(1) צַרַעַת (zāra'ath) is the word translation in Authorized and Revised Versions ‘leprosy’; the root meaning is to smite. The symptoms of zāra'ath are fully described in Leviticus 13, and we have other scattered references to the disease in the OT. To enter into a full examination of OT leprosy would be out of place here, but it may be said that neither true leprosy (in the modern sense) nor any other known disease answers to all the signs described. We must either suppose, as is conceivable but not highly probable, that the disease described in Leviticus 13 has disappeared or greatly changed its character from new environment, or that the term zāra'ath included a great variety of skin diseases, some infectious in the modern sense, but all of them regarded in ancient times as rendering their victims ceremonially impure. Of these diseases, to take a few examples, we seem to be able to recognize psoriasis in the expression ‘a leper white as snow’; favus (a common disease among Eastern Jews to-day) and perhaps ‘ringworm’ in the description of the ‘plague of the head and the beard’ (Lev_13:29-30); and the disease vitiligo in the symptom termed ‘freckled spot’ (בִּזְרֵק, Lev_13:39), the exactly equivalent word بَهَق (bohak) being used for this condition in Palestine and Arabia to-day. On the other hand, there are in the references to zāra'ath an extraordinary absence of the symptoms of true leprosy which will be mentioned lower down; the extremely slow process of this latter disease, and its practically hopeless outlook, ill tallies with either the frequent examinations—at intervals of seven days—or the elaborate directions, evidently meant for use, for restoration of a cured person to the community.

The history of medicine shows that in the undeveloped state of medical science many diseases which a later age learns to differentiate are classed as one disease; of no department has this been truer than of diseases affecting the skin. In the Middle Ages many persons affected with syphilis were put in the lazar hospitals of Northern Europe through the mistaken idea that they were lepers.

(2) λέπρα (meaning ‘rough’ or ‘scaly’) was the name given by the Greek physicians to a disease known to-day as psoriasis. It is a non-contagious, irritating, but by no means fatal disease, in which white scales form on various parts of, and occasionally all over, the body. In such cases the expression ‘a leper white as snow’ might be not inappropriate. The disease is not hereditary nor in any marked degree repulsive, unless, as is unusual, the face is attacked; in this respect it is the very opposite of true leprosy, with which, moreover, it cannot be confused.

In the LXX Septuagint λέπρα is used as the equivalent of zâra’ath; and as the former was well known, the translators apparently regarded this disease as the nearest equivalent to that described in the OT. In the same way the Synoptists, and among them Luke, the ‘beloved physician,’ in using λέπρα and λεπρός, were using words which had a definite meaning to the outside world.

(3) True leprosy—the ἐλεφαντίασις of the Greeks—is certainly no new disease, and references to it are found in Egyptian inscriptions many centuries before the Israelites left Egypt. It is also said that it was known in India at an equally primitive period. Hippocrates appears to refer to it under the name of the ‘Phœnician disease,’ and Galen under the name ‘elephantiasis.’ It is stated by Pliny that it was brought to Europe from Syria by the army of Ptolemy (61 b.c.). From this time references to it are common, but always under the name elephantiasis.

It is evident, therefore, that at the time of the Gospels, λέπρα—in the classical medical sense—was primarily the well-known skin disease psoriasis. At the same time it is highly probable that the disease elephantiasis—true leprosy—together with other skin affections, e.g. vitiligo, favus, etc., were, from the point of view of ceremonial uncleanness, included in the term lepra, the word having, as is usual with medical terms, a much wider signification among the lay public than among the medical authors. The fact that tradition has from the earliest period pointed to true leprosy as the disease of the Bible, certainly makes it probable that it at least was one of the diseases recognized by the Rabbis as zâra'ath; and doubtless its specially horrible and fatal character has caused it to gradually displace all others in the popular mind.

It might be thought that Rabbinical commentaries or existing Jewish custom might help to throw a light on the subject, but neither of these is any real help. The Talmud teaches that zâra'ath refers to any disease with cutaneous eruptions or sores, and indeed some references appear to demonstrate that the writers considered the disease non-contagious; as, for example, the rule that a bridegroom, suspecting himself affected, might wait till seven days after his marriage before reporting his condition. The Rabbinical comments, instead of correlating the Levitical description with known medical facts, are rather engaged in impressing the importance of a literal adherence to the text of the Mosaic law.

Modern custom among the Jews in the East does not seem to view true leprosy with the aversion of even Moslems and Christians. Of six cases of well-marked leprosy among the Jews of Jerusalem which the present writer can recall, only one of them, a stranger from India, was in any way isolated, and he only after he had been in the English Hospital for some days among all the other patients; when he could no longer be kept he was sent to the Leper Hospital, where he died. The other cases, a Russian Jewess, three Spanish Jewesses, and a Spanish Jewish boy, all lived at home and mixed freely with their friends; the boy, indeed, long after he had marked symptoms of anaesthetic leprosy, continued to attend a large Jewish boys' school without any sign of opposition or trouble. The Eastern Jews, on the other hand, manifest at times great fear of the contagiousness of tuberculous, or as they would popularly be called, 'scrofulous' affections of the skin and of the lymphatic glands. These seem by tradition to be recognized as contagious.

When it is remembered that it is only in very recent years, in the life of the present generation of medical men, that the true nature both of leprosy (elephantiasis) and of 'scrofula' has been discovered, it is difficult to believe that the Jews of Palestine, even in NT times, recognized the sharply-defined varieties of disease we do to-day. It is therefore probable that, while the leprosy of the NT certainly included some developments of the disease we now know as psoriasis and allied affections with a scaly eruption, and almost certainly a proportion of cases of 'true leprosy,' it may also have included cases of 'lupus,' 'scrofulous' (i.e. tuberculous) glands, and varieties of parasitic skin affections, such as 'ringworm' and favus, both of which are very common among the Jews of the East to-day.

True leprosy (elephantiasis) has for so many centuries been identified with the disease now called by that name, and, indeed, is likely to be for so many generations, that some description of this disease, especially as it occurs to-day in the Holy Land, is here not out of place. It is a disease of world-wide distribution, though apparently dying out of most European lands, where, as in England and France, it was once rampant. India, China, South Africa, and the Sandwich Islands are to-day the great habitats of leprosy. Climate appears to have no real effect on it. It is not hereditary; the children of lepers, if removed to healthy surroundings at an early age, seldom take the disease, while advance of the disease usually produces sterility. There is no doubt that it is contagious, but only by close personal contact; attendants on lepers run very little risk if they are careful; and they cannot, as was once supposed, carry the contagion to others. Although the almost world-wide custom of isolating lepers is founded upon the doubtful tradition of this being the special and peculiar disease described in the Mosaic law, yet from every point of view this is desirable both for the poor victims themselves, who are always to some degree incapacitated and suffering, and for the sake of their healthy neighbours. Although a leper in the street is no danger to the passer-by, he must in his home be a danger to his family, and no other disease reduces a human being for so many years to such a hideous wreck.

With respect to the ultimate cause of leprosy, Hansen has demonstrated (1871) that it is due to a special micro-organism, the bacillus lepræ, similar in appearance, and to some extent in the action on the human tissues, to the tubercle bacillus. How the poison enters the body is not known. The disease occurs so sporadically that there must be some cause other than contagion; but what this may be has never been proved. The theory recently revived by Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson, F.R.C.S., that the disease is due to a diet of fish, is not borne out by the facts. In Palestine, in particular, the great majority of the lepers have never eaten fish at all, as they come from inland villages: fish is very seldom eaten by the Moslems in Palestine, and the only people who eat it—the Jews regularly, and the Christians at their fasts when living in the cities—suffer least from this disease.

Leprosy manifests itself in three forms: (1) the tubercular or nodular, (2) the anaesthetic, and (3) the mixed. Chronic cases, however they begin, tend to assume in the later stages the third or mixed type.

(1) In the tubercular form, after a prodromal period of indefinite duration during which there is a gradual loss of power and vivacity, obscure pains in the limbs and joints, feverish attacks and loss of appetite, the first definite signs to appear are symmetrical discoloured blotches, especially over the back. These blotches are at the first most marked during feverish attacks. Soon afterwards, definite tubercles, at first pink but later brownish, arise; the skin in these places is thickened and found to be infiltrated. The tubercles have a special tendency to form on the folds of the cheek, the nose, the lips, and the forehead. At this time some amount of ulceration about the soft palate often assists the diagnosis. The nodules enlarge and from time to time ulcerate and become encrusted with discharge. In cases where the face is particularly attacked the expression is entirely altered, and a most characteristic 'lion-like' or

'satyr-like' expression is developed. The leontiasis of Aretaeus and the satyriasis (= satyriasis) of Aristotle (de Gen. [Note: Geneva NT 1557, Bible 1560.] Animal. iv. iii. 22) are both supposed on these grounds to have been true leprosy. As a rule the eyebrows fall out, and the eyes, in addition to suffering from keratitis, become staring in appearance through scarring about the eyelids. The voice is often hoarse, and the breathing loud and wheezing through ulceration of the vocal chords. The hands and feet, sometimes the first to suffer, always in time become ulcerated, though the most severe changes in them are probably secondary to nerve lesions. The disease from first to last has an average duration of nine years; if it runs its full course and is not terminated, as is usual, by the onset of tuberculosis, it leads to gradual mental decay, coma, and death.

(2) The anaesthetic variety, if not complicated, is not nearly so horrible nor so fatal. Here the incidence of the disease falls on the nerve trunks, which may quite early in the disease be felt thickened from inflammation due to bacterial infection. The prodromal symptoms are similar to those described, but the onset of the disease is often not remarked until the patient finds that certain parts of the body are without sensation. Thus it is narrated of Father Damien that, although he had vague symptoms which made him suspicious, he was not convinced that he was a leper until he found he had placed his feet in scalding water without feeling the heat. As the disease progresses, the nerve lesions cause various discoloured patches and blisters on the skin, wasting of muscles and contraction of the tendons, a peculiar claw-like appearance of the hands,—the result of partial paralysis,—disfigurement of the nails, deep chronic ulceration of the foot, and finally progressive loss of various fingers and toes, and even of the feet and occasionally of the hands. Many of these later changes also occur in the tubercular form as the nerves become affected. An anaesthetic case which keeps to this type may last 20, 30, or even more years, and some such cases become 'cured,' that is, the disease actually ceases to progress, though the results of its work can never be remedied.

(3) In Palestine, as has been already suggested, the great majority of cases are of the mixed form; cases of pure anaesthetic type are exceptional.

Leprosy in modern Palestine is not a common disease, but is prominently to the front from three causes: firstly, because of the interest excited in Christians of all Churches, and the special appeal made to their charitable feelings from the traditional view that these sufferers are the veritable lepers of the OT and NT; secondly, because its results are so manifest and repulsive, and its progress so slow, that a comparatively small number of cases are very much in evidence; and, lastly, because practically all the lepers in the land are segregated together by order of the Government in a few chief towns, all resorted to by travellers. There the lepers, being unable to work for a living, sit in groups in prominent places, and endeavour by an exhibition of the miseries of their condition to touch the sympathy of the passer-by. In Jerusalem, at any rate, they collect in this way large sums for their community. They live in huts provided by the Government at Silwân (near Jerusalem), Ramleh, and Nâblus. At Damascus also there is a community, some members of which are also drawn from Palestine, but the majority from Syria and around Damascus; the traditional 'House of Naaman' is their home. In addition to these, there is the voluntary community—now numbering nearly 60—at the excellent Moravian Hospital in Jerusalem; the patients there are not allowed to go begging, and are employed in various ways on the premises. Including these last, there must be between 100 and 120 lepers in Jerusalem, some 25 at Ramleh, about 40 at Nâblus; altogether, allowing for some Palestine lepers in the Damascus community, there are not more than 200 known victims of this disease in the country. It is quite possible that sometimes cases may be hidden away, as with the Jewish cases above mentioned, by their relatives; but this cannot often happen in the villages, as the village sheikhs are very prompt in detecting early signs of the disease, and a suspected case is soon expelled from the community. Sometimes the heads of the village make mistakes; cases of this sort have come to the medical officer of the Leper Hospital in Jerusalem, and their friends learning that they have been mistaken, they have been restored to their rights.

It has been mentioned that one of the striking things about leprosy is that it occurs so sporadically. It is not the rule in Palestine, at any rate, that whole villages or families become leprosy, but a case arises here and there. To illustrate this, we give a list of villages from which came some 60 cases that were in the Moravian Hospital during 1903. They are as follows:—From Ramallah and 'Ain Arîk, 3 cases each; from Zeta, Bait Ammar, Nahalîn, Saidna Ali, ed-Dîr, Deir Diwân, and Nazareth, 2 cases each; from Abu Dîs, 'Ain Kairem, Bîr Zait, Bait Ummar, Bait Jebrîn, Bettîr, Beita, Biddu, Bait Hanîna, Bait Jala, Bait Safafa, 'Asîreh, Dûra, Jerusalem, Feddar, Yasîneh, 'Allâr, Mesar'a, Fara'un, Marassa, Kefrenji, Kefr Akâb, Kefr Hâris, Shafât, es-Salt, and Jummain, 1 each. In addition there were 3 Bedawîn from scattered tribes, one gipsy, one case from Mosul, and two from Greece. Any one who will consult a map of modern Palestine will appreciate from how wide an area, both W. and E. of the Jordan, these cases come. Probably there is no district that does not furnish cases at some time.

The only kind of treatment that can alleviate the disease is a well-managed Leper Home. In the Jerusalem Leper Hospital (founded in 1867 and formally taken over by the Moravian Brethren in 1881) all that medical science and Christian kindness can accomplish is done.

Leprosy in the Gospels.—It has been often pointed out that, whereas the cure of disease in general is called 'healing', (ἰᾶσθαι), that of the lepers is called 'cleansing' ( καθαρίζειν). This was, no doubt, appropriate on account of the very evident restoration of cleanness of skin, but primarily because the miracle enabled the leper to become ceremonially clean. Doubtless the lepers drifting about the land had intractable skin diseases, and as they were shut out from the temple, the synagogues, certainly in all the towns, and to a large extent from the social life of their fellow-beings, their lot was truly pitiable. Their 'cleansing' meant much more than getting rid of a disagreeable and often, doubtless, painful disease, repulsive to all their fellow-men; it meant restoration to the worship and service of God.

Of lepers mentioned in the NT we have but one named, Simon of Bethany (Mat_26:6, Mar_14:3), probably a grateful recipient of the Saviour's mercy. Tradition has made the Lazarus of the parable a leper, and the terms lazzaro for leper and lazar-house for leper hospital were a result of this. Also the order of the Knights of Lazarus, founded during the Crusades, made the care of lepers one of their special duties, and they had always a leper as their Grand Master. But though Lazarus was 'full of sores,' the very account in the parable that he lay in such intimate contact with passers-by would, apart from the express omission of the statement in the parable, make his being a leper highly improbable.

In spite of the great prominence given to the cleansing of lepers both in Jesus' account of His own works (Mat_11:5, Luk_7:22) and in His directions to His disciples (Mat_10:8), we have only two actual incidents described. (1) The incident of the man whom Jesus touched, with the words, 'I will, be thou clean,' and whose grateful excess of zeal prevented Jesus from entering that 'certain city,' and drove Him to seek seclusion in the wilderness (Mat_8:2 || Mar_1:42 || Luk_5:12). (2) The story of the nine thankless lepers and the grateful tenth, who was a Samaritan (Luk_17:11 ff.). It is noticeable that he turned back because he was healed (ἰᾶσθαι); but he was not yet finally cleansed (καθαρίζειν), because he had not yet been to the priest; unless, indeed, it is because he was a Samaritan that he is spoken of as healed rather than cleansed.

⚠️ Letters

LETTERS.—The word γράμματα (Joh 7:15) may be intended to indicate literature in general, as it might do in Act 26:24. But to the ordinary Jew γρ. were practically constituted exclusively by the Sacred Scriptures, certain esteemed Apocryphal books, and the Rabbinical commentaries upon them. The surprise of the question recorded in the reference suggests consideration of the amount of human learning Jesus possessed.

With the rudiments of the Law every Jew was made thoroughly and intimately conversant from his earliest intelligent years (see Education). The education of the Jewish child had the primary purpose of enabling him to read the passages which it was essential for him to know for the proper discharge of his religious duties. Beyond this elementary knowledge comparatively few carried their studies. It was, indeed, the ideal of Judaism that every Israelite should have a professional acquaintance with the Law in its details. But only a small fraction attended the schools of the scribes at which advanced instruction was given in its more recondite matters and the commentaries upon them contained in the Midrash and other Rabbinic books. It would seem from the surprise-expressed in this question that Jesus had not prosecuted such studies, at least in the recognized schools, whether from disinclination or from poverty which prevented Him from paying the fees exacted in spite of the understanding that such instruction should be gratuitous. There are convincing indications, however, that Jesus was to some extent familiar with the literature studied in the schools, both from His direct reference to passages contained in it, and from striking parallelisms in language and thought between various sayings of His and maxims of uncanonical books such as Sirach and the Wisdom of Solomon.* [Note: With Mat 6:7, cf. Sir 7:14; Mat 6:14 (Mar 11:26), cf. Sir 28:2-4; Mat 6:20, cf. Sir 29:11; Mat 7:1-2, cf. Sir 31:15; Mat 19:12, cf. Wis 3:14; Mat 27:43; Mat 27:55, cf. Wis 2:16 to Wis 18:20; Mar 9:44, cf. Sir 7:17; Luk 11:41, cf. Sir 3:30; Luk 12:16-20, cf. Sir 5:1; Sir 11:18-19; Joh 17:19, cf. Sir 36:4.] He is also evidently acquainted with the kind of teaching supplied by the scribes. In the apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy, Jesus is credited with an intimate and astounding acquaintance with 'learning,' partly derived from the reading of books. The bestowal of the title 'Rabbi' upon Him implies that, though not having studied after the usual manner, He was recognized to possess learning. But He Himself in His reply accepts the implication of the question that His teaching was not derived from any human source, but was the immediate communication from His heavenly Father. See also Learning.

Levelling

LEVELLING.—1. In mountainous countries like Palestine landslips are not uncommon, and in this way roads are blocked, or obstructed by falling débris. The drenching rains loosen the stones on the hillsides and send them rolling down to the plains, and the swollen burns and torrents cut new channels for themselves, and dam up old ones, so that familiar paths not infrequently become obliterated. Besides that, the farmers in some places are in the habit of gathering the stones from the fields and throwing them out on the highway, thus making the roads both dangerous and uncomfortable for travellers. It was needful, therefore, to have the roads restored by removing the obstacles and filling up the inequalities. When a sovereign rode forth, a company always went before him to clear the way: hence, ‘Prepare ye the way of the people: cast up, cast up the highway: gather out the stones’ (Isa 62:10), and, ‘A voice crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight’ (Mat 3:3, adapted from Isa 40:3). When Ibrahim Pasha proposed to visit certain places in Lebanon, the emirs and sheikhs sent out a general proclamation commanding the people to prepare the way. The same took place in 1845 when the Sultan visited Brusa.

2. Of the Temple, Jesus said, ‘There shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down’ (Mat 24:2, Mar 13:2, Luk 21:6). This prophecy was fulfilled when the Temple was destroyed in 70 a.d. With the levelling of the sacred building to the ground there came an end to the Ceremonial Law so long cherished by the Jews, and this paved the way for a wider acceptance of the gospel of Christ (Rom 5:12, 1Co 3:23).

Levirate Law

LEVIRATE LAW (Lat. levir, 'a husband's brother') regulated the marriage of a man with his dead brother's widow. In the story of Tamar and Judah (Genesis 38) there is record of a marriage of this type, and at certain stages of civilization the Levirate marriage was a widespread custom.† [Note: Westermarck, The History of Human Marriage, London, 1891, pp. 510-514.] Among the Jews the law was laid down that 'if brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child (son), the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother ... shall take her to him to wife' (Deu_25:5). It almost seems, however, that the Levirate custom was not permitted by later legislation (Lev_18:16; Lev_20:21); but it has been suggested (1) that the forbidden marriage of that legislation was one between a man and the wife of his living brother;* [Note: Note to Deu_25:5 ff. in Steuernagel, 'Deuteronomium und Josua' (Nowack's Hdkom. zum AT, Göttingen, 1900).] and (2) that the custom consecrated in Dt. was the exception to the general law set forth in Leviticus.† [Note: Driver, Deuteronomy, p. 285; note to Lev_18:16 in Dillmann, Exodus und Leviticus, Leipzig, 1897.] The object of the Levirate marriage (Deu_25:6) was to secure that the firstborn of the new union should succeed in the name of the dead brother, whose name thereby might not be blotted out from Israel. In the earlier ages of Judaism there was no clear conception of personal immortality; and the Levirate law was doubtless framed so that there might be the survival through posterity of the name of the representative of a family.

For the statement of a problem regarding the resurrection, propounded to Jesus (Mat_22:23-33, Mar_12:18-27, Luk_20:27-38), the Levirate law was used by the Sadducees, who are described by the Synoptists as saying that there is no resurrection, and by Josephus (Ant. xviii. i. 4) as holding 'that souls die with the bodies.' Regarding as obligatory only those observances which are found in the written word, they rejected those derived from the traditions of their forefathers. The Pharisees, on the other hand, accepted such traditions, and with them a belief in the doctrine of the resurrection (cf. Josephus Ant. xiii. x. 6). This doctrine, taught clearly in Daniel 12, was made popular in Jewish theological discussions by the Book of Enoch,‡ [Note: Charles, The Book of Enoch, p. 52 (Oxford, 1893).] and suggested the problem set forth by the Sadducees, who evidently sought by the authority of Moses to discredit a doctrine held by the Pharisees and taught by Jesus. In stating their problem they brought forward a case of seven brothers who one after the other married the same woman. It is not necessary to take the case as one of actual fact, since the phrase $\pi\alpha\theta\omicron\ \eta\mu\acute{\iota}\nu$ in Mt. may have been used merely for literary effect.

In each of the Synoptics the setting forth of the problem is prefaced by a statement of the Levirate law as spoken or written by Moses (Mt. has Μωϋσῆς εἶπε, but in Mk. and Lk. it is Μωϋσῆς ἔγραψεν ἡμῖν). In none of the three statements are the ipsissima verba of Deu_25:5 used, and Mt. borrows the words ἐπιγαμβρεύσει καὶ ἀναστήσει σπέρμα from the LXX Septuagint version of Gen_38:8.

The problem propounded by the Sadducees may be thus stated:—The Levirate law was enacted by Moses, and there was a case of seven brothers who in obedience to it married, one after the other, the same woman, who herself died after the death of the last of the seven. In the resurrection, since they all had her, whose wife shall she be of the seven? Jesus in His answer to the Sadducees did not discuss the justice or injustice of the Levirate law, or examine the purpose of Moses in decreeing it; but, asserting that they had erred, not knowing the Scriptures or the power of God, He showed them that in the resurrection men neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven; and then He proceeded to declare that belief in immortality is involved in our consciousness of the being of God.

Levites

LEVITES.—According to one line of tradition, the Levites were appointed to assist the priests (Num_3:9; Num_8:19; Num_18:1-6), but were not themselves, like Aaron and his sons, to approach unto the most holy things (Num_4:19); yet according to another representation the priesthood belonged to them as an inheritance (Deu_33:8-11, Jos_18:7). Whatever may have been the origin and date of the distinction between priest and Levite, it existed in the post-exilic period, since it was recognized in NT times. The Levites are to be classed among the Temple officials, and to their office with its specific duties (Num_1:50-51; Num_3:8) they were formally set apart (Num_8:6-7). Among their duties was the instruction of the people* [Note: Schürer, HJP ii. i. 306 ff.] (Neh_8:9, 2Ch_30:22; 2Ch_35:3) and ‘the killing of the passovers for every one that was not clean,’ as also the handing of the blood to the priests to be sprinkled by them according to the Law† [Note: Keim, Jesus of Nazara, v. 276.] (2Ch_30:16-17).

The relation of assistantship which associated the Levites with the priests was similar to that which connected deacons with bishops in the Christian Church; and it is not improbable that that connexion was suggested by the arrangement of the functions of the Temple officers with which the Jewish converts to Christianity were familiar.‡

[Note: Hatch, The Organization of the Early Christian Churches, 52.]

In the Gospels there are only two places where the word 'Levite' is found. In the first of these, the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luk_10:30-35), a priest and a Levite, representatives of the religion of Israel and at the same time examples of Jewish traditionalism, are unfavourably contrasted with a Samaritan, one of a people with whom the Jews had no dealings. The parable is the answer of Jesus to the lawyer who asked, 'Who is my neighbour?' and it seems evident that the Levite, described by Jesus, when he looked on the wounded man and passed by on the other side, recognized that he was not a Jew, and therefore not a neighbour to be humanely treated according to the commandment, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Lev_19:18). The Levite, it may be concluded, accepted a Jewish traditional conception of 'neighbour' which excluded all those who were not of Israel. Clement of Alexandria wrote that Jesus, 'on His interlocutor inquiring, "Who is my neighbour?" did not, in the same way with the Jews, specify the blood-relation, or the fellow-citizen, or the proselyte, or him that had been similarly circumcised, or the man who uses one and the same law.'§ [Note: Ante-Nicene Christian Library, xxii. 205.]

In the Fourth Gospel (Joh_1:19) the distinction between priest and Levite is made by naming together the representatives of these classes, who were sent from Jerusalem to ask John the question, 'Who art thou?' The Levites, as teachers of the people, would be deemed qualified to judge of claims of Messiahship (so Hengstenberg and Godet, but see B. Weiss, ad loc.); but it is significant that the mission to John of priests and Levites, who were officially connected with the Passover ceremonies, is recorded, and in it alone, in the Gospel which, according to the theory held by many critics, identifies Christ with the Paschal lamb. They were told by John that he was not the Christ; and immediately after the account of their interview with him there is the statement that he, seeing Jesus, said, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Joh_1:29).

LIBERALITY.—1. This may be considered to begin when the requirements of the Law have been fulfilled. Thus the payment of tithe, which in our Lord's time was evidently regarded as an ideal (cf. Luk 18:12), cannot be described as liberality, though it seems certain that many of the wealthier among the 'dispersed' regarded it as a duty to send, by way of Temple tribute, generous and even munificent contributions, far in excess of the legal requirement. These were collected at different centres abroad, and then sent by certain specially appointed 'ambassadors' to Jerusalem, where they were placed in three large chests within the Temple, which were opened with great solemnity at certain seasons of the year. Apart from the Temple tribute, the treasury was enriched by voluntary offerings of different kinds; and out of this grew the abuse which our Lord denounces in Mat 15:5-6. It seems probable that the faithful rarely visited the Temple, at least on Sabbaths and feasts, without making some contribution to its revenues. Though votive offerings cannot be regarded, strictly speaking, as instances of liberality, and led to abuses against which the more devout Rabbis protested, the motives which prompted them may not infrequently have been generous and sincere.

In the Court of the Women, within the Temple, were the shopharoth, or 'trumpets,' vessels whose shape is indicated by their name, in which contributions for religious purposes and for charitable objects might be placed. The contents of these were at fixed times placed in the treasury; and in addition to these there was a chamber where donations to be applied to the maintenance and education of poor children might be given. There is reason to believe that, whatever the motives in individual cases might be, there was a constant flow of liberality through these channels (cf. Mar 12:41, Luk 21:1). On the wealth of the Temple treasury and the pious purposes for which it was partly intended, cf. 2Ma 3:6; 2Ma 3:10. Whatever may have been the greedy and grasping spirit of the Pharisees, whose extortions our Lord denounces (Mat 23:14), it is probable that the Deuteronomic precept (Deu 15:7-11) received a generous fulfilment among all classes.

2. Christ's teaching as to liberality.—(a) Of mind. The whole life and teaching of Christ may be regarded as a protest against prejudice and narrow-mindedness, and therefore as an appeal for liberality. His injunctions to love enemies (Mat 5:44-46, Luk 6:27-28), to refrain from passing judgment on others (Mat 7:1-5, Luk 6:37), and indirectly, the parable of the Good Samaritan, afford instances in which He condemns the spirit of prejudice and inculcates an open mind and generous bearing towards others.

(b) In the use of wealth, etc. The claim to which no follower of Christ is to turn a deaf ear is that of need. Need, as evidenced by asking, is a sufficient ground for giving (Mat 5:42). The measure of our giving is to be in proportion to the extent of our own blessing (Luk 11:41; Luk 12:33), and although the command 'Freely ye have received, freely give' (Mat_10:8) was spoken with reference to the use of the miraculous powers given to the disciples, we cannot doubt that it extends also to all endowments of wealth or talents wherewith God has blessed us. Liberality in the form of almsgiving is to be without ostentation (Mat_6:1-2; Mat_6:4); its reward is the heavenly treasure 'that faileth not' (Luk_12:33), and a generous return, here or hereafter, for the right use of wealth (Luk_6:38; Luk_16:9). The complete bestowal of earthly possessions on the poor, accompanied by 'taking up the cross' and following Christ, which is required of the rich young ruler in addition to the observance of the commandments (Mat_19:21, Mar_10:21, Luk_18:22), is not necessarily a rule of universal obligation, but evidently intended to meet this special case; underlying it is the idea, never absent from our Lord's teaching as to the use of wealth, that wealth is a trust from God, and to be renounced when it becomes a hindrance to spiritual life. While liberality is assured of a reward, the reward, or even return, is not to be the object of the giver (Luk_6:35, where μηδὲν ἀπελπίζοντες may be 'hoping for nothing again,' as in Authorized Version ; or 'never despairing,' as in Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ; or, if read μηδένα, 'driving no one to despair,' or 'despairing of no man,' as in (Revised Version margin)).* [Note: One of the few sayings of our Lord quoted outside the Gospels commends liberality (Act_20:35).]

There are three utterances of our Lord with reference to liberality to the Temple and the purposes connected therewith. The gift is to be brought to the altar only after reconciliation to an offended brother (Mat_5:23-24); outward liberality being thus shown to be unacceptable to God unless the heart be filled with the spirit of love. Natural duties are not to be set aside by a liberality which becomes sinful (Mat_15:5) in devoting to the Temple what ought to be given to the support of parents. The teaching of the incident of the widow's two mites is best summed up in the words of Ambrose: 'It is not considered how much is given, but how much remains behind.' The answer of John the Baptist (Luk_3:11) may be quoted as in accordance with the teaching of our Lord: liberality is here shown to be an evidence of repentance, and a practical testimony to a change of heart. LIBERTY.—Christ and His first disciples clearly regarded liberty as an essential of the highest religious life. He begins His mission at Nazareth with the words of Isaiah that His work was ‘to set at liberty them that are bruised’ (Luk 4:18). By His contrast of the Mosaic law with His own ‘I say unto you’ of Mat 5:22; Mat 5:28; Mat 5:39, He declares His disciples to be free of the ancient law; their worship no longer fettered by place (Joh 4:21); their very Sabbath, which had held them together in the Captivity, an institution to be sanely used for any kind of good work and any sinless pleasure (Mar 2:27, Mat 12:8, Luk 5:1-5). New wine-skins must be made for the new wine (Mar 2:22, Luk 6:38). The disciple must hold himself entirely at liberty from the things of the world for the world’s sake; he must stand ‘with loins girded about and lamp burning’ (Luk 12:35), unhindered by multitudinous possessions (Luk 12:15), not anxious as to the lesser matters of clothing, food, and shelter (Mat 6:25, Luk 12:22), taking ‘no bread, no wallet, no money,’ whereon he may come to depend too much (Luk 9:3; Luk 10:4, Mat 10:9, Mar 6:8). If the rich young man would be perfect, he must learn to be the free master of his riches, not their slave, even though he may have entirely to disperse them in order to assure himself of his spiritual liberty (Mat 19:21, Luk 18:22). In all things the disciple must be absolutely free for his mission, and ‘leave the dead to bury their own dead’ (Mat 8:22, Luk 9:60). His utterance itself must partake of the same liberty, not crippled by the slow movement of the intellectual faculties, but made vivid by immediate contact with the Holy Spirit: ‘Settle it therefore in your hearts not to meditate beforehand how to answer’ (Luk 21:14, Mar 13:11, Mat 10:19). Christ promises that the disciple who prizes His word shall come to know the greater fulness of truth, and that revelation shall liberate him; he shall no longer be a bond-servant of sin (it would be impossible, having once seen the light); he shall be free with all the liberties of sonship (Joh 8:32; Joh 8:34-36).

Jesus Himself exhibits the surprises which the ‘law of liberty’ (Jam 1:25) has within it. He tells of the master who, finding his servants alert and faithful, flings conventionality to the winds, ‘girds himself, makes them sit down to meat, and himself serves them’ (Luk 12:37). He tells His host that it were a higher thing to dare to invite, not his relatives and wealthy friends, but the poor, the lame, the blind, who could never recompense him (Luk 14:12). In dealing with the woman taken in sin,* [Note: Although no part of the correct text of John 8, the Pericope Adulteræ probably embodies a true reminiscence of an incident in our Lord’s ministry.] He takes the course of the moment, as novel as it is searching in its free way (Joh 8:1-11). The cruse of precious ointment is looked at as the symbol of an affectionate impulse, more to be valued than a calculated act of philanthropy—selling and giving to the poor (Mar 14:5, Mat 26:6-12, Joh 12:5). Pharisees are startled at His frank intercourse with publicans and sinners (Mar 2:16, Luk 5:30; Luk 15:2). In vain He likens the liberty of the Spirit to the wind ‘that bloweth where it listeth’ (Joh 3:8); few can understand the variety of the workings of the Divine Spirit in man, Wisdom only being justified by 'all her children' (Mar 11:19, Luk 7:35), to the confusion often of those who cannot comprehend a John the Baptist abstaining and the Son of man 'eating and drinking.' There are times when Christ seems deliberately to lead His hearers, and especially the formalists among them, into problems that find no solution in 'the Law,' but that compel an exercise of liberty of judgment, as in the 'Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's' (Luk 20:25, Mat 22:21), 'the baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men?' (Luk 20:4), and the question, 'Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath day, or not?' (Mar 3:4, Luk 6:9; Luk 14:3). The principle of true liberty, as our Lord taught and lived it, would go far in encouraging the believers in 'the reunion of Christendom,' especially such a command as 'Forbid him not: for he that is not against you is for you' (Luk 9:50).

That the Apostles so understood Christ can hardly be questioned. Throughout the NT liberty (ἐλευθερία, and its even more confident form ἐξουσία) runs as a golden thread, distinguishing the New Dispensation from the Old. There is the same joyous exercise of the power of a new life that Christ foretold. The writers have met one of the deepest problems of philosophy (man's freedom of will), and have boldly pronounced upon it. St. Paul has no hesitation in asserting man's natural liberty in the light of the spiritual liberty now made known through Jesus Christ. He claims the right (ἐξουσία) of free action in the common affairs of life, in food, in marriage, in the pastor not necessarily labouring manually, but sharing in material provision in return for his spiritual toiling (1Co 9:4-6; 1Co 9:12 bis), just as St. John will claim for the purified soul the same liberty (ἐξουσία) of approach to the tree of life and entry by the portals of the eternal city (Rev 22:14). Perhaps this particular word is most suggestively used in 1Co 8:9 'Take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to the weak,' i.e. lest the very strength and assurance of the new-found liberty may lead you to flourish it boastfully, thus courting temptation yourself, and perhaps ruining the weaker brethren, who, seeing you able to join in certain practices unharmed, will be tempted to copy you, to their own hurt. It is clear that in the first days liberty was fundamental with the Christian. Each man has to 'work out his own salvation' (Php 2:12), to be 'fully assured in his own mind,' to 'give account of himself to God' (Rom 14:5; Rom 14:12). Christians are the free citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, children of liberty (Gal 4:26). For abiding freedom did Christ set them free (Gal 5:1), calling them into liberty (Gal 5:13). Henceforth no Mosaic veil of past traditions, laws, rites, can bind them. When Moses is read, it shall be with no hindering timidities (2Co 3:15 ff.) of the letter, but in the reverent freedom of the spirit (2Co 3:6-8). The disciple feels himself freed from that yoke 'which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear' (Act 15:10). The Law has but led into a larger world, in which is prized 'the liberty which we have in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3:24; Gal 2:4). The escape has been from the bondage of a religion of fear into the liberty of a faith that discerns in God the Eternal Fatherhood (Rom_8:15). So St. Paul prays that the word may have ‘free course,’ may run (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885) (τρεχῆν), spreading the gospel abroad with a free unhindered spirit (2Th_3:1), and leaving each worker to develop his own methods (1Co_9:1) and rules of conduct—‘Why is my liberty judged by another man’s conscience?’ (10:29). But this does not imply licence. That his liberty is Christian implies a limitation. He is to be ‘as free, yet not using his liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the bond-servant of God’ (1Pe_2:16), having no part with those worldly ones so ready in ‘promising liberty while they themselves are bond-servants of corruption’ (2Pe_2:19). He knows that he will be judged in his speech and conduct by the law of liberty which has taken the place of the ancient law (Jam_2:12). Being made free from sin he is still a servant, but of righteousness, a ‘servant to God’ (Rom_6:18; Rom_6:20; Rom_6:22), and from the ‘bondage of corruption’ has entered into the ‘liberty of the glory of the children of God’ (Rom_8:21). This liberty has been the exchange of a hateful for a precious bondage. If you were actually a slave, you are now ‘the Lord’s freedman,’ if you were free, you are now ‘Christ’s bond-servant’ (1Co_7:21-22), and that service is the ministry of the brethren, a bondage into which St. Paul boasts and glories that he had brought himself (1Co_9:19). He has found a new law in place of the ancient prohibitory ‘law of sin and of death,’ and this ‘law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus’ has made him free (Rom_8:2). The practical comment of the Apostles upon this doctrine of the Gospels indicates also the immeasurable indebtedness of Christianity to that principle of liberty with which Christ inspired His disciples.* [Note: The various terms used, and the many English equivalents, will be found fully treated in Hastings’ DB, artt. ‘Free,’ ‘Freedom,’ etc.]

☩ Life

LIFE (ζωή).—The term applied by Jesus, alike in the Synoptic and the Johannine records of His teaching, to the supreme blessing mediated by Him to men. Certain elements in the conception are common to the two records, but their differences are so marked that it will be necessary to consider them separately.

1. The idea of Life in the Synoptic teaching is substantially that of the OT, unfolded in all its potential wealth of meaning. Hebrew thought, averse to metaphysical speculation, conceived of life as the sum of energies which make up man's actual existence. The soul separated from the body did not cease to be, but it forfeited its portion in the true life. It either departed to the shadowy world of Sheol, or, according to the later view of Ecclesiastes, was reabsorbed (?) into the Divine Being,—'returned to God who gave it' (Ecc_12:7). Thus the highest good was simply 'length of days,'—the continuance of the bodily existence right on to its natural term. Two factors, however, were latent in the OT conception from the beginning, and became more and more prominent in the course of the after-development. (1) The radical element in life is activity. Mere physical being is distinguished from that essential 'life' which consists in the unrestricted play of all the energies, especially of the higher and more characteristic. In the loftier passages of the Psalms, more particularly, the idea of 'life' has almost always a pregnant sense. It is associated with joy, peace, prosperity, wisdom, righteousness; man 'lives' according as he has free scope for the activities which are distinctive of his spiritual nature. God Himself is emphatically the 'living One,' as contrasted with men in their limitation and helplessness. (2) Since God alone possesses life in the highest sense, fellowship with Him is the one condition on which men can obtain it. 'By every word of God doth man live' (Deu_8:3). 'With thee is the fountain of life' (Psa_36:9). In the higher regions of OT thought, life and communion with God are interchangeable ideas. The belief in immortality is never expressly stated, but, as Jesus Himself indicates, it was implicit in this conception of a God who was not the God of the dead but of the living. See art. Living.

Jesus accepted the idea of life as it had come to Him through the OT. To Him also life is primarily the physical existence (cf. Mat_6:25 'Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat and drink,' etc.), and He advances on this conception along ethical and religious lines, in the same manner as the Psalmists and Prophets. (1) He distinguishes between the essential 'life' and the outward subsidiary things with which it is so easily confused. 'The life is more than meat' (Luk_12:23). 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth' (v. 15). 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his life?' (Mar_8:36). (2) Thus He arrives at the idea of something central and inalienable which constitutes the reality of life. This He discovers in the moral activity. The body with its manifold faculties is only the organ by which man accomplishes his true task of obedience to God. Meat, raiment, and all the rest are necessary, 'but seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.' (3) In this way He is led to the conception of a higher, spiritual life, gained through the sacrifice of the lower. 'If a man hate not his own life, he cannot be my disciple' (Luk 14:26). 'He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' (Mat 10:39; Mat 16:25).

Here, however, we become aware of the difficulty which meets us under different forms throughout our Lord's teaching. In His account of the supreme blessing for which lower things must be sacrificed, He seems to pass abruptly from ethical to eschatological ideas. 'Life' is a reward laid up for the righteous in the world to come. It is regarded sometimes as a new state of being (Mat 25:46), sometimes as a sort of prize that can be bestowed in the same manner as houses and goods and lands (Mar 10:30). The precise meaning to be attached to 'the world to come' in which this 'life' will be imparted, depends on our interpretation of the general conception of the Kingdom of God. Our Lord would appear to waver between the idea of a world beyond death and that of a Messianic age or aeon, apocalyptically revealed on earth. In either case, however, He thinks of 'life' as of something still in the future, the peculiar blessing of the realized Kingdom of God.

This future possession is defined more particularly in several passages as 'eternal life,' and the epithet might appear at first sight to imply a distinction. We find, however, on closer examination that the term 'life' itself usually involves the emphatic meaning. 'This do and thou shalt live' (Luk 10:28) is our Lord's reply to the inquiry concerning 'eternal life.' So when He says, 'It is better to enter into life halt or maimed' (Mat 18:8, Mar 9:43), or 'Narrow is the way that leadeth unto life' (Mat 7:14), it is evidently the future blessing that is in His mind. There is good ground for the conjecture that Jesus Himself never used the expression 'eternal life.'

Since the ethical and eschatological ideas are denoted by the same word, we are justified in assuming that in the mind of Jesus they were bound up with one another. The 'life' which is projected into the future and described figuratively as a gift bestowed from without, is in the last resort the life of moral activity. This becomes more apparent when we take account of certain further elements in our Lord's teaching.

(a) The condition on which the future reward is given is faithful performance of the moral task in the present. Those shall 'live' who keep the commandments. The narrow way that leads to life is the way of obedience and sacrifice. By voluntary loss of earthly things in the cause of Christ, the disciples will gain 'life' (Mar 10:30). The apocalyptic imagery does not conceal from us the essential thought of Jesus, that the promised 'life' is nothing but the outcome and fulfilment of a moral obedience begun on earth.

(b) Life is not only a future fulfilment, but has a real beginning in the present. Thus in the saying, 'Follow me, and let the dead bury their dead' (Mat 8:22 = Luk 9:60), Jesus implies that the disciples even now enter into possession of a new and higher life. They are the 'living' as opposed to the children of this world, who are spiritually dead. The same thought appears in the parable of the Prodigal Son: 'he was dead and is alive again' (Luk_15:32). Life in its full reality is the blessing of the world to come, but it will be different in degree, not in kind, from the present life of true discipleship.

(c) One element is common to the two types of 'life,' and marks their ultimate identity. The future consummation, described by Jesus in vivid pictorial language, is in its substance a closer fellowship with God. In the Kingdom which He anticipated, the pure in heart were to see God (Mat_5:8); those who hungered and thirsted after righteousness were to be satisfied with God's presence (v. 6). This perfect communion with God is the supreme reward laid up for the believer. It constitutes the inner meaning and content of the future Life. In like manner the present life of moral obedience is in its essence a life of fellowship with God. The aim of Jesus is to bring His disciples even now into such a harmony with the Divine will that they may be children of their Father who is in heaven, resembling Him and holding real communion with Him. The eschatological idea of life thus resolves itself at its centre into the purely ethical and religious. The Kingdom is already come when God's will is done on earth as it is in heaven.

Jesus is Himself the Mediator of the new life. He imparts to His disciples His own consciousness of God's presence and Fatherhood. He inspires in them a faith and obedience which without Him would have been for ever impossible. Through knowledge of Him and participation in His spirit, they enter into that fellowship with God which is eternal life. See Mediator.

2. In the Fourth Gospel the idea of Life is much more prominent than in the Synoptics. The Evangelist expressly states (Joh_20:31) that he has 'written these things that believing ye may have life,' and this statement of his main intention is fully borne out by the detailed study of the Gospel. The teaching of Jesus, as he records it, centres wholly on the subject of Life.

This in itself need not be regarded as a breach with the authentic tradition. We have seen that in the Synoptics also the idea of Life lies at the heart of our Lord's teaching, since life is the peculiar blessing of the Kingdom of God. St. John, after his manner, detaches the essential thought from the eschatological framework. The future 'kingdom' becomes simply 'life.'

The idea of Life as a present possession (already implicit in the Synoptic teaching) becomes in the Fourth Gospel central and determinative. 'He that believeth on the Son hath (even now) everlasting life' (Joh_3:36). 'He that heareth my word ... is passed out of death into life' (Joh_5:24). The whole purpose of the work of Christ, as conceived by the Evangelist, was to communicate to His disciples, here and now, the eternal life. To those who have received His gift the death of the body is only a physical incident, a 'falling asleep' (Joh_11:11). The true death is the state of sin and privation, out of which they have been delivered, once and for all, in the act of surrender to Christ.

Isolated passages in the Gospel might seem to conflict with this, the characteristic and prevailing view. In the 6th chapter more especially, the conception of Life as a spiritual possession in the present appears side by side with repeated allusions to a resurrection 'at the last day' (Joh_6:39; Joh_6:44; Joh_6:54). These allusions are partly to be explained as reminiscences of an earlier type of doctrine, not completely in harmony with the writer's own; such 'concessions' to a traditional belief meet us continually in this Gospel. At the same time, they serve to emphasize a real, though secondary, aspect of John's own teaching. He anticipates in the future world a full manifestation of the Life which under earthly conditions is necessarily hidden. For the believer, as for Christ Himself, the escape from this world and its limitations marks the entrance into a larger activity and 'glory' (cf. Joh_14:2-3).

The Evangelist nowhere attempts to define his conception of Life. The great saying, 'This is life eternal,' etc. (Joh_17:3), cannot be construed as a definition. It only declares that the knowledge of God through Jesus Christ carries with it the assurance of life (cf. 'His commandment is life everlasting' [Joh_12:50]). The nature of the life is indicated only in vague and half-figurative terms. It is indestructible (Joh_6:58, Joh_11:26), satisfies all spiritual thirst and hunger (Joh_6:35, Joh_4:14), is the source of light (Joh_1:4, Joh_8:12). But, while little is said by way of express definition, the general import of the Johannine conception is sufficiently clear. The Life which Christ communicates is the absolute, Divine Life. 'As the Father has life in himself, so he hath given the Son to have life in himself' (Joh_5:26., cf. Joh_1:4). It is assumed that in God and in the Logos, who is one with Him, a life resides which is different in kind from that of men, and is the real, the 'eternal' Life.

The conception arises from the blending in the Fourth Gospel of Hebrew and early Christian with Greek-philosophical influences. Hebrew thought did not concern itself with questions regarding the ultimate nature of God. He was the 'living' God, who could be known only through His activity in the creation and moral government of the world. The Greek thinkers, on the other hand, tried to get behind His activity to His essential Being. He was the absolute and self-existent, over against the world of phenomena. His Life, so far as Life could be predicated of Him, was an energy of pure thought, abstracted from every form of sensible manifestation (cf. Arist. Metaph. xii. 7). The Fourth Evangelist, carrying out more fully the suggestion of Philo, combines the Hebrew and Greek ideas. He thinks of God as the 'only true' (Joh_17:3), the absolute Being who is eternally separate from the world which He has created. Nevertheless He is a living and personal God. The Life which He possesses is analogous to the life in man, but of a higher order, spiritual instead of earthly.

It follows from this attempt to combine Hebrew with Greek ideas, that the ethical moment falls largely out of sight. The difference between the human and the Divine Life is one of essence. Till man has undergone a radical change, not in heart merely but in the very constitution of his being, there can be no thought of his participating in the life of God. St. John thus involves himself in a conception which may be described as semi-physical. The Divine life is regarded as a sort of higher substance inherent in the nature of God. How can man, who is 'born of flesh' (Joh 3:6), become partaker in this substance, and so experience a new birth as a child of God? This is the religious problem as it presents itself to St. John.

The solution is afforded by the doctrine of the Incarnate Word. Jesus Christ, as the eternal Logos, possessed 'life in himself,' and yet assumed humanity and entered into our lower world. He therefore became the vehicle through which the life of God is imparted to men, or at least to those elect natures who are predisposed to receive it. He not only possesses, but is Himself the Life. To impart His gift He must also impart Himself, since life is inalienable from the living Person. This idea, which lies at the very centre of St. John's thinking, determines his theory of the communication of Life through Christ.

The subjective condition, apart from which the gift cannot be bestowed, is belief in Jesus as the Son of God. This belief is primarily an act of intellectual assent to the claim of Christ; but such an act implies a religious experience which has led up to it and gives it value. It runs back in the last resort to the 'drawing by the Father' (Joh 6:44), the work of God's Spirit in the heart. Through the act of belief a man is brought into such a relation to Christ that His power as Life-giver becomes operative.

Three means are indicated by which Christ imparts the gift to those who have believed. (1) It is conveyed through His word, regarded not simply as the medium of His message, but in the Hebrew sense as active and creative. The words spoken by Jesus are of the same nature as the quickening word of God. They are 'spirit and life,' carrying with them some portion of His own being. He can say indifferently, 'My word shall abide in you' and 'I shall abide in you' (Joh 15:7). It is this imparting of Himself through His words that renders them 'words of eternal life.' (2) The gift is conveyed likewise in the Sacraments, more especially in the Lord's Supper. The Eucharistic reference in the 6th chapter appears to the present writer unmistakable, and, while the Supper is interpreted in a spiritual sense, its real validity is also emphasized.

Ignatius, writing in the same age, describes the Eucharist as the φάρμακον ἀθανασίας

(Ephes. 20), and St. John accepts this current belief, and harmonizes it with his own doctrine of Life: 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you' (Joh_6:53). Since Jesus in His own Person is the Life, it can be given only through an actual incorporation of His 'flesh and blood,' and this is offered in the mystery of the Eucharist. The idea of Life as a semi-physical essence here comes to its sharpest expression. (3) In this same chapter, however, we have the indication of another and still more mysterious means by which the Life is imparted. The Eucharist, while it possesses in itself a real validity, is typical of an abiding union of the believer with Christ. He is like the vine (Joh_15:1 ff.), out of which the several branches draw their nourishment. He is united with His disciples in a relation so profound and intimate that they feel themselves to be one with Him. They abide in Him and He in them, and the life which He possesses becomes their life, springing up within them like a perennial well (Joh_4:14). This doctrine of a mystical union with Christ in which He imparts His Divine life to the believer, contains the central and characteristic thought of the Fourth Gospel.

Thus far we have considered the Johannine idea of Life as it is determined by the Logos theory. It becomes apparent, however, the more we study the Gospel, that the writer is working throughout with two conceptions, essentially different from each other and never completely reconciled. The incarnate Logos is at the same time the historical Jesus, who revealed God and drew all men to Himself by the moral grandeur of His personality and life. Doctrines which are presented theologically on the lines of the Logos hypothesis are also capable of a purely religious interpretation. They require to be so interpreted if we are not to miss their underlying and vital import.

Life regarded from this other side bears a meaning substantially the same as in the Synoptic Gospels. Jesus was the Living One, inasmuch as He realized in His own Person the love and goodness and holiness which constitute the inmost nature of God. The life He sought to communicate was nothing else than His own Spirit, as it was revealed in the scene of the feet-washing (John 13), and in the subsequent discourse with His disciples. Even in the Eucharistic chapter in which the theological view of Life is expressed most forcibly, we can discern this other view in the background. To partake of Christ's flesh and blood is to become wholly conformed to Him, absorbing into oneself the very spirit by which He lived. We cannot read the chapter attentively without feeling that St. John is always passing from the metaphysical conception to this moral and religious one. Both are present in his mind, and he endeavours to fuse them, though such a fusion is in the nature of things impossible.

The cardinal doctrine of union with Christ assumes a new meaning in the light of this other aspect of St. John's thought. What is elsewhere described as a mystical indwelling becomes a moral fellowship. 'Henceforth I call you not servants, but friends; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends' (Joh_15:15). The disciples are to enter into a perfect harmony of mind and will with their Master. His spirit is not to act on them from the outside, through set commandments, but inwardly and spontaneously. The relation of discipleship thus passes into one of 'friendship,'—a friendship so close that they lose all sense of separateness between themselves and Christ. He 'abides in them,' and replaces their will with His own.

To the Synoptic teaching St. John adds one element of priceless value. He perceives that the new Life proclaimed by Jesus was bound up indissolubly with His living Person. 'In him was life' (Joh_1:4), and it is not enough to render some vague obedience to His teaching. There must be a real and personal communion with Christ, so that He may impart His very self to His disciple. In his presentation of this truth, John avails himself of metaphysical modes of thinking which are not wholly adequate to the Christian message. The conception of Christ as Logos obscures the true significance of His Person and of the higher life imparted through Him. But the essential thought of the Gospel is independent of the form, borrowed from an alien philosophy, in which it is expressed. Jesus Christ is not only the Life-giver, but is Himself the Life. He imparts His gift to those who know Him by an inward fellowship, and become one with Him in heart and will. See also Living.

Light

LIGHT.—Apart from the ordinary use of this word to denote outward light (as in Luk_11:36, Mat_17:2, Mat_24:29 etc.), there are three applications of the metaphor of light in the Synoptic Gospels which demand attention.

1. The first occurs in the figurative and somewhat enigmatic saying preserved in Mat_6:22-23 = Luk_11:34-35, where the eye is called the lamp of the body, the symbolism pointing to sincerity of soul as the decisive feature of life. Each Evangelist gives the saying a different setting. In Mt.'s version of the Sermon on the Mount it occurs in a context laying stress upon the supreme need of the heavenly mind in religion; and as the main rival to God in man's affections is the world, in the shape of material wealth, the pursuit of the single mind is naturally correlated with the avoidance of covetousness. This shade of meaning is reflected from Mat 6:19-21; Mat 6:24-25 (see Mammon) upon the intervening logion. The soul is to human life what the eye is to the body (so Philo, de Opif. Mundi, 17, 'reason [νοῦς] is to the soul what the eye is to the body'); it is a lamp, by means of which the way and work of life are illuminated. As the functions of the physical life depend largely upon the soundness of the organs of vision, by means of which men move safely and freely in the outside world, so the mental and moral health of man is bound up with the condition of his inner life. The inward disposition (cf. Joh 11:10) is the key to all (cf. Ruskin's Queen of the Air, § 93; Eagle's Nest, §§ 106-110). The employment of 'light' in this connexion is thus one illustration of the inwardness of the teaching of Jesus. He brought men from the circumference to the centre, laid supreme stress on motive, and sought to emphasize—as in this saying—the vital importance of the inner spirit for conduct. The symbolism turns on the ethical meaning implied in 'single' (ἀπλοῦς) and 'evil' (πονηρός), the former suggesting 'liberality,' the latter 'niggardliness' in the moral sphere. Hence 'light' means that condition of life which is void of covetousness and the grasping spirit. Such a spirit confuses life by diverting it from the supreme inward and heavenly aim which is its true pursuit. The hoarding temper, which absorbs men in outward possessions, is pronounced by Jesus to be a flaw in the moral vision, a speck that blurs 'the light that is in thee,' i.e. the inner light of conscience, the heart, or the soul. When the latter is darkened by the intrusion of a divided affection, especially in the form of some appetite such as covetousness or worldliness, then 'how great is the darkness!' For religion, as Christ taught it, is not admitting God into life. It is putting Him first in life. Faith is not thinking Him good, but hailing Him as best. And nothing can be more ominous than when the soul, which is man's delicate faculty for seeing and choosing God, is diverted to double-mindedness or to an attempt to reconcile the competing interests of God and of the world. The outcome is compromise and its inevitable product, hypocrisy—that sin which a Frenchman once called the firstfruits of English society—ripening under the very breath of conventional religion.—The logion may be, as Brandt suggests, a Jewish aphorism based on Pro 20:27, which Jesus here quotes and applies.

The introduction of the saying in Luk 11:33-36 is due to the key-word λυχνος. Here, as often, Lk. groups sayings together less from their internal correspondence than from some verbal common element. He sharpens the point of the saying by introducing Luk 11:35. As eyes may become injured by the blinding glare and dust which make ophthalmia a prevalent complaint in the East, so, it is implied, the inner disposition lies exposed to risk and disease, against which it is a man's duty to guard. For if the heart rules the life, the life, on the other hand, can stain and spoil the heart. Yet the stress of the saying falls on attention to the inward life as determining the course and value of the outer. ‘ “Take care of the little things of life, and the great things will take care of themselves,” is the maxim of the trader, which is sometimes, and with a certain degree of truth, applied to the service of God. But much more true is it in religion, that we should take care of the great things, and the trifles of life will take care of themselves. “If thine eye be single, thy whole body will be full of light.” Christianity is not acquired, as an art, by long practice; it does not carve and polish human nature with a graving tool; it makes the whole man; first pouring out his soul before God, and then casting him in a mould’ (Jowett’s Paul, ii. 117).—The point of Luk 11:36 is not easy to grasp. It seems a somewhat tautological expansion of Luk 11:34 b (so Blass). D [Note: Deuteronomist.] , Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{cur} etc., omit it, while Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} has a different form of it; yet, as Wellhausen observes, it does not read like an interpolation, and probably we must be content to suspect, with Westcott and Hort, e.g., and J. Weiss (in Meyer⁸ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , pp. 476-477), some primitive corruption of the text.

2. The connexion of Luk 11:33 with the saying is not immediate. Luk 11:33 is simply an equivalent of Mar 5:14-16, which is incorporated here under the rubric of ‘light,’ and Luke has already more appropriately used it in Luk 8:16 (= Mar 4:21) in the second phase of the light-symbolism in the Gospels, viz. that of influence. The disciples are cautioned against the tendency, whether due to modesty or to cowardice, to refrain from letting their faith tell upon the world. In Luk 11:33 it is impossible to trace any very obvious connexion between this and what precedes, any more than between it and what follows, unless the idea of the editor is that Solomon’s wisdom and Jonah’s preaching were frank and open to the world (hence Luk 11:33), while no sign (Luk 11:29) is needed if the inner heart be pure and true (Luk 11:34-38). The context in Matthew 5 is much more congenial. Jesus is warning His disciples that while their relation to the outside world is often full of annoyance and suffering, yet this bitter experience (Mat 5:10 f.) must not drive them into a parochial and secluded attitude of negative protest. ‘You are the light of the world,’ He urges. You owe it a duty. Your faith lays you under an obligation to let your life tell upon your environment (cf. EBi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] , 4377, 4384-4385), instead of weakly relapsing into some esoteric or Essene-like seclusion. The allusion to good works is peculiar to Matthew. It emphasizes that frankness of spirit and necessity of good conduct which the saying upon light advocates as the sole reasonable position for Christian disciples to assume. The vocation of a Christian is to be visible. And visibility means influence. The reference is not to Apostles but to Christians in general, nor is preaching in view. What Jesus inculcates is an attitude of consistent goodness, void of monasticism and ostentation alike, as corresponding to the nature of His Kingdom, whose property and destiny it is to become manifest to the world (cf. Mozley's Parochial and Occasional Sermons, p. 212 f.).

This latter idea, without the moral counsel, is reproduced by Mar 4:21 (= Luk 8:16) as a sequel to the interpretation of the parable of the Seeds, as if to suggest that such knowledge as had just been imparted to the disciples was not to be kept to themselves but to be diffused like light (cf. Menzies, Earliest Gospel, pp. 112-114), the placing of the lamp in its proper position perhaps corresponding (so Jülicher) to the fruitful and useful qualities of the good seed in the good soil (Mar 4:20). Others, like Wrede (das Messiasgeheimnis, p. 68 f.), prefer to read the saying in the light of the Apostolic age, as if it meant that after the Resurrection all reserve upon the Christian mysteries was to be thrown aside (Mar 4:11). This, however, cannot be the original sense of the saying, and there is no reason why one should give up the interpretation which makes the lamp here equivalent to the teaching of Jesus or the knowledge of the gospel (see Expos. Nov. 1900, on 'The Peril and the Comfort of Exposure'). The point is less general than in Mat 5:14-16. But the essential bearing of the saying is the same, viz. that as the function of light is to radiate, so Christian privileges imply the duty of propaganda. Similarly, Mat 10:27 = Luk 12:3 (cf. Jülicher's Gleichnisreden, ii. 86 f.). In the fourth of the New Oxyrhynchus Logia, we have the words: 'for there is nothing hidden which shall not be made manifest, nor buried which shall not be raised.'

3. If Christians, however, are to arise and shine, it must be because their light has come. Consequently revelation is also embraced under the light-symbolism of the Gospels, in Mat 4:16, Luk 1:79 [Isa 9:2] Luk 2:32, where the reference, based on OT quotations, is to the redeeming life of Christ. This semi-mystical application, which associates light with the Divine effluence, runs far back into human history. 'Heaven means both the world of light above us and the world of hope within us, and the earliest name of the Divine beings is simply "the bright ones." Such names are more than metaphors. But if they were simply metaphors, they would show how closely the world without is adapted to express and render definite the yearnings and the fears of the world within' (J. Wedgwood, The Moral Ideal, pp. 6, 7). It is needless to illustrate from ancient thought how light was almost invariably, if variously, allied to the conception of heaven and the Divine nature, the latter being conceived as radiant and glorious. The gradual evolution of the religious idea slowly purified the symbolism, especially in the deeper reaches of faith within the later Judaism (notably in the Book of Enoch). The semi-physical element, though not entirely excluded even from the NT idea of glory and spiritual phenomena, came to be subordinated to the moral and mystical. The purity, the noiseless energy, the streaming rays of light, all suggested religious qualities to the mind, until the light of God came to be an expression for the healing influence and vitalizing power exercised by Him over human life. The light of Christ, the Messiah, was thus His ministry (see Bruce's Galilean Gospel, p. 13 f.). His person formed the creative power in the life of the human soul. Through work and word alike, His being operated with quickening effect upon the responsive hearts of His own people.

This application of the metaphor of light to the Divine revelation in Jesus is developed especially in the Fourth Gospel, where 'light' is reserved almost exclusively for this purpose. John the Baptist is indeed described once as 'the burning and shining lamp,' in whose light (cf. Joh 1:7-8) the Jews were 'willing to rejoice for a season' (Joh 5:35, cf. Sir 48:1), with all a shallow nature's delight in transient impressions (see Martensen's Individual Ethics, p. 385). And Christians are incidentally called 'sons of light' (Joh 12:36, cf. Luk 16:8). But, if John the Baptist is the lamp, Jesus is the Light; if Christians become sons of light, it is by believing on the Light. It is not Christians but Christ, the incarnate Logos, who is the Light of the world (Joh 1:4; Joh 8:12; Joh 9:5; Joh 12:46). Already in the ancient mind the supreme God had been frequently defined as the God of light, and the later Judaism had expressed its profounder consciousness of this truth in the collocation of life and light (e.g. Psa 36:9, En 58:3) and in the employment of 'light' as a summary expression not only for cosmic vitality, but for the bliss of mankind, chiefly, though not solely, in the future (cf. Volz, Jüdische Eschatologie, 328 f.). In the Fourth Gospel, however, this idea is developed with singular precision and breadth. The Logos-Christ is defined in the Prologue not only as Logos but as Life and Light, the former category being confined to Christ's being as a Divine factor in the creation and in the essence of God (Joh 1:1-3), as well as to His incarnation (Joh 1:14-18), after which it is dropped. The intervening paragraph (Joh 1:4-13), dealing with the Logos-Christ as a historical phenomenon, is subsumed under the category of Light and Life, which afterwards dominates the entire Gospel, except (curiously enough) the closing speeches (Joh 1:14-17), where the symbolism of Light is entirely absent. 'In him was life, and the life was the light of men.' This profound sentence really gives the keynote to the Gospel, in which Christ as the Light represents the essential Truth of God as revealed to human knowledge. The Messiah (e.g. En 48:4) and the Logos (as in Philo) had already been hailed as Light. But here the metaphor of light denotes much more than the self-revelation of God in the person of Jesus (Weiss); it describes the transcendent life streaming out on men, the absolute nature of God as truth, as the supreme reality for man to believe in, and by his belief to share. In sharp antithesis to this Light is the Darkness, by which the writer symbolizes all that is contrary to God in human life, whether unbelief or disobedience, all that resists the true Life which it is the function of the Light to produce in humanity, all the ignorance and wilful rejection of Christ which issue in practical consequences of confusion and rebellion. Historically, this opposition emerged during Christ's lifetime in the Jews' rejection of His mission. But, as the present tense φαίνει seems to imply, the truth is general; the same enmity pervades every age—a conception to which there is a remarkable parallel in the Logos-teaching of Heraclitus (cf. Pflleiderer's Urchrist. 2 ii. 339). This antithesis means more, however, than a metaphysical dualism running through the world. The hostility of men to the Light is described as their own choice and fault (Joh 3:19-20), and this conception naturally permeates the entire Gospel. The determinism is apparent rather than real. Whether positive or negative, the attitude of men to God in Christ is run back to their own wills, although the writer makes no attempt to correlate this strictly with Divine prescience. Nor, again, is the conception purely intellectual, though the terminology would seem occasionally to suggest this view. Light and darkness represent moral good and evil as these are presented in the spiritual order introduced by Christ. To love the light (Joh 3:19-21) is not a theoretical attitude, but a practical, equivalent to doing the truth. The light has to be followed (Joh 8:12, cf. Joh 12:35 f.); Christ's revelation is an appeal to the reason and conscience of mankind as the controlling principle of conduct; 'the light of life' is the light which brings life, and life is more than mere intellectualism (Joh 17:3). To walk in or by the light is to have one's character and conduct determined by the influence of Christ, the latter being as indispensable to vitality in the moral and religious sphere as light is to physical growth (cf. 2Sa 23:4, Psa 49:19; Psa 56:13 etc.). See, further, art. Truth.

These and other applications of this metaphor throughout the Fourth Gospel are all suggested in the somewhat abstract language of the Prologue. Three further points may be selected as typical of this mode of thought.

(a) The function of Christ as the Light is described as bearing not only upon the creation of the Universe, but on the spiritual and moral life of men (Joh 1:3-4). In this sphere it encounters an obstacle in the error and evil of man's nature, but encounters it successfully. This is proleptically described in Joh 1:5 (cf. 1Jn 2:8), where οὐ κατέλαβεν probably means 'failed to overpower, or extinguish' (cf. Joh 12:35, Sir 15:7); despite the opposition of man's ignorance and corruption, the true Light makes its way. The climax of this triumph in history is then described. It was heralded by the prophetic mission of John the Baptist, the allusion to whom is, like Joh 5:35, carefully phrased in order to bring out the transient and subordinate character of his ministry (cf. Lightfoot's Colossians, p. 401); whereupon the historic functions of the real Light are resumed in Joh 5:9 f. 'The true light, which lightens every man, was coming into the world'; i.e. had arrived, even when the Baptist was preaching (cf. Joh 5:26). Later on, this is frankly stated by Jesus Himself at the feast of Tabernacles, when brilliant illuminations were held every night—a symbolism which may have suggested the cry, 'I am the light of the world' (Joh 8:12; cf. Isa 60:1). The description in Joh 1:9 is probably an echo of Testament of Levi 13:4 ('the light of the Lord was given to lighten every man').

(b) While the Light is the Christian revelation, it is implied that already (Joh 3:21), not merely in Judaism but throughout humanity (cf. Joh 11:52, Joh 12:21 f.), there were individuals whose honesty and sincerity had prepared them to receive the truth of God (Joh 1:11-12) mentally and morally. When the light fell on those who sat in darkness, some were content to sit still. But others rose to welcome the fuller knowledge of God in the perfect revelation of Christ's person, men like Nathanael and the Greeks. For it is characteristic of the Fourth Gospel that good people, rather than sinners (as in the Synoptic narratives), flock to Christ. The Logos, as Hausrath puts it, draws God's children to the light as a magnet attracts metals, while mere stones are left unmoved by its presence. And God's children are those who respond to Christ by the exercise of their moral instincts and religious affections. Unlike Philo, the author refuses to trace back this lack of susceptibility towards God to any source in the material constitution of mankind (cf. Joh 8:44); but the semi-Gnostic idea of a special class remains.

(c) Upon the other hand, Christ, the Light, came to His own people; and there are repeated allusions to the brief opportunity of the Jews (Joh 9:4, Joh 11:9-10, Joh 12:35-36), in sayings which warn the nation against trilling with its privilege,—a privilege soon to be taken from its unworthy keeping. Here the author is reflecting the period in which he writes, when the Jews' day of grace had passed, with tragic consequences to themselves. 'Light, accept the blessed light, if you will have it when Heaven vouchsafes. You refuse? Very well: the "light" is more and more withdrawn, ... and furthermore, by due sequence, infallible as the foundations of the universe and Nature's oldest law, the light returns on you, this time, with lightning' (Carlyle's Latter-Day Pamphlets, iii. ad fin.).

⚡ Lightning

LIGHTNING (ἀστραπή).—There are 3 references to lightning in the Gospels, one of these being duplicated (in Mt. and Lk.).

1. Luk_10:18 ‘I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven.’ The word ‘beheld’ (ἐθεώρουν), being in the impf., indicates a continuous contemplation. Taken in conjunction with the aorist participle ‘fallen’ (so Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885, not ‘fall’ as in Authorized Version, the Gr. being πεσόντα), this cannot mean that in a pre-existent state Jesus beheld the fall of Satan taking place, i.e. when the devil was cast out of heaven, as described in Paradise Lost. The meaning of the expression should be arrived at through the context, where we read of the Seventy returning to Jesus with joy, and exclaiming, ‘Lord, even the demons are subject unto us in thy name’ (Luk_10:17), in reference to their successful exorcism. This meaning seems to be that the news brought to Jesus by His disciples did not take Him by surprise, because at the very time when they were carrying on their successful work He was looking at the prince of the demons lying fallen (so Holtzmann, Plummer, etc.),—a highly figurative expression which need not point to an actual vision. Jesus had the intuitive assurance that His arch-enemy was defeated already. Therefore the disciples were able to cast out the demons. The situation may be illustrated by the parable of the strong man bound by a stronger so that his house can be robbed (Mar_3:27), Satan being the strong man, Christ the stronger, the demons the vessels that are taken from the house, which may be either the world or the possessed victims. There is no indication when Satan fell (as perhaps at the Temptation of Jesus). He is contemplated as fallen. Still the aorist points to a definite action, and the comparison with lightning emphasizes this point. Possibly our Lord was alluding to Isa_14:12. A similar idea appears in Rev_12:9. Wellhausen regards the verse in Lk. as apocryphal; but Jesus frequently used apocalyptic imagery. In the Koran (Sura 72) the demons are cast out of heaven at the coming of Mohammed, the angels bombarding them with stars.

2. Mat_24:27 ‘For as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and is seen even unto the west; so shall be the coming of the Son of Man’ (cf. Luk_17:24). The idea seems to be that of widespread and unmistakable evidence. The coming of the Son of Man will be seen everywhere, and that very manifestly (so Plummer, Wellhausen, etc.). A second thought, the suddenness of the flash (Plummer), is not so apparent, if it is even present at all, in this application of the idea of lightning to the Parousia. For the apparent contradiction between this thought and that in Luk_17:20 see Observation.

3. The one other Gospel reference to lightning is in the description of the angel of the Resurrection (Mat 28:3), whose appearance is 'as lightning,' the idea being dazzling brightness.

☩ Lily

LILY.—The lily (לילך, לילך, κρίνον) is mentioned by various OT writers (1Ki 7:19, 2Ch 4:5, Son 2:1 etc., Hos 14:5). In the NT there is but one reference (Mat 6:28 and || Luk 12:27). From the expression 'lilies of the field,' we gather that they were wild flowers, while the comparison of them with the regal robes of Solomon (Mat 6:29) implies that they were not white, but coloured (cf. Son 5:13). The plant that best accords with these conditions is the scarlet anemone (A. coronaria), with which, in the spring of the year, the Galilaeen hillsides are clothed. (See Tristram, Fauna and Flora of Palestine, p. 208; Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 462). The nature of the reference might, however, favour the supposition that our Lord used the term 'lilies' in a very general way, and that it should be taken as comprising a variety of flowers, such as anemones, poppies, and tulips.

☩ Linen

LINEN (βύσσος, σινδών).—Cloth of various kinds prepared from the fibre of flax was largely used in Egypt and Palestine for under-garments. It was preferred to cotton or wool, as being cleaner and cooler in the hot climate. It formed an important element in priestly dress, and in the Temple hangings. Worn together with purple it constituted the characteristic clothing of the wealthy (Est 8:15, Luk 16:19), and probably of royalty (Gen 41:42). Linen was used in Egypt to prepare the bodies of both men and animals for burial, and in Palestine it was the common wrapping of the dead. Wool was avoided, the belief being that it tended to breed worms. To this day linen is used for these purposes in Palestine by all who can afford it. Coarser cloth was made in the country, but the finer sorts were imported, the products of Egypt being held in high esteem. As an article of merchandise, linen ranked with gold, silver, precious stones, silk, etc. (Rev 18:12).

σινδών (Mar_14:51-52) probably corresponds to the Rabbinic sadin or sedina, a linen cloth, or loose linen wrapper; although possibly it may also mean a night-dress (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 1900, ii. 545). In this garment the body of Jesus was wrapped when taken from the cross (Mat_27:59). It may have been torn into strips to form the ὀθόνια in which, with the spices, the body was bound (Joh_19:40; Joh_20:5 ff.). Probably, however, these were the bandages fastening the σινδών.

⦿ Lip

LIP.—This word, in the plural, is found in the Gospels only in Mat_15:8 || Mar_7:6, where it stands for χεῖλεσιν in a free quotation from the LXX Septuagint . It is rendered by Authorized Version , ‘This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me’ (cf. Isa_29:13). St. Matthew, who quotes oftenest from the LXX Septuagint , does so here (Mat_15:8 f.), even though it departs considerably from the Hebrew. But he modifies its phraseology so as to improve it, and to bring out the prophet’s thought more clearly than would be done by a literal translation of the Hebrew. (See Toy, NT Quotations from the OT). The expression ‘honoureth me with their lips’ is explained by some as an allusion to the Jewish custom of putting the tassel of the tallith to the lips during worship, as a sign that the Law was accepted, not as of duty only, but as the enthusiastic preference of the heart (cf. Job_31:27, where putting the hand to the lips is an act of astral worship; and the Oriental salutations in which putting the hand to the lips is supposed to have been originally a sign and assurance of sincerity; see Jewish Eneye. art. ‘Lip’). Others explain this clause, in relation to the entire passage, as intended to put in sharp contrast a worship of God, or a form of religion, that is taught of men (cf. ‘teaching teachings which are precepts of men,’ Mat_15:9), and a worship that is really according to the teachings of God’s word, i.e. which springs from a devout and trusting heart (cf. ‘But their heart is far from me, Mat_15:8, with the suggestion of emptiness in Mat_15:9 ‘In vain do they worship me,’ etc.).

It would seem from the OT that the lips had come to be regarded as a sort of originating centre of life and morals. We read of ‘lying lips’ (Psa_31:18), of ‘the lip of truth’ (Pro_12:19), of ‘unclean lips’ (Isa_6:5), and of ‘the poison of asps’ as ‘under the lips’ (quoted in Rom_3:13); and in the NT also, of ‘the fruit of the lips’ (Heb_13:15), and of ‘lips that speak no guile’ (1Pe_3:10), etc.

But whatever be the implied allusion or exact meaning of the words here, this much is certain, that our Lord in speaking to His own contemporaries said, ‘This prophecy of Isaiah was concerning you’—language that would seem to require us to interpret the passage so as to make it include and describe the unbelieving Jews of His day, and, probably, all people of all times who were, or are, or will yet be, guilty of offering to God a worship in which they do not draw near to Him in heart.

☛ Little Ones

LITTLE ONES.—The phrase ‘one of these little ones’ occurs in the records of our Lord’s discourses in the Synoptic Gospels six times (Mat 10:42; Mat 18:6; Mat 18:10; Mat 18:14, Mar 9:42, Luk 17:2), although, to satisfy these references, it need not have been employed by our Lord on more than two or three different occasions. It seems to have been used with marked solemnity and to be charged with high emotion. To understand its implications, we shall need to inquire whom our Lord designates as ‘little ones,’ whence the designation was derived, and what its significance is.

1. It seems to be quite generally assumed that at least in some of the instances of its occurrence the phrase designates, quite simply, actual children. Thus, multitudes of Christians appear to be accustomed to read Mat 18:10 as a declaration that the ‘angels of children’ (whatever these ‘angels’ may be) hold a particularly exalted place in heaven. The connexion of this whole passage with the opening verses of the chapter, where a ‘little child’ is presented as a type of the children of the Kingdom, seems to many to require this interpretation, and the parallel passages, Mar 9:37; Mar 9:42, Luk 9:48; Luk 17:2 to add their support to it. A careful scrutiny of the passages in which the phrase occurs, however, will show that its reference is never to actual children, but in every case to our Lord’s disciples.

The earliest recorded employment of the phrase is reported in Mat 10:40-42. Our Lord is here bringing to a close His instructions to His Apostles as He sent them forth on their first, their trial, evangelistic tour. His words are words of highest encouragement. ‘He that receiveth you,’ He says, ‘receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me.’ Our Lord makes common cause with His messengers: that is the general declaration. Then comes the enforcement by illustration. It was a matter of common understanding that ‘he that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet’—that is, not in the name of another prophet, but on this sole ground, that he is a prophet, or, as we should say in our English idiom, as a prophet—‘shall receive a prophet’s reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man’—that is, again, merely because he is a righteous man—‘shall receive a righteous man’s reward.’ The broad principle, then, is that the receiver shall be put, in the matter of reward, on the level of the received; by his reception of the prophet or righteous man, he takes his place by his side and becomes sharer in his reward. Now comes the application, marked as such (and not the continuation of the examples) by a change of construction. ‘And whosoever’—perhaps we might paraphrase ‘Likewise whosoever’—‘shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.’ The parallelism of the clauses here with those in the preceding sentences compels us to read ‘one of these little ones’ as a synonym of ‘a disciple.’ The sense is, as the receiver of the prophet shall share the prophet’s reward, and the receiver of the righteous man the righteous man’s reward, so the receiver of the disciple shall share the disciple’s reward. The general purport of the declaration, moreover, demands this sense. Its object was to hearten and encourage the Apostles on their mission. For that, they needed assurance, not that goodness to children would be marked and rewarded, but that they, the Apostles, were under Divine care. The very variations from the phraseology of the earlier sentences which are introduced into the application have their part to play in emphasizing this needed lesson. These variations are five in number. In the first place, instead of the simple ‘he that’ receiveth, we have here the emphasized universal ‘whosoever’; there is no danger of failure here. Next, instead of the simple, comprehensive ‘receiveth,’ the least conceivable benefit is here specified—‘shall give to drink a cup of cold water only’: the slightest goodness to the disciples shall be noted and rewarded. Next, instead of the simple statement that the benefiter shall share the reward of the benefited, we have a solemn asseveration that in no case will a due reward be missed: the nature of the reward is left in large vagueness, and it is hinted only that it shall be appropriate, treated as of obligation, and surely given. Lastly, instead of the cold ‘disciple,’ we have the tender ‘one of these little ones.’ The disciples our Lord has in mind are His own disciples: His own disciples He cherishes with a devoted love; and this love is pledged to their protection. The effect of these variations from the formally exact parallel is to raise the saying to its emotional climax. The lesson conveyed is that Christ’s disciples are under the watchful care of His jealous love.

The case is similar with that in the paragraph Mat_18:5-14. It is important that the relation of this paragraph to the preceding one (Mat_18:1-4), and the nature of the transition made at Mat_18:5 be correctly apprehended. The Apostles had been disputing about their relative claims to greatness in the Kingdom of heaven; and the Lord teaches them a much needed lesson in humility by the example of a little child. Setting a little child in their midst, He exhorts them to see in it a type of the children of the Kingdom, and to seek to become like it if they would be greatest in that Kingdom (cf. art. Children, vol. i. p. 304). With Mat_18:4, however, this incident closes, and the lesson from it is concluded. The discussion that follows in the succeeding verses is no longer an inculcation of humility. It is an exhilarating pledge of the whole Divine power to the sustaining, protection, and glorification of Christ's disciples. The connexion between the two paragraphs seems to turn on the idea that, though men enter the Kingdom like helpless infants, they are not therefore abandoned to the adverse forces of the world: the power of God is outstretched for their salvation. 'Such little children' (Mat_18:5) God takes under His own protection, rewarding those who do them benefits, and visiting with the severest punishment those who evil-entreat them; their angels ever behold the Father's face in heaven; if they go astray everything is left that they may be recovered; the Father's will is pledged that no one of them shall perish. The force of these great assurances is indefinitely enhanced by the individual note that is thrown into them. Throughout, the stress is laid upon the individual, as distinguished from the class, as the object of the Divine love (Mat_18:5-6; Mat_18:10; Mat_18:12; Mat_18:14): not a single one of them shall be without the Father's care, no single one of them shall perish. The passage is in effect just the Synoptic parallel of the seventeenth chapter of John, or the Evangelic parallel of the eighth chapter of Romans. Christ's 'little ones' in it are, in short, just 'those that believe on him,' of whom 'it is not the will of the Father that one should perish,' whose 'angels in heaven do always behold the face of the Father which is in heaven.'

The declaration of Mar_9:42 is parallel with that of Mat_18:6, and is immediately preceded by a verse the thought of which is parallel with that of Mat_10:42. This passage gives us thus afresh in a single context the two primary statements we have met with in Matthew. The variations of the phraseology in Mat_10:41 from what we have seen in Mat_10:42 supply commentaries on the meaning of the phrases in the latter. 'Little ones' in the one becomes 'you,' that is, Christ's disciples, in the other: 'in the name of a disciple' in the one, 'in the name that ye are Christ's' in the other. Thus the interpretation suggested of the passage in Matthew is confirmed by the very language of the passage in Mark. But this language in Mat_10:41 settles the meaning also of the phrases in the succeeding verse. The 'you,' i.e. the disciples, of Mat_10:41 is replaced in Mat_10:42 by 'these little ones that believe,' which must, therefore, mean the same thing. This indeed would be independently true, since these 'little ones' are specifically defined here not as 'little ones' simply, but as those 'little ones' 'that have faith.' It is quite clear, therefore, that 'these little ones' in this passage means not children, but believers.

The only other passage in which the phrase occurs, Luk_17:2, is parallel in its assertion with Mat_18:6 and Mar_9:42, and repeats in effect their language. There is no allusion to children in the entire context, in which our Lord simply warns His 'disciples' against sins against their brethren. In this and the parallel passage in Mk., in other words, we have merely renewed manifestations of the Saviour's concern for those He calls 'these little ones.' He pronounces the sin of causing those for whom His love was thus pledged to stumble, almost too great to be expressed in words.

On every occasion of its occurrence, therefore, the phrase 'these little ones' evinces itself independently a designation, not of children, but of the disciples of Christ. In these circumstances, we cannot permit doubt to be thrown on its meaning in the palmary passage, Mat 18:5 f., by the circumstance that certain passages in Mark (Mar 9:33-37) and Luke (Luk 9:46-48) which are parallel to Mat 18:1-5 might easily be so read as to make literal children the subject of their declarations (Mar 9:37, Luk 9:48) parallel to Mat 18:5. The account in Matthew is the fuller, and permits the connexion of the clauses to be more exactly estimated. It seems as if it were merely the compression of Mark's and Luke's reports which tempts to the identification of the 'little child' of the earlier verses with the 'one of such little children' (Mk.), or 'this little child' (Lk.) of the closing verse: and the pressing of this language literally is not free from difficulties of its own. In any event, we cannot permit any difficulties that we may feel in explaining Mar 9:37, Luk 9:48 to affect the determination of the meaning of a phrase which does not occur in them, when we meet it in other passages where its sense seems clearly indicated.

We may take it as established, then, that the phrase 'these little ones' on the Master's lips means not 'children,' but distinctly and always 'my disciples.' The question still remains open, however, whether our Lord means by it all His disciples, or only a specially designated class of them. The latter has been quite commonly supposed, and interpreters have busied themselves defining the characteristic qualities of the particularly designated class. Hahn, for example, argues strenuously that the disciples at large cannot be meant; but that the designation presupposes gradations among the disciples (cf. Luk 7:28), and the essence of the exhortation in Luk 17:2 at least is that the greater must not despise the lesser. Godet similarly supposes that the 'little ones' are 'beginners in the faith,' 'those yet weak in the faith.' Surely, however, such distinctions are foreign to the contexts in which these phrases occur, and even inconsistent with them. In Mat 10:42, for example, the broad identification of 'one of these little ones' with 'a disciple' excludes from thought all divisions within the body of disciples; and the definition of 'these' as the disciples to whom our Lord was speaking, as He spoke of them as 'these little ones,' looks in the same direction. In Mar 9:42, again, the phrase 'these little ones' takes up broadly the 'you' of the preceding verse, and therefore designates just the disciples at large. 'These little ones' are, moreover, defined here as 'these that believe,' that is to say, as 'believers,' in their essential characteristics as such. Much the same may be said of Luk 17:2, in the context of which there is a distinction between brother and brother but no discrimination between greater and lesser, while the whole drift of Mat 18:5-14 is to exalt the 'little ones' and to identify them with that body of chosen ones to whose salvation the will of the Father is pledged. It may be taken as exegetically certain, then, that by ‘these little ones’ our Lord does not intend to single out a certain section of His disciples,—whether the weakest in faith or the more advanced in that humility of spirit which is the fruit of a great faith,—but means the whole body of His disciples. This is therefore just one of the somewhat numerous general designations which He gives to His disciples by which to express His conception of their character and estate, and the nature of His feelings towards them.

2. Whence this particular designation of His disciples was derived by our Lord remains indeed somewhat obscure. It used to be quite generally supposed that in it He had simply adopted and applied to His own disciples an ordinary designation for their pupils current in the Rabbinical schools. This idea seems traceable to J. J. Wetstein, who illustrates the phrase on its first occurrence (Mat_10:42) by the following quotation from the Bereshith Rabba (xlii. 4):

‘Where there are no little ones, there are no disciples; where there are no disciples, there are no sages; where there are no sages, there are no elders; where there are no elders, there are no prophets; where there is no prophet, there is no God.’

Following this suggestion, commentators like Bolten, Kuinoel, Bloomfield, Fritzsche have accordingly explained the phrase as simply a Hebraism for ‘disciples.’

It was early pointed out, however (e.g. by Meyer, ed. 2, p. 215 note; Bruno Bauer, ii. 241), that the currency in the Rabbinical schools of such an employment of ‘little ones’ as a designation for ‘disciples’ is neither shown by the citation from the Bereshith Rabba nor supported by any other evidence. Accordingly this notion has quite generally died out (cf. Meyer-Weiss, ed. 8, 1890). Its place has been largely taken by the very natural supposition that our Lord has done for Himself what the Rabbis had been supposed to have done for Him,—applied affectionately to His disciples a designation appropriate literally only to children. The difficulty of this supposition, otherwise most satisfactory, is that the particular designation in question—‘little ones’—is not a Biblical designation of children, and not one which would readily suggest itself as a term of affection. Neither the Hebrew (קַמֵּץ) nor the Greek (μακρός) lent itself readily to adoption as a term of tenderness; and accordingly neither in the Hebrew nor in the Greek Bible does the term ‘little ones’ (הַקְּמִיץִים, οἱ μακροί) ever occur as a periphrasis for children. Where we read of ‘little ones’ in the English Bible in the sense of children, this is an imposition of an English idea upon a totally divergent Hebrew conception (מֵץ Gen_34:29; Gen_43:8; Gen_46:5 etc.). It is quite true that in Rabbinical Hebrew קַמֵּץ has become a standing term for children;

but not as a term of affectionate feeling so much as with the simple implication of immaturity. The katan and kētanna were to the Rabbis merely the ‘boy’ and ‘girl’ as undeveloped and unripe, in opposition to the mature man and woman. And although this term was occasionally transferred by them metaphorically to their pupils, it was not, if we can trust the lexicographers, in a very pleasant sense. The ‘little one’ among the disciples was just an ‘abortion’—one who disregarded his teacher and set his immaturity against his master’s ripe learning; or one who, while yet fit only to be a learner, wished to set himself up prematurely as a teacher (ef. Levy or Jastrow, sub voce קטן, quoting the tract Sota 22a; but consult Sota 24b, where we are told that Samuel was surnamed הקטן ‘the Little,’—cf. ‘James the Little’ in the NT, and ‘Kleigenes the Little’ in Xenophon,—because he made himself little, that is, bore himself humbly; here a good sense seems to be attached to the metaphorical use of the word). It was assuredly not from this circle of ideas that our Lord derived His use of the phrase, even if we may suppose that this Rabbinical use of it was already developed in His day.

Only two OT passages suggest themselves as offering natural points of departure for the framing of such a phrase as our Lord employs. The one of these is Isa 60:22 and the other Zec 13:7. In the former, the terms employed, from which our Lord’s phrase may have been derived, are הקטן in the first clause and הצעיר in the second. In the latter the Hebrew term employed is הצעירים, translated in the LXX Septuagint οἱ μικροὶ οἱ. Both passages are Messianic, though only Zec 13:7 is adduced in the NT and given explicit application to Christ (Mat 26:31, Mar 14:27). In neither is there any allusion to children; but in both the reference of the diminutive term is to the smallness of the beginnings out of which the Lord in the days of the coming blessing shall recreate His Church. If we may believe that the Master had these passages in mind when He called His disciples ‘these little ones,’ then the application of the term to them obviously meant to point them out as those ‘little ones’ who, Zechariah had promised, should be refined as silver and tried as gold, only that they might for ever become the Lord’s people; who, Isaiah had promised, should be the unassuming nucleus out of which by gracious expansion should be developed the newly created city of God which should be to Him an everlasting possession. The consonance of this implication of the term with all the allusions of the contexts in which it occurs, and with all the declarations concerning His ‘little ones’ which our Lord makes, lies on the face of things. And on its assumption all the peculiarities of the form and use of the phrase at once find an adequate explanation.

3. If, now, we ask why and with what meaning our Lord designated His disciples ‘these little ones,’ a twofold answer seems indicated. It is on the one side His chief Messianic designation of His followers: it is on the other side the chief of His hypocoristic designations of them. Other designations of each order exist. When Jesus speaks of His followers as ‘children of the kingdom,’ for example, He is applying to them a Messianic designation; or, to confine ourselves to the circle of ideas most closely related to the passages of the Old Testament supposed to be in His mind in the instance holding our attention, when He calls them His ‘sheep’ (Mat 26:31) or more pointedly His ‘little flock’ (Luk 12:32), these are Messianic designations which He is applying to them. Similarly His language with reference to them was full of hypocoristics. They were not merely His ‘children’ (Mar 10:24, Joh 21:5), but His ‘little children’ (Joh 13:33). They were not merely His ‘flock’ (Mat 26:31, Joh 10:16), but His ‘little flock’ (Luk 12:32). They were not merely His ‘sheep’ (Mat 10:6), but His ‘little sheep’ (Joh 10:7; Joh 10:16); not merely His ‘lambs’ (Luk 10:3), but His ‘little lambs’ (Joh 21:15). In the designation ‘little ones’ both these lines of expression reach their height. In calling His disciples the ‘little ones’ of Isa 60:22, Zec 13:7, He points to them as the true seed of the Kingdom, the branch of God’s planting, the work of His hands in which He shall be glorified (cf. Schwartzkopff, The Prophecies of Jesus Christ, pp. 199-202). In calling them ‘little ones’ (οἱ μικροί) He applies to them the hypocoristic by way of eminence,—so pure a hypocoristic that the very substantive is lacking, and nothing persists but the bare endearing diminutive. There is combined, therefore, in this designation the expression of our Lord’s deep-reaching tenderness for His disciples and the declaration of His protecting care over them as ‘the remnant of Jacob.’ The ordinary suggestions of the meaning of the phrase as applied to the disciples may doubtless be neglected as artificial. Reuss, for example, thinks they were called ‘little ones’ because they were drawn from the most humble, the least distinguished section of society; de Wette, because they were despised and meanly esteemed for Christ’s sake; Dr. Riddle, in recognition of their weakness in themselves in the midst of the persecution of the world. These are all secondary ideas. Primarily our Lord’s disciples were called by Him ‘little ones’ because this was the natural utterance of the tenderness of Jesus’ love for them, and the strongest mode of expressing the glorious destiny that was in store for them. The passages in which the epithet occurs are full of the note of pledged protection, and they run up into that marvellous declaration that no man and no thing can snatch them out of the Father’s hand. We shall not go far wrong, then, if we say simply that our Saviour calls His disciples ‘these little ones’ because He thinks of them as the peculiar objects of His protecting care, and sees in them already of the travail of His soul that He may be satisfied. The greatness of His love for them, the greatness of their significance as the seed of the Kingdom,—these are the two ideas that combine in this designation.

Benjamin B. Warfield.

Living

LIVING.—1. Βίος = ‘livelihood,’ ‘means of living.’ It is often used in this sense in class. Gr., e.g. τὸν βίον κᾶσθαι, ποιεῖσθαι, etc.; Plato, Gorg. 486 D [Note: Deuteronomist.], (men) οἷς ἔστι καὶ βίος καὶ δόξα καὶ ἄλλα πολλὰ ἀγαθὰ; Phocylides, Frag. 10, ed. Bergk, δίζησθαι βιοτήν, ἀρετὴν δ’ ὅταν ἦ βίος ἤδη (like Hor. Ep. i. i. 53, ‘quaerenda pecunia primum est, virtus post nummos’). It is rendered ‘living’ in four passages in the Gospels. (1) Mar_12:44 (|| Luk_21:4) ἔβαλεν ὄλον τὸν βίον αὐτῆς, Vulgate totum victum suum = ‘all that she had to live upon until more should be earned’ (Swete). Jesus knew that this was the case, and that she might have retained one of the λεπτά when she cast in both (Nestle, Expos. Times, xiii. 562, who adds that 2Co_8:12 looks like the moral drawn from this passage; cf. Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar, 256). Compare the praise of the virtuous woman, Pro_31:14 (LXX Septuagint συνάγει δὲ αὕτη τὸν βίον). (2) Luk_8:43 ἰατροῖς προσαναλώσασα ὄλον τὸν βίον, Vulgate omnem substantiam suam: the πρὸς implying that besides what she had suffered, she had expended all her means of subsistence (cf. Plummer, 234; Holtzmann, 157; Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible iii. 322^a). Son_8:7 LXX Septuagint, ἐὰν δῶ ἀνήρ πάντα τὸν βίον αὐτοῦ ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, ἐξουδενώσει ἐξουδενώσουσιν αὐτόν, forms a suggestive parallel. (3) Luk_15:12 διεῖλεν αὐτοῖς τὸν βίον, Vulgate divisit illis substantiam: ὁ βίος being equivalent to ἡ οὐσία (‘his estate’). Such a division of property in the father’s lifetime was perhaps not uncommon. What precise rights the father retained after the division is not clear. The words πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σὰ ἐστίν (Luk_15:31) are not spoken in a legal sense, but are an expression of fatherly affection (cf. Plummer, 372; Simcox, Expositor, 1889, ii. 124, 127). τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος was a technical formula, as appears from the papyri (Deissmann, Bible Studies, 230). The share of the younger son would be a third (Deu_21:17, cf. Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, 338). (4) Luk_15:30 ὁ καταφαγὼν σου τὸν βίον. Plummer thinks there may be bitterness in the σου, when αὐτοῦ might have been more fairly used. But the σου τὸν βίον may have been due to correct feeling; the elder son not regarding the share which he himself had received as being absolutely his own as long as his father lived (cf. Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, 337). Βίος is used in the same sense: 1Jn_3:17 ὃς δ’ ἂν ἔχη τὸν βίον τοῦ κόσμου, where it is rendered ‘this world’s good’ (Authorized Version), ‘goods’ (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), and includes ‘all the endowments which make up our earthly riches, wealth, station, intellect’ (Westcott, in loc.). For the distinction between ζωή and βίος, in NT and in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers (ζωή the principle of life, vita qua vivimus; βίος the process, the circumstances, the accidents of life, in its social relations, vita quam vivimus; cf. Luk 8:14), see the valuable note of Lightfoot, Ignat. ad Rom. [Note: Roman.] vii. 3 (Apostolic Fathers, second part, ii. 1, 225-226); and cf. Haupt on 1Jn 2:16, and Trench, Synon. xxvii.

2. Ζῶν.—(1) as applied to God: by St. Peter, Mat 16:16 ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος; by the high priest, Mat 26:63 ἐξορκίζω σε κατὰ τοῦ θ. τ. ζ.; by Christ Himself, Joh 6:57 ὁ ζῶν πατήρ.

The title ‘the living God’ occurs in OT in the following passages: אֱלֹהִים חַיִּים Deu 5:23 (Deu 5:26), 1Sa 17:26-36, Jer 10:10; Jer 23:36; אֱלֹהִים חַיִּים 2Ki 19:4; 2Ki 19:16 (|| Isa 37:4; Isa 37:17); אֱלֹהֵינוּ Jos 3:10, Hos 2:1 (Hos 1:10), Psa 42:3 (2) Psa 84:3 (2); אֱלֹהֵינוּ Dan 6:21 (20) Dan 6:27 (26). It is found besides (in LXX Septuagint) Deu 4:33, Tob 13:1, Est 6:13, Dan 4:19; Dan 5:23; Dan 12:7, Bel 5, 3Ma 6:28. A study of the OT passages shows that God is called ‘the living God,’ not only as contrasted with the dead idols of the heathen, but also as the God of active Providence, as Israel’s Protector and Helper, as He who is Life, and the never-failing Source of spiritual life to men. It is perhaps the title of God that comes nearest in significance to Jahweh, and it seems to have been used at times of great emotion as a substitute for it, particularly when the name Jahweh had disappeared from popular use (cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, 195). Sanday (BL [Note: L Bampton Lecture.], 1893, p. 153, cf. 124) justly calls attention to the richness and depth of this prophetic title as compared with modern terminology: ‘the Absolute, the Infinite, the Unconditioned, the First Cause, the Moral Governor,’ and so on (cf. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, 170).* [Note: ‘O Thou Infinite, Amen,’ was the form of prayer Tennyson used in times of trouble and sorrow (Memoir by his Son, i. 324). The language of the founder of the Gifford Lectureship may also be recalled.]

‘The living God’ occurs often in NT, and the writer of Hebrews uses it with special force and emphasis (see A. B. Davidson, note on Heb 3:12). On the lips of St. Peter (Mat 16:16) it amounts to a confession that the living God is now revealed in Christ, who thus becomes the Source of eternal life to His followers (Joh 6:68; cf. Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible iv. 574^b). The high priest’s use of the title adds a certain dignity to his adjuration; and Jesus answered on being thus solemnly appealed to.

‘The living Father’ (Joh 6:57) is a remarkable expression, combining as it does all that was signified by ‘the living God’ in the OT with Christ’s revelation of God as the Father who sent His Son (or, of God as the Source of life on the side of love). The meaning of this verse may be briefly stated as follows: our Lord’s words, ‘I live by (διὰ , Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘because of’) the Father’ are to be referred to the personal life of human weakness and suffering now in progress. In living this life Jesus is dependent upon the support and sustenance which He is receiving at every moment from the Father who sent Him. A like dependence exists in our case upon Jesus Himself. Being Himself strengthened, He becomes the source of strength to us. It is the very fact of His coming and living this life of human weakness and suffering on earth that puts it within our power to take Him for our spiritual support and sustenance. When we take home the truth of His self-humbling love for our sake, and assimilate it to ourselves as the bread we eat, we receive into our souls the true life that cannot die (cf. Beyschlag, NT Theol. i. 272; and for a similar profound saying as to the relation between the Father and the Son and believers, see Joh 10:14-15).

(2) As applied to the Risen Lord: Luk 24:5 τί ζητεῖτε τὸν ζῶντα μετὰ τῶν νεκρῶν; the angels’ question conveyed a reproof to the women who were come to the place where the dead was laid, bringing the spices which they had prepared: it was like asking them, ‘Where is your faith?’ They had heard the announcement Christ made to the circle of His followers before leaving Galilee, that He would rise again the third day (Luk 24:6-7). At the same time, the question was spoken sympathetically, and conveyed to them the first intimation of the astonishing truth, οὐκ ἔστιν ὧδε, ἀλλὰ ἡγέρθη. Here ὁ ζῶν simply implies that Jesus lives, and is not now to be sought in the place where the dead are, i.e. continues no longer under the power of death (cf. Luk 24:23 ἀγγέλων ... οἱ λέγουσιν αὐτὸν ζῆν). But as spoken at the empty sepulchre, it undoubtedly has something of the exaltation of meaning with which it was afterwards used by our Lord in His glorified state (Rev 1:18 ἐγὼ εἰμι ... ὁ ζῶν ‘the Living one,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885). There is comprehended in it the completeness of that triumph over death which was afterwards so richly unfolded to the mind of the Church by the Holy Spirit, as, for example, when St. Paul used the exultant language of Rom 6:9-10, or spoke of Christ as a πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν (1Co 15:45).

(3) As applied to Water and Bread in the Fourth Gospel: Joh 4:10-11 ὕδωρ ζῶν; Joh 7:38 ποταμοὶ ὕδατος ζῶντος; Joh 6:51 ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἄρτος ὁ ζῶν.—a. Joh 4:10-11. ‘Living water’ is spring water, as contrasted with that collected in a well or cistern. It is the מַיִם חַיִּים of the OT (Gen 26:19 [see Driver's note], Lev 14:5-6; Lev 14:50-52, Son 4:15, Jer 2:13; Jer 17:13, Zec 14:8 : also LXX Septuagint Gen 21:19, Num 5:17). The woman of Samaria was familiar with the expression, and her question was quite natural and appropriate, 'Art thou greater than our father Jacob?' 'Here is an ordinary man offering to supply better water, spring water, in the place where the patriarch Jacob had been obliged to content himself with building a cistern and drinking cistern water' (Wendt, St. John's Gospel, 124). The water in Jacob's Well (wh. see) is believed to be due to 'percolation and rainfall' (cf. Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible ii. 536, Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4829, Smith's DB [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] ² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] ii. 1503). Jer 2:13 especially illustrates the difference between the spring or fountain, gushing forth with its unstinted and unfailing supply, 'overflowing, ever-flowing,' and the cistern, so liable to be destroyed by cracking (Land and Book, 287), which at the best cannot afford a refreshing draught like that of the bubbling spring, and which cannot permanently retain the water collected in it. Christ does not call Himself 'the Living water,' as He calls Himself 'the Living bread.' What He means by 'the living water' is the word of salvation which He preaches (cf. Joh 4:41-42). This word, He says (Joh 4:14), enters into the inner personal life, and becomes there a gushing spring, a perennial fountain (πηγή ὕδατος), 'springing up into eternal life,' i.e. persisting to flow upwards till we reach our end of full communion with God. C. Wesley's 'Spring Thou up within my heart, Rise to all eternity,' is quite in harmony with Israel's water-drawing song, in which the spring is addressed as a living being (Num 21:17, cf. Encyc. Bibl. i. 515, iv. 4778).

b. Joh 7:38.—'Pouring out water before the Lord' was a primitive ritual practice, of which the origin is uncertain. It was 'in all probability a survival from a time when water (in the desert) was considered an article of value' (Kantzsck in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible , Ext. Vol. 620^a). It is mentioned as a prayer-offering, 1Sa 7:6; as a thank-offering, 2Sa 23:16. There are no traces of it beyond the time of David (a reference to it in 1Ki 18:33 is not probable); but the practice of pouring out water as a drink-offering continued to be observed, or was revived, in connexion with the Feast of Tabernacles. Every morning during the seven days of the feast water was drawn from the spring of Siloam in a golden pitcher, and was poured into a basin at the top of the altar (Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4213). The libation of water was probably a prayer-offering for abundant rain for the new seed-time (ib. iv. 4880, cf. iii. 3354). Rain was an emblem of Messianic blessings (2Sa 23:4, Psa 72:6, cf. Hos 6:3); and we may well believe that the symbolical act of pouring out water gave occasion to our Lord's looking forward to the abundant showers with which He was soon to water the earth.—Further, this joyous festival brought to our Lord's mind the Rock at Horeb (Exo 17:6, Num 20:11, cf. 1Co 10:4), and perhaps more especially those OT sayings in which it had been predicted that living water should flow out from Jerusalem, or from the House of the Lord (Eze 47:1; Eze 47:12, Zec 14:8, Joe 3:18, cf. Psa 87:7). What was the precise connecting link of thought between these predictions and the phrase ἐκ τῆς κοιλίας αὐτοῦ, it is difficult to say. But may it not be the case that, in our Lord's view, what had been spoken concerning Jerusalem and the Temple was now to be applied to the inner personal life of the believer, enriched by the entrance of His word, and renewed by His Holy Spirit? This sanctified personal life was what now answered to the sanctuary from which it had been foretold that living waters should flow out. Our Lord's application of the term κοιλία to it was in keeping with the use of קִּיבּוּץ in certain passages of the OT, where it denotes the whole of man's emotional nature and sympathetic affections (Pro 20:27; Pro 20:30, Hab 3:16, cf. Sir 19:12; Sir 51:21; cf. also the expression 'his bowels yearned,' Gen 43:30, 1Ki 3:26). The words καθὼς εἶπεν ἡ γραφή, κ.τ.λ., are thus a terse and eloquent paraphrase of the scope of the passages above referred to. It need hardly be said that the clause καθὼς εἶπεν ἡ γραφή cannot possibly be connected with the preceding ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμέ ('there are not different ways of believing,' Principal Campbell, The Four Gospels, in loc.). This saying of our Lord supplements and extends that of Joh 4:14. The word of salvation which becomes a gushing spring when received into the inner personal life of the believer, and rises up there unto eternal life, Jesus now announces, is to become a rushing stream, and is to flow out from the believer in rivers of blessing to others (ποταμοὺς ἐκάλεσεν, οὐχ ἓνα ποταμὸν, ἀλλὰ ἀφάρτους, Chrys. in loc.). The limitations to its diffusion that at present exist will be removed when Christ shall have entered into His glory. His sending His Holy Spirit upon the company of believers will enable them to proclaim His word with full power, and will make their holy lives a means of spiritual replenishment to all mankind. The saying was fulfilled after Pentecost, when 'rivers of living water' flowed out from the Lord's witnesses 'unto the uttermost part of the earth,' 'beginning at Jerusalem'* [Note: The Patristic expositors applied the saying mainly to the effusion of the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit (Hare, Mission of the Comforter, Note H, where a passage is quoted from a sermon preached by Luther in 1531, in which he states the right sense with his usual vigour).] (cf. Dykes, Expositor, 1890 (i.) p. 127 ff.). When the water from Siloam was brought to the Temple, priests and people sang the words, 'Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation' (Isa 12:3). But in the verses following (Isa 12:4-6), it was implied that the water so drawn was not to be Israel's exclusive possession, but that the salvation which it symbolized was to be communicated to other nations (Isa 12:5 'let this be known in all the earth,' Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885). With the leading thought of Joh 7:38 may be compared what St. Paul says about Christians first receiving and then giving forth 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ' (2Co 4:6).

c. Joh 6:51.—Two things—the manna and the bread of the miracle which He had just wrought—were present to our Lord’s mind when He preached at Capernaum, and also to the minds of His hearers. They had said, after His feeding the five thousand, ‘This is of a truth the Prophet that cometh into the world’ (Joh 6:14). But the earthly and material good which they expected to follow not being immediately forthcoming, and the first favourable impression produced by the miracle having worn off, they began to criticise and find fault. ‘After all, His multiplying the loaves is not anything so very wonderful. Can He “rain down manna upon us to eat, and give us of the corn of heaven” (Psa 78:24), that we may see and believe Him (Joh 6:30)? The manna,’ said they, ‘supplied the wants of all the hosts of Israel for forty years, but He has furnished us with no more than one meal.’ This led Jesus to set forth the difference between the manna and ‘the true bread from heaven’ (Joh 6:32). Inasmuch as the manna was sent down from above, and was continually renewed, it was a type of the true bread. But that bread it was not, being simply a provision which was made for a special purpose, and which lasted only until that purpose had been fulfilled (cf. Jos 5:12); nor had their fathers’ having eaten it eventually delivered them from the power of death (Joh 6:49). Jesus also showed that His hearers had failed to perceive the true purpose of the miracle He had wrought. The bread of the miracle was intended for ‘a sign’ (Joh 6:26), which they had not had faith to discern (Joh 6:36), that He could supply them with the true bread of the soul. Inasmuch as the multiplying of the loaves was due to His love, and involved the repeated action of that love in the gift of a satisfying meal to each of them severally (cf. Swete, St. Mark, 127^b), it was ‘a sign’ that should have led them to believe that He could give them the true bread. But they had sought Him at Capernaum, not hungering for this bread, but hankering after more earthly good, like that which they had already received. Accordingly, Jesus spoke of the bread of the miracle as ‘the meat which perisheth,’ and contrasted it with ‘the meat which endureth unto eternal life’ (Joh 6:27). These distinctions of the bread of the miracle as well as the manna from the true bread of the soul are important and vital, and they assist us to lay hold of our Lord’s meaning when He said, ‘I am the living bread.’ This expression has no parallel in the OT, but it is in close affinity with the ‘living water’ in ch. 4. As ‘living water’ is water that never ceases to gush forth, so ‘living bread’ is bread that Jesus never ceases to multiply for the supply of our spiritual wants,—bread, therefore, by which our spiritual sustenance is perpetually renewed (cf. Dods, Expositor’s Bible, in loc.). It is bread in ever-multiplying, unmeasured store, that can never be exhausted by the famishing. As Jesus speaks of ‘giving’ this bread (Joh 6:27), it must mean, in the first instance, the same thing as the better water which He also spoke of ‘giving,’ namely, His word. This view is in agreement with the teaching of Joh 6:63; Joh 6:68, and is also supported by our Lord’s use of Deu 8:3 (Mat 4:4, Luk 4:4). But He not only speaks of ‘giving’ bread, He also says, ‘I am the living bread.’ The key to His meaning is found in the Prologue. Jesus not only utters the word of God, but is ‘from eternity the very Word of God, by which God manifests Himself. He is not one who leads to the way, but Himself the Way; not one who preaches truth, but Himself the Truth' (Joh 1:1; Joh 14:6; Hibbert Journal, Oct. 1905, p. 6). So here Jesus not only gives the bread, but is Himself 'the living bread,' – 'the actual source of nutrition.' He 'speaks of Himself not as resembling, but as being the veritable vine, the veritable bread, the veritable light of the world; implying that He is the absolute truth of all these things; the supreme reality which they partially manifest in their several spheres' (Illingworth, *Divine Immanence*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , 135, cf. 137). Jesus adds, 'which came down from heaven.' As in the physical realm, so, too, in the spiritual, the food that sustains us comes down from heaven, and to procure it is beyond the reach of our own powers (Isa 55:10-11). As the heaven-given bread which feeds our bodies ultimately assumes the humble form of the baked loaf, which, inasmuch as it nourishes life, retains the life of the living wheat, and can impart it, so Jesus, in order to feed our souls, must humble Himself and 'be found in fashion as a man,' be born, and that in a low condition (v. 42), undergo the miseries of this life, and at the end of His earthly course even 'give his flesh for the life of the world.' The power of this truth of His self-humbling love for our sake enters into our inner personal life, and we are enabled to assimilate it to ourselves as the food we eat, by means of His word. His word is the 'bread which strengtheneth man's heart' (Psa 104:15), because it is the embodiment of Him who, having humbled Himself to death, now for ever lives. Through it the repeated action of His love still ministers the gift to each hungering soul. The Bread of heaven, in heaven itself, will be the word which Jesus speaks to His people.—It is the same truth respecting Christ as our Living Food and Strength that is 'represented, sealed, and applied' to us in the Lord's Supper.

(4) As applied to the Patriarchs: Mar 12:27 (|| Mat 22:32, Luk 20:38) οὐκ ἔστιν θεὸς νεκρῶν, ἀλλὰ ζώντων.—In expounding this cardinal saying, we have first to inquire what doctrine our Lord is here vindicating. Religious minds among the Jews had already arrived at the clearly defined hope of a future life (Driver, Sermons on OT, 92), which life they conceived of as comprehending 'the deliverance of an existent personality from Sheol, and its re-endowment with life in all its powers and activities' (Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iv. 232^a). Sadduceeism, which represented the old Jewish standpoint, rejected these doctrines. The Sadducees were hostile to our Lord's whole teaching respecting 'the kingdom of God,' which carried the consummation of the Kingdom into a future life, and accordingly implied that there would be a resurrection of the dead. It was with reference to the resurrection that they chose their line of attack on His teaching. In His discussion with them, it was our Lord's object not only to maintain that there is a life after death, but also to reveal what deliverance from death really implied. Had He made use of Exodus 3 simply to prove the continued existence of men after death, He would not have met the objections of

His opponents. It was their attack on the resurrection that He successfully repelled (cf. Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 222). The Sadducees, although not actually rejecting the other books of the OT, considered them as being very inferior in value to the five books of Moses (cf. Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4240). It was from the latter, accordingly, that they drew their objection to the resurrection. Founding on the law of the Levirate marriage (see Levirate Law), they thought to put our Lord in an embarrassing position by propounding the case of seven brethren, who, after having married the same wife in succession, had all died childless, and then asking, 'In the resurrection, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of the seven?' The story of Glaphyra (Josephus Ant. xvii. xiii. 4; cf. Addison, Spectator, No. 110) was probably much canvassed about that time (Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar, 245); and in it the marriage-relation was conceived of as still standing in the world beyond death. Our Lord took the opportunity afforded Him by the disputation which had arisen to set free the doctrine of the resurrection from such grossly materialistic notions as these, and to show that the resurrection life is not a continuation of the present life of the body, or of human relations as they now exist (Joh 6:25). As to the main point at issue, He met the Sadducees on their own ground. He directed their attention to a passage which they had overlooked in one of their revered books, and prefacing the quotation with the words, 'As touching the dead that they rise,'—thus showing that it was the resurrection He was vindicating,—He asked them, 'Have you considered the bearing of this passage upon the doctrine in question?' As to our Lord's use of this passage of the OT, all that need be said here is that the revelation given to Moses at Horeb, and made by him the ground of his appeal to the Hebrew tribes,—the revelation, namely, of Jahweh as the God of their fathers,—lies at the very root of Israel's religion (cf. W. R. Smith, Proph. 1 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] 32, OTJC [Note: TJC The Old Test, in the Jewish Church] 2 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] 303; Kautzsch in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible, Ext. Vol. 624, 625^a). Our Lord's argument, based on the passage quoted, may be stated as follows:—The words of Exo 3:6; Exo 3:13; Exo 3:15-16 spoke of the relation of the patriarchs to God as a still existing relation, and set forth a fellowship with God in which they, being dead, yet lived. But their fellowship with God contained in itself the promise and the pledge of a more complete life and more perfect fellowship which should hereafter be granted them by God. It followed, by an inner principle of necessity, from their being united to Him who is 'the God of the living,' that He would not leave any part of their being for ever under the destructive power of death, but would in the end awaken them to a heavenly life with Himself (Wendt, l.c. i. 223; cf. Bengel, note on Mat 22:32; Salmond, *Chr. Doctr. of Immortality*³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , 366; Swete, St. Mark, 266). Or, to state the argument in a more compact form:—God is Life. The patriarchs are in God, therefore they partake of life. But life cannot die, therefore they must continue living for ever. But a purely incorporeal existence does not give the full conception of life in man's case. Each patriarch is soul plus body. Therefore the body, as well as the soul, is secured in an everlasting life. Compare the remarkable treatise on the Resurrection by the apologist Athenagoras (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 177), especially chs. 14-17 (Donaldson, A Critical History of Chr. Lit. and Doctr. iii. 116, 136 ff.). The ground of the resurrection-hope which our Lord found in this passage was beyond question contained in it, seeing that He found it there and set it forth. He could see all that God meant when He called Himself 'the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.' He could discern the full witness borne by this title to the certainty of the hope which He defended. 'He who spoke in the OT was God, and from the first that which He spoke about was the consummation which filled His thought' (A. B. Davidson, Expositor, 1900 (i.), 15; cf. OT Prophecy, 14). Further, in the Resurrection of Christ Himself we have the conclusive proof that communion with God involves the restitution of the whole of our personal being. What the proper view of the resurrection body is we find later on from St. Paul, whose doctrine of a σῶμα πνευματικόν as contrasted with a σῶμα ψυχικόν (1Co 15:44), and of a σῶμα τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ as contrasted with a σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν (Php 3:21), was no doubt evolved from our Lord's saying.

(5) As applied to the manner or course of life: Luk 15:13 ζῶν ἀσώτως, 'with riotous living' (cf. Josephus Ant. xii. iv. 8, ἀσώτως ζῆν). Contrast 'holy living.' From this phrase is derived the title ὁ ἄσωτος υἱός, filius prodigus, by which this parable is generally known (Trench, Par. 8 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] 393; Jülicher, Gleichnissr. 337, 341).* [Note: (de Pœnitentia, Hom. i. 4) calls the younger son ὁ ἄσωτος, but the sermon εἰς τοῦ ἄσωτον υἱόν referred to by Jülicher is omitted as spurious, ed. Montfauçon (Paris, 1839).] See also art. Life.

☞ Loaf

LOAF (ἄρτος).—The Eastern loaf is not at all like the bread in use among ourselves. The Passover loaf—a large round thin cake—probably preserves the shape of the loaf in use among the Jews of our Lord's time. The same shape of loaf is found to-day among the Bedawîn and fellahîn as well as in many villages and towns. The loaves are of considerable size,—18 in. or more in diameter,—and are of an extreme tenuity and of a peculiar but not unpleasant toughness. They are baked usually on a convex girdle, very often on the implement which is used for roasting coffee—hence the name 'girdle bread.' They may also be baked on heated stones or on the outside of a jar within which a fire has been kindled. Such without doubt would be the kind of bread baked by the children of Israel in their desert wanderings. And at the present time one may see this loaf in almost every part of Palestine. Even where other kinds of bread are used, this is still highly relished. If there is a guest in a native house, the loaves are often folded up in quarter size and laid beside his plate, and more than one European traveller has mistaken them, when so placed, for table napkins!

In all probability the loaves in Mar_6:38; Mar_8:6, etc., were of this kind, inasmuch as such bread is almost always carried on a journey, and by workmen, because of its keeping properties. The loaf is never cut; it is broken or torn asunder. Small scoops are made of the portions, with which the meat, rice, or leben (curdled milk) is scooped up—spoon and contents being eaten together. A man will eat three or four of these loaves at a meal (Luk_11:5).

Another loaf in common use at the present day is smaller in circumference and considerably thicker, and very much resembles in appearance the 'scones,' baked on a girdle, so common in some parts of Scotland. Bread of this kind is found only in towns where there are public ovens. See also art. Bread.

Loans

LOANS.—There are frequent references to money, and many illustrations suggested by financial obligations, in the teaching of Jesus. These have been gathered together as indications of 'the economic background of the Evangelical history' (Hausrath, NT Times, i. p. 188 f., quoted also in full by Bruce in Parabolic Teaching, p. 243 f.). We learn from Tacitus that the year 17 was marked by great discontent in Judaea and throughout Syria, on account of the burdensome taxation, and that the year 33 was one of financial crisis throughout the Empire. There is thus full justification for the numerous Gospel intimations of hardship and debt, and impoverishment generally. See Debt.

But the relation of debtor and creditor is so obviously adaptable to moral obligations, that under any social condition the use of this figure is to be expected. The very terms for financial obligations are freely used to express the obligations of moral life. Thus the same Gr. verb (ὀφείλω) is variously rendered in the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'owed,' 'owest,' 'that was due' (Mat 18:28; Mat 18:30; Mat 18:34, Luk 7:41; Luk 16:5; Luk 16:7 of financial obligation); 'debtor' (Mat 23:16; Mat 23:18 [Authorized Version 'guilty']), 'duty' (Luk 17:10), 'ought' (Joh 13:14; Joh 19:7), 'indebted' (Luk 11:4; all of moral obligation); and the noun (ὀφειλέτης) is translated 'owed' (Mat 18:24 of money debt), 'debtors' (Mat 6:12 of moral debts), 'offenders' (Luk 13:4 [Authorized Version 'sinners'] of guilt before God). Financial obligations afford also a ready measure of moral indebtedness; our sins against one another are as debts of £50 or £5 (Luk 7:41), but our sin against God runs into 'millions sterling' (Mat 18:24).

The very naturalness of these illustrative uses of money values and financial relations makes it obviously wrong to press them into the support of economic theories, e.g. the justification of commercial loans from 'Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the bankers, and then at my coming I should have received back mine own with interest' (Mat 25:27 = Luk 19:23). In parables any relations may hold which the story demands. In Christian economics only moral relations are to be tolerated. Because then, in the Gospel narratives, debtors and creditors, borrowers and lenders figure largely, we are not able to say that the teaching of Jesus either supports or condemns modern commercial arrangements. The true basis of Christian economics must be found in the ethical teaching of the Gospels as a whole.

Apart from incidental references in parables, there is one saying of Jesus which calls for fuller notice. 'If ye lend (δανείζω, lend upon interest; contrast κίχρημι, of a friendly loan, Luk 11:5 only) to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? even sinners lend to sinners, to receive again as much. But love your enemies, and do them good, and lend, never despairing; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be sons of the Most High: for he is kind toward the unthankful and evil' (Luk 6:34 f., cf. Mat 5:42). The difficulty, in part one of textual reading, but mainly of interpretation, finds adequate representation in 'hoping for nothing again' (Authorized Version), 'never despairing' (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), 'despairing of no man' ((Revised Version margin)). This uncertainty cannot, however, affect the meaning, which is determined by the preceding verses, and though the rendering of the Authorized Version must be rejected on critical grounds, it may well stand as an adequate gloss. On the authority of this saying the unlawfulness for Christians of receiving interest on loans has been based; and, rightly understood and applied, the inference is just. The commandment is one of benevolence. Christian charity is not to be by way of loans at interest. It is the duty of giving Jesus teaches, as if He said, 'Let your lending be giving'—a rule of charity which experience justifies, and which, from the would-be borrower's side, receives support in St. Paul's saying, 'Owe no man anything, save to love one another' (Rom_13:8).

Locust

LOCUST

1. Zoological description.—Locusts belong to the natural order Orthoptera. The members of this order are insects which undergo only a partial metamorphosis; the larva is scarcely distinguishable from the adult, unless by its smaller form and by the atrophy of its wings, which develop only gradually in proportion to its growth. Excepting this difference, it has the same form and the same habits as the adult. In its perfect state, the first pair of wings, though remaining supple, have a certain consistency. They cover the hind wings, which are membranous and transparent, and folded under the upper wings in the form of a fan. The mouth is of shape suitable for mastication, and the jaws act like a pair of scissors. Formerly the Orthoptera were divided into runners and leapers, but this division has been abandoned. Locusts were classed among the leapers. According to the present nomenclature, we must class them among the Orthoptera genuina. Among these appear among others (a) the family of Locustodeæ, to which the European grasshoppers (the subfamily of the Locustidæ) belong; and also (b) the family of Acridiodeæ, which includes in its various sub-families the principal locusts of Palestine. It is of the highest importance to avoid the confusion which may arise from this misleading terminology, according to which the 'locusts' of the Bible do not belong to the scientific family Locustodeæ.

We are, then, to treat of the family Aeridiodeæ. Their antennae are relatively short, scarcely exceeding the length of the head, whereas the antennae of the Locustodeæ are very long, as long as their bodies. Their hind legs, adapted for leaping, have very strong thighs furnished with indentations, which are easily seen if slightly magnified. The head is vertical. The first pair of wings are more leathery than the second, but both present the same reticulated appearance. The rapid brushing of the thighs of the hind legs, furnished with indentations, against the nervures of the front wings produces, when the insect is at rest, a stridulation, the tone and height of which vary according to the species. The Acridiodeæ are generally diurnal, and their food is essentially herbaceous. In the females the abdomen ends in a pair of short pincers, whereas in the Locustodeæ this appendage is greatly prolonged like the blade of a sabre. These pincers serve to bury in the earth, one by one, the eggs, which are disposed in cylindrical masses and held together by a frothy secretion.

The insect moults six times, but the principal stages of its development are only two—larva and imago (perfect state). The intermediate state (pupa) which we find in other orders of insects is imperceptible in the Orthoptera. In their state of larvae, locusts, having no wings, or more correctly, merely the rudiments of wings, hop on the ground; even at this stage they are extremely destructive. Later, with the succeeding moultings, the wings develop, but remain enclosed in a membranous case; the insects now advance walking. At last, at their sixth moulting, which takes place from six to seven weeks after their coming out of the egg, locusts attain to their perfect state, and, unfolding their wings, fly through the air, producing what travellers describe as ‘a hissing or a buzzing noise.’

In Palestine as many as forty different species of Acridiodeæ have been noted. The most important of these belong to the sub-families of the Tryxalidæ, the Ædipodidæ, and the Acridiidæ properly so called. The commonest species, those which are rightly associated with the locusts mentioned in the Bible, are the Pachytylus migratorius (formerly called Ædipoda migratoria) and the Sehisticerea peregrina (formerly called Acridium peregrinum). The colour of these insects is generally brown bordering on green, but with a bluish tint round the mouth, and with black spots on the body and green spots on the wings. The males are coloured differently from the females. In regard to their dimensions, locusts are as much as three or even four inches long when they are full grown.

Locusts are migratory insects, as the qualifying words, migratoria, peregrina, applied to them denote. They are produced chiefly in desert regions on the lofty plateaux of the East, and, carried by their wings and driven on by the east wind, they invade western Palestine in compact bodies.

2. Biblical names.—The OT mentions locusts under at least nine different names. These are (1) אַרְבֵּכָה 'arbch, Exo 10:4; Exo 10:12-14; Exo 10:19, Lev 11:22, Deu 28:38, Jdg 6:5; Jdg 7:12, 1Ki 8:37, 2Ch 6:28, Job 39:20, Psa 78:46; Psa 105:34; Psa 109:23, Pro 30:27, Jer 46:23, Joe 1:4; Joe 2:25, Nah 3:15; Nah 3:17. (2) חֲגָבָה hâgâb, Lev 11:22, Num 13:33, 2Ch 7:13, Ecc 12:5, Isa 40:22. (3) סִלְעָם sol'âm, Lev 11:22. (4) חֲרָגֹל hargôl, Lev 11:22. (5) יֵלֶק yelek, Psa 105:34, Jer 51:14; Jer 51:27, Joe 1:4; Joe 2:25, Nah 3:15 f. (6) חֲסִיל hâsîl, 1Ki 8:37, 2Ch 6:28, Psa 78:46, Isa 33:4, Joe 1:4; Joe 2:25. (7) גֻזָּאם gûzâm, Joe 1:4; Joe 2:25, Amo 4:9.

(8) נִבְּ, נִבְּ, נִבְּי, gçb, gôb, gôbai, Isa 33:4, Amo 7:1, Nah 3:17. (9) זְלַזַל zêlâzal, Deu 28:42.

It would naturally be a matter of the greatest interest to know if these various names correspond with as many different species. But before replying to this question, (a) we should have to be certain that the ancients, the Easterns, the Hebrews in particular, were capable of making a distinction similar to that of genus and species used by modern scholars; (b) we should have to be equally certain that Biblical writers employed the terms in their language in a strict and rigorous fashion (a thing which even modern writers do not always do); and (c) we should require sufficient data to enable us to assign such and such a Hebrew name to such and such a particular species. Now these three conditions cannot be fulfilled, and in such a case it may well seem chimerical to demand a systematic classification, in accordance with present zoological principles, of the various locusts mentioned in the Bible. We must remember that Oriental languages, such as Hebrew and Arabic, possess a considerable choice of synonyms to denote one and the same animal. We note that the LXX Septuagint proceeds on no regular system. It translates the Hebrew by using the terms ἀκρίς, βροῦχος, κάμπη, ἀπτέλαβος (ἀπτέλεβος), ἐρυσίβν (ἐρυσύβη), ἀττάκης, ὄφιομάχης, etc., in a purely arbitrary and, it would appear, conjectural manner, without taking the least care always to translate the same Hebrew by the same Greek word. The same is true of the version of Jerome and of translations into modern languages. The Authorized and Revised Versions has had no better success with its varying use of 'locust,' 'grasshopper,' 'canker-worm,' 'palmer-worm,' 'caterpillar,' and even 'beetle' (for hâgâb, manifestly a false translation).

We must also avoid the error of thinking that the various terms employed, for example, by Joel and Nahum refer to locusts at various stages in their development. The fact that the order of the four terms gâzâm, 'arbeh, yelek, hâsîl in Joe 1:4 is followed in Joe 2:25 by the order 'arbch, yelek, hâsîl, gâzâm, in itself disproves this theory. Besides, it would be difficult to perceive in the development of the Orthopterous insect four stages easily distinguishable by every observer, since, as we have seen, the insect changes very little from moulting to moulting.* [Note: Perhaps one might instance, to prove that the Hebrews had noticed the successive stages of development in the locust, the fact that in Jer 51:27 yelek is qualified by סָמָר sâmâr (EV 'rough'): this might be understood to apply to the state of the insect before it has the use of its wings (?).] We must add to the passages of the canonical OT cited above Jdt 2:20, Wis 16:9, Sir 43:17. The term used in these three texts is ἀκρίς; the Hebrew Sirach has 'arbch.

The names that the Hebrew language gives to locusts prove that these insects were peculiarly feared (a) on account of their great numbers, and (b) on account of their voracity and their power of destruction. In fact, 'arbch probably goes back to a root meaning to be numerous, to multiply. On the other hand, gâzâm, hâsîl, yelek, and sol'âm all have the sense of destruction (literally to clip, to cut, to devour, to swallow).† [Note: It is striking to note, in view of these names of serious and even terrible import, that similar insects in Europe (the Locustidœ) are tricked out with such innocent names as 'grasshopper' (German, Heuschrecke, from Heu, 'hay,' and the old word scricchan, 'to leap'; in French sauterelle); note also the German Heupferd and the Italian cavaletta, due to the resemblance of the grasshopper's head to a horse's.] The sense of gçb (gôb, gôbai) and of hâgâb is a problem. Hargôl appears to signify one who gallops, and zêlâzal is a more harmless term, referring to the humming of the locust's wings, or rather to the stridulation it makes when it is at rest (a word akin to this is used to denote cymbals).

3. Locusts in the OT.—In the books of the OT the locust is sometimes used figuratively to denote smallness (Num 13:33, Isa 40:22), lightness (Ecc 12:5, but the passage is obscure and in dispute), and great numbers (Jdg 6:5; Jdg 7:12, Jer 46:23). But, as a rule, when locusts are mentioned, it is usually as an instrument of destruction or as food.

The former of these last two usages is much the more frequent in the OT. Particularly forcible, vivid, and picturesque descriptions of the destructive power of the locust are given in the passages quoted above from Exodus, Joel, Amos, and Nahum. The fear-inspiring character of these insect invaders, as they advance in regular companies (Pro 30:27), is in no way exaggerated. Locusts are a veritable plague. We find graphic descriptions in the writings of travellers or residents in the Holy Land, such as Wilson, Tristram, Thomson, Van-Lennep, as well as of other writers in various countries. Their accounts have, among others, been collected by Driver (loc. cit. inf.). Van-Lennep even says of locusts (p. 314) that 'their voracity is such that in the neighbourhood of Broosa, in the year 1856, an infant having been left asleep in its cradle under some shady trees, was found not long after partly devoured by the locusts.' See also the singularly graphic passage in which Thomson relates his personal experiences (LB [Note: The Land and the Book.] ii. p. 296 f.). On a sculptured stone found at Babylon is an exact representation (reproduced in Van-Lennep, l.e.) of two locusts devouring a bush. The present writer has seen on both sides of the Dead Sea, and also in the neighbourhood of Jericho and Gadara, locusts at the various stages of development devastating the country and making all verdure disappear in an instant. He has also been a witness of the efforts of the fellahîn, under the direction of the officials of the Turkish Government, to check the advance of the insects by lighting along their track fires fed with petroleum. Another device is to compel the Bedawîn, proportionally to the number of members of each family, to bring in a fixed weight of the eggs or larvae of locusts. The wind, which brings the swarms of locusts, also drives them hither and thither (cf. Psa_109:23), and sometimes carries them into the sea (Exo_10:19, Joe_2:20). One who has read, for example, Joel 1-2, or has seen with his own eyes the ravages of the locusts, is not surprised to find in Rev_9:3-11 this insect playing an apocalyptic part and accomplishing a mission of destruction.

4. Locusts in the Gospels.—But in the Gospels—with which this Dictionary is principally concerned—locusts are never mentioned as devastating insects. In Mat_3:4 and in the parallel passage Mar_1:6 they appear only as an article of food. It is in this character, then, that we have chiefly to study them here. The word used is ἀκρίς; it is said that John the Baptist fed on ‘locusts and wild honey’ (see art. Honey). An ancient tradition of the Christian Church held that the locusts eaten by the Baptist were not insects, but the pods or husks of a tree, the carob or locust tree (Ceratonia siliqua, Arab. [Note: Arabic.] kharrúb). Curiously enough, this old interpretation has been resuscitated in our own times by Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. ii. cols. 2136, 2499), who sees in the locusts of John the Baptist ‘carobbeans,’ but for reasons which do not seem to us convincing. In fact, locusts are a well-known food in Eastern countries. Herodotus mentions this (iv. 172); Thomson says (LB [Note: The Land and the Book.] ii. p. 301): ‘Locusts are not eaten in Syria by any but the Bedawîn on the extreme frontier. By the natives, locusts are always spoken of as a very inferior article of food, and regarded by most with disgust—to be eaten only by the very poorest people. John the Baptist, however, was of that class ... he also dwelt in “the wilderness” or desert, where such food was and is still used.’ There are, according to travellers, several ways of preparing locusts for food. ‘The Bedouins eat locusts,’ says Burckhardt (p. 239), ‘which are collected in great quantities in the beginning of April. After having been roasted a little upon the iron plate on which bread is baked, they are dried in the sun, and then put into large sacks, with the mixture of a little salt. They are never served up as a dish, but everyone takes a handful of them when hungry. The peasants of Syria do not eat locusts.... There are a few poor fellahs in the Haouran, however, who sometimes, pressed by hunger, make a meal of them; but they break off the head and take out the entrails before they dry them in the sun. The Bedouins swallow them entire.’ ‘The wings and legs are lopped off the body,’ says Wilson (p. 330), ‘and fried with salt and pepper.’ ‘They are roasted and eaten as butter upon loaves of bread,’ says Van-Lennep (p. 319), ‘resembling shrimps in taste, or they are boiled in water with a little salt, dried in the sun, and, being deprived of their wings and legs, are packed in bags for use. They are beaten to a powder, which is mixed with flour and water, made into little cakes, and used as a substitute for bread when flour is scarce. Dried locusts are generally exposed for sale in the markets of Medina, Bagdad, and even Damascus. Palgrave goes so far as to say (p. 346), ‘Locusts are here an article of food, nay, a dainty, and a good swarm of them is begged of Heaven in Arabia no less fervently than it would be deprecated in India or in Syria.... When boiled or fried they are said to be delicious, and boiled and fried accordingly they are to an incredible extent.’ It would appear likewise, to judge from Thomson (l.c.), that occasionally dried, boiled, or fried locusts are eaten with honey. Even horses (Blunt, ii. p. 79) and camels (Daumas, p. 258) are fed on locusts.

The Law of Israel, which strictly forbade the eating of creeping things, insects, etc., made an exception in the case of locusts, which are mentioned under four different names, two of which (sol’âm and hargôl) are found only in this one passage (Lev 11:22). The Law characterizes them in this sentence: ‘Yet these may ye eat of all winged creeping things that go upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth.’

Literature.

1. Ancient use of the term.—The Gr. λόγια is the plural of λόγιον ‘a brief utterance,’ ‘apothegm,’ ‘saying’ (so Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 969. 973). According to Liddell-Scott (Lex.) and Meyer (on Rom 3:2), λόγιον is the neuter of λόγιος = ‘learned,’ ‘rational,’ and hence means ‘a wise saying.’ More correctly, according to Grimm-Thayer and others, it is a diminutive of λόγος ‘word,’ like βιβλίον from βιβλος ‘book,’ plur. τὰ βιβλία ‘the (sacred) books,’ English ‘Bible.’ In secular writers (Herodotus, Thucyd., Aristoph., et al.) it is applied to the Divine oracles (because brief utterances), as those of the Sibyl of Dodona, of Delphi, etc. The same connotation of sacred utterances attaches to the use of the word as applied to the Hebrew Scriptures, as by Philo and Josephus. Thus the contents of the OT, as Divine utterances, are called τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ. In particular the Ten Words (English ‘Ten Commandments’) are called by Philo τὰ δέκα λόγια (ed. Mangey ii. p. 180ff). By NT writers the term is applied to the Scriptures generally, as ‘oracles’ of God, or to individual inspired utterances of prophets, pre-Christian or Christian (Act 7:38, Rom 3:2, Heb 5:12, 1Pe 4:11). In Ecclesiastical writers of the sub-Apostolic age πᾶ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ is used of the admonitions of God in Scripture (Clem. Rom. [Note: Roman.] ad Cor. liii. 1, in parallel with αἱ ἱερᾶι γραφαί), and τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου, or simply τὰ λόγια, of the precepts of Jesus, not including embodying narrative. So especially Polycarp ad Phil. vii. 1, denouncing heretics, who ‘pervert the precepts of the Lord (τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου) to their own lusts, denying that there is either (bodily) resurrection or (day of) judgment’ (cf. Hegesippus ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica ii. xxiii. 9); and Papias (ap. Euseb. Historia Ecclesiastica iii. 39), who interpreted ‘the oracles of the Lord’ (λόγια κυριακά) in accordance with the tradition of elders who had been followers of the Apostles. In Papias the λόγια are made equivalent to ‘the commandments (ἐντολαί) delivered by the Lord to the faith,' and stand in contrast with 'alien commandments' (ἀλλότριαι ἐντολαί) of heretical teachers, and the 'loquacity sought by the multitude' (οὐχ ὥσπερ οἱ πολλοὶ τοῖς τὰ πολλὰ λέγουσιν ἔχαιρον). The true interpretation of these logia is matter of tradition transmitted through (1) the Apostles, (2) the Elders 'the disciples of these' (lege οἱ τούτων—8c. τῶν τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν—μαθηταί [see Aristion-Aristo], Iren. Hæer. v. v. 1; οἱ πρεσβύτεροι [οἱ] τῶν ἀποστόλων μαθηταί, Origen ap. Eus.: οἱ διάδοχοι τῶν ἀποστόλων). Compare Polycarp (I.e.), 'Wherefore leaving the vain talk (ματαιότητα) of the multitude and the false teachings (ψευδοδιδασκαλίας), let us turn to the word handed down by tradition from the beginning (τὸν ἐξ ἀρχῆς ἢ μὲν παραδοθεντα λόγον).

At a much later time the term τὰ λόγια is applied to NT Scripture generally in the same sense as to the OT (Ignatius, ad Smyrn. iii. [longer form in the interpolated matter]). See in general Grimm-Thayer, Lexicon, s.v. λόγιον, and Lightfoot, Contemp. Rev. for Aug. 1875, p. 399 ff. On Papias' use see Hall, Papias, 1899, p. 242.

2. The modern use of the term 'logia' is partly (a) conformed to the Patristic application to the precepts of Jesus conceived as 'brief and pithy apothegms' (Justin M. Apol. xiv.) of sacred authority; partly (b) designates a compilation, or compilations, antecedent to or parallel with the canonical Gospels, supposed to have been entitled or called τὰ λόγια; cf. the use of 'Bible' (Lat. Biblia = τὰ βιβλία), to mean 'the (sacred) books' of the Canon.

(a) Of the former (correct) use it is enough to say that science has no better designation for the apothegms of Jesus in the form wherein tradition has transmitted them, whether in the Synoptic Gospels or as uncanonical agrapha. The connotation of sacredness in the designation logion, if we have regard to the later period of transmission, is not inappropriate. The cherished utterances of Jesus soon obtained such currency independently of our Gospels (Act 20:35, Clem. Rom. [Note: Roman.] ad Cor. xiii. 1, xlvii. 7, Polyc. ad Phil. [Note: Philistine.] vii. 2) as rightly to deserve it. The term is appropriate therefore to the sacred apothegms of Jesus as preserved in the Synoptic Gospels or independently. As against the simple λόγοι, it is probably a later form involving tacit comparison with the (sacred) precepts of the OT. It is less common than λόγοι, and certainly much less applicable to the discourses of the Fourth Gospel, where, even if traditional logia are embodied, dialogue, the favourite form for philosophic and religious exposition, predominates, and the traditional interest is subordinated to that of expounding the Evangelist's Christology.

(b) The use of 'Logia' or 'the Logia' to designate a certain type of Gospel-composition is open to serious objection. The discovery by Grenfell and Hunt of papyri of the 2nd or 3rd century, in which Sayings attributed to Jesus are agglutinated with no more of narrative framework than the bare words, 'Jesus saith' (λέγει Ἰησοῦς), proves that such compilations actually circulated, fulfilling a function similar to the Pirke Aboth, or 'Sayings of the Fathers' in the contemporary and earlier Synagogue. But the later discovered superscription of the Oxyrhynchus collection itself (published 1904) condemns the editors' hasty application of the title Λόγια Ἰησοῦ to the fragment of 1897, by using the simple λόγοι (οἱ τοῖοι οἱ λόγοι, κ.τ.λ).* [Note: This of course is ungrammatical. The editors propose to delete the first οἱ. Professor Swete prefers to read οὔτοι for οἱ τοῖοι (see ExpT xv. [1904] p. 490).] There is, in fact, absolutely no evidence that any book ever received the title λόγια, though there is a certain significance in the use of the word by Papias and Polycarp interchangeably with λόγοι to designate the precepts of Jesus, whether in literary embodiment or otherwise. For Papias these precepts are 'commandments delivered by the Lord to the faith' (ἐντολαὶ τῇ πίστει δεδομένα), and hence comparable with 'the oracles of God committed to Israel' (ἐπιστεύθησαν τὰ λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ, Rom 3:2); but he refers to just the same precepts as λόγοι, when in a connected clause he declares that Peter had no design of making a syntagma of the 'sayings' (οὐχ ὥσπερ σύνταξιν τῶν κυριακῶν ποιούμενος λόγων). Indeed, in all the earlier evidence we possess of the formation of such syntagmata, the expression used is always λόγοι, and never λόγια. Thus, besides the references already given to Acts, Clem. Rom. [Note: Roman.] ad Cor., and Polycarp ad Phil. [Note: Philistine.], the Pastoral Epistles have two references to 'wholesome words' (ὑγιαίνοντες λόγοι) which are more closely defined as 'sayings of the faith' (λόγοι τῆς πίστεως, cf. Papias, ἐντολαὶ τῇ πίστει δεδομένα) 'of the excellent teaching,' and even explicitly as 'the sayings of our Lord Jesus Christ' (οἱ λόγοι τῆς πίστεως καὶ τῆς καλῆς διδασκαλίας, οἱ ὑγιαίνοντες λόγοι οἱ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, καὶ ἡ κατ' εὐσέβειαν διδασκαλία, κ.τ.λ., 1Ti 4:6; 1Ti 6:3).

More important for its bearing on the question of the name to be applied to the Matthaean syntagma are the structural phenomena of the canonical Mt., to be discussed later. At present we note only that, apart from the Markan narrative outline, the main framework of this Gospel consists of five great agglutinated discourses, each marked off by the resumption of the narrative in a stereotyped formula, 'And it came to pass when Jesus had finished these words.' In this formula the expression λόγοι is varied only by the expressions 'parables' and 'directions to the Twelve,' where the context requires (Mat 11:1; Mat 13:53), while the final group concludes: 'And it came to pass when Jesus had finished all these words' (πάντας τοὺς λόγους τούτους, Mat 26:1), in spite of the fact that the narrative continues: 'he said to his disciples.'

In view of this earlier evidence it is manifestly unwarrantable to infer from the use by Papias of the term λόγια alongside of λόγοι, that 'he refers to three documents, (1) St. Mark's version of St. Peter's teaching, (2) an anonymous collection of Sayings of the Lord, (3) the Logia of St. Matthew' (K. Lake, Hibbert Journ. iii. 2 [Jan. 1905], p. 337). Papias is defining his authority for 'the commandments given by the Lord to the faith.' If he refers to these now, with 1Ti 4:6; 1Ti 6:3, as 'sayings,' of which Peter might have made a syntagma but did not, and now, with Polycarp ad Phil. [Note: Philistine.] vii., as 'oracles,' of which Matthew did make a syntagma, the difference is only that in the latter embodiment they seemed to him comparable with the 'oracles of God' given to Israel (Act 7:38, Rom 3:2, Heb 5:12, 1Pe 4:11).

The relatively late date of Papias (145-160 a.d.) makes it certain that for him, if not already for Polycarp, τὰ λόγια meant the precepts of Jesus as embodied in narrative Gospels, pre-eminently in canonical Matthew. In later authorities, who take over the tradition, the term is gradually extended to cover the embodying narrative as well, until with Irenaeus and Tertullian the Divine utterance is coextensive with the canonical Gospel ('ait Spiritus Sanctus per Matthaenum,' applied by Irenaeus to utterances of the Evangelist). Whether at a stage anterior to its adoption by Papias the tradition regarding the λόγια had a narrower application, must be settled by a consideration of the expression in its context.

3. Tradition on transmission of the Sayings.—The fragments from the preface (προοίμιον) of Papias' work in five books, entitled Exposition (s?) of the Oracles of the Lord, as given by Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica iii. xxxix. 2, 16), are closely related to one another, and to the passage already referred to in the Epistle of Polycarp, Papias' earlier contemporary and friend. As regards the 'commandments' which Papias sought to hear and to expound as ‘oracles,’ the fragment states as a tradition (probably from the same authority, ‘John the Elder, who gave that regarding Mark) that ‘Matthew made a compend (συνετάξατο v.l. συνεγράψατο) of the logia in the Hebrew (Aramaic?) tongue, and every man translated them as he was able.’ For Papias, and a fortiori for the later authorities who repeat the tradition in partly independent forms, it was a testimony to our canonical Matthew. This to them represented the syntagma of which the tradition spoke, though it was admitted not to be identical with it. That was in ‘Hebrew,’ this in Greek. Possibly a difference of contents as regards the narrative framework was also recognized, since Papias has no scruple in contradicting Mat 27:3-10 (cf. Lightfoot-Harmer, Apost. Fathers, Frgt. xviii.), and Jerome recognizes the independence of what he regarded as the ipsum Hebraicum, and which was in his day ‘called by most the authentic Gospel of Matthew,’ by translating it anew into both Greek and Latin. Surviving fragments, however, prove this work, the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, to have been another and much later product. In Papias’ time the Hebrew syntagma had disappeared from use (ἠρμήνευσεν), if ever known in his region; his idea of its relation to canonical Mt. was probably as vague as his successors’. He valued the tradition because it gave him Apostolic authority for the Gospel on which he relies in all known instances for his logia of the Lord (Frgt. xi. ibid. is not related, as Lightfoot supposed, to Luk 10:18, but to Mat 12:22-29; see Heads against Caius, Frgt. v., and cf. Apollinaris, Frgt. ii. in Chron. Paseh.). It also gave him a convenient explanation for their variation of form in the Greek Gospels current in his own day (Mt., Lk.); both went back to a common Apostolic original, but were more or less perfectly translated.

4. Criticism of the tradition.—Modern critics attribute great value to the tradition reported by Papias, partly because of its inapplicability to canonical Mt., which shows it to be in his hands an heirloom, not a manufacture; partly because it is independently attested; partly because it seems to be connected internally with the tradition concerning Mark explicitly ascribed to ‘the Elder’ (John of Jerusalem [d. a.d. 117]), and in that relation becomes both intelligible and historically probable in view of known conditions in the Palestinian Church.

Its inapplicability to canonical Mt. appears in that our Mt. is not a translation, whether from Hebrew or Aramaic; not (strictly) a syntagma of the Oracles; and, as concerns derivation from immediate ‘followers of the Lord,’ less authentic in its ‘order’ than Mk., since practically its entire historical outline is borrowed from our Second Gospel with arbitrary alteration (in chs. 1-14) of the order (see the Introductions to NT). The tradition is also attested, however, by Pantaenus (ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica v. x. 3), Irenaeus, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Jerome, Augustine, and Euthymius Zigabenus. Not all of these can have derived all their data from Papias, so that the tradition cannot be his invention, although he clearly adapts it to his own use (cf. ὡς ἔφη in the Mk. fragment, referring probably to an inference of his own from 1Pe 5:13 [Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica ii. xv. 2, iii. xxxix. 16]. Finally, the internal evidence of the tradition itself indicates a close relation to the testimony of 'the Elder' as to Mk., and agrees with known conditions in the Palestinian Church.

(a) Holsten has pointed out (Drei urspr. Evang., ad init.) that the original motive of the Mark fragment is apologetic and harmonistic. It accounts for the incompleteness and lack of system in Mk. by contrast with some other writing which could be regarded as a complete σύνταξις τῶν κυριακῶν λόγων. No such compendium did Mark make, but only a transcript of certain discourses of Peter, accurate and complete so far as secondary testimony could go, but suffering from the inevitable limitations of one who had been a follower, not of the Lord (like Matthew), but, 'as I (Papias) said, of Peter, afterward.' The result was a mingled account of narratives about Christ, now a saying, now something done (ἢ λεχθέντα, ἢ πραχθέντα), incomplete (ἔνια, ὅσα ἐμνημόνευσεν) and without system (οὐ μέντοι τάξει), because Peter's preaching, Mark's only source of knowledge, had brought out the material in such irregular order as the occasion demanded (πρὸς τὴν χρεῖαν).

Our first concern must be with the motive of this conception of Mk., reserving the question of its historicity. Clearly, while unwilling to reject the narrative Gospel, it contends for the superiority of some other, whose characteristics may easily be inferred from what is denied to its rival. This authority of superior standing in the region whence Papias obtained his traditions (Palestine) emanated from one who had been a follower of the Lord Himself, not (like Mark) of an Apostle. It was more complete, and afforded a systematic, not necessarily chronological, arrangement of the Lord's words (σύνταξιν τῶν τοῦ κυρίου λόγων, συνέταξεν τὰ λόγια, οὐ μέντοι τάξει) serviceable to those in search of the 'commandments given by the Lord to the faith.' For, as soon as the general point of view is considered, the real significance of the complaint against Mk., so puzzling to modern critics, and perhaps not clear to Papias himself, becomes intelligible. The deficient τάξις of Mk. is explained by the contrasting statements regarding Peter and Matthew respectively, the former of whom did not aim at a σύνταξιν τῶν κυριακῶν λόγων [v.l. λογίων], whereas the latter actually made such a compend (συνετάξατο [v.l. συνεγράψατο] τὰ λόγια). The two fragments are parts of a single tradition, and the general point of view is that of a church to which the Gospel was primarily a new Torah, wherein the object of system (τάξις) is completeness in presenting 'the commandments given to the faith.' The historian-evangelist's idea of 'order' as chronological sequence in the biography (καθεξῆς Luk_1:3) is not that in consideration. In short, the tradition of Papias reflects the attitude of the Palestinian Church towards the rival claims of its own autochthonous Matthaean tradition, and the Petrine or Roman. It aims to adjust the two with recognition of the merits of the latter, while holding to the superiority of the former, just as the appendix to the Fourth Gospel (John 21) adjusts the secondary Petrine to its own primary authority, the Johannine (Asiatic).

Looked at thus, from the point of view suggested by its own internal relations, the tradition of Papias becomes not only intelligible but probable. It defines (no doubt correctly) the primary authority for the λόγια κυριακά which Papias proposed to expound in the light of the traditional authorities. If the Gospel of Lk. does not come into Papias' consideration, and Mk. is treated as quite subordinate, it is because the object in view is the ἐντολαί delivered by the Lord, and tradition and Church usage were at one in pointing to Matthew as the fountain-head for such purposes.

Nor does the tradition stand alone in its distinction of syntagmata of the Logia of the Lord from Gospels of the Markan type. Act_1:1 refers to its author's 'former treatise' as relating what 'Jesus began both to do and to teach' (ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν), thereby properly classing Lk. with Mk. and similar Gospels made up of 'both works and teachings' (ἢ λεχθέντα ἢ πραχθέντα). Moreover, the implied distinction from syntagmata of the Sayings is precisely what we should expect in a church whose institutions and traditions were almost invariably based on the practice of the Synagogue. The teaching of the Synagogue was divided into (1) Halacha, i.e. 'the Way,' authoritative applications of the Mosaic law, precepts of life, and (2) Haggada, i.e. 'tales,' unauthoritative preaching, based mainly on OT narrative. Just so in the primitive Palestinian Church we soon find two types of Gospel composition—(1) the catechetical, for the converted, generally connected with the name of Matthew. Then (2) the evangelistic, for the unconverted, similarly associated with the name of Peter. To the latter type would belong the 'testimony of the cross' (τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ) rejected by the opponents of Polycarp (l.c.); to the former not only the 'Sayings of the faith' or 'of the Lord Jesus' (1Ti_4:6; 1Ti_6:3) compiled by Matthew and others, but examples of Christian catechesis, such as the little manuals of ethics or 'teachings of baptisms' which survive to us under such titles as 'the Two Ways,' or the 'Teaching' (Διδαχή, Διδασκαλία) of the Apostles. These were primarily of Jewish origin, and were intended for the instruction of neophytes and catechumens. Such writings, on the other hand, as the Preaching of Peter, of the apologetic or evangelistic type, are clearly addressed to the unconverted, and if we go back to the examples furnished in Acts of this evangelistic preaching, still attributed to 'Peter,' we may identify the already stereotyped outline of Synoptic story in Act 10:38-41, the so-called 'lesser Gospel of Mark.' Long ago the resemblance of this Synoptic outline to the haggadic type was observed by Jewish scholars such as Wünsche and Hirsch. Both types accordingly were current in the Palestinian Church. We might, in fact, presuppose it from the nature of the situation. But both would not there be equally esteemed. The indigenous product, adapted to the requirements of a church more given to the perpetuation than to the propagation of the gospel, a church where Jesus was pre-eminently the 'Prophet like unto Moses,' giver of 'the perfect law of liberty,' would be the authoritative syntagma of the Lord's Sayings, halachic in the fundamental sense of the term. The Greek version of the Preaching of Peter, imported probably from Rome, would be received; but it would stand upon the lower footing of haggadic narrative. The lateness of the combination is attested not only by the reluctance manifest in the tradition, but by the fact that when Mk. was added to the Matthaean syntagma, the editor had so little else to add.

The correspondence of Papias' tradition of the Matthaean syntagma with known Palestinian conditions is strongly confirmatory both of the tradition itself and of that interpretation of it which emphasizes the distinction between catechetic works and Gospels of the evangelistic type. It is characteristic of the Gospels which continued to circulate in Palestine independently of the canonical four so late as the time of Jerome and Epiphanius, that, while they conflate material drawn from the Greek Gospels with their own, they continue to represent their tradition in all cases as delivered by the Apostle Matthew (Preuschen, Antilegomena, Frgs. 2. 3. 12 of Ev. Hebrews, 6 of Ev. Naz.).

(b) The internal evidence of our Synoptic Gospels is the decisive factor in the question of the historicity and meaning of the tradition. Here we have only to subtract the material coincident with Mk. from Mt. and Lk. respectively, to see that what is left is in Lk. to a great extent, in Mt. almost exclusively, a mass of discourse-material, much of it reproduced in common by the two. So convincing is this general result of an application of the representations of early tradition to the actual structure of our Synoptic Gospels, that since the time of Schleiermacher the so-called 'two-document' theory of the Synoptic Gospels, which rests upon it, has won wider and wider assent, and is to-day in its general outline an almost universally accepted canon of criticism (see art. Gospels). Synoptic tradition consists in the main of the Markan story, filled out and expanded by masses of discourse-material which are otherwise almost devoid of historical setting.

But there is a great and significant difference in result when the subtraction is made from Mt. and when it is made from Luke. Subtract Mk. from Mt. and the narrative material which remains is exceedingly meagre in amount, somewhat apocryphal in character, and unconnected with any other source. It includes the Genealogy and Birth-stories (chs. 1, 2), Peter's walking on the sea (Mat 14:28-31), the stater in the fish's mouth (Mat 17:24-27), and a few traits in the story of the Passion and Resurrection—the suicide of Judas (Mat 27:3-10), Pilate's wife's dream, and his washing of his hands (Mat 27:19-24), the earthquake (Mat 27:51-53), watch at the tomb (Mat 27:62-66, Mat 28:11-15), and appearance to the women and to the Eleven in Galilee (Mat 28:9-10; Mat 28:16-20). A few other apparent Matthaean additions to the narrative of Mk. are illusive. The story of the centurion's son (Mat 8:5-10; Mat 8:13) is the one great exception in character and attestation, being shared not only by Lk. (Luk 7:2-10), but even by Jn. (Joh 4:46-54). The real surplus of Mt. over Mk. consists pre-eminently in great aggregations of discourse-material, grouped in the live principal masses already referred to. These groups of agglutinated λόγοι consist of (1) the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7), showing the new Way of Righteousness; (2) the Mission of the Disciples (ch. 10), showing the duty of Witness-bearing; (3) the Parables (ch. 13), treated as fulfilling the Scripture Is 6:9 ff. against a generation which had rejected both the Baptist and Christ; (4) Rules of conduct towards brethren in 'the church' (ch. 18); (5) Warnings of the Judgment (ch. 25) attached to the eschatological chapter (24) parallel to Mark 13. Each of the five groups is marked off by the formula καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, κ.τ.λ., where the narrative is resumed; but groups (3) and (5) are enlarged by prefixing the two denunciatory sections (chs. 11-12 and 23), which are unaccompanied by the formula, and expand the total number of discourses to seven (cf. the seven parables of ch. 13, seven woes of ch. 23, seven petitions of the Lord's Prayer expanded from five of Lk.). Thus our First Gospel, minus the Markan biographic outline and the few late narrative accretions, really consists of a systematic compendium of the teachings of the Lord, once framed in the favourite pentad structure of Torah, Psalm-book, and the Christian Διδαχή, but later expanded to a sevenfold form.

The same process applied to Lk. yields a very different but equally enlightening result. The subtraction of Mk. leaves a much more considerable narrative element, including, besides the Centurion's Son, a whole series of incidents elsewhere unknown, of kindred animus. Such are the Penitent Harlot and Penitent Thief, Zacchaeus, the Ministering Women, the Samaritan Leper, the Crooked Woman, the Widow of Nain. But more important than the new incidents is a series of parables and teachings in the same vein, of which the Prodigal Son, Good Samaritan, Rich Man and Lazarus, Pharisee and Publican, are examples. The so-called Infancy chapters of Luke show the same favour towards the lowly, and partake otherwise to so high a degree of the linguistic and stylistic peculiarities of this material, that we must either suppose Luke to have had at command a 'special source' equally abundant in narrative-and discourse-material, and characterized by the humanitarian interest so manifest here, or else ascribe to him an extremely one-sided selection from a much more copious stream of tradition than would seem probable from Matthew and Mark. Thus the great outstanding difference in structure between the non-Markan element in Mt. and in Lk. is that in the former it is almost exclusively the λόγοι, arranged in groups as such; whereas in Lk. the logian material does not stand apart from narrative, but is connected with and framed into a narrative independent of Mk. and found in no other Gospel. Moreover, the combination of discourse with narrative in Lk. is not, as sometimes stated, a mere adaptation by the Evangelist of logian material to narrative settings of his own composition. There are examples (Luk 14:1-7) of such fictitious settings, but who would dream of so describing the incident of the Repentant Harlot (Luk 7:36-50), which-forms the setting of the parable of the Two Debtors? No explanation will here suffice but an admission that narrative and discourse have come down together from the earliest and most authentic sources. The same conclusion must be reached when the relation of this 'pre-canonical Luke' to Mk. and to the added sections of Mt. (Matthew 11 f. and Matthew 23) is studied (see art. Wisdom). Priority will be found to belong in both cases to the Lukan source.

Luke's distribution of his discourse-material under various heads of narrative description, and his disposition of the non-Markan material at various points of a shorter and longer journey (Luk 6:12 to Luk 8:3, Luk 9:51 to Luk 18:14), indicate in what sense we should take his proposal to write 'in order' (καθεξῆς, Luk 1:3). He aims, like the historian that he is, at chronological sequence; but certainly not without some better authority than his own conjecture. For while his discourse-material is sometimes without true connexion, it has a basis of order which indicates that, in the region whence this Gospel is derived, narrative and teaching had been combined at a much earlier time and with better resources than in our Matthew.

Critics who have attempted to reconstruct the Logia from Mt. and Lk. have unfortunately neglected this fundamental distinction, reconstructing their ultimate source, without regard for the difference in type (with Mat 28:20 cf. Luk 1:4, Act 1:1), from the mere coincidence of Mt. and Lk. in a certain part of the discourse-material. This ultimate source, however, cannot be reached from the side of Lk. without first taking account of the so-called 'special source' from which some elements seem to have passed into Mt. (e.g. Mat 3:7-12; Mat 4:1-11; Mat 6:19-34; Mat 8:5-10; Mat 11:1-27), and can even be shown with great probability to have affected canonical Mk. (With Mar 1:2; Mar 1:5 f., cf. Luk 7:24-27; Luk 7:33 f.; with Mar 1:13, Luk 4:2-12; with Mar 2:1-22, Luk 7:33 f.; with Mar 3:22-30, Luk 11:14-22; with Mar 7:1-23, Luk 11:37-54. Comparison with Mt. will in all these cases prove dependence by Mk. upon the source more fully recoverable from Mt. and Lk.). But the elements most naturally to be sought in a purely logian common source, such as the Sermon on the Mount and the Parables, display a very different degree of resemblance in Mt. and Lk. respectively. Instead of the exact verbal identity of long sentences in the sections outside the Matthaean pentad, there is within it for the most part an extreme divergence from the Lukan parallels. In general it would be difficult, if not impossible, to prove from this material any direct acquaintance with the Logia on the part of our Third Evangelist.

5. Conjectural reconstructions of the source.—Lost works have nevertheless been so frequently reconstructed in modern times by process of extraction from later documents into which they had been independently incorporated, as to offer a standing challenge in this supreme instance of the Matthaean Logia. If Krawutzky (to cite a single example) could reconstruct the Teaching of the Twelve from the Apostolic Constitutions and Apostolic Epitome, in advance of its discovery by Bryennios, why should not our First and Third Gospels yield up out of their common discourse-material the substance of the lost Logia? There have been thus far but two notable attempts to meet this challenge. Wendt's Lehre Jesu (1886) presents in the first (untranslated) volume the author's attempted reconstruction from Mt. and Lk. of the (Greek) Logia of Matthew. Unfortunately no account is taken of the third factor, Luke's 'special source,' which certainly afforded much discourse-material not likely to have been connected with the Matthaean Logia, and may even have contained all that Luke shares with Matthew. Equally unfortunate was the failure to distinguish the difference in point of view between a 'syntagma of the Lord's commandments' in which 'order' must be topical, and a διήγησις καθεξῆς such as Luke's, where the λόγοι are λόγοι τῆς χάριτος (Luk 4:22) illustrative of the message of the Divine wisdom. The problem must not be treated as if a mere question of arithmetic: Elements common to Mt. and Lk., minus Mk. = the Logia. As a pioneer in the field, Wendt deserves credit for his work, but a process so simple could not be expected to solve so complicated a problem. Wendt himself could find no place for a non-Markan διήγησις such as the Centurion's Son, Luk 7:2-10 = Mat 8:5-13 = Joh 4:46-54, which could not naturally be connected with the Matthaean Logia, but falls into place at once when account is taken of its relation to the Lukan context. Wendt's results were not unjustly pronounced 'a heap of interesting ruins, without beginning, without conclusion, without connexion' (Resch).

A much more elaborate and detailed analysis is that of Alfred Resch, Dic Logia Jesu nach dem griechischen und hebräischen Text wiederhergestellt, Leipzig, 1898 (Hebrew text separately ספר היסודות של ישוע דבריו: ישוע דבריו: ישוע דבריו, τὰ λόγια Ἰησοῦ). Here the attempt is made to restore the original Apostolic source not only in the Greek form assumed to be utilized in common by Mt. and Lk., but to retranslate into the Hebrew (sic) assumed to have been employed by the Apostle as the classical religious language in preference to the colloquial Aramaic spoken by Jesus Himself. Resch brings to his task an immense amount of learning and patience, especially in the accumulation of all possible (and many impossible) traces of extra-canonical logia. Unfortunately the process is again vitiated, not only by an extremely indiscriminate use of unsifted material, but by highly uncritical assumptions. Of these one of the most fatal is that the order of Lk. must be nearest that of the Logia because, in Resch's judgment, nearest the historical; while another, wherein may be traced the influence of B. Weiss, attributes to the Logia the features of a narrative-Gospel. As will be apparent from our criticism of the tradition, and criticism of canonical Mt., all the evidence we possess should commend precisely the reverse principle. The Apostolic syntagma of Matthew was not a narrative, and cannot have had a historian's order, and the structure of Mt. and Lk. respectively shows that in the one case the halachic, in the other the haggadic, principle was predominant from the first. On the other hand, Resch's gathering of the material was indispensable. His renewed consideration of the careful and scrupulous work of B. Weiss (Matthäusevangelium, 1876; Markusevangelium, 1872) looking toward an Apostolic (?) source utilized in common by these Gospels, did better justice to another factor not to be neglected, namely, use of the Logia (?) in Mk.; and his tracing of the tradition of Matthaean authorship to a direct claim embodied in at least one of the early Palestinian Gospels (Ev. Naz. Frg. 6 [Preusch.] σὲ τὸν Ματθαῖον), are contributions of permanent service. The experience of both Wendt and Resch, however, should warn against indiscriminate combination of Mt. and Lk., without regard for the structural evidence of the Gospels as we have them, or even for the avowed purpose of the Third Evangelist himself.

Besides Wendt and Resch, mention should be made of the disposition of material in the Greek Synopticon of A. Wright, who devotes Division 2 of his presentation to material supposedly derived from the Logia of Matthew. The arbitrariness of the dealing with the Lukan material is amply demonstrated by the two supplementary divisions which follow. The work is unfortunately affected by inadmissible presuppositions regarding oral tradition.

6. Conclusions.—These may be briefly summarized in the following outline:—

(1) The term logia was applied to the Sayings of Jesus early in the 2nd century by those who held them as Divine utterances, but not as displacing the earlier λόγοι.

(2) The same individuals report a tradition of Palestinian derivation which contrasts the Markan type of Gospel with another, of Matthaean origin, consisting of syntagmata of the Sayings.

(3) Our present representative of the Matthaean tradition, disembarassed of its Markan framework, displays this type-form, combining the teaching of Jesus in five agglutinations of Christian precepts corresponding to the five books of the Torah.

(4) Our Third Evangelist presents the discourse-material which he holds in common with Mt. from the historical point of view, and seems to have received it in a collection wherein narrative and discourse were intermingled from the first, the agglutination being effected with an eye to illustrate Jesus' mission of grace rather than to form a new Torah (see art. Wisdom).

(5) If the actual work of the Apostle Matthew (Matthias?) be not too remote for recovery, it should be sought primarily in, or rather under, the accumulated aggregations of logian material in the five discourse groups of our First Gospel, with secondary comparison of the added groups (chs. 3 f., 11 f., 23) which have special aflinity by language and content with Lk., together with the rest of the Lukan material. It is not probable that the Matthaean syntagma can have been lost in any other way than through superimposition of new material. To extricate it from the mass of superimposed accretion is a task which still challenges the utmost skill of the critic.

☩ Logos

LOGOS.—The conception of Christ as the Logos, or eternal Word, is peculiar to the Fourth Gospel. In the Epp. to Colossians and Hebrews (writings which are likewise touched with the Alexandrian influence) the Logos theory of Christ's Person is in some points implied (cf. Col 1:15-18, Heb 1:2-4). In Revelation (Rev 19:13) the 'Word of God' is announced as the new and mysterious name which Christ bears when He comes forth to execute judgment. But only in the Fourth Gospel is the conception deliberately adopted and worked out in its full significance.

The idea of a Logos, an immanent Divine reason in the world, is one that meets us under various modifications in many ancient systems of thought, Indian, Egyptian, Persian. In view of the religious syncretism which prevailed in the 1st and 2nd centuries, it is barely possible that these extraneous theologies may have indirectly influenced the Evangelist; but there can be no doubt in regard to the main source from which his Logos doctrine was derived. It had come to him through Philo after its final elaboration in Greek philosophy.

In the 6th cent. b.c. Heraclitus first broke away from the purely physical conceptions of early Greek speculation, by discovering a λόγος, a principle of reason, at work in the cosmic process. From the obscure fragments of this philosopher that have come down to us we gather that he was chiefly interested in accounting for the aesthetic order of the visible universe. In the arrangement of natural phenomena, in the adaptation of means to ends, he discerned the working of a power analogous to the reasoning power in man. His speculation was still entangled with the physical hypotheses of earlier times, and on this account dropped out of sight, and had little influence on the greater systems of Greek thought. Plato and Aristotle were engaged in the development of the theory of ideas, with its absolute separation of the material world from the world of higher reality. Their work was of profound significance for the after history of Logos speculation, but belongs itself to a different philosophical movement. It was in the reaction from Platonic dualism that the Logos idea again asserted itself, and was worked out through all its implications in Stoicism.

The Stoics, animated chiefly by a practical interest, sought to connect the world of true being, as conceived by Plato, with the actual world of man's existence. They abandoned the theory of supersensible archetypes and fell back on the simpler hypothesis of Heraclitus, that the universe is pervaded in all its parts by an eternal Reason. Man in his individual life may raise himself above all that limits him, and realize his identity with this Logos, which resides in his own soul, and is also the governing principle of the world. The Stoic philosophy not only furnished the general conception of the Logos to later thinkers, but also emphasized the distinction which became of prime importance in the later development. The faculty of reason as it exists in man reveals itself in speech, which is denoted by the same Greek word, λόγος. To the universal λογος Stoicism ascribed the two attributes that mark the reasoning power in man. On the one hand it is λόγος ἐνδιάθετος,—reason in its inner movement and potentiality,—and on the other hand λόγος τροφορικός,—reason projected and made concrete in the endless variety of the visible world.

1. Philo appropriates the main Stoic conception, but combines it with other elements borrowed eclectically from previous systems of thought. The Logos idea is loosened from its connexion with Stoic materialism and harmonized with a thoroughgoing Platonism, which regards the visible things as only the types and shadows of realities laid up in the higher world. It becomes identical in great measure with Plato's idea of the Good, except that it is further regarded as creatively active. Philo's grand innovation, however, is to press the Logos theory into the service of a theology derived from the OT. The same problem which Stoicism had tried to solve had in a different manner become urgent in Jewish thought. Here also all progress, alike in the moral and intellectual life, was like to be arrested by an overstrained dualism. The effort to conceive of God as absolutely transcendent had resulted in separating Him entirely from the world, of which He had yet to be regarded as the Creator and Governor. Already in the later books of the OT, much more in Rabbinical speculation, we can trace the idea of an intermediary between God and the world. 'Wisdom' is described in Job and Proverbs, with something more than a poetical personification, as God's agent and co-worker. Peculiar significance was attached by the later expositors to the various OT allusions to the 'word' of God. By His 'word' He had created heaven and earth and revealed Himself to the prophets. The actual hypostatizing of the Word in the doctrine of the Memra was subsequent to the time of Philo, but it was the outcome of a mode of thinking already prevalent in Jewish theology. God who was Himself the High and Holy One, of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, mediated His action through the Divine Word. It was natural for Philo, with his Hellenic and philosophical culture, to advance a step further and identify the Word of the OT with the Stoic λόγος.

The Logos of Philo requires to be understood in the light of this double descent from Greek and OT thought. The Stoic conception, as we have seen, took account of the two meanings of λόγος as reason and uttered speech, but the distinction was of little practical importance. What the Greek thinkers sought to affirm was the rationality of the world. The Logos under all its aspects was simply the principle of reason, informing the endless variety of things, and so maintaining the world-order. To Philo, on the other hand, the idea of reason is combined with that of the outgoing of Divine power. While describing his Logos in terms directly borrowed from Plato and the Stoics, he regards it as in the last resort dynamic, like the creative word in Genesis. This difference between Philo and the Greek thinkers is connected with another and still more vital one. To the Stoics the eternal Reason was itself an ultimate principle, and the necessity was not felt of explaining it as the reason of God. The doctrine of the Logos may, indeed, be regarded as an attempt, more or less conscious, to escape from the belief in a Divine Creator. Philo could not content himself with this notion of an absolute Logos. He started from the Hebrew belief in a supreme, self-existing God, to whom the immanent reason of the world must be related and subordinated. To this clashing of the primary Greek conception with the demands of Hebrew monotheism, we may largely attribute one of the most perplexing peculiarities of the Philonic doctrine. The Logos appears, sometimes as only an aspect of the activity of God, at other times as a 'second God,' an independent and, it might seem, a personal being. There can be little doubt that Philo, who never ceased to be an orthodox Jew, had no intention of maintaining the existence of two Divine agents; and the passages in which he appears to detach and personify the Logos must be explained mainly in a figurative sense. The Word which is described as speaking, acting, creating of itself, is the word of God, vividly realized by an imaginative thinker. But this separate existence assigned to the Logos may also be set down in some measure to the composite origin of the idea. The Stoical doctrine of an independent Reason could not be wholly reconciled with the Jewish belief in one supreme God.

2. The Fourth Gospel sets out from a conception of the Logos which to all appearance is closely similar to that of Philo. In the Prologue the main features of the Philonic doctrine are reproduced one by one;—the eternal existence of the Word, its Divine character (ἦν θεός), its relation to God as towards Him, and yet distinct (πρὸς τὸν θεόν), its creative activity, its function in the illumination and deliverance of men. The Evangelist assumes that the idea of the Logos is already a familiar one in Christian theology. It is introduced abruptly, as requiring no explanation, and its different aspects are lightly indicated, by way of reminding the reader of truths sufficiently known to him. We can thus infer that the conception of Philo had already naturalized itself in Christian thought, but there is reason to believe that the author of the Gospel was acquainted more or less directly with the Philonic writings and consciously derived from them.* [Note: the list of parallel passages collected by Grill (pp. 111-138).]

To what extent does the Logos idea of Philo change its character as it assimilates itself to the theology of the Gospel? Before an answer can be offered to this question, it is necessary to consider a preliminary difficulty with which Johannine criticism has been largely occupied since the appearance of Harnack's famous pamphlet.* [Note: Über das Verhältniss des Prologs des vierten Evgl. zum ganzen Werk (1892).] Is the Prologue to be regarded as an integral portion of the Gospel, or is it, as Harnack contends, a mere preface written to conciliate the interest of a philosophical public? The idea of Christ as the Divine Logos is nowhere resumed in the body of the Gospel. Although the term Logos is constantly used, it always bears its ordinary sense of spoken discourse, while the categories of Light, Life, Love are substituted for the Logos of the Prologue. The work, as we have it, is no metaphysical treatise, such as we might expect from the opening verses, if they truly set forth its programme, but a historical document, the narrative of the earthly life of Christ. In spite, however, of Harnack's powerful argument, the almost unanimous voice of Johannine criticism has declared against him. The statement of his view has led to a closer examination of the Prologue in its connexion with the Gospel, resulting in multiplied proof that the ideas presented at the outset are woven in with the whole tissue of the work. The Prologue supplies the background, the atmosphere, which are necessary to a right contemplation of the history. Nevertheless, while Harnack's main argument cannot be accepted, it serves to remind us of one fact which cannot be emphasized too much. St. John is not concerned merely with the Word, but with the Word made flesh. After the first few verses, in which he treats of the pre-existent Logos, he passes to the historical Person of Jesus, who is more than the abstract Word. In Him it had become visible, and acted on men through a human Personality.

St. John therefore accepts the Philonic conception in order to assimilate it to his account of a historical Person, through whom the Word declared itself under the conditions of human life. It is evident that the conception could not be so adapted without submitting to profound modifications. (1) The Logos, which was to clothe itself in flesh and act on men with the force of a personality, must in its deepest ground be a personal Being. We have seen that Philo, partly in imaginative fashion, partly because of the composite origin of his thought, attributes a semi-independence to the Logos. This prepared the way for a complete personification; but Philo himself thinks only of a Divine principle, the creative reason of God. St. John, however, makes it an essential moment in his conception that the Logos has a ground of independent being within God ($\pi\rho\delta\varsigma\ \tau\acute{\omicron}\nu\ \theta\epsilon\acute{\omicron}\nu$, standing over against Him as a distinct Being). His view even of the pre-existent Logos is coloured by his knowledge of the ultimate Incarnation. (2) The creative activity of the Logos, which in Philo is central and all-determining, falls into the background. Only in Joh_1:3 ('All things were made by him') do we have any clear trace of this aspect of Logos doctrine, and the sequence of thought would still be complete if the brief allusion were omitted. It is thrown out, apparently, by way of acknowledgment of the recognized theory. Some reference to the cosmic significance of the Logos was necessary if any link with previous speculation was to be preserved. The Gospel, in point of fact, knows nothing of the absolute transcendence of God, which Philo's whole theory is designed to mitigate. It assumes that 'the world' is the direct object of God's love and providence (Joh_3:16). It maintains that God acts immediately on the human soul and so makes possible the redeeming work of the Logos (Joh_6:44, Joh_17:6). (3) In the Gospel, much more emphatically than in Philo, the term $\lambda\acute{o}\gamma\omicron\varsigma$ denotes Word as well as Reason. The Greek philosophical meaning is, indeed, discarded, or retained only as a faintly colouring element. The Word is regarded throughout as the expression of God's will and power, the self-revelation of His inward nature. It does not represent the Divine reason but the Divine energy. Its sovereign attribute is Life, the life which it derives from God and transmits to men. Under the form of Alexandrian speculation St. John preserves the essential Hebrew conception of the living, quickening Word.

Thus, in accepting the Philonic idea, St. John does not commit himself to the precise interpretation that Philo placed on it; on the contrary, whether consciously or not, he departs from the characteristic lines of Philo's thinking. The differences, however, do not alter the main fact that he rested his account of the Christian revelation on a hypothesis which was metaphysical rather than religious. The Jesus who had appeared in history was identified with the Logos of philosophy, and this identification involved an entirely new reading of His Person and life. St. John does not, indeed, press to its full extent his theory that the Logos became manifest in Christ. Behind his speculation there is always the remembrance of the actual life, which had arrested him as it had done the first disciples, and been to him the true revelation of God. His worship is directed in the last resort not to the Logos whom he discovers in Jesus, but to Jesus Himself. Nevertheless the acceptance of the Logos idea imposes on him a mode of thought which is often alien to his deeper religious instinct. On the one hand, he conceives of Jesus as revealing God to men and lifting them to a higher life by His ethical personality. On the other hand, he is compelled to interpret the work of Jesus in terms of metaphysic. God was manifest in Him because He was Himself the Logos, and the life He imparted was the Divine life, different in essence from that of man. The Gospel wavers throughout between these two parallel interpretations of the life of Christ,—that suggested by the history and that required by the Logos hypothesis. Superficially the two conceptions are drawn together, but they are disparate by their very nature and will not admit of a true reconciliation.

St. John does not concern himself with the questions that arose in later theology regarding the nature of the union between the Logos and the human Jesus. He assumes the union as a fact incapable of further definition. 'The Word became flesh,' appeared in Jesus as a human personality. How and when this Incarnation was effected, to what extent the Divine nature in Christ could be distinguished from the human,—these are questions which he does not try to answer, and which he probably never asked himself. His silence is mainly to be explained by the practical intention with which he wrote his Gospel. It was not his purpose to discuss the Divinity of Christ as a theological idea, but to impress it on his readers as a fact, by the knowledge of which 'they might have life' (Joh 20:31). At the same time, the problems which came to light in the course of later controversy are all legitimately suggested by the simple thesis 'the Word became flesh.' From St. John's silence in regard to them we are compelled to infer that he did not reason out his doctrine with any fulness or clearness. He had set himself to combine ideas which in themselves were radically incompatible, and succeeded in doing so only by a certain confusion of thought.

3. The Evangelist, then, sets out from the fact that the historical Jesus was also the Divine Logos. In the body of the Gospel this hypothesis is never directly alluded to, but it is assumed throughout and modifies profoundly the whole picture of the earthly life of Jesus. (1) Peculiar stress is laid on His miracles as the 'signs' by which He 'manifested forth his glory.' The motive of compassion, to which the miracles are for the most part ascribed by the Synoptic writers, falls into the background. They are regarded as sheer exhibitions of power, intended by Jesus to inspire belief in His Divine claims. The marvellous element is uniformly heightened, in such a manner as to preclude all natural explanations. (2) Apart from direct works of miracle, certain attributes are assigned to Jesus which witness to His possession of the Logos nature. He partakes even on earth of the Divine omniscience (Joh 1:48, Joh 2:25, Joh 4:17, Joh 11:14). He appears where He will, with something of a Divine omnipresence (Joh 6:19, Joh 8:59, Joh 9:35). There is a majesty about His Person which quells and overawes (Joh 7:46, Joh 12:21, Joh 18:6). An impression is borne home on us in every episode of the history that, while He dwelt with men, He was a heavenly being, who could exercise at will the prerogatives of God. (3) The aloofness of Jesus, as of one who belonged to a different world, is everywhere brought into strong relief. In the Synoptic narratives, what separates Him from other men is His matchless wisdom and moral purity. St. John ascribes to Him a radical difference of nature. He does not participate in human weaknesses and distresses (even His sorrow over Lazarus is that of a Divine being who stands apart and contemplates the tragedy of our mortal lot). In His intercourse with the disciples He is conscious all the time that He has come from God and returns to God (Joh 13:3-4). (4) A still more striking emphasis is laid on the absolute freedom, the self-determination of Jesus. While submitting for a time to earthly limitations, He vindicates His higher nature by acting in everything on His own sovereign will, without compulsion from without (Joh 2:4, Joh 6:5-6, Joh 7:6, Joh 11:33). From the beginning He has fixed His 'hour,' and Himself ordains all the conditions that will lead up to it. His enemies are impotent until the hour willed by Himself has come (Joh 7:30, Joh 8:20), and meanwhile He goes about His work in perfect security (Joh 11:9). In this well-marked strain of Johannine thought we have little difficulty in discerning the influence of the Logos idea, penetrating the actual reminiscence of the life of Christ. (5) The Logos character of Jesus, which is thus illustrated on various sides by His actions, comes to clear expression in His spoken words. These are concerned almost wholly with the assertion, under many different types and forms, of the Divine significance of the Speaker Himself. Hence the peculiar value which is ascribed to them (Joh 6:63; Joh 6:68, Joh 15:3). They convey more clearly and emphatically than actions could do the inner secret of our Lord's personality. Being Himself the Logos, one in essence with God, He had power to impart the higher life (see Word).

In all these directions, therefore, St. John gives effect to the idea of the Prologue that the nature of Christ was a Logos nature. His acceptance of this doctrine involves him in a new reading of the Gospel history—a reading which in some respects is artificial and inadequate. The life of Jesus becomes that of a heavenly being, and all traces of moral struggle (as in the Temptation and the Agony) disappear from it. The attributes of faith in God and infinite sympathy with men are replaced by metaphysical attributes, which are supposed to belong more essentially to the Divine nature. Jesus is the revelation of God because He is the eternal Logos, who manifests in an earthly life the absolute being and self-dependence of God. This, however, is to divest the revelation of its real worth and meaning. What we desire to know and what was actually revealed to us in the life of Jesus, is the moral character of God, and of this the Logos doctrine can render no account. In so far as the Fourth Evangelist has subordinated his conception of Christ to a philosophical speculation, we cannot but feel that he defeats his own purpose. He desires so to assert the majesty of Christ that men may be drawn to believe in Him as the Son of God, and enter into life-giving fellowship with Him. But in the endeavour to exalt the Lord's Person by means of the Logos hypothesis, he obscures those very elements in the Divine life which constitute its true glory.

4. It is necessary at the same time to recognize that much was gained for Christian theology by the adoption of this hypothesis. (1) A middle term was discovered between Christianity and the forms of Hellenic thought, and a wider development was thus rendered possible. The new religion could now interpret itself to the Graeco-Roman world, and assimilate whatever was congenial to its spirit in the intellectual life of the time. With the help of the categories which it henceforth borrowed from Greek philosophy, it was enabled in many ways to convey its message more clearly and adequately. (2) The claim of Christianity to be the absolute religion was definitely formulated in the Logos doctrine. Jesus was identified not merely with the Jewish Messiah, but with the eternal Word who had been with God from the beginning. His revelation was not one out of many, but the supreme and final revelation. This idea is prominent throughout the Prologue, in which the 'true Light' is contrasted with the manifestations of God through John the Baptist and Moses. These, although burning and shining lights, were only 'for a season' (Joh 5:35). (3) By identifying Him with the Logos, St. John declared, in a manner that could not be mistaken, the uniqueness of Jesus, and assigned Him His central place as the object of Christian faith. The Logos category was in itself insufficient, and tended to confuse Christianity with metaphysical issues which were alien to its real import. But it provided a form within which the innermost truth of the religion could maintain itself for ages following. Jesus Christ in His own Person is the revelation of God, and believing on Him we have life through His name.

5. The vital and permanent message of the Fourth Gospel is little affected by any estimate we may form of the value of the Logos hypothesis. It is evident that, while the Evangelist ostensibly sets out from a philosophical theory, he derives in reality from a religious experience. From the impression created in him by the earthly life of Jesus, still more from the knowledge he had received of Him in inward fellowship, he has arrived at the conviction that this is the Christ, the Son of God. He avails himself of the doctrine of the Logos, the highest that the thought of his time afforded him, in order to express this conviction, and in some measure explain it. But the speculative idea belongs to the form, not to the essence of St. John's teaching. It represents the attempt to interpret, in terms of an inadequate philosophy, a truth which has been grasped by faith. See also art. Divinity of Christ, vol. i. p. 478^b.

☩ Loneliness

LONELINESS.—To speak of the isolation of Christ would give a wrong impression as far as the everyday circumstances of His life are concerned. He was most often either in crowds, teaching and healing, or else seeking loneliness without success; He was lonely in the same sense as that in which Nazareth and Syria were lonely—placed close to the world's highways, yet living a life of their own (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL [Note: GHL Historical Geog. of Holy Land.], p. 432; Edersheim, Life and Times of Messiah, i. 147). We may notice four aspects of what may be called the loneliness of Christ.

1. Solitude for the purposes of prayer, meditation, and rest. The outstanding instances are—the Temptation in the Wilderness (Mat 4:1, Mar 1:12, Luk 4:2), the retirement after the excitement consequent on the feeding of the five thousand (Mat 14:22, Mar 6:45; cf. Joh 6:15), and the retirement for prayer, soon interrupted (Mar 1:35; cf. also Luk 6:12; Luk 9:18 where Mar 8:27 has 'in the way he asked his disciples'). It should be noted that at times of peculiar spiritual intensity Jesus withdrew from the other disciples, but kept by Him Peter and the sons of Zebedee, as at the Transfiguration (Mat 17:1, Mar 9:2, Luk 9:28), at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mar 5:37), and at Gethsemane (Mat 26:37—'watch with me,'—Mar 14:35, Luk 22:43).

2. Retirement from possible persecution, or from unwished for notoriety: e.g. after the death of John the Baptist (Mat 14:13; in Mar 6:11 this retirement immediately follows the return of the Twelve); from the opposition of the Pharisees (Mat 16:13, Mar 8:27, Luk 9:18; also Mat 15:21, Mar 7:24). Similarly, He was extremely anxious that His miracles should not become known (Luk 5:13, Mat 8:4, Mar 8:26; Mar 9:9; the chief exception, where there were special reasons, is in Mar 5:19). The opposite reason for solitude and concealment is given in Joh 6:15 ('perceiving that they were about to come and take him by force, to make him king'). On the other hand, it must be remembered that (a) Jesus was constantly accompanied, at least in Galilee and at the end in Jerusalem, by twelve friends and disciples specially appointed (Mat 10:2, Mar 3:16, Luk 10:1 imply a larger circle from which to draw); to these we must add a number of women (Luk 8:3; cf. Mat 27:55, Mar 15:40, Luk 23:49). In connexion with the visits to Jerusalem recounted in the Fourth Gospel, the disciples are hardly mentioned; Joh 7:10, coupled with the absence of reference to the disciples in chs. 7 to 10, seems to make it certain that Jesus was alone; we find the disciples with Him again in Joh 11:16. (b) In the earlier part of His ministry Jesus was constantly inconvenienced by the thronging of the vast crowds drawn to His side (cf. Mat 4:23; Mat 8:18; Mat 9:35, Mar 1:37, Luk 4:42, Luk 12:1; see Swete, St. Mark, p. lxxx); in the last visit to Jerusalem He sought retirement at night by leaving the city either for Bethany or the Mount of Olives (Mat 21:17, Mar 11:19, Luk 21:37). (c) His conduct was social enough—as distinct from that of John and of the Essenes—to give rise to the slanders about 'a gluttonous man and a winebibber' (Mat 11:19, Luk 7:34); He went to the marriage at Cana (Joh 2:1); He was found at the feast in Simon's house (Mat 26:6, Mar 14:3, also Luk 7:36); with Matthew (Mat 9:10, Luk 5:29), and Zacehaeus (Luk 19:6); and contrasted Himself with John as one who 'comes eating and drinking' (Mat 11:19, Luk 7:34).

3. The inevitable result of His own attitude. The question in Mat 12:48 seems to be that of one who wilfully cuts himself off from human ties; as He faced death more nearly, isolation could not but grow on Him (Mat 17:12, Mar 9:30, Luk 9:22; Luk 9:44, cf. also Mar 10:32); as early as the feeding of the five thousand, 'many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him' (Joh 6:66). The disciples remained with Him till the end, when the arrest proved too much for their loyalty, although we find John, with the women, at the foot of the cross (Joh 19:25-26, Mat 27:55, Mar 15:40).

4. The uniqueness of Christ's Person. This is emphasized chiefly in the Fourth Gospel; though that it was soon felt is shown in Luk 5:8 ('Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord'; compare the timidity of the disciples in Joh 21:12); and easily gathered from the manner in which the disciples misunderstood Him and His purposes for themselves (Mat 20:21, Mar 10:37; cf. Luk 9:54-55, and Mar 9:32, Luk 9:46; Luk 22:24). When Christ speaks of His own nearness to the Father, distance from mankind must naturally follow; see Joh 5:18 ff; Joh 8:16; Joh 8:27; Joh 8:29; Joh 10:30; Joh 20:17. On the other hand, this special relation of Christ to the Father is one which is, through Christ, to be shared by His disciples (see Joh 10:4, ch. 17 passim, and Joh 20:17). The extreme of loneliness, as it is heard in the cry upon the cross (Mat 27:46, Mar 15:34, cf. Luk 23:46, Joh 19:30), lasted, it would seem, but for a moment. See Dereliction.

☩ Long-Suffering

LONG-SUFFERING (μακροθυμία), like another fruit of the Spirit, love (ἀγάπη), has almost entirely non-pagan connexions. The Gr. word occurs 14 times in the NT, while its cognate verb is found 10 times, and the adverb only once (Act 26:3). Only the verb occurs in the Gospels: Mat 18:26; Mat 18:29 (Authorized and Revised Versions 'have patience'), Luk 18:7 (Authorized Version 'bear long,' Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'is long-suffering'). It is both a Divine attribute and a Christian virtue. The word 'long-tempered' as opposed to 'short-tempered' is not in ordinary English use, but it expresses with fair accuracy the central thought in μακροθυμία. The Latin equivalent is longanimitas (Vulgate), and Jeremy Taylor amongst others tried to transplant the word into English soil under the form of 'longanimity,' but without success.

OT use.—Long-suffering is one of God's noblest attributes, and is made the subject of a special revelation in Exo 34:6. The Heb. phrase 'erek 'aph (עֵרֶךְ אָפִי) is found frequently in the books that follow, and Joel (Joe 2:13), Jonah (Jon 4:2), and Nahum (Nah 1:3) specially dwell upon this element in God's character.

NT use.—It is significant that the word μακροθυμία is rare in pre-Christian Greek. In the NT it occurs several times in context with ὑπομονή (patience, endurance), from which it must be carefully distinguished (2Co 6:4; 2Co 6:6, Col 1:11, 2Ti 3:10, Jam 5:10-11). Trench (Synonyms) says μακροθυμία is used of persons, and ὑπομονή of things. As regards NT usage alone, this is near the truth (but see Jam 5:7, and cf. in OT Isa 57:15 [LXX Septuagint] and in Apocr. [Note: Apocrypha, Apocryphal.] 1Ma 8:4). Perhaps we may more truly say that patience keeps a man from breaking down in despair, while long-suffering keeps him from breaking out in word or action because of some unsatisfied desire. This latter distinction is probably the key to several passages where μακροθυμία has been said to approximate to the meaning of ὑπομονή. In Heb 6:12; Heb 6:15, for instance, Abraham not only waited patiently for the promise; he did not in heart or word break out into murmurs against God's delay, and this right attitude won him his reward. So in Jam 5:7 the husband-man without patience would break down with despair, but if his long-suffering gave out he would probably break out into pulling up his tardy plants. Long-suffering, then, is a passive virtue, and waits God's time. It is the exact opposite of hasty action or hurried speech. Nevertheless, it is not carelessness. If God is long-suffering, He waits to give further opportunity for repentance, and this may not be presumed upon without risk (Rom 2:4; Rom 9:22, 1Pe 3:20, 2Pe 3:9).

1. Christ's long-suffering character.—The word itself is not often used of, or by, Christ Himself, but the virtue which it expresses is frequently exemplified in the Gospels. It was His long toleration of manifest injustice that puzzled John the Baptist (Mat 11:3), and there is long-suffering too in His quiet reception of John's complaint (Mat 11:4). In long-suffering He refused to call down fire from heaven on inhospitable Samaritans (Luk 9:54). It was long-suffering too that made Him yield to arrest without resistance (Mat 26:52-53, Jam 5:6-7), and refrain from returning scorn for scorn or threat for threat at His trial (Mat 27:12). And after His ascension we see Him exhibiting the same long-suffering spirit towards those who persecuted the disciples as they had persecuted the Master (1Ti 1:16, Act 9:4; cf. 2Pe 3:15).

In His teaching He bids His people be partakers of His own long-suffering character. The tares are not rooted up, but grow together with the wheat until the harvest (Mat 13:30). In the parable of the Unmerciful Servant the prayer of that unworthy man was for long-suffering (Mat 18:26), but a full pardon was given instead, until his subsequent conduct caused the withdrawal of the boon (Mat 18:29). In the parable of the Unjust Judge the word μακροθυμεῖ (Luk 18:7) occurs in connexion with a difficult piece of interpretation, for the full discussion of which we have scarcely space here. Christ possibly had in mind a verse in Sir 35:18 [Gr. 32:22]. If ἐπ' αὐτοῖς refers to the elect, we may say that μακροθυμεῖ here means the vindication of the cause rather than the punishment of the foe. But if we may refer the words to the enemies of the elect, the phrase will be parallel in thought to Rom_2:4.

2. Long-suffering a Christian duty.—In Mat_18:26; Mat_18:29 we noted the obligation resting on those who enjoy Christ's long-suffering to exhibit it to others. This habit we find enforced in the Epistles (1Co_13:4, 2Co_6:6, Gal_5:22, 1Th_5:14, 2Ti_3:10). It is not a natural characteristic: it has to be acquired (Col_3:12). In Eph_4:2 it is explained as forbearance, or cessation of hostilities (ἀνοχή). This implies that there may be wrong on both sides. But there is a power from without (Col_1:11, Gal_5:22), the Spirit of God, who will enable Christ's people to reproduce His long-suffering in face, for instance, of opposition to the truth they teach (2Ti_4:2). In Jam_5:7-10 the word occurs four times. The Christian who is persecuted is to be as long-suffering towards his foe as the farmer who waits till the unproductive field bears a crop after fertilizing showers. There is, perhaps, in addition, a thought of man's attitude towards God in times of trial. Christ's long-suffering man refuses both to rail at his enemies and to question the dealings of his God.

☞ Look

LOOK (CHRIST'S).—The Gospels give no direct information as to the look of our Lord, if the word 'look' be regarded as a synonym for His outward appearance. The first natural request of a child—'You are going to tell me about Jesus, then tell me what He was like'—puts a question the Evangelists do not even begin to answer; and in a tale generally so frank and childlike this fact is not without significance. No description of Jesus' 'face' is ever given in the Gospels, except when, in the story of the Transfiguration, it is said that the fashion of His face was altered (ἐγένετο τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ ἕτερον, Luk_9:29). Even then, it is stated to have become like the sun (Mat_17:2); and, as it happens, the figure is of something which, though it lights the world, is not in itself directly to be gazed upon (cf. Rev_1:16). While it may be possible, therefore, to deduce from the Epistles a message figuratively termed 'the Gospel of the Face' (see Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, 73 ff.), the Evangelists afford no opportunity of making this study of Christ ‘after the flesh.’ See art. Christ in Art.

It is further to be observed, in the same connexion, that even the more vivid words for looking, as a synonym for ‘seeing,’ ‘beholding,’ are never used of Christ so as to draw attention to the manner of His look. Such a word, e.g., as ἀτενίζω, ‘to gaze fixedly’ (employed to describe a congregation gazing at Jesus, Luk 4:20; the maid staring at St. Peter, Luk 22:56; St. Paul flashing an indignant look at Elymas the sorcerer, Act 13:9), is never associated with our Lord. Even διαβλέπω, a milder though still pietorial word, is not connected with Him. It is as though every mental image of Christ’s outward appearance were designedly excluded. We must be content, therefore, to study Christ’s look in the more objective sense in which it expresses simply the act of vision. Here we may roughly divide the references into four classes.

1. The look of Christ is sometimes disclosed as an upward look, expressing dependence on the Father. This uplifted glance is recorded on four occasions—during the miracle of the feeding of the 5000, while giving thanks and blessing the loaves (Mat 14:19); in the healing of a man deaf and dumb, when Christ looked up to heaven and sighed (Mar 7:34 [in both passages ἀναβλέψας εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν]); in the raising of Lazarus (Joh 11:41 ἤρεν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ἄνω); and during the great High-Priestly prayer (Joh 17:1 ἐπάρας τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν). In all these instances the action and gesture must have imprinted themselves very deeply on the memory of the disciples. They were an outward sign of a lifelong inward attitude. They evidenced the direction of the appeal which Christ made in His human nature to God. Of Him the words are preeminently true, ‘Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord’ (Psa 25:15).

2. The look of Christ is often disclosed as an outward look of calm clear-eyed discernment on the world around Him. ‘He beheld (ἐθεώρει) how the people cast money into the treasury’ (Mar 12:41)—appreciating not only the matter of their gift, but the manner of it. He ‘entered into the temple, and looked round about upon all things’ (Mar 11:11 περιβλεψάμενος πάντα); and it appeared on the following day how piercing and comprehensive His glance had been (Mar 11:15 ff.). ‘He looked up’ (ἀναβλέψας) and saw Zacchaeus in his post in the tree (Luk 19:5). When the scribes brought Him a crafty question, ‘He perceived (κατανοήσας) their craftiness’ (Luk 20:23)—‘saw at a glance,’ the word might be rendered. If there were space to offer a complete list of those things which Jesus is said in the Gospels to have beheld or seen, the impression would at least be strong that those calm eyes missed nothing. Retaining God continually in the field of vision, Jesus' sight was not thereby dimmed, but only purged and purified for all other exercise. On one occasion His disciples were permitted to share a deeper gaze into the world behind the veil—'And He said unto them, I beheld (ἐθεώρουν) Satan as lightning fall from heaven' (Luk_10:18).

3. A special look of Christ is recorded as directed to a man or an audience during the utterance of some statement or address. The simplest record of this is when it is said that He 'looked round' before speaking (Mar_3:34; Mar_10:23 περιβλεψάμενος); or that 'he beheld (ἐμβλέψας) them and said' (Mat_19:26); or when more fully St. Luke states in reporting the Sermon on the Mount, 'And he lifted up his eyes (ἐπάρας τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς) on his disciples, and said' (Luk_6:20). This is the look of the sower scrutinizing the field. It is a look adding personality to the word spoken. It is a silent 'Verily, verily, I say unto you.' More individual instances of this look are when Jesus 'beheld' (ἐμβλέψας) Peter, and said, 'Thou art Simon ... thou shalt be called Cephas' (Joh_1:42)—a look sealing the new name upon Peter's heart; or when He 'beheld' (ἐμβλέψας) the chief priests and scribes, 'and said, What is this then that is written?' (Luk_20:17)—a grave look of reproach, 'to add solemnity to His reference to their own Scriptures.' Christ and His words can never be separated. He is Himself the Word made flesh—the greatest utterance in the greatest Person; and the language of the Apostles is 'what we have seen and heard declare we unto you' (1Jn_1:3).

4. A few passages form a group by themselves, wherein strong feeling is expressed or implied as accompanying some look of Christ. The most notable instance of this is when 'the Lord turned and looked upon (ἐνέβλεψεν) Peter' (Luk_22:61), 'No word, no gesture of reproach'; but

'Oh to render plain,

By help of having loved a little and mourned,

That look of sovran love and sovran pain'

(Mrs. Browning, Sonnets).

Akin to this is the look directed by Jesus upon the young ruler, ‘And Jesus beholding (ἐμβλέψας) him loved him’ (Mar_10:21); or the look of the King upon Jerusalem, on ‘what should have been the City’s bridal day,’ ‘He beheld (ιδών) the city, and wept over it’ (Luk_19:41). As a last instance, though expressing a very different emotion, we may adduce Mar_3:5 ‘He looked round about on them (περιβλεψάμενος αὐτούς) with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts.’ Of Christ, too, might the words have been written, He ‘loved well because he hated,

Hated wickedness that hinders loving’ (Browning).

R. Stevenson.

⚡ Lord

LORD.—This title is used as the translation of three different words in the Gr. Gospels: (1) ὁ δεσπότης. This word occurs only once in the Gospels, in the prayer of Simeon, ‘Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word’ (Luk_2:29). It is the proper correlative of δοῦλος. In thus addressing God, Simeon thinks of himself as His slave. (2) οἱ μεγιστᾶνες. This word also occurs but once in the Gospels, in Mar_6:21 ‘Herod ... made a supper to his lords.’ It describes the chief men or nobles of a city or kingdom. (3) κύριος, ὁ κύριος. Except in the above instances, this is the word which stands for ‘Lord’ and ‘lord’ in the Gospels. It occurs with great frequency. With or without the article, it is found at least 244 times. The frequency of its use is concealed from readers of the English versions. It is sometimes translated ‘master’ (‘Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master’s table,’ Mat_15:27), or ‘sir’ (‘I go, sir, and went not,’ Mat_21:30), or ‘owner’ (‘the owners therefore said, Why loose ye the colt?’ Luk_19:33). Fundamentally the title describes one who has power or authority (ὁ ἔχων κύριος) over persons or things. Strictly speaking, it implies ownership, but it is also used as a title of reverence or courtesy. In the Gospels it is applied in a wide variety of relationship.

1. It is frequently used as a name for God.—(1) In most cases as a name for God, it is used without the article. It occurs in all 59 times (17 in Matthew , 8 in Mk., 30 in Luke , 4 in Jn.). It is found in quotations from the OT, as ‘Thou shalt not tempt (the) Lord thy God' (Mat_4:7); and in phrases of OT origin, as 'the angel of (the) Lord' (Mat_1:20 || Luk_1:11); 'the law of (the) Lord' (Luk_2:23); 'the power of (the) Lord' (Luk_5:17). It is noteworthy that the only instances in the Gospels where the title is used in direct address to God, are found in the prayers of Jesus: 'I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth' (Mat_11:25 || Luk_10:21). In both cases the title is found in exactly the same phrase. (2) The use of the name with the article is infrequent, occurring in all 11 times (twice in Mt., once in Mark, 8 times in Lk.): e.g. 'Perform unto the Lord thine oaths' (Mat_5:33); 'Tell how great things the Lord hath done for thee' (Mar_5:19); 'Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest' (Luk_10:2). In the application of this name to God, with and without the article, the Gospels follow the usage of the LXX Septuagint .

2. It is also used with great frequency as a general title of courtesy, or as a name for a master or owner. (1) Without the article, it is employed in direct address, as the salutation of a son to a father, 'I go, sir' (Mat_21:30); of servants to their master, 'Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field?' (Mat_13:27); 'Lord, let it alone this year also' (Luk_13:8); of the Greeks to Philip, 'Sir, we would see Jesus' (Joh_12:21); of the Pharisees and priests to Pilate, 'Sir, we remember that this deceiver said' (Mat_27:63). This use of the title, as a general term of courtesy in direct address, is not found in Mk., but it occurs 9 times in Matthew, 8 times in Lk., and twice in John. As the name for a master, without the article it is found only in Mat_6:24 'No man can serve two masters,' and in Luk_16:13, the parallel passage. (2) With the article, it is a frequent name for a master or owner, as 'the lord of the vineyard' (Mat_20:8), 'the lord of that servant' (Luk_12:46), 'the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth' (Joh_15:15). In Luk_16:8 it is the 'lord' of the unjust steward who commended his dishonest method of providing for himself.

3. It is most frequently of all employed as a title of courtesy in direct address to, or as a name for Jesus.

(1) Without the article, it is used (a) by His disciples, as 'Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water' (Mat_14:28). This title in direct address to Jesus by disciples is never found in Mark. It is most frequent in Jn., as is to be expected, since he records most of the private intercourse between Jesus and His disciples. (b) By others than disciples, as 'Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean' (Mat_8:2). In Mk. it is employed only once in this relation, by the Syrophenician woman, 'Yes, Lord' (Mar_7:28). In most cases, the title as used by others than disciples is found in narratives of miracle. (c) By Jesus Himself, as 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mat_7:21). (d) It is also found in the words of the angel to the shepherds, 'Unto you is born this day ... a Saviour, who is Christ (the) Lord' (Luk_2:11). This phrase (χριστὸς κύριος) is found in Ps-Sol 17:36.

Briggs (Messiah of the Gospels, pp. 34, 35, notes) says it is probably to be interpreted on the basis of אֲדַבֵּר Psa_110:1 ('The Lord said unto my Lord'), but adds that Schürer, Ewald, Wellhausen, and W. R. Smith regard the phrase in Ps-Sol as a mistranslation of יְהוָה שָׁחַח ('Anointed of (the) Lord,'—a phrase which is found in Luk_2:26 (the) Lord's Christ'). Dalman, on the other hand (Words of Jesus, T. & T. Clark, p. 303 f.), thinks it incredible that a translator should have made such a mistake. We agree with him in regarding κύριος (Lord) as a word added by the Evangelist to interpret the Jewish title Messiah (χριστός) to his Gentile readers. (The same necessity of interpretation accounts for the phrase 'Christ, a king' (Luk_23:2), in the accusation made before Pilate. The claim that Jesus was 'the Christ' had no political significance to the Gentile governor. It had to be interpreted to him as 'king' before he could receive the charge as an accusation). In Act_2:36 the phrase 'God hath made that same Jesus ... both Lord and Christ' (κύριον καὶ χριστόν), is to be explained in the same way. 'Lord' is an addition by the Evangelist, to interpret 'Christ' to Gentile Christians. We may add that the same necessity of interpreting 'Christ' to Gentiles accounts for the curious phrase in the address of Peter to Cornelius, which has been found so difficult—'Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all, πάντων κύριος),' Act_10:36. The clause in brackets is added to interpret the confessional title 'Christ.' It may be due to Lk., but it is more likely that it was added at the time by Peter. He was speaking to a Gentile, who, though he was 'a devout man and one that feared God,' may not have understood the confessional significance of the term 'Christ.' Without the addition of the interpretation, Cornelius might have regarded it as part of the name of Jesus. The title 'Christ' did become a proper name, but that use of the term did not arise till a later date. If the interpretation was given by Peter when speaking to Cornelius, it provides an interesting illustration of the way in which the first preachers of Christianity adapted themselves to the new conditions in which they found themselves, when they began to preach to Gentiles. The Saviour of the world must not have a local or national confessional title, (cf. the words of Paul and Silas to the Philippian jailer as they are given in \aleph AB, and accepted by Westcott and Hort, Tischendorf, and other critical editors, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus (i.e. believe on Jesus as Lord), and thou shalt be saved,' Act_16:31. Also, 'No man can say that Jesus is Lord but by the Holy Ghost' (1Co_12:3), and 'every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father,' Php_2:11). To the Jewish Christian, Jesus was the 'Messiah,' to the Hellenistic Christian Jew He was 'the Christ,' and to the Gentile Christian He was 'the Lord.' The Hellenistic and Gentile terms are combined in our familiar name 'the Lord Jesus Christ.' The interpretation of 'Christ' as 'Lord' enables us to understand that the essential idea of the first term is that of Sovereignty or Lordship. The Saviour is the Lord, the Possessor and Ruler of the Kingdom of God.

This title readily acquired its highest significance as one of Divine honour among the Gentile Christians, especially in the East. 'Oriental religions are fond of expressing the relationship between the divinity and the devotee, as that of the "Lord" or "Lady" to a slave' (Deissmann). The higher significance of the title was most likely assisted also by the fact that among Hellenistic Jewish Christians κύριος was in use as a Divine title applied to God.

(2) With the article, the title is applied to Jesus (a) by Himself, directly, as 'Ye call me Master and Lord' (more literally, 'the Teacher and the Lord') (Joh 13:13), and indirectly, as '(The) Lord said unto my Lord (τῷ κυρίῳ μου), Sit thou on my right hand till I make thine enemies thy footstool' (Mat 22:44). (b) The historical application of the title, with the article, to Jesus is specially significant. Tischendorf and Westcott-Hort omit the title in this form, in the only place where it is found in Mt. (Mat 28:6). It occurs twice in Mk. (Mar 16:19-20), i.e. in that part of the Gospel which is regarded by critical editors as not belonging to the original Manuscripts. Therefore it is only in the Gospels of Lk. and Jn. that the title in this form is applied historically to Jesus. This is a strong argument for the earlier composition of Mt. and Mk., for the title became so common in the Apostolic Church that its absence from these Gospels can be explained only by their early date. The title occurs 18 times in Luke, 12 times in John. Twelve of the instances in Lk. are found in passages which are peculiar to that Gospel, as 'the Lord appointed other seventy' (Luk 10:1). The other instances may be regarded as editorial additions (Luk 7:13; Luk 11:39; Luk 12:42; Luk 17:5-6; Luk 24:3). Three of the instances in Jn., which are found in the early part of the Gospel, are plainly editorial additions (Joh 4:1; Joh 6:23; Joh 11:2). The remaining instances are found in the last two chapters of the Gospel, and in passages which are peculiar to it. They deal with the risen life of Jesus, and were written at a time when the higher conceptions of His personality gave a deeper significance to the title, and when its confessional meaning was universally known. The adoring cry of Thomas, 'My Lord and my God' (ὁ κύριός μου καὶ ὁ θεός μου) Joh 20:28, is an illustration of how among Jewish Christians the title of respect addressed to a teacher became one of Divine honour. Yet, as Dalman says, 'it must ... be remembered that the Aramaic-speaking Jews did not, save exceptionally, designate God as "Lord," so that in the Hebraic section of the Jewish Christians the expression "our Lord" was used in reference to Jesus only, and would be quite free from ambiguity' (p. 329).

4. In comparing parallel passages in which the title occurs, it is to be noticed that other titles are sometimes employed as equivalent terms in addressing Jesus. —

i. Mat 8:25 (κύριε) 'Lord, save us: we perish.'

Mar 4:38 (διδάσκαλος) ‘Teacher, earest thou not that we perish?’

Luk 8:24 (ἐπιστάτα) ‘Master (teacher), we perish.’

ii. Mat 17:4 (κύριε) ‘Lord, it is good for us to be here.’

Mar 9:5 (Ραββει) ‘Rabbi, it is good for us to be here.’

Luk 9:33 (ἐπιστάτα) ‘Master (teacher), it is good for us to be here.’

iii. Mat 26:22 (κύριε) ‘Is it I, Lord?’

Mat 26:25 (Ραββει) ‘Is it I, Rabbi?’

Joh 13:25 (κύριε) ‘Lord, who is it?’

The variety in the title used in addressing Jesus is not confined to the parallel passages. It is to be seen throughout each of the Gospels. Arranging the titles in the order of preference, Mt. uses κύριος, διδάσκαλος, and Ῥαββει; Mk. διδάσκαλος Ῥαββει, Ῥαββουνει, and κύριος Lk. κύριος, διδάσκαλος, and ἐπιστάτης; Jn. κύριος, Ῥαββει, Ῥαββουνει, and διδάσκαλος. Sometimes the variety of the title is seen even in the same passage. It cannot be without intention or meaning that in (iii.) Mt. represents the eleven disciples as asking, ‘Is it I, Lord?’ while Judas, the traitor, says, ‘Is it I, Rabbi?’ (Mat 26:22; Mat 26:25). Possibly Judas indicated his position of detachment or opposition by using ‘Rabbi’ instead of the title employed by the rest of the disciples. It is only by Judas that Jesus is addressed as ‘Rabbi’ in Mt. (Mat 26:25; Mat 26:49). There must also be some difference of feeling in the use of different titles in Luk 5:5 ‘Master (teacher, ἐπιστάτα), we have toiled all night’; and Luk 5:8, where Peter, after the miraculous draught of fishes, falls at the feet of Jesus with the cry, ‘Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord’ (κύριε). But it is possible that the variation of title in the parallel passages may have taken place in the process of oral transmission, or in translation from the Aramaic.

5. The variation of title in addressing Jesus suggests that in the original language of the Gospels at least two titles were employed. Of these Ῥαββει was one, cf. ‘ye call me Master (teacher) and Lord,' Joh 13:13, and the frequent use of 'Rabbi' in the Gospels. Evidently 'teacher' (διδάσκαλος) is a translation of 'Rabbi' in some of its forms (רב, רבי, רבן). In 7 places Lk. uses ἐπιστάτης as a synonym for διδάσκαλος (Luk 5:5; Luk 8:24 bis. Luk 8:45; Luk 9:33; Luk 9:49; Luk 17:13), and, without doubt, some form of רב lies behind this also. As to the title κύριος (Lord), which is used so frequently in addressing Jesus, it is most probably a translation of מַרְיָא or מַרְיָא. It was a common name for a master, and was used as a title of courtesy. It was used by a servant to a master, by a debtor to a creditor, and by a layman to a learned man. It is possible, however, since many of the people of Palestine were bilingual, that κύριος was used by itself when one who knew Greek spoke to Jesus.

6. We thus suggest a twofold origin of the title as applied to Jesus. First, as the translation of the Aramaic titles in use among the disciples; and second, as the substitute for χριστός with confessional meaning among Gentiles. These distinctions of origin and meaning were soon lost in the gradual but rapid adoption of the title as one expressive of Divine honour. It is possible that this use of the title first became common among Eastern Christians.

7. In regard to the application of κύριος to God, it may be said that this was entirely due to the influence of Hellenistic Judaism. It is very unlikely that it was in use among Aramaic-speaking Jews at the time of our Lord. In reading the Scriptures in the synagogue in Hebrew, the name אֲרִנִי (Lord) was read wherever the sacred name יהוה was found in the text. When it became necessary to translate the Scriptures into Aramaic in public reading, אֲרִנִי still took the place of the sacred name. In quoting from the Scriptures אֲרִנִי was not employed for the name of God, but הַשֵּׁם ('the Name') in Hebrew, and שְׁמַיָא in Aramaic. In phrases of OT origin like 'the angel of (the) Lord,' the name of God was entirely omitted or merely hinted at.

☩ Lord's Prayer (I)

LORD'S PRAYER (I)

1. Place in NT.—Mat 6:9-13, Luk 11:1-4. The former passage has been more influential in the later history of the Lord's Prayer, but the latter seems to give it in a more historical setting. In the Sermon on the Mount, the Prayer is, to all appearance, a later insertion; Lk. leads into the neighbourhood of Bethany (Luk 10:38-42) or Gethsemane; see J. A. Robinson, 'On the Locality in which the Lord's Prayer was given,' in F. H. Chase, 'The Lord's Prayer in Early Church' (TS [Note: 5 Texts and Studies.] iii. [1891] pp. 123-125). Not far from the traditional site of Gethsemane, on the slope of the Mount of Olives, stands to-day the Church of the Paternoster, showing in the quadrangle the Lord's Prayer engraved in thirty-two languages.

The Lord's Prayer has been frequently published in Polyglot editions; the oldest at Rome, 1591, in 26 languages; then by Il. Megiser, Frankfort, 1593, in 40 [2nd ed., 1603, in 50; 3rd ed., Linz, 1616, in 52]; by Andr. Müller, 1660, in 100; Chamberlayne, 1715, in 150 languages. J. Adelung (Mithridates, 1804-1817) made the Lord's Prayer the basis of a scientific classification of languages. Further Polyglot editions by Bodoni (Parma), J. J. Marcel (Paris), Auer (Vienna), Dalton (St. Petersburg, 1870, in 108 languages of Russia), S. Apostolides (London, no date, in 100 languages, published for the benefit of the poor Cretan refugees now in Greece); The Lord's Prayer in Three Hundred Languages ... with a Preface by Heinrich Rost, 1891; in 300 dialects of Africa, 1900. But most of these compilations lack scholarly supervision. A pleasant task would be for a united band of scholars to trace the historic development of those languages for which this is possible, on the basis of the Lord's Prayer, and to show the character of the rest on the same basis. The Lord's Prayer has also been frequently turned into metre and rhyme. Whether there exists a collection of this kind in English, is unknown to the present writer; in German, cf. Das Gebet des Herrn: Eine Sammlung metrischer Umschreibungen des Vaterunsers, Reutlingen, 1821; E. W. Scripture, 'A Record of the Melody of the Lord's Prayer,' in Die neueren Sprachen, ed. by W. Vietor, x. 9.

For early English translations of the Lord's Prayer, see Albert S. Cook, 'Study of the Lord's Prayer in English' (Amer. Journ. Philol. vol. xii. pp. 59-66), and Biblical Quotations of Old English Prose Writers (London, 1898, pp. xxv, liii, lix, lxiv, 147 ff.). Cook refers to Wanley's Catalogus, where separate versions of the Lord's Prayer are either given or their existence noted, pp. 51, 160, 169, 197, 202, 221, 224, 239 (?), 240, 248. Cook gives the first from MS. Bodl. Jun. 121. Three poetical paraphrases of the Lord's Prayer of uncertain date are given by Greiss in his Bibliothek der Angelsächsischen Poesie, ii. 285-290 (new ed. ii. 227-238), the last two published by Wanley, Catalogus, pp. 48 and 147 f., and by Etmüller, Scopas and Boceras, pp. 230-237; the first by Thorpe, Codex Exoniensis, p. 468 f. On p. 147, Cook gives the Lord's Prayer from aelfric's Homilies, and an isolated quotation in Cnut's Laws (Schmid, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, p. 270). We may quote: 'urne daeghwamlican hlâf,' 'ure gyltas,' 'on costnunge'; 'fram yfele,' 'hlâf userne oferwistlic,' 'instondenlice,' 'scylða' (Cook, pp. liii, lix). For the expression 'costnunge,' it is interesting to note that the corresponding German word 'Bekörung,' was declared by Luther better than the received 'Versuchung.'

In the new and enlarged edition of The Lord's Prayer in Five Hundred Languages, comprising the Leading Languages and their Principal Dialects throughout the World, with the Places where Spoken; with a Preface by Reinhold Rost (London, Gilbert & Rivington, 1905), the Lord's Prayer is given in English in sixteen forms, namely: Charles 11. Prayer-Book, 1662; Edward VI. Prayer-Book, 1549; as sent from Rome by Pope Adrian, an Englishman, about 1160; from two Manuscripts of the 13th cent.; from Wyclif, about 1380; Tindale, 1534; Cranmer, 1575; Rheims Version, 1582; Authorized Version, 1611; Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885, 1881; The Twentieth Century NT; further, in Anglo-Saxon.

A disciple—it is not said whether one of the Twelve—asked Jesus, as He was praying in a certain place, when He ceased, 'Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples.' That the disciples of John were wont to make prayers or supplications, besides their fasting, is told by St. Luke only (5:33). On a form of prayer ascribed to John, see 'Lord's Prayer' (by present writer) in Ebi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] 2817, n. [Note: note.] 6, and the Catalogue of the Syriac Manuscripts preserved in the Library of the University of Cambridge (p. 529). There it begins: 'Bright Morning, Jesus Christ, Who was sent by God the Father.' Where fixed forms of prayer are in use, as was the case, it seems, with the Jews in the time of Christ, it is but natural that petitions on particular subjects should be added to them; such additions are mentioned as made, for example, by R. Eliezer and by R. Johanan (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Matthew 6, and art. 'Schemone Esre' in Hamburger, RE ii. [1883] 1098).

2. Sources.—The sources whence our Mt. and Lk. took the Lord's Prayer are quite unknown. The Gospel of Mk., which, according to the common view, was used by our Mt. and Lk., does not give it. On Mar 11:24 f., where Mk. speaks about prayer, see A. Wright, *Synopsis*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , 1903, p. 115, and Wellhausen, who thinks that Mk. may have known the Lord's Prayer as a prayer of the Church, but did not dare to refer it in its wording to Jesus; the expression (ὁ πατήρ ὑμῶν) ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, occurring there, is not found elsewhere in Mk. If the first Gospel was originally written in (Hebrew or) Aramaic, its author may have had the Lord's Prayer before him, written or oral, in (Hebrew or) Aramaic, and given it in one of these dialects; then the translator may have formed the Greek under the influence of Lk. (cf. the hapaxlegomenon ἐπιούσιος). This is the view especially of Th. Zahn. The opposite view, that ἐπιούσιος was first coined by Mt. or one of his fellow-workers, is maintained, for instance, by A. Wright, The Gospel according to Luke, 1900, p. 102.

3. Text of the Lord's Prayer.—As there are two traditions about the place of origin of the Lord's Prayer, so even its wording is given in two different forms. In the Received Text, it is true, they differ very little; in the Authorized Version, for instance, the variations are but four:

| Matthew. | Luke. |
|---------------------------------------|---|
| (1) in earth as it is in heaven. | as in heaven, so in earth. |
| (2) this day. | day by day. |
| (3) debts, as we forgive our debtors. | sins, for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. |
| (4) For thine ... Amen. | omits. |

In the Greek Textus Receptus they differ even less, the first of the above variations has nothing to correspond in Greek. (In Mt. the Authorized Version preserved the order of the Pr. Bk. [Note: Bk. Prayer Book.] version, which differs both from Mt. and Lk. in the fifth petition, 'trespasses' against 'debts' and 'sins').

There can be no doubt that in the Textus Receptus the form of Lk. has been assimilated to that of Mt. The modern critical editions agree almost to the letter; see the editions of Scrivener, Weymouth, Nestle. Weiss retained in Mt. the form ἐλθέτω instead of ἐλθάτω, and the article τῆς before γῆς. The critical apparatus of Tischendorf and WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] [the 2nd ed. of 1896 is enriched by some additional notes] may be supplemented by the following notes:

(1) The Didache (8:2) has the singular τῷ οὐρανῷ; the Apost. Const. in both places, 3:18 and 7:24 (here reproducing the Didache), the plural.

(2) On the form ‘veni ad regnum tuum’ in the oldest Latin MS (Cod. Bobbiensis), see F. C. Burkitt (Cambr. Univ. Reporter, 5th March 1900).

(3) Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{CUF} and the Syr. [Note: Syriac.] Acts of Thomas have the plural for ‘thy will’ as the first hand of Cod. \aleph in Mat 7:21 (τὰ θελήματα).

(4) On the article for ‘on earth,’ see Ebi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] 2818; on the new punctuation of the third petition, see below.

(5) With τὴν ὀφειλὴν of the Didache cf. Mat 18:32, and the difference of the singular and plural in German and Dutch: Schuld and Schulden. Two Manuscripts of the Apost. Const. give καραπτώματα = ‘trespasses,’ καθώς for ὡς, and omit the verb. Syriac forms combine ‘debts’ and ‘sins’; see, besides Ebi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] 2818, Burkitt in his ed. of the Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, Mrs. Gibson’s ed. of the Didascalia, and Mrs. Lewis’ MS of the Acts of Thomas.

(6) In some Oriental translations ‘deliver’ is rendered by different roots in Mt. and Lk., and then both are combined in liturgical use of the Lord’s Prayer.

(7) Of the Doxology the Didache omits ‘the kingdom and’; in the Apost. Const. (7:24) one MS, on the contrary, omits ‘and the power and the glory’; and the same two clauses are omitted by another MS at 3:18, which with its ally ends ‘of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, for ever and ever.’ In this connexion it is worth while to remark, that Funk, in his new edition of the Didascalia and Apost. Const., puts at 3:18 and 7:24 the final quotation marks after τονηροῦ, implying by this that he does not regard the Doxology as part of the quotation from the NT. Compare with this the above statement about the Manuscripts of the Constitutions, and Brightman’s Liturgies Eastern and Western, p. 353 f.

In Lk. the modern editions differ even less than in Mt.—only in a single letter, Weiss retaining here also the spelling ἐλθέτω. With this unity contrast the judgment of Dean Burgon (The Revision Revised, pp. 34-36; The Traditional Text, p. 84):

‘ “The five Old Uncials” (\aleph ABCD) falsify the Lord’s Prayer as given by St. Luke in no less than forty-five words. But so little do they agree among themselves, that they throw themselves into six different combinations in their departures from the Traditional Text; and yet they are never able to agree among themselves as to one single various reading: while only once are more than two of them observed to stand together, and their grand point of union is no less than an omission of the article. Such is their eccentric tendency, that in respect of thirty-two out of the whole forty-five words they bear in turn solitary evidence.'

Any one who is unwilling to believe that the Textus Receptus of Lk. is due to assimilation with Mt. may compare the critical apparatus of the Latin Testament of Wordsworth-White, or of the pre-Lutheran German Bible as edited by Kurrelmeyer. There he can watch the same process for the German and the Latin texts. Even the Vulgate of Sixtus V. (1590) has the addition in Lk., Fiat voluntas tua sicut in caelo ct in terra; but not the rest.

The chief question about the Lord's Prayer in Lk. is, What about the petition ἐλθέτω τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρῶσαι ἡμᾶς, which is witnessed for Marcion and found since in one MS (604, or Scrivener's b, Gregory's 700, von Soden's ε 133, pub. by Hoskier, 1890). Perhaps a trace of it is found in D [Note: Deuteronomist.], which has ἀγιασθήτω ὄνομά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, ἐλθέτω σου ἡ βασιλεία, etc. Another reading of Marcion is 'thy bread' for 'our'; whether he read the second clause of the fifth petition we do not know, the sixth (and last with him) had the form καὶ μὴ ἄφες ἡμᾶς εἰσενεχθῆναι εἰς πειρασμόν. The same or similar forms are found independently from Marcion down to the present day. Harnack (Sitzungsber. Acad. Berl. 21st Jan. 1904) was inclined to see in the petition, 'Thy holy spirit come (upon us) and cleanse us,' the original for Lk., comparing Luk 11:13 with Mat 7:11.

4. Arrangement of the Lord's Prayer.—Augustine tells us (Enchir. 116): 'Lucas in oratione dominica petitiones non septem sed quinque complexus est'; thus it became the custom in the West to count seven petitions; but Origen, Chrysostom, and the Reformed Churches count six, connecting 'but deliver us from evil' closely with what precedes. WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] print in Mt. the Lord's Prayer in 2 × 3 stichi, in Lk. without strophical arrangement, seeing in 'as in heaven, so on earth' the common burden for the first triplet of single clauses; see § 421. This has been adopted now for the Pr. Bk. [Note: Bk. Prayer Book.] version by Parliamentary Papers, 1903, No. 53, removing the comma from behind 'on earth' to behind 'done.' For the Authorized Version, the editions of the Parallel NT give a comma after 'done' as well as after 'on earth'; but Scrivener's Paragraph Bible (1873), the Two Version Edition (1900), and the Interlinear Bible (1906) omit the first comma. Whether the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 agrees with WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] is not quite clear from its comma (in this case we should have expected a colon). This arrangement was already put forward by the Opus imperfectum in Mt. (Migne, lvi. 712): ‘Communiter autem accipi debet quod ait, Sicut in caelo et in terra,’ i.e.— ‘Sanctificetur nomen tuum, sicut in caelo et in terra.

Adveniat regnum tuum, sicut in caelo et in terra.

Fiat voluntas tua, sicut in caelo et in terra.’

On the fact that in mediaeval explanations the beginning was construed ‘Pater noster qui es. In caelis sanctificetur nomen tuum,’ see below.

5. Contents.—(a) The exordium.—The short πάτερ in Lk., the fuller πάτερ ἡμῶν in Mt., would both correspond to an Aram. Aramaic אבא, which is connected with ὁ πατήρ in Rom 8:15, Gal 4:6, Mar 14:36. Cf. J. H. Moulton’s Prolegomena, pp. 10, 233, and art. Abba in vol. i. That πάτερ ἡμῶν may also correspond to אבא and does not necessarily presuppose the form with suffix (אביו in Heb., אביו in Aram. Aramaic, אביו in Galilaean), is shown by Dahman, Worte Jesu, 157, though for the beginning of a prayer the more solemn form appears to him more probable. Among Jews it is customary to add שבשמים in Hebrew (שבשמיא in Aramaic) to אב where it is used of God, but the isolated אבא is not unusual. In the NT ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς is almost exclusively used in Matthew. On the question whether from Rom 8:15, Gal 4:6 an acquaintance of St. Paul and his churches with the Lord’s Prayer may be concluded, see Gerh. Bindemann, Das Gebet um tägliche Vergebung der Sünden in der Heilsverkündigung Jesu und in den Briefen der Apostel, Gütersloh, 1902.

(b) On the imperatives ἀγιασθήτω, γενηθήτω, see Origen, de Orat. 24. 5; Blass, Grammar, § 20. 1; Moulton, Proleg. p. 172, who quotes from Gildersleeve on Justin Martyr, p. 137: ‘As in the Lord’s Prayer, so in the ancient Greek Liturgies the aor. imper. is almost exclusively used. It is the true tense for “instant” prayer.’ Moulton adds: ‘To God we are bidden, by our Lord’s precept and example, to present the claim of faith in the simplest, directest, most urgent form with which language supplies us.’

(c) With the first petition cf. *SE [Note: SE, used hereafter as abbreviation for Shemone Esre, the daily Prayer of the Synagogue; see the edition in Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 299 ff.; and cf. on it, e.g., Hirsch in JE x. 270-282.] 3, and the beginning of the Kaddish רבא שמייה ויתקדש תפילת; afterwards eight more such verbs are placed together about ‘the name of holiness (Blessed be it).’ A benediction without mentioning השם (= יהוה) is no benediction at all (Ber. 40b).

(d) Likewise a benediction with no מלכות is no benediction at all (ib.; cf. SE 11, in opposition to 12, 14, 17, Kaddish).

(e) γεννηθήτω is translation יעשה by Shemtob, Delitzsch, Salkinson-Ginsburg, Resch; יתי by Alexander (McCaul-Hoga), Margoliouth, by the old Syriac versions except the Syro-Palestinian; from SE cf. 13, רצוק עשי; in the Kaddish: ‘May your prayers be accepted, and may your petition be done.’ To רצון of Biblical Hebrew would correspond צביון in post-Biblical Hebrew and Aramaic.

(f) For ἐπιούσιος the remark of Origen, de Orat. 27, still holds good, that the word is found nowhere else in the whole range of Greek literature. Jerome compares it with the LXX Septuagint περιούσιος; but this stands almost everywhere for סגולה (ap. Aquila, Gen 14:21 for רבש, LXX Ps 16:14 for יתך). On περιούσιος, see Jerome’s remark (Anecd. Mareds. iii. 1, p. 92): ‘Verbo περιούσιος, i.e. substantialis, exceptis sanctis scripturis nullus foris disertorum usus est.’ The Gospel according to the Hebrews had for ἐπ., as Jerome states, mâhâr (מחר=). His most explicit statement has been published by Morin, Anecd-Mareds. iii. 2, p. 262: ‘In Hebraico evangelio secundum Matthaeum ita habet: Panem nostrum crastinum da nobis hodie.’ This lends a strong support to the view that ἐπιούσιος is formed from ἡ ἐπιούσα, ‘the coming day,’ even if this mâhâr were nothing but a retranslation of the Greek. But another view is that it is the original word used by Jesus and preserved by the Jewish-Christian communities. This is the view of Zahn, Gesch. Kan. ii. 193, 703, Eind. ii. 312; Ambrose: ‘Latinus hunc panem quotidianum dixit, quem Graeci dicunt advenientem, quia Graeci dicunt τὴν ἐπιούσαν ἡμέραν advenientem diem’; Athanasius: τὸν ἐ. ἄρτ. τουτέστι τὸν μέλλοντα; Cyril Alex. [Note: Alexandrian.]: οἱ μὲν εἶναι φασὶ τὸν ἕξοντά τε καὶ δοθησόμενον κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τὸν μέλλοντα; the Sahidic Version, on which see Lagarde, Mitt. ii. 374.

But the Oriental versions took another view: Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] cur אמינא לחמן, i.e. ‘our continual bread,’ in Luke Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] cur sin and Acts of Thomas ‘the continual bread' (אמינא אלחמ); the same tradition seems to be followed by the cotidianus of the Latin, the sinteinan of the Gothic, especially by חמירי לחמנו of Shemtob ben Shafrut, with which cf. Num_4:7 תַּמְיִר לֶחֶם 'the continual bread.' [The Armenian version of 2Ma_1:8 used for the shewbread the same expression as in the Lord's Prayer, wherefore Holmes-Parsons remarked: 'tres codices Sergii ἄρτους ἐπιουσίους,' which remark led Deissmann (Neue Bibelstudien, p. 41) and Hilgenfeld (in his Ztschr., 1899, p. 157) to the belief that ἐπιουσίους was actually found in some Greek Manuscripts . This was corrected by the present writer in ZNTW [Note: NTW Zeitschrift für die Neutest. Wissen. schaft.] i. 250, EBi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] 2820, n. [Note: note.] 1; but it is repeated by Wellhausen in his Com. on Mt. and not recalled in that on Lk.]. The Vulgate (Jerome?) has supersubstantialis in Mt. and cotidianus in Lk. How the Peshitta (Rabula?) came to translate 'the bread of our need,' דסונקמ לחמא, is not quite clear, while the translation 'our bread of richness' in the Syro-Palestinian version rests on confusion with περιουσίους.

The following is a conspectus of the different renderings that have been tried:

(1) Shemtob: חמירי לחמנו. (2) J. B. Jona, Rome, 1668: להמנו הקיום על, a literal rendering of the supersubstantialis of the Vulgate, as überstantlich in three editions of the pre-Lutheran German Bible. (3) Delitzsch, Salkinson, Resch: תקני לֶחֶם, after Pro_30:8. (4) Taylor: תמיד לֶחֶם or תהירא המאל. (5) Schultze: lahma di çorkána (= Pesh.). (6) Rönsch: סגלתנו לֶחֶם, like the Syro-Palestinian version. (7) Arn. Meyer: מססח (sufficient). (8) Chase: 'our (or the) bread of the day.' The Variorum Bible quotes the readings: 'our bread in sufficiency,' 'the bread proper for our sustenance,' 'the bread for the coming day,' 'needful bread,' or 'bread for the life to come.' Others translation 'bread of second quality,' 'the bread that we shall need' (Twentieth Cent. NT); see on the word, ExpT [Note: xpT Expository Times.] ii. [1891] 184, 242, 254, iii. [1891-92] 24, 31, 77.

The meaning of the word is certainly not far from the ἐφήμερος τροφή of Jam_2:15.

The change of σήμερον into καθ' ἡμέραν (and of δός into δίδου) has been explained by the daily use of the prayer; but the Didache, which already enjoins the use of it three times a day, does use δός and σήμερον.

(g) In the fifth petition ὀφειλήματα is rather = חֲבוּתֵינוּ (Shemtob, Delitzsch, Margoliouth), not אֲשַׁמְדֵינוּ (Salkinson, Resch). On the variant ὀφειλήν and the dogmatic changes of εἰσενέγκης, see above. In the Latin Church it became customary in the time of Jerome and Hilary to say ‘in tentationem quam ferre (or, sufferre) non possumus.’

(h) The last ambiguity is πονηροῦ, malo, which also in Heb., Aram. Aramaic and Syr. [Note: Syriac.] may be masculine or neuter. The translation of Shemtob, לְמִכָּל רָע ‘from all evil,’ finds its parallel in Ethiopic (see Brightman’s Liturgies, p. 234), ‘Deliver us and rescue us from all evil,’ while the Nestorian Liturgy equally combines the two verbs by which the Pesh. (not Sin^{cur}) renders ῥῦσαι in Mt. and Lk., ‘Save and deliver us,’ but continues, ‘from the Evil and his host.’ The neuter is found (in a different connexion, 10:5) already in the Didache: μνήσθητι, Κύριε, τῆς ἐκκλησίας σου, ῥύσασθαι αὐτήν ἀπὸ παντὸς πονηροῦ. Nevertheless, it seems to the present writer, on the whole, more probable that it should be taken as masculine. For the Greek NT see the exhaustive investigation of Chase, and cf. Act 10:38 where διαβόλου (Cod. E [Note: Elohist.] σατανᾶ) is rendered (by Shemtob) אֲשַׁמְדֵנוּ ‘the Evil One.’ The most decided view that the word is masculine is in the Clem. Hom., where Peter uses the passage as one of his proofs for the fact that his Master frequently spoke to them of the existence of an Evil One (Act 19:2 ἐν ἧ παρεδωκεν ἡμῖν εὐχῆ ἔχομεν εἰρημένον· ῥῦσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ, along with Mar 1:13, Mat 12:26, Luk 10:18, Mat 13:39; Mat 5:37, as proof for the statement: πολλάκις οἶδα τὸν διδάσκαλόν μοι εἰπόντα εἶναί τὸν πονηρόν = τινὰ κακίας ἡγεμόνα). Zahn and Wellhausen take it as neuter, as in Mat 5:37.

(i) That the Doxology formed no original part of the Lord’s Prayer needs no longer to be proved, in spite of Dean Burgon. The very discovery of the oldest witness outside of the NT, the Didache, where it occurs, corroborates the view that it originated in liturgical use. Its peculiar form there does not agree with any of the forms known to occur in the authorities for the text of Matthew (see The NT in the Apostolic Fathers, by a Committee of the Oxford Society of Historical Theology, 1905, p. 28 f.). The statement of WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort’s text.] on the Doxology in the Apost. Const. must be supplemented as above from the new edition of Funk. See also art. Doxology in vol. i. p. 492.

6. The Lord's Prayer as a whole.—True prayer, says Wellhausen, is a creation of the Jews, and so the Lord's Prayer follows Jewish examples, though it is not a mere composition 'ex formulis Hebraeorum.' On the latter exaggeration, put forward by Grotius, Wetstein, and others, and strongly maintained by modern Jewish writers, see The Lord's Prayer no Adaptation of existing Jewish Petitions, by the Rev. M. Margoliouth (London, Bagster, 1876). The Kaddish, which is justly quoted for comparison, does not begin with 'Abba,' but it, too, has as first petition, 'Hallowed be thy name,' with the addition, however, 'in the world to come.' The national, eschatological, or Messianic element which goes through the Kaddish and the SE from beginning to end is remarkably thrown into the background in the Lord's Prayer. A petition like 'Give us this day our daily bread' would be impossible in the Kaddish, though a similar petition is not wanting in SE.

It is, however, wrong to deny completely the eschatological character of the Lord's Prayer; see esp. the Com. of Th. Zahn, who insists on the force of the aorists ἀγιασθήτω, ἐλθάτω, γεννηθήτω. Even the first petition looks forward to the time when the name of God, which in this world is so much blasphemed, especially among the heathen, through the sins of Israel (Rom 2:24), shall be glorified, when He brings about the inward purification and outward restoration of His people, separating the godless out of their midst. Zahn declares it erroneous to believe that the Lord's Prayer had a specifically Christian character. A Jew knowing nothing of Christ, and having no wish to have anything to do with Him, was able and is still able to-day to pray it. The saying of Mat 5:17, that He 'came to fulfil,' is true also of the Lord's Prayer.

That the first three petitions touch God and the rest refer to man is too clear a point to be missed.* [Note: It is, however, wrong to accentuate the word 'thy'; only codex D has in Lk. the emphatic order of words, σου ἡ βασιλεία.] The second half may perhaps be arranged under the heads of present (daily bread), past (debts of the past), future (temptation and deliverance); but a reference to the last trial (Mat 24:22), the hour of temptation (Rev 3:10) and deliverance from it, does not seem to be implied in the words.

'Thy kingdom come' is again the second petition in the Kaddish.

Instead of the third petition, which Wellhausen calls hard to understand, we have in the Kaddish, 'Your petition be done.' Whether it was under the influence of the fact that it is missing in the true text of Luke or not, at all events it is remarkable that Luther, in his Catechism, gave to the third petition no contents of its own, but treated it as a mere combination of the first and second ('Wenn Gott allen bösen Rat und Willen bricht und hindert, so uns den Namen Gottes nicht heiligen und sein Reich nicht kommen lassen wollen,' etc.).

Dogmatics and Ethics seem to be combined in every one of these three petitions: That we do not dishonour the name of the Heavenly Father (1) by mistrust, (2) by disobedience; that His Kingdom may come (1) with its blessings, (2) with its tasks and duties; that we (1) gladly accept all that is God's will concerning us, and (2) willingly do what He demands of us. To take the fourth petition as merely spiritual, like Marcion and afterwards Luther in his monkish days, is certainly wrong.

The sixth petition reminds us much more of the temptation of Jesus Himself at the beginning and end of His work, in the wilderness and in Gethsemane. The Jewish morning prayer contains the petition גסיון לירי ... תביאנו אל 'Bring us not ... into temptation'; but the age of this part is unknown. Jesus speaks, however, throughout in the second person, advising His disciples, not including Himself; on the other hand, He could not have taught them such a prayer if He had not Himself lived in that atmosphere which the prayer breathes. When He bids them pray after this manner (οὕτως), He gives them an example from which they might learn with few words to say to God what the pious soul has to say to Him, and He did not prescribe the use which was made very early of this prayer, so that it became, to use Luther's expression, the greatest martyr.

7. Later history of the Lord's Prayer.—Only a few hints can be given here. It is very sad to observe how early a mechanical use of the Lord's Prayer set in. The same Didache which turned the warning of Mat_6:16 into the precept, 'Your fastings shall not be with the hypocrites, for they fast on Monday and Thursday, but you fast on Wednesday and Friday,' goes on to write: 'Nor do ye pray as the hypocrites, but as the Lord commanded in His Gospel, Our Father, etc. Thrice in the day do ye pray so.'

This was enforced by the Apost. Const. (iii. 18): προκατασκευάζοντες ἑαυτοὺς ἀξιους τῆς υἰοθεσίας τοῦ πατρὸς, lest Mal_1:6 and Isa_52:5 find application to the Christians. Tertullian styled the Lord's Prayer breuiarium totius evangelii, and pronounced the judgment: 'Oratio haec quantum substringitur verbis, tantum diffunditur sensibus.' Cyprian called it caelestis doctrinae compendium; Origen wrote on it the treatise de Oratione (vol. ii. in the Berlin edition). On its use in the Liturgy, Brightman (p. 58) says: 'It occurs in all liturgies except Apost. Const. as the conclusion of the central action and summing up of the great prayer (533-534), and the transition to the communion, with a proem and a conclusion (Embolismos); it is also otherwise used.' For instance, in the liturgy of the Nestorians it is three times repeated.

Of mediaeval explanations, the Glossa ordinaria draws a rather artificial parallel between the seven petitions of the Lord's Prayer and the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost (Isa_11:12) and the seven Beatitudes. The Com. of St. Thomas Aquinas has been translated from the Latin by Edw. Male (1893). Of special interest is the block-book of Henricus ex Pomerio (Henri van den Bøegaarde, 1382-1441), Explanatio figuralis super Pater noster.

See on it Alvin in Bulletin de l'Académie R. de Belgique, 2 Ser. vol. xvii. 674-94; Monuments iconogr. et typogr. de la Bibliothèque R. de Belgique; and P. Weizsäcker in Christliches Kunstblatt, 42 (1900), Nos. 4, 5. It is characterized by joining in caelis with the first petition,* [Note: Dibelius, Das Vaterunser (1903, p. 165 ff.), knows, for this construction, only Theodoricus of Paderborn, Com. in Or. Dom. M. 147, 333 f.] and a thoroughgoing tripartition ('in caelo tres sanctorum afflictiones; in purgatorio tres animarum afflictiones; in saeculo tres virorum defectiones; tres panes in via necessarios (naturae, gratiae, gloriae); triplex debitum (commissionis, omissionis, remissionis); triplex tentatio; damnandorum triplex malum; salvandorum triplex bonum. The illustrations remind one of the task which has yet to be executed, of writing a monograph on the artistic illustrations to the Lord's Prayer.

Literature.—The literature on the Lord's Prayer is immense. Strangely enough, an art. 'Lord's Day' is found in Smith, but not one on 'Lord's Prayer.' Under 'Paternoster,' Murray mentions that the first example of this term in English is one from about 1000. Of Queen Mary the saying is quoted that she 'got the crown by Our Father and held it by Pater noster.' The Latin designation was so frequently used, esp. in connexion with the rosary, that it was taken over into the language of architects, engineers, and anglers (see Murray). In German both its components in the form 'Patter' and 'Nuster' became expressions for collar-chains. As a measure of time, cf. a 'Paternoster cricket.'

Out of the literature on the Lord's Prayer, Th. Zahn in his Com. on Matth. (1903) selects: Tertull. de Orat. cc. 1-10; Cypr. de Oratione Dominica (Vienna ed. i. 267); Origen, περὶ εὐχῆς (Berlin ed. ii. 346); Gregory of Nyssa, Or. 2-5, de Oratione (Opp. ed. Paris, 1638, i. 723-761); Kamphausen, Das Gebet des Herrn, 1866; Chase (see above); E. v. d. Goltz, Das Gebet in der ältesten Christenheit, 1905, pp. 35-53; Ebi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] 2816 ff. ☩ Lord's Prayer (II)

LORD'S PRAYER (II.)—This name for the prayer which Jesus taught His disciples (Mat 6:9-13, Luk 11:2-4), though used so generally by Christians, does not occur in the NT, and objection to it has sometimes been offered. It might suggest that the prayer was one which Jesus Himself employed, while not only is there no evidence of His having done so, but the petition for forgiveness is a sufficient assurance that He cannot have made it His own. ‘When ye pray,’ He said to His disciples, ‘pray thus’; but His own manner of praying would be different—how different we may judge from the recollections preserved in the Fourth Gospel of one of His prayers (John 17). And so it has sometimes been suggested that we should speak not of ‘The Lord’s Prayer,’ but of ‘The Disciples’ Prayer,’ or that we should content ourselves with designating it by its first two words, calling it the ‘Our Father,’ just as German Protestants call it the ‘Vaterunser’ and Roman Catholics the ‘Paternoster.’ But apart from the consecration of long and hallowed use, the name is appropriate as giving expression to the fact that the prayer comes to us from the very lips of our Lord. In this sense it is the Lord’s Prayer. When we use it, we are approaching God with no words of our own, but in the very words which our Master has taught us.

1. Occasion.—Of the two accounts, in Mt. and Lk. respectively, of the occasion when Christ gave the prayer, it is generally agreed that if we must choose between them, Lk.’s is to be preferred as the more historical. It may be that the author of the First Gospel, after recording the Lord’s injunctions with regard to the spirit and manner of prayer (Mat 6:5-8), thought this a suitable opportunity to set down the prayer-form which was really given at a different time. And yet there seems no positive reason why we should set aside Mt.’s statement as to the connexion at least in which the prayer was spoken. If Jesus gave a form of prayer at all, and meant it to be used as He gave it, it seems likely that He would repeat it, more especially when dealing with different sets of hearers. And if it was natural that He should impart it when one of His disciples, not necessarily one of the Twelve, asked to be taught to pray, it was also natural that, when He had just been warning His disciples against hypocrisy in prayer and the vain repetitions of the Gentiles, He should instruct them to pray after the brief, simple, and filial manner of this model of approach to God.

2. Structure.—This is exceedingly simple. A part from the Doxology, which occurs only in Mt., and even there forms no part of the original, but is a later insertion due to liturgical usage, we have only an invocation and a series of six petitions. Since Augustine, the number of the petitions has commonly been reckoned at seven, the last clause in Mt.’s version being regarded as two separate requests. But the view that now commends itself to most scholars is that the two members of the sentence are to be taken as one and the same petition negatively and positively expressed. This view is confirmed by the fact that in the critical text of Lk. (see Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885) the petition runs simply, ‘Bring us not into temptation,’ and it is further borne out by the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 rendering (almost certainly correct) of Mt.’s τοῦ πονηροῦ by ‘the evil one’ instead of ‘evil.’ The petition is that we may not be brought into temptation, but may be delivered from the Tempter; and these are two aspects of the selfsame request.

Looking now at the six petitions, we observe at once that the first three have a Godward, the second three a manward reference. Because of this the prayer has often been compared to the Decalogue with its summation of human duty first to God and then to man (cf. Mat 22:40, Mar 12:31). But beneath this resemblance there lies a great difference between the Ten Words and the Lord's Prayer, the familiar difference between law and grace, between the Old Testament and the New. For while in the one case our debt to God and to man is laid upon us from above as a commandment that must be obeyed, in the other we look up to God, crying like Augustine, 'Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis' (Conf. x. 60).

When we examine the prayer more closely, a beautiful continuity and symmetry of thought becomes apparent. In the invocation God is addressed by His new name of 'Father'; and it is with a petition for the hallowing of this name that the prayer proper begins. If we take the three petitions of the first group, God appears to be addressed: (1) as the Father whose name must be hallowed, (2) as the King whose Kingdom is to come, (3) as the Lord of heaven and earth whose will must be fulfilled. And when we pass to the three petitions of the second group, the same threefold view of God may be traced, coming, too, in the same order, so that the successive clauses of this group correspond respectively to those of the first. For the prayer for bread naturally suggests the request of the child to the Father, the prayer for forgiveness the petition of the subject to the King, and the prayer for deliverance from the Tempter the cry of one who feels in the presence of the world's evil his utter dependence upon the strong and holy will of his Master and Lord.

3. Contents.—Without entering here into the questions raised by the twofold text (see preceding art.), we shall for convenience follow Mt.'s version as the one which has passed into general use in the Christian Church.

(a) The Invocation: 'Our Father which art in heaven.' These words mark a new epoch not only in the history of prayer, but in the history of revelation. In the OT, God is occasionally spoken of as the Father of the Jewish people (Deu 32:6, Isa 63:16 etc.), but individuals do not venture to address Him by this name (Psa 103:13 is only a comparison). And though in some of the extra-canonical writings there appears a dawning consciousness of a personal relation to God as a Father (Wis 2:16, Sir 23:1; Sir 23:4 etc.), it was Jesus Christ who first turned the dim hope of pious hearts into the assured certainty of faith. 'Father' is the distinctive Christian name of God, the name which Christ taught us, and which, apart from Him, we have no proper right to use (cf. Joh 1:12, Gal 4:6). The Fatherhood here appealed to is not the general Fatherhood of Creatorship, but the special Fatherhood of grace. It is for those who are the children of God by Christian faith that this prayer is meant, those who turn to Him with filial hearts, prepared to say: 'Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done.'

But God is called not 'Father' only, but 'Our Father,' and thus the invocation acknowledges the brotherhood of man as well as the Fatherhood of God. There is a human brotherhood which rests on the Divine Creatorship (cf. Mal 2:10). But just as there is a special sonship, the sonship of believers, so there is a distinctive brotherhood, the brotherhood of saints; and it is this brotherhood that finds immediate expression in the invocation of the Lord's Prayer.

Our Father is 'in heaven.' The phrase speaks to us of His greatness and holiness, of the reverence we owe Him, of His power to bless. But it also reminds us that if we are the children of the heavenly Father, His home is the true home of our souls, and that, as always, so especially when we bow before His throne with our requests, we must set our mind on the things that are above.

(b) First Petition: 'Hallowed be thy name.' In the OT the 'name' of God is a constant expression for His revealed character (cf. Psa 9:10; Psa 20:7, Pro 18:10). Without doubt it is in this sense that the word is used by Jesus. But His immediate reference here must be to that character of Fatherhood under which He had just presented God to His disciples. It is our Father in heaven whose name is to be hallowed. To hallow that name is to set great store by it, to exalt it and revere it and glory in it. To pray that it may be hallowed is to pray that God as revealed to us by Christ may be accepted and honoured by ourselves and others—that we may turn to Him as our Father with loving, trustful hearts, and give Him the honour that is due.

(c) Second Petition: 'Thy kingdom come.' The Kingdom of God was the hope of Israel before Christ's advent, and when He came it formed the constant and central theme of His teaching. When we examine the Synoptic Gospels to learn what His teaching upon the subject was, we find Him speaking of the Kingdom of God in two ways. (1) It was a present reality set up on earth (Mat 12:28, Mar 1:15, Luk 17:21), gathering round His own person (Mat 13:41; Mat 16:28; Mat 25:31; Mat 25:34 etc.), the coming of which meant its entrance (which is really His own entrance, Mat 8:10 ff; Mat 11:28-30 etc.) into the individual heart (Luk 17:20-21, Mat 18:3 ||, Joh 3:3), its steady growth (Mar 4:26-32), and its gradual spread like leaven through society (Mat 13:33 = Luk 13:20 f.). (2) But again it was a hope of the future, a Kingdom not realized as yet, but one day to be revealed in power by the Parousia of the Son of Man Himself (Mat 13:41 f., Mat 13:49 f., Mat 22:13; Mat 25:30). And so, when we pray for the coming of God's Kingdom, we are praying that Christ the King may enter into our hearts, that He may take full possession of them, that the gospel of the Kingdom may spread throughout the world, and that its principles may work in human society with subduing power. But we are praying also for the hour of the final consummation when the Lord Himself shall appear in His glory, when the kingdom of this world shall become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, when out of that Kingdom there shall be cast all things that offend, and God shall be all in all.

(d) Third Petition: ‘Thy will be done.’ This may be described as the dominant note of the Lord’s Prayer. The petitions that precede lead up to this, and those that follow must be brought into harmony with it. We frequently use these words as if they were nothing more than a prayer of submission and resignation in the day of sorrow, an echo of the Saviour’s cry in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mat 26:39 | |). And no doubt this is part of their meaning, and one of the uses to which they may be applied. They are a cry to God to enable us to bear what He sees fit to send, and to make us meek and patient under His chastening hand. But while this is implied in the petition, it is not its first intention. The added words, ‘as in heaven, so on earth,’ should keep us right here, since from heaven all sorrow and sighing have fled away. This is the prayer of active rather than of passive obedience, an obedience like that of God’s angels who excel in strength and do His commandments. Before we think of Jesus in the garden of shadows, we should think of Him as He sat by the well of Sychar and said to His disciples, ‘My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work’ (Joh 4:34). When we pray this prayer we are asking that we and all men, being delivered from the spirit of wilfulness, may attain to a joyful alacrity like that of angels in doing the will of God.

(e) Fourth Petition.—‘Give us this day our daily (ἐπιούσιον) bread.’ We pass now from the God ward to the manward aspects of the prayer. The first petition of this second group shows that it is right and proper to pray for material as well as for spiritual blessings. The prayer is not to be spiritualized, with most of the Fathers, into a request for the Bread of Life; it is literal bread, bread for bodily sustenance, that Jesus means us to ask for.

The one expository difficulty of this petition lies in the word ἐπιούσιος, which has been called ‘the most untranslatable word in the NT.’ It appears here (in both Mt. and Lk.) for the first time in Gr. literature, and within the NT occurs nowhere else. Of the three principal renderings—‘daily’ (Authorized and Revised Versions text), ‘for the coming day’ ((Revised Version margin)), and ‘needful’ (Amer. (Revised Version margin) , alternat.)—there is least to be said for the first, familiar as it is. It reproduces the Old Lat. quotidianum, but finds no support in etymology, and may be regarded perhaps as nothing more than a guess suggested by what the sense of the passage appeared to require. ‘For the coming day’ is more likely from the etymological point of view (ἐσιούσιος fr. ἡ ἐπιούσα [sc. ἡμέρα] = ‘the coming day,’ fr. ἐπιών, pres. part. of ἔπειμι [εἶμι, ‘to go or come’]), but seems out of keeping with Christ’s teaching elsewhere in the Sermon on the Mount (Mat 6:34). If this rendering is accepted, Chase’s view (‘Lord’s Prayer in Early Church,’ Texts and Studies, Cambridge [1891], in loc.) is plausible, that the word was a liturgical insertion intended to adapt the prayer for use at evening service. In the morning the petition would run, according to its original form, 'Give us this day our bread,' while in the evening there would be substituted, 'Give us our bread for the coming day.' Cf. Lk.'s 'day by day,' which obviates any inappropriateness in asking at night for the bread of the day.

Perhaps, however, there is most to be said for the view that ἐπιούσιος is a word specially coined, after the analogy of the LXX Septuagint περιούσιος (Exo 19:5, Deu 7:6; Deu 14:2; Deu 26:18, for Heb. לֶחֶם Authorized and Revised Versions 'peculiar.' It is evidently derived from περιουσία = wealth, abundance [περί and οὔσια]). ἐπιούσιος in contrast to περιούσιος would thus denote what is needful or sufficient as distinguished from what is abundant or superfluous. If this is the proper rendering of the word, the petition would correspond almost exactly with the prayer of Agur, 'Feed me with the food that is needful for me' (Pro 30:8 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885).* [Note: In support of this interpretation see A. N. Jannaris in Contemp. Rev., Oct. 1894; ExpT vi. [1894] p. 61. Cf. also the preceding article.]

(f) Fifth Petition.—'Forgive us our debts (ὀφειλήματα), as we forgive our debtors.' Lk. has 'sins' (ἁμαρτίας), while in the explanatory addition given by Mt. (Mat 6:14-15) 'trespasses' (παροπτώματα) is used—the word which in the Bk. of Com. Prayer is substituted for 'debts' in the Lord's Prayer itself. 'Debts' is particularly suggestive. In the first place, it reminds us of the personal accountability to God into which we are brought by every act of sin. We may look at sin in many aspects—as the transgression of an ideal law, as a wrong done to our neighbour, as a harm inflicted upon ourselves. But most solemn of all is the thought that sin makes us debtors before God, debtors who have wasted our Lord's money and are called to render account. But further, 'debts' reminds us of a class of sins we are most apt to forget—our sins of omission. It is when we ask ourselves, 'How much owest thou unto thy Lord?' that the full extent of our shortcoming begins to appear. Perhaps we have striven hard against wrongdoing, but what of the things we have left undone? In Christ's great vision of the Judgment, 'Inasmuch as ye did it not' is the preface to the sentence of condemnation (Mat 25:45).

By teaching us to offer this petition our Lord teaches that God is ready to forgive all our debts. But a condition is laid down. Those who pray for forgiveness must be ready to forgive. On this Jesus placed great emphasis, so great that He does for the fifth petition what He does for no other, adding at the end of the prayer (Mat 25:14-15) a sentence of explanation and enforcement, in which He makes it perfectly clear that if we will not forgive those who have trespassed against us, neither will our Father in heaven forgive our trespasses.† [Note: If the view is taken that Mat_25:14-15 have been imported here by the Evangelist from another connexion such as I835 (so Meyer-Weiss and Bruce; cf. Holtzmann in Hand-Com.), the words testify at all events to the fact that Jesus was accustomed to lay stress on the relation between human and Divine forgiveness; see Mar_11:25-26, Luk_6:37, and esp. the parable of the Unmerciful Servant, Mat_18:23-35.]

(g) Sixth Petition.—‘Bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one.’ This petition follows naturally after the fifth, for the recollection of past falls makes us conscious of weakness and fearful of future possibilities. But is it not an impracticable petition? How can we hope to escape from being tempted? The world and the flesh and the devil are ever with us, and still ‘in the midst of the garden’; just where all life’s daily cross-paths meet, the tree of temptation grows and the Tempter himself lies waiting. And is it not also a mistaken petition? Is not temptation a means of grace, an opportunity of ‘winning our souls’? Does not St. James write, ‘My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations’? (Jam_1:2). Yes, but there is another side to the question. Temptation is a means of grace, but it may prove to be an occasion of stumbling and even of utter destruction. Blessed is the man that endureth it (Jam_1:12); but what of him who is drawn away by his own lusts and enticed, and so falls into the snare of the devil? By putting this petition into our lips Jesus reminds us that the hour of temptation is always a dangerous hour. He hangs out a red lamp of warning on the dark and crooked road along which we have to pass, and summons us to ‘watch and pray’ (cf. Mat_26:41 = Mar_14:38).

And yet temptations must come, we cannot hope to escape meeting them, and this petition, like every other in the Lord’s Prayer, is subject to the rule of the guiding petition of all, ‘Thy will be done.’ But ‘Deliver us from the evil one’ is a prayer that Satan may not gain the victory over our souls. That ‘the evil one’ is the right rendering of τοῦ πονηροῦ is now commonly accepted by scholars on grounds of exegesis. It is in keeping, too, with our Lord’s teaching about the presence and influence in the world of a hostile and malevolent will, an ‘enemy’ of God’s Kingdom and its King (cf. Mat_13:25; Mat_13:39). From him we may well pray to be delivered. Jesus Himself prayed for Simon that in the hour of Satan’s sifting his faith might not fail (Luk_22:31 f.). And we know that faith need never fail. God will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able (1Co_10:13), and this petition is an appeal to Him for strength to endure and to overcome in the evil day.

4. Uses.—(1) This is a breviary of Christian prayer, in which all Christian petitions are summarily comprehended. As the commandments of the moral law are all gathered up in the two tables of duty to God and to man, so the petitions of the gospel are all represented in the two divisions of this little prayer. Apart from requests of a personal and particular kind, everything that the universal Christian heart need ask for is explicitly stated or implicitly enfolded here, whether things on earth or things in heaven, things human or Divine, things of the body or the spirit, things of the life that now is or of that which is to come.

(2) It is a model or directory of prayer. According to Mt.'s account, Jesus, when He gave it, had just been warning His disciples against the formalisms of hypocrites and the vain repetitions which the Gentiles use (Mat 6:5-8), and it was in contrast with these that He said, 'After this manner pray ye.' Looking at the manner of the prayer we are struck by its direct sincerity, its brevity, its simplicity, its calmness and quietness of spirit, its entire submission to the will of God. It teaches us that we are not heard for our much speaking, that long and elaborate prayers are unnecessary, that a simple request like that of a child to a father is enough. It teaches also the right relation and proportion in prayer between what belongs to God and what concerns ourselves. The earthly has its claims, but the heavenly comes before it; and all requests must be made in subordination to the Divine will.

(3) It is a form of prayer. The prayers which John the Baptist taught his disciples (Luk 11:1) must have been forms; and when a disciple of Jesus, reminding Him of John's custom, said, 'Lord teach us to pray,' it was doubtless a prayer-form for which he asked. And Jesus justified the request by replying, 'When ye pray, say, Our Father,' etc. Not that He wished His disciples to restrict themselves to this form or to repeat it incessantly. It is significant that, apart from these two passages in Mt. and Lk., we do not hear of the Lord's Prayer in the NT again. The recorded prayers of the Apostolic Church bear no resemblance to it. When God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into men's hearts, they prayed with freedom as the Spirit gave them utterance. And yet from the first this must have been, and must ever continue to be, a specially consecrated form of prayer, which no one can sincerely use without being conscious that, in presenting his petitions in the very words that Christ has given, he is asking according to the will of God (cf. 1Jn 5:14).

(4) It is a prayer especially for social use. There are prayers which can be offered only in secret, and Jesus had already spoken of these. 'Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet,' He said (Mat 6:6). But this was a prayer for the whole Christian society: 'After this manner pray ye,' 'When ye pray, say.' The invocation is addressed to 'our Father,' the requests are on behalf of others as well as ourselves: 'give us,' 'forgive us,' 'bring us not,' 'deliver us.' And so this prayer, which is an appeal to the Fatherhood of God, is also a constant reminder of our human and especially of our Christian brotherhood. It teaches us to join our desires with those of the universal Church as we pray for the coming of the Kingdom. It teaches us when we ask for bread, or forgiveness, or guidance and deliverance, to bear the needs of others along with our own on our hearts before God, and to remember that the unspeakable privilege of intercession is of the very essence of Christian prayer.

☩ Lord's Supper (II)

LORD'S SUPPER'S SUPPER (II).—The NT passages bearing on this subject may conveniently be divided into the following groups:—

1. Preparation for Institution

(1) Feeding of Five thousand (Mar_6:41-42 = Mat_14:19-20, Luk_9:16-17, Joh_6:11-12). In connexion with this miracle it is important to observe that (a) it is recorded in all four Gospels; (b) the record contains the following significant phrases, which it is well to compare with the phraseology in the accounts of the institution: λαβών (Mk., Mt., Lk.; ἔλαβεν, Jn.), εὐλόγησεν (Mk., Mt., Lk.; εὐχαριστήσας, Jn.; cf. Joh_6:23 εὐχαριστήσαντος τοῦ Κυρίου), κατέκλασεν (Mk., Lk.; κλάσας, Mt.; Jn. omits), ἐδίδου, (Mk., Lk.; ἔδωκεν, Mt.; διέδωκεν, Jn.); (α) the event carried on and emphasized the idea of a sacred meal, which, as a means of communion with God, had been profoundly impressed on the minds of the Jews by the sacrificial system.

(2) Feeding of Four thousand (Mar_8:6-8 = Mat_15:36-37). In connexion with this must be observed: (a) the same type of phrases as in the Feeding of the Five thousand: λαβών (Mk.; ἔλαβεν, Mt.), εὐχαριστήσας (Mk., Mt.), ἔκλασεν (Mk., Mt.), ἐδίδου (Mk., Mt.), εὐλογήσας (Mk. only); (b) the same idea of a sacred meal as in the Feeding of the Five thousand. With the Feeding of the Five thousand and the Four thousand should be compared the meals after the Resurrection in Luk_24:30-31; Luk_24:35 and Joh_21:13, where, though neither appears to have been the Eucharist, the idea of a sacred meal is maintained, and the phraseology should be noticed (λαβών τὸν ἄρτον εὐλόγησεν καὶ κλάσας ἐπέδιδου αὐτοῖς and ἐν τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου in Luk_24:30; Luk_24:35, and λαμβάνει τὸν ἄρτον καὶ δίδωσιν αὐτοῖς, καὶ τὸ ὄψάριον ὁμοίως in Joh_21:13).

(3) Discourse in the Fourth Gospel in connexion with Feeding of Five thousand. This miracle, like others, is called σημεῖον in the Fourth Gospel (Joh 6:14; Joh 6:26), i.e. it has a place in the group of 'signs' which are so called because 'they make men feel the mysteries which underlie the visible order' (Westcott). The peculiar significance of this 'sign' in particular was drawn out by our Lord in the discourse at Capernaum which followed it. That it was an acted parable of Divine truth He asserted to the multitude which sought Him at Capernaum, in the words: 'Ye seek me, not because ye saw signs, but because ye ate of the loaves, and were filled. Work not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of Man shall give unto you: for him the Father, even God, hath sealed' (Joh 6:26-27). Thus it supplied the starting-point for the conversation with the multitude, in which our Lord identified 'the bread out of heaven that is genuine,' which 'the Father giveth,' with Himself as 'the bread of God which cometh down out of heaven, and giveth life unto the world,' 'the bread of life,' 'the bread which cometh down out of heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die,' 'the living bread which came down out of heaven' and further declared, 'the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world' (Joh 6:32-51). As the conversation proceeded, our Lord spoke, in still clearer terms, of the reception of His flesh and blood as the means whereby there was to be participation in Himself, and as requisite to the possession of life; 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have not life in yourselves. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life'; 'My flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him'; 'He that eateth me, he also shall live because of me. This is the bread which came down out of heaven'; 'He that eateth this bread shall live for ever' (Joh 6:52-58). Recognizing the difficulty caused to His hearers by this teaching, our Lord laid stress on the deep spiritual significance of what He had said: 'The Spirit is the life-giver; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit, and are life' (Joh 6:61-63). By this conversation, the idea of a sacred meal is carried further than it had been in the miracle itself. An act of eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ is anticipated as the way in which His disciples will participate in the life which is in Him.

To dissociate this teaching from the Eucharist is to take away the key to its meaning which is supplied by the comparison of the phraseology used in it with that employed by our Lord at the Institution. This fact may be illustrated by the view of Arthur Wright (*Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , p. 140, NT Problems, pp. 134-146) that the Eucharist had been observed by our Lord from the first as 'a covenant of service' or 'union,' since the language of John 6 would not have been intelligible unless the Eucharist had been already in common use. Wright's view must be rejected as (a) lacking positive support; (b) not really affording a parallel to the existence of a rite of baptism (Joh 3:22; Joh 4:1-2) before the institution of Christian Baptism (Mat 28:19); (c) being contrary to the tenor of John 6, which implies that, to the disciples as well as to the multitude, the teaching had the element of difficulty which shows that the Eucharist was not yet instituted; and (d) as contrary to the parallels by which the discourse about Baptism in John 3 is prior to the institution in Mat 28:19, and the teaching about forgiveness in Mar 2:5-11 (= Mat 9:2-8, Luk 5:20-24) is prior to Joh 20:21-23; but its plausibility at first sight is a significant indication of the truth that the discourse in John 6 was destined to find its explanation in the Institution of the Eucharist. Thus the teaching may be taken as anticipatory of the Eucharist. As such it suggests (α) a real spiritual participation on the part of the communicant in the human nature of Christ by the power of the Holy Ghost, and a consequent union with His Divine Person; (β) connexion with His death, indicated in the words ‘the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world,’ and with His resurrection, indicated by the references to ‘the bread of life’ and ‘the living bread.’ Consequently the communicant feeds on the living risen body and blood of the Lord which have passed through death.

The interpretations of the discourse which need be mentioned are the following: (1) that there is no connexion with the Holy Communion, but the feeding on Christ referred to is simply acceptance of His teaching or faith in His work, a view which obviously fails to allow for the distinctive character of the phraseology; (2) that the primary and special reference is to the Holy Communion, the interpretation which best satisfies all the conditions; (3) that the teaching, while not excluding the Holy Communion, is rather to the general verity of spiritual communion with our Lord than specifically to the Holy Communion, a view which, though it may be expressed so as to come very near the interpretation here accepted, does not account for the peculiar phrases used in the discourse and their remarkable likeness to, and explanation by, the words used in the Institution of the Eucharist. The objection that, if the primary reference were to the Eucharist, Joh 6:54; Joh 6:58 would require that mere reception of Communion, even by one who should receive unworthily, would confer the gift of life, is not weighty, since any reasonable treatment of the passage regards it as referring to those who communicate with such dispositions as may preserve them from receiving unworthily.

2. Accounts of the Institution.—(1) 1Co 11:23-25. The earliest history of the Institution which we possess is that here given by St. Paul. It records our Lord’s words with reference to the bread: ‘This is my body, which is for you: this do as my memorial’; and with reference to the cup: ‘This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial.’ The interpretation of these words is concerned with two subjects:—

(a) The meaning of 'This is my body.' The word 'this' is the subject of the sentence. Viewed in connexion with the introductory words 'took bread,' 'He brake it and said,' it cannot reasonably be understood to denote bread in general or anything else except the actual pieces of bread which our Lord gave as He spoke. The word 'is' is the logical copula between the subject 'this' and the predicate 'my body.' In the Aramaic sentence which our Lord spoke, the predication was probably expressed simply by the juxtaposition of the subject and the predicate without any copula. Either the Greek copula, as used in the record which we possess, or the juxtaposition in the Aramaic sentence which it probably represents, denotes that the subject ('this,' i.e. the bread which our Lord gave to His disciples) and the predicate ('my body') are viewed as identical. The interpretation of the sentence then depends on the sense in which the word 'body' is to be understood. It must be remembered that (α) the idea of communion with God by means of a sacred meal was familiar, as in many religious rites outside Judaism, so also in the literature and the religion which were well known to the disciples, as shown in the Levitical peace-offerings with the threefold division into the portion for God, the portion for the priest, and the portion for the worshipper (Leviticus 3; Lev 7:29-34); the bread and wine brought forth by Melchizedek, the 'priest of God Most High' (Gen 14:18); the eating of the lamb in the Passover (Exodus 12); the meal of Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders in the presence of God (Exo 24:1-11); the prophecy by Isaiah of the feast to be made by the Lord of hosts (Isa 25:6); and the invitations to a meal evidently of profound spiritual significance given by the personified 'Wisdom' of the Sapiential books (Pro 9:1-5, Sir 24:19-21). (β) This idea had been emphasized in our Lord's ministry in the Feeding of the Five thousand and the subsequent discourse, and the disciples had been taught that in eating His flesh and drinking His blood they would have participation in Divine life (Joh 6:53-57). (γ) There is nothing to indicate that the word 'body' is used in any unreal or metaphorical sense, and the added words, 'which is for you,' alluding to the sacrificial efficacy of our Lord's body, appear to identify that which is spoken of with His actual body. (δ) The close connexion of the words 'The Spirit is the life-giver; the flesh profiteth nothing' (Joh 6:63) with the teaching about eating the flesh of the Son of Man and drinking His blood, suggests that in the rite which our Lord was instituting there would be the operation of the Holy Ghost and a work of spiritual efficacy. (ε) However accomplished at the Institution, as in the parallel instances of anticipation in the walking of our Lord on the water and His Transfiguration during the days of His humiliation, the gift contemplated in the rite instituted must be viewed in the light of the spiritual nature and powers of the risen body of Christ. (ζ) The assertion of this spiritual aspect of the body denoted is confirmed when the language in which St. Paul describes Christians as 'the body of Christ' (1Co 12:27) is compared; but this comparison would be pushed beyond its proper force if it were held to imply that the meaning in the two passages is the same, since in St. Paul's teaching the gift in Baptism, which makes men 'the body of Christ' (1Co_12:13), is not identified with the gift in the Holy Communion. The exegesis of this part of our Lord's words at the Institution, then, as recorded by St. Paul, indicates that the gift in the Eucharist is the spiritual food of the risen and ascended body of our Lord. The same method of exegesis involves a similar interpretation of the words 'In my blood,' though, in view of the spiritual nature of the risen body, it is impossible to make a sharp severance between the body and the blood.

That this line of exegesis, which is that which is naturally deduced from the study of the Holy Scripture by itself, is right is strongly confirmed by the traditional interpretation in the Church from St. Ignatius onwards.

Other interpretations are (1) that the words 'this is my body' mean, 'This conveys the efficacy of my body but is not my body'; (2) that they mean, 'This represents my body but is not my body.' Both of these interpretations are vitally distinguished from that which has here been adopted, namely, 'This not only represents my body and conveys its efficacy, but also is my body.' To adopt either of them involves putting aside the cumulative argument which has already been briefly detailed; the main argument by which they have been supported is the supposed merely metaphorical character of certain phrases, alleged to be parallel, in which our Lord described Himself as 'the bread of life' (Joh_6:35; Joh_6:41; Joh_6:48), 'the living bread' (Joh_6:51), 'the light of the world' (Joh_8:12, Joh_9:5), 'the door of the sheep' (Joh_10:7-8), 'the good shepherd' (Joh_10:11; Joh_10:14), 'the way' (Joh_14:6), 'the true vine' (Joh_15:1; Joh_15:5). In regard to these phrases it must be observed that (1) neither the phrases themselves nor the circumstances in which they were used were really parallel to the words and circumstances at the Institution; and (2) the phrases in question are as a matter of fact very far from being simply metaphorical. In each of them an actual fact about Christ is set forth. Christ in spiritual reality feeds Christians, and gives them light, and admits them into the Church, and tends them, and affords them access to the Father, and unites them in Himself. Similarly, in spiritual reality the bread which He gives in the Holy Communion is His body.

(b) The meaning of 'This cup is the new covenant'; 'this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial.' The interpretation of these sentences turns on three words: (i.) 'covenant,' (ii.) 'do,' (iii.) 'memorial.'

(i.) The sentence 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood,' while recalling the phraseology and promise of Jer_31:31-34, inevitably suggests a comparison with Exo_24:1-11. The making of a covenant between the Lord and Israel is there described. A sacrifice was offered by the slaughter of oxen and the sprinkling of part of the blood of the victims on the altar. After the reading of the book of the covenant in the audience of the people by Moses, and their promise to be obedient to all that the Lord had thus spoken, the rest of the blood was sprinkled by Moses on the people with the words, 'Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words.' The sacrifice was consummated, and the covenant completed, by the sacred meal wherein 'the nobles of the children of Israel' 'beheld God, and did eat and drink.' The analogy between this series of actions and the Eucharist which the words 'This is the new covenant in my blood' suggest, is worked out with some detail in Heb_9:11-28. The death of Christ and His entrance into heaven with His own blood are there represented as the high-priestly actions of which the slaughter of the beasts and the sprinkling of their blood in the Mosaic sacrifices, alike in the covenant of Exo_24:1-11 and in the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement in Exo_30:10, Leviticus 16, were an anticipation. The words 'This is the new covenant in my blood' thus bring the Eucharist into close connexion with the high-priestly work wherein Christ offered Himself a sacrifice in His death on the cross, and His entrance into heaven at the Ascension. They denote that the gift by Christ of His body and blood, and the reception of these by Christians, are the means of a covenant relation in the sacrificial action; and that Christians by participating in this rite are in contact with the death of Christ and His high-priestly acts in heaven.

(ii.) The command 'this do' conveys the injunction for the perpetuation of the rite instituted by our Lord in the Church. It has been much discussed whether the word 'do' (ποιεῖτε) suggests sacrificial associations. The truth appears to be that in itself ποιεῖω is simply negative as to this point. Apart from other indications of sacrifice, it would not suggest any such thing, since in the very large number of instances in which it is used in LXX Septuagint and NT it is in a merely general sense. In a sacrificial context, however, like the Heb. עשה, it acquires the idea of 'sacrifice' or 'offer,' as, e.g. in Exo_29:39, Lev_9:7, Psa_66:15, where עשה (LXX Septuagint ποιεῖω) is rightly translated 'offer' in Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885. In NT cf. Luk_2:27. In this possibility of a special use, side by side with the ordinary use, ποιεῖω is not greatly dissimilar from the Shakespearian use of 'do,' by which 'do' constantly has its ordinary general sense, but in a sacrificial context in Jul. Caes. II. ii. 5 acquires the sense 'offer' ('Bid the priests do present sacrifice,' i.e. 'offer sacrifice immediately'). Consequently, the word 'do,' as used by our Lord at the Institution, is in itself wholly negative, and does not suggest or deny the idea of sacrifice. In relation to the context, however, it will be held to be appropriate or inappropriate to the idea of sacrifice according as the suggestion of sacrifice is recognized or ignored in the general surroundings of the Last Supper and in the words 'covenant' and 'memorial.'

(iii.) The primary thought suggested in the word ‘memorial’ (ἀνάμνησις) is that of a memorial before God, though without excluding the idea of a memento to man. It occurs five times in the LXX Septuagint, namely in Lev 24:7, Num 10:10, Psa 37:1 (= Heb. 38:1), Psa 69:1 (= Heb. 70:1), Wis 16:6. In Wis 16:6 it denotes a reminder to man; in the other four passages it denotes a memorial before God. The only place in NT where it occurs besides 1Co 11:24-25, and the same phrase in Luk 22:19, is Heb 10:3, where it refers to the remembrance of sins in the Jewish sacrifices. When all the circumstances are taken into account, the thought most naturally suggested is that of a memorial of Christ presented by Christians before the Father, which is at the same time a memento to themselves. If so, the idea differs little from that way of regarding the Eucharist in much Greek theology, whereby it is viewed as the act in which the Church remembers Christ and in remembering Him makes the memorial of Him before the Father. In the sentences ‘This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial,’ then, our Lord associated with the command for the observance of the rite which He instituted, indications that by means of it Christians would have access to His high-priestly work on the cross and in heaven, and would possess a memorial before God and a memento to themselves.

(2) Mar 14:22-25. As here recorded, our Lord’s words at the Institution were: ‘Take ye: this is my body’; ‘this is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many. Verily I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God.’ The words in connexion with the species of bread are the same as those in 1Co 11:24, already discussed, and do not need further comment, except to notice that Mark does not add ‘which is for you: this do as my memorial.’ In connexion with the cup Mark differs from 1 Cor. in that (1) he has ‘this is my blood of the covenant’ instead of ‘this is the new covenant in my blood’; (2) he omits ‘this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial’; (3) he adds ‘which is poured out for many’; (4) he adds ‘Verily I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God.’ As to these differences, it may be noticed: (α) The blood in Mark’s phrase is described as being Christ’s and as being ‘of the covenant,’ i.e. it is Christ’s because it is the blood which He personally took in the Incarnation, and it is ‘of the covenant’ because by means of it the covenant between God and man which Christ makes is ratified and sealed. Consequently the meaning of the expression is not substantially different from that used by St. Paul in 1Co 11:25; (β) the consideration of the omission of ‘which is for you: this do as my memorial,’ ‘this do, as oft as ye drink it, as my memorial,’ does not belong to this section of the article; (γ) the words ‘for many,’ i.e. ‘on behalf of many’ (ὕπερ πολλῶν), indicate the sacrificial and expiatory power of Christ’s blood. Similarly the words ‘which is poured out’ (τὸ ἐκχυννόμενον) are connected with the sacrifice of His blood. In the LXX Septuagint ἐκχέω is often used both of the shedding of blood in slaughter and of the pouring out of the blood of slain victims at the altar. Instances of the latter use are Exo 29:12, Lev 4:7; Lev 4:18; Lev 4:25; Lev 4:30; Lev 4:34; Lev 8:15; Lev 9:9; cf. 1 K (= 1 S) 1Ki 7:6. The close connexion with the word 'covenant' in Mar 14:24, and the general sacrificial surroundings, give strong probability that the meaning here is 'poured out' rather than 'shed,' and that the sense is 'this is my blood,' 'which is sacrificially poured out,' as in the Jewish sacrifices the blood of the slain victim was poured out as the culmination of the sacrifice; (δ) like much else in the Gospels, the words 'when I drink it new in the kingdom of God' appear to have a twofold reference. They refer in part to Christian Eucharists; the 'kingdom of God' is the Christian Church; the drinking 'new' is in the 'new covenant' of 1Co 11:25; thus is denoted the fellowship between Christ and His people in the Eucharistic feast. In a further sense they refer to the 'marriage supper of the Lamb, (Rev 19:9); the 'kingdom of God' is the consummated Kingdom of glory; the drinking 'new' is in that state in which 'all things' are made 'new' (Rev 21:5), newness being a characteristic feature of the future as well as of the present Christian life. See art. Covenant.

(3) Mat 26:26; Mat 26:29. As here recorded, our Lord's words were: 'Take, eat, this is my body'; 'Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins. But I say unto you, I will not drink hence-forth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.' There is little here different from Mark's account which calls for comment: (α) 'unto remission of sins' is added to 'poured out,' specifying distinctly the object of the sacrificial offering of our Lord's blood; (β) the words 'with you' are added in the description of the future 'new' drinking of 'this fruit of the vine'; (γ) the phrase 'my Father's kingdom' is used instead of 'the kingdom of God,' both phrases alike being descriptive of both the Christian Church and the future perfected Kingdom.

(4) Luk 22:14-20. The account here given is as follows: 'When the hour was come, he sat down, and the apostles with him. And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: for I say unto you, I will not eat it, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. And he received a cup, and when he had given thanks, he said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves; for I say unto you, I will not drink from henceforth of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. And he took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave to them, saying, This is my body which is given for you; this do for my memorial. And the cup in like manner after supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood, even that which is poured out for you.' From the point of view of exegesis, this account of the Institution does not need further comment than what has already been said in connexion with the accounts in 1 Cor., Mk., Mt. From other points of view it would be necessary to discuss (1) the cup which our Lord 'received' (δεξιόμενος) before He 'took bread' (λαβὼν ἄρτον); and (2) the shorter reading of the text according to which some authorities omit from 'which is given for you' to 'which is poured out for you.'

3. Pauline teaching.—(1) 1Co 10:16-21. 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? seeing that we, who are many, are one bread, one body: for we all partake of the one bread. Behold Israel after the flesh: have not they which eat the sacrifices communion with the altar? What say I then? that a thing sacrificed to idols is anything, or that an idol is anything? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God; and I would not that ye should have communion with demons. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of demons; ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons.' The following points here call for comment: (α) St. Paul describes the 'bread' and the 'cup' as being the means by which Christians participate in the 'body of Christ' and the 'blood of Christ'; (β) there is nothing to suggest that the phrases 'body of Christ' and 'blood of Christ' are used in any other sense than that in which they would ordinarily be understood; (γ) the phrases 'which we break,' 'of blessing which we bless,' seem to connect the efficacy of the elements as means of conveying the body and blood of Christ with the consecration of them, not simply with their reception; (δ) this participation by Christians in 'the one bread' is a means of their unity, so that they are 'one bread, one body'; (ε) this description of the 'bread' and the 'cup' as the 'body of Christ' and the 'blood of Christ' must be compared with St. Paul's description elsewhere of Christians being made by means of baptism the body of Christ (see 1Co 12:12-13; 1Co 12:27, Eph 5:30); (ζ) the communion of Christians is analogous to the Jewish sacrifices and to the sacrifices of the Gentiles. As the object of the Jewish sacrifices was to hold communion with God, and as the object of the Gentile sacrifices was to hold communion with the false gods who are more properly regarded as demons, so also the Christian feast aims at communion with Christ.

(2) 1Co 11:26-29. 'As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come. Wherefore whosoever shall eat the bread or drink the cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord. But let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup. For he that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgment unto himself, if he discern not the body.' (α) Christian communion is here declared to be a proclamation of the death of the Lord, a setting forth of it so that it may not be forgotten between the time of His visible departure from the earth and the time of His return. So far as the indications of a sacrificial aspect which have already been noticed are held to be of weight, this proclamation may be regarded in a double manner as a memory among Christians and as a memorial before God. (β) The reception of communion unworthily is said to be an offence of so great gravity as to make the offender 'guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord,' so that his communion is an act of judgment upon himself in his failure to discern or appreciate or estimate the significance of the Lord's body.

(3) 1Co_12:13. 'We were all made to drink of one Spirit.' This probably refers to the gift of the Holy Ghost in Baptism, though the use of the word 'drink' has led some to refer it to such a gift in Communion.

4. Heb_13:8-16.—The starting-point in this passage is the assertion in Heb_13:8 of the unchangeableness of Christ: 'Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, and to-day, yea and for ever.' From this is derived the thought of Heb_13:9, that since Christ, the centre of Christian life, is unchangeable, Christian belief must have stability and consistency. Hence 'divers and strange teachings,' such as those in Judaistic forms of Christianity, and the externalities to which Judaizing teachers would have led Christians, are to be avoided; and the power that stabilises the heart is to be sought in Divine grace. This contrast leads on to Heb_13:10, the point of which is to emphasize the sharp line which divides Christianity from Judaism; since Christians 'have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle.' Heb_13:11-12 pass on to the likeness between the Jewish sacrifices and the sacrifice of Christ, in that in the former bodies were 'burned without the camp,' and in the latter Christ 'suffered without the gate.' Heb_13:13 notes the conclusion from the sacrifice of Christ that it is right for Christians to abandon what is distinctively Jewish. Heb_13:14 takes up the frequently-implied thought of this Epistle, that the old covenant is earthly, and that the new covenant, both now on earth and in its future perfection, is heavenly. The Christian gets beyond the old earthly covenant. He reaches the new heavenly covenant in the city of the living God, which on earth he does not realize as an abiding possession, though even now he has the life of Christ which makes his citizenship, and through which he is eventually to reach perfect holiness and fruition of God. Heb_13:15-16 point out that through Christ Christians can offer up to God a 'sacrifice of praise,' and that with this are to be associated the 'sacrifices' of doing good and communicating, with which 'God is well pleased.' These two verses, then, describe the worship and life of Christians as being a sacrificial offering to God. The Epistle as a whole regards the heavenly centre of this earthly worship and life as being the high-priestly work of our Lord in heaven. If the 'altar' mentioned in Heb_13:10 is the altar of the Eucharist, this implies that the earthly centre of the sacrificial worship and life of Christians is in the Eucharist. This would be in harmony with the traditional Christian view of the Eucharist as the means whereby Christians enter into and partake of the heavenly offering of Christ. The interpretations of the word 'altar' which need be mentioned are that it denotes (1) Christ Himself, (2) the cross of Christ, (3) the altar of the Christian Church. Any one of these three interpretations would give a good meaning to the verse. It might be truly said that the Jews have no participation in Christ, or in His cross, or in the Christian altar. But the use of the word 'eat' makes it difficult to suppose that a reference to the Eucharist was not at any rate included by the writer. Thus there is the idea of the priesthood of Christ as an abiding priesthood, and the sacrifice of Christ as an abiding and continually pleaded sacrifice in heaven, and of the Eucharist as the means of entering into and pleading that heavenly sacrifice on earth, and as the earthly centre of the sacrificial worship and life of Christians.

5. Rev_5:6.—'A lamb standing as slain.' The offering of our Lord's living ('standing') created human nature ('lamb'), which had passed through death ('as slain'), is here represented as the centre of the heavenly worship. This passage, therefore, has an indirect relation to the Eucharist as the corresponding earthly centre (see above on Heb_13:8-16).

6. Summary.—The results of the exegesis of the NT passages relating to the Eucharist may be summed up as follows: (1) In the reception of Holy Communion there is a gift of Christ's body and blood to sustain and increase His life in those who receive it. (2) The consecrated elements are the spiritual body and blood of the risen and ascended Christ. (3) Those who receive the communion grow thereby in that living union with Christ which their baptism conferred. (4) The feast of communion is also a sacrificial presentation of Christ. (5) It is important to observe that the tradition found in the teaching of the writers of the Church corroborates what is thus seen to be taught in the NT.

Literature.

Introductory.—The Lord's Supper has been for centuries, and is to-day, a theological storm-centre; though the blasts have shifted, recent critical scholarship having occasioned a new incidence of forces. Former controversies raged round the meaning of the institution. At present the discussion is even more vital, for it is a matter not of interpretation only, but of the trustworthiness of the sources. The Gospels as they now stand are said to owe so much to the thought and practice of the growing Church, that it is necessary to read between the lines in order to detect the simple form of the Eucharist on the day of its first celebration, when 'it signified rather the abrogation of the old worship and the near approach of the Kingdom than the institution of a new worship.' It is denied that Jesus, with His views as to the speedy consummation of His Kingdom, could have instituted the Supper as a perpetual memorial of His death; and the connexion in the Gospels between the Last Supper and the Passover is regarded as a later overlying deposit, which can be easily detached from the primitive stratum. To take an example, Jesus is supposed to have uttered the words of the Supper recorded in the Gospels on the impulse of the moment. Feeling Himself already victor over death and the world, He wishes to inspire His disciples with His own conviction, and by an act of vivid imagination conceives Himself as already dispensing the blessings of the completed Kingdom, their simple farewell meal having been transformed into the great Messianic banquet of the future, which commonly served as a figure for the joys of Messiah's sovereignty. Professor Gardner is even more drastic in his treatment of the Gospel tradition, eliminating all evidence except that of St. Paul, who, he thinks, was the real originator of the rite, having 'turned a pagan ceremony to Christian use' in a moment of ecstasy under the influence of what he had seen of the Greek mysteries in Corinth.

But the great majority of impartial scholars who have discussed the question do not adopt such a highly critical attitude towards the narratives of the institution of the Supper, or reverse so completely the ordinarily accepted views as to its origin and purpose. No sufficient treatment of the Lord's Supper can pass in silence these problems which have been raised with great learning and acuteness, but they must be discussed in relation to the method of Jesus the Messiah, who brings Israel to its fulfilment.

1. The Sacramental in Hebrew worship.—The term 'sacrament' denotes an outward and visible sign of an invisible spiritual reality. By means of symbol, which is metaphor transformed into action or concreteness, truth is conveyed to the participants in a sacrament much more readily than by the bare word. Language conveys truth, but symbol does what language cannot compass. The worship of the OT was full of the symbolic, for it is almost certain that the cultus was in its essence no arbitrary prescription of meaningless forms. The sacrificial system was held to be a means of grace, of Divine appointment, whereby the worshipper could approach Jehovah. It must have been educative, so that the obedient and lealhearted Israelite became in the actual observance more receptive of moral and spiritual truth. In that sense the sacrificial system of Israel was truly sacramental. But whether the average Hebrew recognized the sacramental character is doubtful, for the great prophets constantly warn the people that the mere ritual performance of sacrifice is inefficacious. Some, especially the earlier prophets, often seem to disparage offerings entirely, as though the only worship with which Jehovah is well pleased is the spiritual service of moral character and a contrite heart. And yet the prophets employ symbolic action again and again in the service of an ideal spirituality, so that in itself symbol has been a widespread and perfectly legitimate means of grace. The transcendental element in worship, however brightly or faintly the contemporary life of Israel may have been illumined by the spiritual truth of the prophets, had all but vanished from the official Judaism of our Lord's day. There was no open vision. No prophet or seer was abroad in the dull day of rationalism. Heroic faith had been displaced by a shrewd but commonplace conduct. The Law had come in alongside Temple service, and ritual was observed as an ordinance. The average Jew, having become a deist, could not feel sky, earth, and sea palpitate with the Divine Spirit, and so was impervious to sacramental conceptions (W. P. Paterson, art. 'Sacrifice' in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iv. 341; Bousset, Rel. des Judenthums, pp. 182-184). It was to the 'poor of the land' who cherished the prophetic ideal that the parabolic, the sacramental, the symbolical in the teaching of Jesus would appeal.

2. The Method and Teaching of Jesus.—The Gospel narratives represent the Supper as a solemn final act in the life of the Messiah. But the Messiah of their delineation is a Person of startling originality. He penetrates through the crust of unimaginative moralism to the living prophetic stream which in His day found its way to the surface only in tiny rivulets. On His own authority He claims, while purifying and enlarging the hopes of prophecy, to fulfil all that was truest in the religion of Israel, having accepted in His Temptation the Divine ideal of a Kingdom unalloyed by any earthly aspirations. He discovers and applies to Himself the title 'Son of Man,' and in virtue of His position inaugurates changes in religion which constitute a breach with the past, for His doctrine concerning worship, foreshadowed by the prophets, antiquates bloody sacrifices and opaque ritual. To say that Jesus could not have instituted the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, because He looked for a speedy realization of the Kingdom, is to deny that He had the complete vision of the destiny of the Servant of the Lord whose function is assumed by the Son of Man, whereas it seems certain that He foretold a spiritual inheritance among the Gentiles in return for His faithful service even unto death (Isa 42:1 ff., Isa 52:13 ff., Isa 62:1 ff., Mar 1:11, Luk 4:16-21, Mat 12:18, Mar 10:45). Another unique prophetic ideal was the consummation of the Kingdom in the Day of the Lord. With respect to this also we must assume that Jesus was a creator of spiritual truth, for the consistency of the Synoptic portraiture of Jesus, and the purity of His own views as to His mission, demand that our interpretation of His outlook into the future of the Kingdom should not be limited by the current ideas of Jewish apocalypses, or by the literal symbolism of OT prophecy.

We infer from the Gospels, (1) that before the close of His ministry in Galilee Jesus had looked forward to His death as the goal of His service (Mar 8:31); (2) that this death was to result in the redemption of the new Israel to which the prerogatives of the old would be transferred (Mar 10:45; Mar 12:1-12); (3) that He expected an earthly future for His Kingdom outlasting the earthly Jerusalem, and involving its establishment among the Gentiles (Mar 4:30-32; Mar 12:1-12; Mar 13:10; Mar 13:14 ff., Luk 13:32-35; Luk 21:20-24). No less evident, however, was the inability of the disciples to understand that the road of service even unto death was the road to the crowning glory of the Kingdom. For Him thus steadily to set His face towards Jerusalem, was, they thought, a sheer and fatal fascination (Mar 10:32-34, Luk 18:31 ff.).

Nor is the institution of the sacrament of the Supper inconsistent with the method of Jesus. The day for symbolism was not past, provided the symbolism was adequate; and this Supreme Teacher surpasses all others in the use of parable and symbol. Every meal with His disciples becomes sacramental through its prayer of thanksgiving, a symbol of the spiritual truth that in Him God was giving to the world the food that was real indeed (Joh 6:51-58). Nor would such a procedure be altogether strange to men who would remember that in the OT the common meal was the symbol of a completed covenant (Gen 26:30; Gen 31:54, Exo 24:11, 2Sa 3:20; see König, 'Symbols, Symbolical Actions' in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible , Ext. Vol., 171^b). In order to understand the significance of this institution, it must be borne in mind that the disciples had committed all their fortunes to Jesus. Their faith had been for them a heroic venture, and the death of the Messiah meant little less than His desertion of them. That night, death like a dark shadow hovering over them was forcing their loved one within its portal. They could not see that a glorious light was shining on His back, that He was in reality an angel of blessing. They needed a pledge of love significant of the future and yet full of tender memories. This the Lord's Supper becomes to them. That it was a mark of supreme wisdom thus to perpetuate the significance of His death for the completion of His Kingdom in concrete symbolism, is evident from their misinterpretation of their Lord's promise as to the future of His Kingdom on earth and His own return; but we are led to expect only such words and symbolic action as would illuminate the spiritual idea of the Kingdom; not precepts and ritual ordinance for its external organization.

3. Passover Eve.—Jesus came into Jerusalem on the morning of the first day of the week, and for several days escaped the plots of His enemies. But Judas entered into a conspiracy with the chief priests apparently two days before 'the Passover and the feast of unleavened bread' (Mar 14:1; Mar 14:10-11). Ignorant of this accomplished treachery, the other disciples, observing that Jesus has as yet made no arrangement for the celebration of the feast, say unto Him 'on the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover, Where wilt thou that we go and make ready that thou mayest eat the Passover?' (Mar 14:12). Now we are embarked upon a sea of difficulties. The Gospels separate very distinctly—the Synoptics on the one side, the Fourth on the other. Did Jesus eat the regular Passover with His disciples, or did He not? At first sight the Synoptic Gospels seem to say that He did. But, according to John, Jesus died on the afternoon when the Passover lamb was slain (Joh 13:1; Joh 13:29; Joh 18:28).

(a) The Synoptic Gospels.—(α) Evidence that the last meal was eaten at the conclusion of the regular Passover meal is offered by Mar 14:12; Mar 14:14, Mat 26:17-19, Luk 22:7-8; Luk 22:11; Luk 22:15-16, the last verses laying especial stress upon the desire of Jesus to eat this Passover with His disciples. Many features of the meal also suggest the Passover,—the family group with Jesus presiding, the prayers of thanksgiving, the cups (Luk 22:17; Luk 22:20), the breaking of the bread, the solemn demeanour, the exposition, the conclusion with a hymn.

(β) But the Synoptics contain hints that the Supper was not a regular Passover meal. It is stated in Mar 14:1-2, that two days before the feast the priests resolved to capture Jesus, and to execute Him before any sympathizers among the populace could interfere; and, since nothing is said to the contrary, it is reasonable to conclude that the purpose was carried out. It would appear that, according to contemporary Jewish practice, Passover, the 14th Nisan, was spoken of as the beginning of the feast Mazzoth, though originally Unleavened Bread began on 15th Nisan (Wellhausen, Evangelium Marci, 115; Schürer, ThLZ [Note: hLZ Theol. Literaturzeitung.], 1st April 1893, col. 182; as against Chwolson in Das letzte Passamahl). But only work necessary for preparing food was permitted from sunset on the 14th to sunset on the 21st, and it would have been illegal or contrary to custom to arrest Jesus that night with swords and staves, to hold a meeting of the Sanhedrin, to release a prisoner, to purchase grave-clothes, and to take the dead body down from the cross, if He ate the regular Passover meal on Thursday evening Nisan 14. Further, there is no mention in the Synoptic narrative of their eating the lamb (Jewish Encyc. x. art. 'Passover'). Jesus died on a Friday, so that we may probably assume from Mar_14:1-2 that Passover (Nisan 14) fell on the Sabbath, which began on Friday at sunset. Nevertheless the preponderating impression of the Synoptic Gospels is certainly in favour of this meal having been related in some way to the Passover feast. It is distinctly so stated, and it is difficult to suppose that there were not good grounds in the primary sources for such united testimony.

(b) The Fourth Gospel.—From Joh_18:28 we must infer that Jesus died on the afternoon before Passover—'between the two evenings' (Deu_16:6). This inference is so strongly reinforced by Joh_13:1; Joh_13:29, that Dr. Hort, with whom Dr. Sanday and Mr. C. H. Turner agree, believes that the Fourth Evangelist is silently correcting a false impression left by the Synoptists (Expos. iv. v. [1892] p. 182; Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible i. 411^a). On the other side see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, Bk. v. ch. x.). St. John neither here nor elsewhere refers directly to the institution of the Supper, but in Joh_6:53-59 his conception of the truth that underlies the Sacrament is set forth in the conversation of Jesus. He states that the miracle of the feeding of the 5000 took place at Passover time (Joh_6:4, so true reading), probably seeing in it a figure of the Christian Passover. Notwithstanding, therefore, his fixing of the day of our Lord's death before the regular Passover, there is good ground for holding that he implicitly relates the Last Supper to the Passover (Westcott, St. John, pp. 96, 113; Holtzmann, NT Theol. ii. 503; Wendt, St. John's Gospel, 137-139). See, further, artt. Dates, vol. i. p. 413 ff., Last Supper, Passover (II.).

(c) The Apostle Paul.—Though 1Co_5:7-8 is often interpreted so as to make St. Paul agree with the Fourth Evangelist, that Jesus died when the lambs for the feast were slain, it is very doubtful whether this idea was in his mind. He is comparing the Christian life with the old Passover upon which the Feast of Unleavened Bread followed (Exo_12:19; Exo_13:7). So now, since the Christian Passover has begun through the sacrifice of Christ, all impurity must be removed from their lives. Perhaps 1Co_10:1-2; 1Co_10:6; 1Co_10:15-16 have the imagery of the Passover; 'the cup of blessing' (1Co_10:16) was one of the most sacred elements of the Paschal meal

The figure of 1Co 5:7-8 may refer to an actual celebration of the Christian Passover in the Corinthian Church, for we know that in the middle of the 2nd cent. Easter was the most important annual festival of the Catholic Church, and there is no evidence of its having been introduced after the Apostolic age. The great Quartodeciman controversy (c. 165 a.d.) was not concerned with doctrinal differences, but with the date on which the universal Christian feast was to be held—whether the Jewish date, Nisan 14, or the Sunday of Easter week. No inference can be drawn from it as to the connexion between the Eucharist and the Passover, inasmuch as the Christian Passover was not a memorial of the Passover only, but of redemption in which Christ's death and resurrection both were the essential factors. The Supper would be at most one element in the celebration, and possibly had little direct Paschal significance. The Church of the last half of the 2nd cent. assumed that there was agreement among the four Evangelists with regard to the time of Christ's death, and apparently accepted the Synoptic chronology, Origen and Eusebius making definite attempts to bring Jn. into conformity with the other Gospels. Zahn, however, holds that the Quartodecimans interpreted the latter in accordance with the former (Gesch. NT Kan. i. 1. 191). For a fuller discussion, with older literature, see Zahn, op. cit. i. 1. 180-192; J. Drummond, Character and Authorship of Fourth Gospel, 444-513; Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, 173-197; Preuschen in PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologie und Kirche.] ³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] xiv. 725-734 takes a different view.

The easiest explanation of this conflicting evidence is that Jesus did not eat the regular Passover feast with His disciples, but that He did eat a meal by anticipation on Nisan 13, the night before the regular Jewish celebration, which was in some sort a keeping of the Passover by this little group (but see Robinson, art. 'Eucharist' in Encyc. Bibl. i. § 3). The words of Jesus in Luk 22:15-16 become intelligible when we remember what the Passover meant, and also His method in promulgating His Kingdom. Passover was the greatest national feast, gathering into itself whatever was most sacred in the religious life of Israel. It was the memorial of national redemption. Through its families—each a part of the larger whole—Israel entered annually into renewed covenant relationship with Jehovah, who had graciously preserved and ransomed the people. It was a sacrificial feast allied with the shelamim or peace-offerings. The sprinkled blood denoted atoning efficacy (v. Orelli, 'Passah,' in PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologie und Kirche.] ³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] xiv.; art. 'Passover' in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. and in Jewish Encyc.). Now Israel is on the point of being transformed. A new redemption is to be completed. Jerusalem and the Temple, with its bloody sacrifices and ritual worship, are soon to disappear. But while the Messiah is abrogating the letter of the old, He fulfils its spirit. He is supplying new wine-skins for the new wine. Just as He has provided the new Israel with a new conception of worship (Mat 6:1-18, Joh 4:21-24), a new standard of righteousness (Mat 5:17-48), and a reinterpretation of the Sabbath (Mar 2:23-26; Mar 3:1-5), so now He transfigures, while yet He preserves the identity of, the central institution of Israel's national life. By 'a masterpiece of practical skill as a teacher' Jesus enshrines, in this symbolic action, for the spiritual representatives of the new Israel, the memory of its ransom through the death of Messiah, whereby a new covenant relationship with Jehovah is possible.

We read in Matthew and Mark that, during a meal, Jesus took bread and brake it. Possibly it was one of the unleavened cakes used at the Feast, though the foregoing discussion renders unnecessary any attempt to fix this action into the order of the regular Passover. The procedure was peculiarly solemn, with an added gravity, because for the first time, a few moments before, Jesus had announced that one of the little group was a traitor (Luk 22:21-23, which puts this after the narrative of the Supper, is probably a displacement). Ruin without, treachery within, the disintegration of the brotherhood may well have seemed to have already begun, and collapse was staring them in the face. Nothing but the serene assurance of Jesus could brace them against such disaster. Like a father presiding at a family meal, He rallies them, in full view of His own death, by such a thanksgiving as they had often heard from Him before (Mat 14:19; Mat 15:36, Joh 6:11). There is no suggestion here of exaltation or ecstasy. His demeanour is that of confidence, subdued by sorrow for His betrayal and the hatred of His enemies. The presumption from the order of Mar 14:18-21 and Joh 13:21-30 is against the traitor having remained throughout the Supper.

(a) The common underlying Tradition.—The action of Jesus in solemnly breaking bread and handing it to His disciples must mean that His body is likewise to be broken, destroyed by men; but, when assimilated by His disciples, He in His complete Person will become their spiritual food. It is parabolic, or rather, it may be illustrated by the allegories of the Fourth Gospel, as e.g. Joh 15:1, where Jesus claims to be ‘most really and yet not materially the true vine’ (Westcott). Quite apart from the question of its historical value, the discourse of Jesus in Joh 6:47-59 may be used to illuminate this procedure, because the same truth is expressed in Jn. in words as in the Lord’s Supper by words and symbol.

The second part of the Supper is another solemnly acted allegory. Old is passing over into new. At Sinai sprinkled blood had ratified a covenant (Exo 24:4-8). Jeremiah, all but submerged in the flood which was carrying on its surface the fragments of the old system, sees like a rainbow of hope the new covenant which, with its promise of forgiveness of sins, was to be established on a perfect knowledge of God; and later came the profound truth that this new covenant between God and man could be inaugurated only by the death of the Servant of the Lord, whose sufferings would bring salvation to the whole world (Isa 42:6; Isa 49:8; Isa 52:13-15; Isa 53:11-12; see Kautzsch, ‘Religion of Israel,’ in Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible, Extra Vol. 708).

The new covenant is about to be ratified by Messiah’s blood. The many are to be ransomed (Mar 10:45), these representatives of the true Israel being but the first to appropriate the benefits of the new covenant. Parabolic or symbolic this meal was, but both parts do not convey the same truth. The first action is a vehicle for the truth that Jesus Himself will continue to be for His disciples their heavenly food unto eternal life; the second that, in virtue of Messiah’s death, salvation from sin is possible through the covenant grace of God. To attribute the conception of the second half of the institution, as it is recorded in Mk., to the influence of Pauline thought, is to do injustice to the fact that its roots are deeply imbedded in OT prophecy, although, like many other ideas, its flower first appears in the teaching of Jesus.

His closing words have a future outlook. Death will end in victory, and when the Day of the Lord shall usher in the Kingdom, He will again hold fellowship with His disciples at the eternal Messianic banquet. That Day began to come with power as the Spirit-filled Church received the Gentiles for her inheritance, and the eagles gathered upon the carcass of official Judaism.

(b) Differences in detail.—The records, as preserved in the Textus Receptus, divide into two types—Mark-Matthew and Luke-Paul. In the shorter recension of Luke, to be referred to later, there is an independent narrative. We begin with the Markan tradition, reproduced mainly in Matthew, as the earliest source.

(i.) Mark-Matthew.—The words ‘take (eat)’ may perhaps be intended to emphasize the representative action of the disciples. As those who are to sit on twelve thrones, they are not eating a common meal but accepting this blessing for Israel. Some justification of this view may be found in the fact that in Luke and Paul the addition ‘which is (given or shed) on your behalf’ is qualified by the words ‘do this in remembrance of me,’ whereas in Mk.-Mt., which omit this injunction altogether, the words run ‘which is shed for many,’ as though the meal had a wider reach than an ordinary supper. The omission from Mk.-Mt. of the command to repeat the meal as a memorial is the most remarkable difference between the two sources for the Supper. Mt. differs from Mk. in minor points, the most important being the addition of the words ‘unto remission of sins,’ which may have been a current or ritual interpretation, but in any case merely render explicit the idea of the new covenant (Jer 31:34).

(ii.) Luk 22:15-20.—The difficulties of the text are such that so far no final decision has been reached with regard to them, some scholars indeed thinking that the textual problem is involved in the Synoptic problem. The evidence is as follows: (1) The Textus Receptus is supported by \aleph ABCL. (2) Old Latin be (k defective) have the order Luk 22:16; Luk 22:19 a, (καὶ λαβὼν ἄρτο ... τὸ σῶμά μου) Luk 22:17-18, and omit Luk 22:19 b, Luk 22:20. Old Syriac (Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} and Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{cur}) agree in the main with old Latt., though with interpolations. Their order is Luk 22:16; Luk 22:19; Luk 22:17-18; Luk 22:21. ‘And he took bread and gave thanks for it and brake it and gave and said: This is my body which is for you (Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} + ‘is given’): do this in remembrance of me. And (Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} ‘after they had supped’) he took a cup and gave thanks over it and said: Take this and share it among yourselves (Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} + ‘this is my blood of the new covenant'). I say to you that from this time on I shall not drink of this growth of the vine (Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin 'fruit') until the kingdom of God comes.' The Pesh. omits Luk 22:17-18; Egyp. [Note: Egyptian.] omits Luk 22:16-18; Marcion omits Luk 22:16; Luk 22:18-19 b, and after Luk 22:19 a comes the cup, but there is only one. (3) D [Note: Deuteronomist.] a ff2 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] i l omit Luk 22:19 b and Luk 22:20. Hort, with whom Nestle agrees, is strongly of opinion that Luk 22:19 b, Luk 22:20 were not part of the original text of Luke. Weiss, Schürer, Zahn, and others also believe in a shorter text, but Zahn looks to the oldest versions rather than to D [Note: Deuteronomist.] a, etc., for the proper order. Their testimony is uniform for the order of Mk.-Mt.-Paul (for 1Co 10:16 even with the Didache can hardly, in the face of 1Co 11:24, be cited for primitive practice) and for only one cup. However, Mark and Paul seem to have influenced the oldest Syriac directly, in its additions 'this is my blood,' etc., and the command for repetition. If the longer text be accepted, as it is by many scholars, the mention of the two cups may be due to the recapitulatory propensity of Luke (Thayer), or the first cup may signify the close of the Old Covenant in the last Passover (Luk 22:16-18), while the second cup belongs to the New Covenant (Luk 22:19 a, 20). In favour of the latter view it may be observed that 'a cup' occurs in Luk 22:17, but in Luk 22:20 'the cup,' as though well known in the Church (Holtzmann). There is, however, other evidence in this chapter of unsuitable order if not disarrangement, as e.g. Luk 22:18; Luk 22:21-23, where a change of position would fit the narrative better: and if Joh 13:1-30 may be taken as a guide, it would seem that Luk 22:24-27 should come before the institution of the Supper. Hence Hort's excision of Luk 22:19 b, Luk 22:20 is as yet the simplest solution of the difficulty. In that case Luke did not intend to give the detailed account of the institution of the Supper, but rather its meaning. Whatever the original order may have been, there can be no doubt that he desires to lay stress on the Paschal character of the meal. The old dispensation is closing. For the last time Jesus hands His disciples the Passover cup: in the coming Kingdom He will provide for them a heavenly vintage (cf. Joh 15:1). (See Hort, 'Notes on Select Readings,' p. 63 f.; Nestle, Textual Crit. of Gr. Test. p. 276 f.; Zahn, Einl. in d. NT, ii. 357 ff.; Sanday, Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible ii. 636; Plummer, St. Luke, 496).

(iii.) Paul.—1Co 11:23-26 is evidently drawn upon by the author of the longer account of the Supper in Luke. The Apostle gives unimpeachable authority for his view of the Supper, claiming that he had a revelation from the Lord, though it is highly probable that he derived it indirectly through the Apostles (ἀπό seems to involve a remote source; see Schmiedel, Hand-Com. ii. 162). Of the variations from Mk.-Mt. the most important are the repetition of 'Do this in remembrance of me,' and the change of 'This is my blood of the covenant' into 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood': while the common Synoptic prophecy of Jesus that He will drink the new fruit of the vine in the Kingdom with His disciples, gives way to a Pauline interpretation of the forward aspect of the Supper—‘ye proclaim the Lord’s death till he come.’

In 1 Cor. the subject is introduced incidentally. There is no formal description of the first Supper, with full historical detail. The narrative is intended to correct abuses among light-hearted Greeks, who seem to have degraded the Supper to the level of their former heathen club-banquets (συσσίτια, ἕρῳνοι). They had few such sacred associations as the Jews, whose annual Passover was a valuable discipline in reverence for Jehovah their Redeemer. These Corinthians had poor ideas of the awful cost of their redemption, when they failed to recognize the meaning of this memorial of Christ’s redeeming death, and by their selfish party-spirit profaned the Lord’s Supper, instituted as it was at such a time as the night on which preparations for His betrayal were being matured (παρεδίδετο). The rite as described here is essentially the same as in the Gospels; but in the Gospels we have the historical account of its creation; while 1 Cor. describes an ideal celebration for the Christian brotherhood.

According to 1Co 11:23-26, the ruling idea of the Supper is the symbolical display of redemption through the death of our Lord, and the same conception, under the figure of the Christian Passover, is involved in 1Co 5:7. Another truth also underlying 1Co 11:23-26, but especially taught in 1Co 10:16-22, is that all those who partake of the spiritual food and drink in this Sacrament are brought into fellowship with Christ Himself, and are thus united into one body (1Co 10:3-4; 1Co 10:16-17).

(iv.) The Fourth Gospel.—Though the institution of the Supper is not found in Jn., the final discourses of Jesus (13-17) are coloured with the thought of it and of the love-feast, like brilliant clouds irradiated by the sun which they hide. It is in a measure true to say that, while the Synoptists are concerned with the Supper, St. John lingers upon the memory of the love-feast, for the conversations have the one great theme fittingly introduced by the deed of humility on the part of Him who having loved His own, loved them unto the end. He had exhibited the new law of love of which His death would be the crowning expression, and He becomes at once their example and their Sanctifier (see esp. ch. 17). The Evangelist, as we have seen, seems to correct the Synoptists as to the day of Christ’s death, but he relates the discourse of ch. 6 to the Passover, and in the theme he agrees substantially with them, for the words ‘this is my body ... this is my blood,’ with their symbolic accompaniments, find an excellent interpretation in Joh 6:41-58, which can hardly be dissociated from the later institution of the Supper (see Westcott, St. John, 113; Holtzmann, NT Theol. ii. 501-503; Loisy, Quatrième Evangile, 702-722, 760, 811).

Results.—(a) The Lord’s Supper was instituted by Jesus as a perpetual memorial of His death. It is true that the words ‘Do this in remembrance of me’ do not occur in the oldest tradition, and may, perhaps, in their present form be traceable to St. Paul; but it is incredible that he should have originated this sacrament, and that it should have been adopted from him by the Jewish Christians. The ordinance was in existence among the Jerusalem Churches before his conversion, and the symbolism and narrative which he received must have been invested with a peculiar sacredness, for, as preserved in the written Petrine source (Mark) at least twenty years later, while different and distinctly more original, they are essentially the same. It is difficult to see how the early Christians would have turned every meal into a commemoration of their Lord's death without His command, for even after the death they failed for a while to understand its full significance. After Pentecost they might have found their meals to be symbols of His perpetual presence to nourish them, but that they should have combined with this the necessity of His death, which remained a solemn mystery, would be inexplicable except under the example and instruction of their Lord.

(b) The Evangelical records relate the Supper to the Passover either directly or indirectly, but no such transformation of the original feast as we find in the Supper would have been made by the primitive Church, which remained thoroughly Jewish, except under the guidance of Jesus.

(c) Like all other teaching of Jesus, this does not prescribe new ritual dependent for its validity upon a set of fixed terms. Possibly freedom was allowed even with regard to the order of the action (see shorter text of Luke, 1Co_10:16 and Didache): certainly the spirit was not to be enslaved by an inerrant repetition of sacred words. Complete verbal accord is not to be found in the records, nor even in St. Paul is there a fixed liturgical formula such as might be repeated by a presiding officer; but the import of the Supper was preserved and conveyed mainly by a generally uniform Christian practice.

(d) The Lord's Supper was a 'visible word' conveying the truth of the awful mystery of Redemption. Until He came, however long or short might be the interval, His followers, Jew and Gentile, would in this acted parable read their Master's mind in regard to His death, the culmination of His service of love on their behalf. 'The Passion of Christ was itself a sacrament or mystery of an eternal truth: it was the supreme sacrament of human history: the outward and visible sign of a great supra-temporal fact' (W. R. Inge, Contentio Veritatis, p. 298; see also art. Fellowship, § ii.).

5. The Apostolic Church

(a) The Jewish-Christian Community.—‘To break (or ‘the breaking of’) bread’ (κλᾶν—ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου) is almost a formula in the NT (Mar 8:6 ||, Mat 26:26, Luk 24:35, Act 2:42; Act 2:46; Act 20:7; Act 20:11, 1Co 10:16; 1Co 11:24). The term does not seem to have been employed for the ordinary meals of the Jews or their sects in any formal way (see Jer 16:7-8, Lam 4:4). Undoubtedly sacrificial feasts shared in by fellow-worshippers were common not only in heathen circles but among the Jews; they were consecrated by thanksgivings and other religious ritual (Schürer, ThLZ [Note: hLZ Theol. Literaturzeitung.] , 1891, 32), and it would have been quite natural for the Christians thus to associate themselves together; but a widespread religious custom is not sufficient to account for the usage, and its nomenclature among the early disciples. Why was it distinguished from the ‘fellowship’ (κοινωνία) and singled out by a different terminology? Partly because of the memory of their Lord’s constant table-fellowship, to which His thanksgivings, with their intense reality, had given religious significance, but much more because of the Last Supper carrying His command. That Supper made every common meal more sacred. Enshrining the love of their Master in the symbolism of its closing scene, it gave new meaning to the communion of brethren at their common board. It became the source of a renewed joy, and the daily inspiration of a richer hope. So the term ‘breaking of bread’ covers more than the observance of the Eucharist. It designates the meals of which this ordinance formed an integral part, the action of breaking bread, which was the largest factor of their meal, being used to denote the whole feast. We may assume that the disciples followed their Lord’s example, celebrating a love-feast, which would be enriched with memories of their Master and teaching from His nearest disciples, and closing with the more solemn thanksgiving for the broken body and the cup of blessing which Jesus had consecrated.

(b) The Pauline Churches.—There are signs in the letters of St. Paul that there was a widespread doctrine and practice to which his own churches would conform (Rom 6:17), so that his influence over any churches but those of his foundation must not be exaggerated, especially in matters so vital as the sacred observances on which the personal disciples of Jesus would be regarded as primary authorities (cf. 1Co 1:12). Nevertheless the Church underwent a profound change when it passed from Jerusalem and the village churches of Judaea to the large cities of Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece. All ranks now contributed their share to the brotherhood. Thus of necessity the disciples could no longer meet daily, and their regular gatherings were held on the first day of the week (Act 20:7, 1Co 16:2, Rev 1:10). Probably the conduct of the service at Troas (Act 20:7-11) was that of the average Gentile congregation, but little can be gathered from it except that there was a weekly meeting of the church on Sunday night, followed by a common meal, at which, in this case, St. Paul presided, and protracted the discourse till daybreak. The Lord's Supper may have been observed at some time during the common meal.

Thanksgiving was such an outstanding feature of the meal that already in 1Co 10:16 there is mention of 'the cup of blessing which we bless' (some think it is so called in distinction from the cups at heathen banquets), and afterwards the meal is called 'the Eucharist' (Ignat. Philad. 4, Smyr. 6; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 64-66, Trypho, 116, 117). This Supper, originated and presided over by the Lord (τὸ κυριακὸν δεῖπνον), did not owe its validity to any official president or to any Apostolic blessing. It was a celebration of the brotherhood as a whole; indeed, the sacrilege of the Corinthians consisted partly in destroying the bond of love which united into one body the brethren who ate one bread (1Co 10:16 f., 1Co 11:20 ff.). Only brethren seem to have been admitted to the Supper, though unbelievers and strangers attended other gatherings of a hortatory or didactic nature (1Co 14:23). It is noteworthy that the direct references to the Lord's Supper in the epistolary writings of the NT are confined to 1 Cor., so that we may possibly attach a larger importance to the function of the Lord's Supper in the Christian life than the Apostle Paul (see 1Co 1:14-17), though he did undoubtedly regard it as a powerful means of grace (1Co 10:16-21).

(c) The Agape and the Lord's Supper.—While the word 'Agape' occurs only once in the NT (Jud 1:12, for the reading of 2Pe 2:13 is almost certainly ἀγάπαις), there can be no doubt that the common meals of the primitive Christians, and the table-fellowship which the Corinthians abused, answer to the later Agape. A new name was given to what was really a new thing, for there is nothing elsewhere like the spirit of love which called into existence and pervaded the common intercourse of the brotherhood. The occasion for the origin of the name may be found in John 13-16, though the technical term probably did not come into use till long after the brethren had been enjoying the reality.

What did 'the Lord's Supper' (τὸ κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, 1Co 11:20) precisely mean? Was it the concluding part of the Agape, later called the Eucharist, or did it include both the Agape and the Eucharist? Or was the Lord's Supper a distinct Eucharistic meal separate from the Agape? The decision turns partly on the interpretation of 1Co 11:20. Jülicher is of the opinion that 'the Lord's Supper' was quite unlike all other congregational gatherings, and holds that St. Paul found fault with the Corinthians because by their greed they turned a meal, which was meant to serve the brotherly unity of the Church, into a means of satisfying their appetites (see Stewart, Expos. July 1898, and also Drews, PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologic und Kirche.] ³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] v. 562 f.). But there are two decisive objections to this view. (α) The Apostle says that the ordinance was instituted ‘after supper’ (μετὰ τὸ δειπνῆσαι, 1Co 11:25). (β) Bread and wine would not occasion the gluttony which he rebukes. It is much more difficult to decide between the other views. Those who hold that the Agape culminated in the Eucharist, and that the whole was called ‘the Lord’s Supper,’ explain that the selfish conduct of the Corinthian cliques rendered impossible any table-fellowship like that of the first Lord’s Supper, when the feast of love culminated in the Eucharist. (Keating, Agape and Eucharist, Appendix B; Robertson in Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible i. 490^b). Perhaps this agrees with the term ‘breaking of bread,’ and the practice as outlined in Acts, but the words of St. Paul seem to separate this part of the feast from the rest. It is a ‘Lord’s meal’ because of the institution by the Lord which he proceeds to relate. ‘It is impossible for you to eat a real Lord’s Supper when you have acted so disgracefully in the Agape.’ Further, the institution ‘after supper,’ and the subsequent history of the ordinance, seem to be most easily explained on this view. (Weizsäcker, Apost. Age, English translation vol. ii. 283 ff.; Zahn, ‘Agapen,’ in *PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologie und Kirche.]*³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] i. 236 f.). The abuses which led eventually to a separation of the Agape from the Eucharist were abundant in Corinth, though the process of dissociation proved to be slow, and varied in different localities.

6. The sub-Âpostolic Church

(a) Clement of Rome.—To counteract the disturbances resulting from the Corinthian rivalries, Clement urges the necessity of order and reverence in the service, which will be effected by every one abiding in his own part (41). The bishops must offer ‘the gifts blamelessly and holily’ (44), i.e. ‘the prayers and thanksgivings, the alms, the Eucharistic elements, the contributions to the Agape, and so forth’ (Lightfoot). His stately prayers and insistence upon orderliness may point to a developing liturgical service, but the epistle sheds no real light upon the place or meaning of the Eucharist in the worship of the Church.

(b) Pliny’s Letter to Trajan (a.d. 112).—This letter is of importance, but raises vexed questions. How far the practice described extended beyond the Church of Bithynia, and the trustworthiness and interpretation of evidence which he drew from apostate Christians, are doubtful. He says: ‘Essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem, seque sacramento non in scelus aliquod obstringere, sed ne furta, ne latrocinia, ne adulteria committerent, ne fidem fallerent, ne depositum appellati abnegarent: quibus peractis morem sibi discedendi fuisse, rursusque coeundi ad capiendum cibum, promiscuum tamen et innoxium’ (Ep. 96. 7).

Just what is involved in the word sacramentum has divided scholars. Lightfoot (Ign. i. 50 ff.) and Ramsay (*Ch. in Rom. [Note: Roman.] Empire*³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , 219 f.) believe that the Eucharist and the Agape were separated at this time, and that the social meal, which was held in the evening, had been repressed in accordance with the Roman Imperial policy against associations (Keating, 54 ff.). Weizsäcker is not very clear (op. cit. ii. 249, 285), but Zahn (*PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologie und Kirche.]*³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] i. 236, art. 'Agapen') and J. A. Robinson (Encyc. Bibl., 'Eucharist,' § 17) are unwilling to draw such a conclusion. Possibly the abolition of the Agape was local and temporary (Mayor, Clem. of Alexandria, Strom. vii. 376 ff.). In any case, undue emphasis should not be placed upon the Imperial policy as a uniform influence, for there were other contributory local forces at work, introducing changes into worship; and when Ignatius wrote, the Eucharist and the Agape were still united 'in some parts of Asia Minor, and probably at Antioch' (Light-foot).

(c) The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.—The uncertainty of the date and local origin of the Didache renders its witness doubtful. Quite different in tone from Paul, and not influenced directly, it would appear, by John, it may be taken as a type of widespread Jewish Christian life within the limits of Palestine, and possibly Egypt, about the end of the 1st century. The Supper, called 'the Eucharist,' and associated with 'the breaking of bread,' is mentioned in chapters 9, 10, and 14. The Eucharist is not yet separated from the Agape, if, indeed, they are not identical, for the latter is not mentioned, though some take ch. 9 to contain the closing prayers of the Agape, and ch. 10 those of the Eucharist (Zahn, Weizsäcker, Weiss, Loofs). It is held on the Lord's Day, and is preceded by confession, for only pure hearts make praise and thanksgiving possible. The order, as in the shorter form of Luke, is cup and bread; but nothing is said as to the method of celebration, except that, while a set form of prayers is given for ordinary use, prophets are allowed freedom. There is no sign of a priest, and the celebration is the common act of the whole Church. Only the baptized are to partake of the Eucharist, which is that holy thing that cannot be given to the dogs, though not because the Eucharistic elements are regarded as conveying some mysterious power, or are, in any sense, sacrificial; for there is not much advance on Rom. 12:1.* [Note: 'εὐχαριστία in Christian usage has two concrete senses besides the abstract sense: (1) a thanksgiving in words, and (2) a thanksgiving in offerings; and in early times it appears to denote always the offering or thing offered itself, not the ceremony or service, or the institution' (Hort, JThSt, vol. iii. 595).]

The Didache is mystical, like the Fourth Gospel. Life and knowledge come through the appropriation of Jesus Christ as Messiah, but no reference is made to redemption through His blood. A unique figure—that of the grains of wheat being brought together to form one loaf—is applied to the sanctification of the Church in a unity. Thanks are given for knowledge of God, for faith and immortality brought through Jesus the Servant, and for daily food, but especially for the spiritual food through Jesus. After the stress of the present evil age, which may soon close with the advent of the Lord, will come the peace of perfect mystical union in the Church of the completed Kingdom (Bartlet, ‘Didache,’ Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible , Extra Vol. 439 ff.; Drews in Neutest. Apokryphen, 182-188).

(d) Ignatius.—The Lord’s Supper assumes large importance. By a transference of the name for the prayer of thanksgiving to the whole meal it is called ‘the Eucharist’ (Eph. 13, Phil. [Note: Philistine.] 4, Smyr. 6, 8). It is still associated with the Agape (Smyr. 8. 1, 2), and the term ‘breaking of bread’ seems to include both (Eph. 20). His utterances often stand out untuned in the atmosphere of controversy with the Docetists, against whom he is never wearied of insisting upon the reality of the human nature of Jesus Christ which is essential to salvation. Only in the one Church is this full truth preserved, and the Eucharist is the symbol of unity, for there the gifts of salvation which are the full fellowship of life with Christ find fleshly expression. So, to be valid, it must be celebrated by the bishop, who, as opposed to all heretics, performs the sacrament as an act of the Church as a whole. For Ignatius the spiritual supersensible world is intensely real, but it becomes illusory without an earthly or material form, and only through the appropriation of the flesh and blood of Christ do believers enter into mystical union with God. This is most fully realized in the breaking of bread, an action efficacious as an antidote to spiritual death—‘a medicine for immortality’ (φάρμακον ἀθανασίας, Eph. 20). Some hold that Ignatius regards the elements of the Supper as purely symbolic, for in Phil. [Note: Philistine.] 5. 1, the gospel is called ‘the flesh of Jesus’; in Trall. 8. 1, faith is ‘the flesh of the Lord,’ and love is ‘the blood of Jesus Christ’; and in Rom. [Note: Roman.] 7, Ephesians 5, ‘the bread of God’ is an image of the blessings of salvation without any reference to the Lord’s Supper (v. d. Goltz, Ignatius von Antiochien, pp. 72, 73; Lightfoot, Ign. ad Rom. [Note: Roman.] 7; Loofs, PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologic und Kirche.] 3 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] i. 40). Harnack’s most recent view is that in Ignatius, sixty years after St. Paul, the whilom clear theology has become fouled by the Mysteries and their lore (Expansion of Christianity, i. 289). Apparently Ignatius does not think of magical powers as being inherent in material elements, but, influenced by Johannine mysticism, holds that the material forms must be interpreted by a spirit of faith, love, and thanksgiving in order to convey spiritual gifts. Yet he is ambiguous, and his realistic language, partly due to a mind more imaginative than penetrating, opens the door for the cruder conceptions which follow. Perhaps we may go further, and see in his use of the term ‘medicine for immortality’ the first evidence of the later view of Greek theology, which laid the chief stress of redemption rather on the annihilation of physical corruption by the infusion of the Divine Nature of the Son of God, than on spiritual regeneration through the eternal Divine Person. (Lightfoot, Ign. ii. 45, 171, 258; Inge, Christian Mysticism, 257, and Appendix C; Swete in JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] , iii. 168; Sanday, The Fourth Gospel, 241-245).

(e) Justin Martyr.—The ecclesiastical term for the Supper is henceforth ‘the Eucharist.’ Justin makes no mention of the Agape. The Eucharist ceases to be a meal of the congregation and becomes a regular part of the Sunday service, and seems to require the presence of a bishop or some other official for its valid celebration (Apol. i. 65-67). Under the growing tendency towards ritual it began to gather to itself some of the Jewish, or perhaps heathen, sacrificial ideas centring in a special priesthood. Indeed Justin sees in the mysteries of Mithras a demonic imitation of Christian symbolism (Apol. i. 54, 62, 65-67; Dial. c. Trypho, 70, 78). The ideas of Ignatius are in Justin losing their purity. He continues to speak of the Supper as a spiritual life-giving food, but holds that a material change passes upon the elements of the sacrament, so that they nourish our bodies and make them incorruptible, the Logos becoming united by the Eucharistic prayer with the bread, as He took flesh and blood when He became incarnate in Jesus (Apol. i. 66; Loofs, PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologic und Kirche.] ³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] i. 40, 41, 45, 46; Swete, JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] , iii. 169 f.). Harnack put forward a theory that bread and water were the usual elements in the Eucharist at the time of Justin, but it has received little approval, for the most that can be said is that the practice existed among some small sects in Africa (TU [Note: U Texte und Untersuchungen.] vii. 2, 117-144, outlined by Stewart, Expos. July 1898, 43 ff.).

A variety of causes led to the discontinuance of the celebration of the Agape along with the Lord’s Supper. (a) The increase of abuses as they are found already in 1 Cor. and Jude. (b) The growth of the Church in large cities, where it became impossible for the Christians to meet together in house-celebrations. (c) The increasing power of the bishop and clergy, who found in house-gatherings a menace to the unity of the Church, together with the development of the dogma that the presence of a bishop was necessary to make a Supper valid. (d) Charges of child-murder and cannibalism (θ υέστεια δεῖπνα, οἰδιποδείους μίξεις). (e) The enforcement of the Imperial law against associations (see Drews, PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologic und Kirche.] ³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] v. ‘Eucharistie’). The change, already widespread in the time of Justin Martyr, whereby the Supper is definitely called ‘the Eucharist’ and becomes the central part of public service, was of vast consequence, and gradually spread over the whole Church, transforming the conception of worship. In Tertullian’s circle the Eucharist is celebrated in the early morning and the Agape is held in the evening (Apol. 39, de Corona, 3). But authorities differ as to the completeness of the separation at Alexandria in Clement's day, Bigg, e.g., saying that 'the Eucharist was not distinguished in time, ritual, or motive from the primitive Supper of the Lord' (Christian Platonists, 102, 103), while Mayor is doubtful (Clem. Alex. [Note: Alexandrian.] Strom. vii. 382), and Zahn is strongly of the contrary opinion (PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyclopädie für protest. Theologie und Kirche.] ³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] 'Agapen,' 234).

7. The Lord's Supper and the pagan Mysteries.—Dr. Percy Gardner may be taken as a representative of a few scholars who trace the influence of the pagan Mysteries on St. Paul.

'The great difference between the teaching of the Synoptic Jesus on the one hand, and the teaching of Paul, of the Fourth Evangelist, and of the author of Hebrews on the other, is just that the latter is permeated, as the former is not, by the ideas of spiritual communion, of salvation, of justification, and mediation—ideas which had found an utterance, however imperfect, in the teaching of the thiasi.... Christians are, like the Pagan Mystae, called upon to be δσιοι and ἀγιοι. The language of the Pauline and Johannine writings shows the translation of Christianity on to a new level by the reception and baptism into Christ of a set of ideas which at the time, coming from a Divine source, were making their way into the various religions of the human race' (Explor. Evangel. p. 340 ff.). H. J. Holtzmann also holds that in separating the sacrament as a specifically religious act unrelated to the kernel of his gospel, Paul opened the gates to 'mystery' conceptions (NT Theol. ii. 186, 187).

But the sacrament of the Supper was in existence before St. Paul, and its import well established in the Jewish section of the Church before the gospel went to the Gentiles, who for many decades were not sufficiently influential to stamp the sacrament with 'mystery' conceptions even if they had so desired. All this type of thought was alien to the Jewish mind, the only section of the nation that was in sympathy with these ideas being the Essenes, who derived their sacramental meals—in some sort 'mystery' associations—from foreign sources, and they cannot be regarded as a factor in the shaping of the Christian rite (Bousset, Rel. des Judenthums, 431-443). It is quite gratuitous to say that the ideas of spiritual communion, salvation, justification, and mediation are especially Pauline or Johannine. They had, in fact, a long history in Hebrew thought, and while they are frequent in 'mystery' ritual, their import is different. The pagan Mysteries, even in their purest expression, were tainted with the religious conceptions of old nature-worships. Fellowship through sacraments with the Divine was thought to bring an infusion of the subtle material essence of the god, who thus held present communion with the initiated, and vouchsafed immortality to him. This was the result not so much of a moral act of faith as of an impression produced upon the character by the vision of the Divine drams. Contemplation and ecstasy crown the course of the initiated. A rigorous ethical discipline was also required by way of preparation for the vision of the Divine, but inasmuch as the purpose was to free the soul from its prison-house in the flesh, the purification was chiefly of a ceremonial character. The soul cleansed of earthly impurities would ascend after death into final union with the Supreme (see Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, Bk. iv. chs. v. vi.). Of sin in the Christian sense there is little trace in pagan thought. Such sin as the worshipper was freed from in the heathen Mysteries was inherent in him by reason of human frailty, or was an outward taint of the body (Anrich, Das antike Mysterienwesen, 38). When in the 2nd cent. these subtle shades began to colour Christian thought, it was a sign that the full summer was passing.

St. Paul is ruled by the Hebrew idea of sin as it became heightened by the life and death of Jesus. God is for him the supremely moral Person, and sin is treason against His Sovereignty. On His Son, the Redeemer from sin, he lavishes all his loyalty and worship. Indeed, Christ becomes his intimate personal friend and Lord. For him it is Christ to live, which is only another way of saying that Christ is his spiritual food as it is symbolized in the Supper (1Co 10:4; 1Co 10:17). He does not, it is true, lay inordinate emphasis on the celebration of Baptism or the Supper (1Co 1:14-17), but he finds in the common meal of love the most perfect earthly expression of the fellowship of the saints with the Head of the body. The living Christ draws the believers, who have abandoned their former pagan fellowship, into a new communion with Himself. He is the most real of all persons, dwelling in the hearts of a loving company as their thought is focussed upon Him by the symbols of His redemption, and pledged by this memorial of His death to return (see Dobschütz, Probleme d. apost. Zeitalters, 72, 73; Ramsay, Expos., Dec. 1900, Jan. 1901). Even the use by St. Paul of such words as 'mystery' and 'to initiate' (τελειοῦν), 1Co 2:6-7, 2Co 1:22, Php 3:12, hardly justifies the assumption of conscious influence (Heinrici, Com. [1887] zu 2 Kor. 121; Anrich, 112). Nor is there any more reason for discerning 'mystery-doctrine' in John, for the conception of God and of true worship which rules this Gospel is unsurpassed (Joh 4:20-24), while in Joh 6:63 words which might be thought to have a materialistic sense are expressly said to be spirit and life. In the final discourses of Jesus the conditions for receiving the Spirit of Christ are ethical. Those abide in Christ who show their love to Him by obeying His command to love one another. In the First Epistle the final vision of God is promised for the world to come, but only those can know God now who love, and who have had their sins taken away through the Lamb of God who is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (1Jn 2:2, cf. Joh 1:29). 'Faith' in Paul. 'love' and 'knowledge,' almost convertible terms in John, are the subjective conditions for communion with God, who dwells in the individual heart attuned to the loving fellowship of the brotherhood.

It may be partially true to say that without the sacraments Christianity would not have conquered Europe, and yet such a judgment should be qualified by the fact that non-sacramental Judaism was the most effective proselytizer of all the religions of the old world. Widespread as the 'mystery' cults were, the Jews became a church within the Roman Empire, exceeding other foreign worships in numbers, the attention it attracted, and the privileges it extorted from a hostile power. Philo, the only 'mystery' philosopher of the Jews, was an isolated phenomenon (Bousset, op. cit. 78, 79).

Unquestionably, the heathen Mysteries satisfied many deep religious longings. The contemplation of impressive ceremonial and a Divine drama concealed from all but the initiated, the litany, the rhythmic music, appealed to the feeling of the worshipper, and swept him into an attitude of mind in which he enjoyed Divine communion and received a pledge of his immortality. By means of a common meal he entered into mystical union with the god, and began the process of deification through the infusion of the imperishable Divine nature. Degraded though these Mysteries often were by magic and superstition, they were felt by their purest votaries to be the guarantee of salvation here in fellowship with God and of a blessed future life (Anrich, pp. 39, 46, 47; Dill, 609-614). And yet Judaism was the most powerful factor in that religious world, because it satisfied more perfectly than any 'mystery' cult the more insistent ethical and spiritual needs of human nature. But Christianity brought to the world a richer boon than either Judaism or the heathen Mysteries. It offered all that was best both in the Mysteries and in Judaism. By its sacraments it disclosed its 'open secret' to Jew and Gentile; and in these sacraments the believer, as one of a brotherhood of saints, was brought into perfect communion with the eternal God who had redeemed him.

The most sacred symbol of this redemption, 'the core of religious worship,' was the Lord's Supper, and it remained truly symbolic until, after the first decade of the 2nd cent., the stream of Christian life, making its way through pagan soil that was saturated with ideas drained off from mystery practice and thought, began to grow discoloured. How far in the succeeding years there was direct imitation between Christianity and the mystery religions, or how far resemblances were due to ideas that had by a long process of religious development become almost essential to the thought of the early centuries, is a problem that still awaits solution. But it was the Gnostic sects that were first invaded and overcome by distinctly heathen influences. The Christian Church, with its immense reserve of spiritual power, performed a masterly and slow retreat from the more exalted positions of the Apostolic age (Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, i. 285-299; Hatch, Hibbert Lectures, 283-309; Mayor, Clement of Alexandria, ch. iii.; Inge, Christian Mysticism, Lect. ii. and Appendix B; and esp. Dill and Anrich, ut supra).

☛ Lost

LOST.—The word ‘lost’ has come to be invested with a sinister theological significance. A moral sense hopelessly degraded, a sullen abandonment to evil, a persistent closing of the heart, and a future determined beyond the possibility of alteration—are some of the ideas which it compels in the mind. As it fell from Christ’s lips, however, the word did not, as a rule, convey any such harsh suggestions. It was rather a word of infinite pathos and of Divine pity. Used in its Middle voice, the verb ἄπολλυμι denotes irretrievable ruin, as in the great text, Joh_3:16 (cf. also Joh_17:12 ‘None of them is lost, but the son of perdition’; see Judas Iscariot); but as a participle used passively, the form in which we find it in Luk_19:10, and in the group of parables in Luke 15, which bear especially on this subject, it signifies simply a condition of peril, grave, yet with the glad prospect of recovery.

What moral condition of humanity is meant by the word ‘lost’ appears from the character of those to whom Jesus directed His message. Broadly speaking, the society of His day was split up into two classes. There were those who, with the advantage of wealth, or, if wealth were denied them, with praiseworthy self-denial, contrived to satisfy the demands of the Law; and, on a platform infinitely lower, stood those who had neither the will nor the means to bear so heavy and so doleful a burden. These latter comprised the sinners, the lapsed, and those recreant Jews who so far forgot themselves as to take service under the conquering Power. They had no share in Israel's hopes; they had ceased to cherish the ideals of the race. It was precisely to this class, called by the Pharisees in a bitter hour 'an accursed multitude which knoweth not the law' (Joh_7:49), that Christ mainly appealed. He ate and drank with them: He made the conditions of entrance to His Kingdom such as were possible for them all. With a profound sense of what they had missed in life, He summed up their imperfections under this term, 'the lost.' Reviving a beautiful OT figure, He compared them with sheep that had gone astray. If the reality of the case demanded sterner language, His supreme pity covered that fact from His eyes. They were simply 'lost'; and the word, sorrowful as it was, yet with a ring of hope in it, expressed, while at the same time it concealed, the heinousness of their sin. It was a moral condition full of danger, because they acquiesced in it, and were in some measure content to abide under the shadow of the contempt of their fellow-men. It was a condition full of hope, because it was due partly to circumstances that were invincibly against them, and partly to a merely thoughtless divergence from the true way of human life.

But the delicate shades of meaning which Christ imparted to the word may best be appreciated from its use in the trilogy of parables in Luke 15. From there we learn that, however sinister may be the suggestions which the word carries to our minds, it did not, as employed by Christ, indicate any supreme or singular degree of vice. To be lost was to wander, aimlessly and thoughtlessly, or in wantonness and self-will. It was to live in vain, as a coin that lies hidden among the dust; to turn aside from life's true way, and therefore miss life's true end. There is a suggestion in the term of the lost ideals that one used to hold, and of the forlornness of the mind from which those ideals have fled. There is a hint of the entanglement of the wandering soul in influences that hold it back from safety. There is the generous implication that sin is always in a greater or less degree the result of ignorance, of a thoughtless and wild pursuit after unknown pleasures into unknown paths, until the true path is lost to view, and the unhappy wanderer does not know where it lies. The term leaves also upon the mind the impression that to be lost one does not need to wander far. A man need step but a little way aside to find himself among circumstances that stand up about him and shut out the light, and then, equally with him whose 'feet stumble on the dark mountains,' he is lost. But the singular and appropriate beauty of the idea lies in the prospect of recovery which it implies. Whatever is lost may be found, if in its ignorance it cannot find itself. It may be found by him who has lost it, and whose heart, tortured by anxiety and thrilled with exquisite devotion, will carry him in his search over difficult and perilous roads.

☛ Lot

LOT.—The suddenness of the Divine Parousia and the unpreparedness and want of expectation on the part of the world, find illustration from ‘the days of Lot’ (Luk_17:28), when the people of Sodom continued their social and commercial activity until ‘the day that Lot went out’ (Luk_17:29).

Lot’s Wife—to whom in Jewish tradition the name עֲרִיַת Edith is given—is recorded in Genesis 19 to have been turned into a pillar of salt as a result of her looking back upon Sodom while escaping to the mountain. Her fate, as one failing to escape imminent and foretold destruction, is referred to in Luk_17:32, though without specific mention of the form in which destruction overtook her.

Our Lord’s word ‘Remember’ neither confirms nor rejects the tradition. It is with the spiritual fact and its lesson, not with the memorial, that He is concerned. The folly of unreadiness, of the longing for things left behind, of the desire to retain a transient little in the face of impending judgment and at the cost of a greater and eternal loss, is the lesson He would teach in connexion with His Parousia, from the remembrance of Lot’s wife.

☛ Lots

LOTS (Casting of) (λαγχάνω, κλήρον βάλλειν).—Among the Jews the lot was in frequent use (see Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible , art. 'Lots'). It was the recognized method by which the order of service and most of the individual duties of the priesthood were determined. The order of the 24 'courses' or priestly families was arranged by lot. The 'course' to which Zacharias (Luk 1:5-9) belonged was that of Abijah, which stood eighth on the list (1Ch 24:1-19). Each family or 'course' was on duty for a week, from one Sabbath to another, twice a year (2Ki 11:9). The priests from whom the officiating ministers for the service of the day (ἐφημερία) were to be chosen, had to present themselves 'washed' (Exo 40:12-15) before the officer who had special charge of the lots. The lots were cast in the 'Hall of Hewn Polished Stones' in the Temple. The distribution of duties for a day among the priests required that the lot should be cast four times. The priest who had to offer incense was chosen by the third lot. This duty was regarded as one of special honour, and the lot by which it was assigned was cast after prayer and confession. The decision was accepted as indicating the man whom God had chosen to offer the prayers of the people. The third of April or the first week of October is by some reckoned as the time when Zacharias was appointed to offer incense (Luk 1:9). It may have been at the morning or the evening service.

At the Crucifixion the soldiers cast lots for the clothes of Jesus. As they were divided into 'four parts, to every soldier a part' (Joh 19:23), it was evidently a quaternion of soldiers that was on duty. The Synoptists simply record the parting of the garments by lot (Mat 27:35, Mar 15:24, Luk 23:34). In Jn. special reference is made to His 'coat.' It is impossible to say whether the 'coat' was added to one of the four parts, or if a separate lot was cast for it. The precision and detail of the narrative in Jn. have been regarded as proofs that the Fourth Evangelist was an eye-witness of the things which he records. In the casting of the lot for the 'coat' he saw the fulfilment of one of the predicted woes of the Messiah (Psa 22:18). The quotation is in the exact words of the LXX Septuagint . Critical editions of the NT omit the quotation in Matthew.

There is no indication as to the particular method by which the lot was cast in the two incidents in which it is employed in the Gospels.

It may be noted under this heading that the idea of the lot as giving expression to the Divine will runs through all the words which relate to inheritance (κληρονόμω, -ομία, -ονόμος). With this fundamental significance all such words become part of the language of grace. The right of inheritance in the Kingdom of God, or to eternal life, does not spring from legal enactment or personal merit, but from the will of God.

Love

LOVE.—In the word ‘love’ is concentrated, we may say, the essence of the Christian religion. It is love that is the outstanding feature in the revelation Christ has given us of the nature of God, love that is the controlling power in the life of the Son who claimed that he that had seen Him had seen the Father (Joh 14:9). On the two commandments to love God and to love our neighbour, Christ declares that all the Law and the Prophets hang (Mat 22:40). In the commandment to love one another as He has loved them, He sums up the new law which He lays upon His disciples, declaring that by their fulfilment of it the faithfulness of their discipleship shall be known (Joh 13:34 f.). We propose to exhibit from different points of view the place which love holds in the doctrine of Christ.

1. The love of God for man.—It is certainly true, as has been pointed out, that Christ does not, in the Synoptic Gospels, speak directly of the love (ἀγάπη) of God. But if He does not thus expressly predicate love of God, it is because He has already endowed Him, as subject, with this love in the highest degree. The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God, which is the foundation of the whole gospel of Christ, contains within it the fullest recognition of the love of God. If the Apostolic writers of the NT expand with greater fulness the doctrine of the Divine love, they are only making explicit the truth involved in the assurance of the Fatherhood of God set forth on every page of the Synoptic Gospels. The God whose love is the constant theme of St. Paul’s preaching is the Father-God of Jesus Christ (so H. Holtzmann interprets the Pauline formula ὁ θεὸς καὶ πατὴρ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, Neutest. Theol. i. 171). In the one word ‘Abba,’ which Christian lips have learned to repeat after the Master, there lies to St. Paul the assurance of the Divine love which can banish the old feeling of bondage and inspire the spirit of adoption (Rom 8:15). The Johannine doctrine that God is love (1Jn 4:8) is but the statement in abstract terms of the truth to which Christ has given concrete expression in the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God. For it is the love of God that Christ will express by this name which is so constantly on His lips. He speaks of God not only as His own Father (‘My Father’), or as the Father of those who are members of the Kingdom of God (‘your Father’), but as ‘the Father’ absolutely (Mat 11:27, Mar 13:32, Luk 11:13). The title suggests more than the relation in which God stands to mankind as their Creator. In Mat 5:44-48 Christ urges His hearers to become God's sons by showing a love like to that of their Father in heaven, 'for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.' Did Fatherhood mean merely Creatorship, there could be no question of becoming the sons of God. All men are God's creatures. The fact that Christ speaks of our becoming God's sons, proves that He is using the terms 'Father' and 'sons' in an ethical sense. By Fatherhood He indicates the love which God cherishes for men, by sonship the love by which they may prove themselves like in character to this Father whose nature is love. This love suggested by the name 'Father' is the very essence of the Divine nature. It is not merely one among the various attributes of God. It is the supreme and dominating element in the Divine character. It is in it that the Divine perfection lies; and when Christ urges us to be perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect (Mat 5:48), it is evident from the context that it is of the love of God that He is thinking, a fact recognized by Lk., who substitutes 'merciful' for the 'perfect' of Mt.'s version (Luk 6:36).

This love of the Father in heaven is the foundation upon which the gospel of Christ rests. It is all-embracing. God is the Father not only of those who are members of the Kingdom of God, i.e. of those who by the love which animates them prove themselves to be His sons (Mat 5:45), but of all men. The evil as well as the good, the unjust as well as the just, are the objects of His love (ib.); and if the facts to which Christ refers, in this connexion, in proof of the universality of the Father's love, do not go beyond such natural blessings as the sunshine and the rain, that is explained on the ground that these blessings require for their appreciation no special receptivity on the part of those who enjoy them (Beyschlag, Neutest. Theol. i. 81). The Father cares for all. Each individual is precious in His sight. 'It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish' (Mat 18:14). The very hairs of our head are all numbered (Mat 10:30). There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth (Luk 15:7; Luk 15:10). In the fact of God's Fatherhood there lies the assurance that He will certainly give good things to them that ask (Mat 7:11; Mat 18:19), and that He will welcome the penitent sinner who turns to Him (Luk 15:11-32). It is the Father's good pleasure, Christ assures us, to give us the Kingdom (Luk 12:32), that greatest of all blessings, to obtain which a man might well be willing to sacrifice everything else (Mat 13:44-46); and with it He gives us all such material blessings as He sees to be necessary for us (Luk 12:31, Mat 6:33). When we thus gather together the various utterances of Christ with regard to the God whom He reveals to us as Father, when we think of the assurance that name breathes of bountiful providence, of watchful care, of forgiving love, when we remember, above all, how Christ points to the Father's unfailing goodness towards the undeserving as an instance of the Divine perfection, we must confess that though the Synoptic Gospels contain no direct mention of the love of God, the Being whose character the Saviour seeks to reveal to us by that name 'Father' is one whose very nature is love.

In the Fourth Gospel it is the same representation of the nature of God that meets us. Here, too, 'Father' is the favourite designation. It has been questioned, indeed, whether the title 'Father' has the same significance in the Fourth Gospel as in the Synoptics. H. Holtzmann (Neutest. Theol. ii. 433 f.) maintains that in the constantly recurring designation of God as 'the Father' there is always either an express or a tacit reference to the Son. [For a full discussion of the use of the word 'Father' in St. John, see Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, pp. 29-34]. But there are occasions on which we feel that the title is used in a manner which suggests a reflexion on the love of God quite in the manner of the Synoptics, as when Christ says to the disciples that whatever they shall ask the Father in His name He will give (Joh 15:16; Joh 16:23), or when He tells them that He does not say that He will pray the Father for them, for the Father Himself loveth them (Joh 16:26 f.). And in any case the question of the significance attaching to the title 'Father' in the Fourth Gospel is of minor interest in our present inquiry, since that Gospel contains many express declarations of the love of God, the absence of which makes the question of the significance of that title in the Synoptics matter of importance. These express references to the love of God in the Fourth Gospel occur specially in connexion with that aspect of the Divine love which we proceed to consider under the following head.

2. The love of God for man as manifested in Christ.—The highest proof of the Father's love is given in the mission and Person of the Son. This aspect of the Divine love, which is emphasized in the Fourth Gospel, is not unknown in the Synoptics, though it is rather implied than expressed. If the love of the Father is manifested in the bestowal of the Messianic Kingdom (Luk 12:32), that Kingdom which has been prepared for His children from the foundation of the world (Mat 25:34), and which is now about to come with power (Mar 9:1), then the sending of the Son (Mat 10:40; Mat 21:37) to inaugurate the Kingdom must in itself be an evidence of the love of God. All things are delivered unto the Son of the Father, and He alone can reveal the Father to man (Mat 11:27, Luk 10:22). And this revelation is not confined to His preaching. It embraces the whole of His Messianic work. That work was from beginning to end animated by the spirit of love. He pointed to His works of healing as proof that the Messianic era had arrived (Mat 11:5; Mat 12:28). He described His daily work on one occasion as 'casting out devils and doing cures' (Luk 13:32). He called to all who laboured and were heavy laden to come to Him and He would give them rest (Mat 11:28). As He had assured men of the forgiving love of God, so He declared that He came not to call the righteous but sinners (Mar 2:17), and on occasion announced the forgiveness of their sins to those who approached Him (Mar 2:5, Luk 7:47 f.). His whole ministry was one continual mission of love, culminating in the willing sacrifice of His own life as a ransom for many (Mar 10:45). If we look for the revelation which the Son gives of the Father, not only to His preaching but to His Person and work, then we must admit that that revelation is one which confirms at every point the assurance of God's boundless love for man conveyed by the gracious title by which Christ designates Him.

But this aspect of the matter is not emphasized in the Synoptics as it is in the Fourth Gospel. Here the mission of the only-begotten Son for the salvation of man is expressly cited as a proof of the vastness of the love of God (Joh 3:16 f.); and whatever question there may be as to the metaphysical relation suggested by that word 'only-begotten,' there can be none as to the depth of the love involved in the sacrifice of the Son so designated. We may note not only the depth but the wideness of the love here proclaimed. God gives His Son for the salvation of the world. This wider outlook in connexion with the work of Christ is characteristic of the Fourth Gospel (O. Holtzmann, Johannesevangelium, 49 f., 80 ff.). Christ is the Saviour of the world (Joh 4:42), the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world (Joh 1:29). He speaks to the world (Joh 8:26), gives His flesh for the life of the world (Joh 6:51), is the light of the world (Joh 9:5, Joh 12:46). Into this world burdened with sin (Joh 1:29) and animated by a spirit of hostility to Himself (Joh 12:31, Joh 17:14), God in His infinite love has sent His Son for its deliverance (Joh 3:17). Throughout the whole Gospel there is far more prominence given than in the Synoptics to the fact that Christ has been sent by the Father (Joh 5:37, Joh 7:16, Joh 8:16; Joh 8:28 etc.). He repeatedly refers to Himself as Him whom the Father hath sent (Joh 5:38, Joh 6:29, Joh 10:36, Joh 17:3). He is not come of Himself (Joh 7:28), but is come in the name of His Father (Joh 5:43) from whom He has come forth (Joh 8:42, Joh 16:27, Joh 17:8). Not only does the Son, as in the Synoptics, claim to reveal the Father as none other, He asserts that He is in the Father and the Father in Him (Joh 10:38, Joh 14:10; Joh 14:20, Joh 17:21; Joh 17:23). He and the Father are one (Joh 10:30, Joh 17:22). The words that He speaks have been given Him by His Father (Joh 7:16 f., Joh 12:49 f., Joh 14:10; Joh 14:24, Joh 17:8). The works that He does are the works of His Father who dwelleth in Him (Joh 14:10). He that hath seen Him hath seen the Father (Joh 14:9). As it is love that has inspired the Father in the mission of His Son, so it is love that is the animating principle in the life of the Son who is one with the Father—love to the Father on the one hand (Joh 14:31), and love to His own in the world on the other (Joh 13:1, Joh 15:13). As the Father has loved Him, so He has loved His disciples (Joh 15:9). He sets His love before them as an example, and bids them love one another as He has loved them (Joh 13:34, Joh 15:12). The highest proof of His love is given in His death (Joh 10:15, Joh 15:13). The Son lays down His life willingly in obedience to the commandment of the Father (Joh 10:17 f.). For this the Father has given the Son (Joh 3:16 ἔδωκε, if not to be restricted to the giving to the death, may be taken, in view of Joh 3:14, cf. Joh 12:32, to include this reference); and the result will be the consummation of the gracious purpose which animated the Father in the giving of the Son. The cross will become the centre of attraction. Through it Christ will draw all men unto Him (Joh 12:32, Joh 8:28, Joh 11:52, cf. Joh 10:15 f.), and gain the victory over the prince of this world (Joh 12:31). Thus will the love which impelled the Father to the sacrifice of the Son gain the end it seeks to attain, man's deliverance from the destruction which threatens him, and participation in the blessing of everlasting life (Joh 3:15 f., Joh 6:40).

Such is the aspect under which the love of God is presented in the Fourth Gospel. It is in the Person of Christ that we have the full and complete revelation of that love. He is God's love incarnate. The Prologue gives the keynote to the whole Gospel. Christ is the Word become flesh, the perfect revelation in human personality of the Divine nature. He is the only-begotten Son (or only-begotten God, if we adopt the reading $\theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ instead of $\nu\iota\omicron\varsigma$), who has declared the Father to us (Joh 1:18). With God in the beginning (Joh 1:2), He was made flesh, and dwelt among us (v. 14). The glory that we behold in Him is a full revelation of the Divine glory, for His relation to the Father is that of an only son who receives the whole of his father's inheritance (ib.). And that glory is the glory of one who reflected in His own person the Divine love, who was full of grace and truth (ib.), and of whose fulness we have received, in ever increasing measure, participating in the grace which flowed from Him.

3. The mutual love of God and Christ.—The words 'Father' and 'Son' as applied by Christ to God and man in their relations to one another have, as we have seen, an ethical significance. It is by His love that God proves Himself the Father. It is by exhibiting a love like to that which God displays that man becomes the son of God (Mat 5:45). The terms do not lose their ethical content when used to describe the relation in which God and Christ stand to one another. The God whom Christ revealed to men as 'the Father' He had known first of all as His own Father. Such He had felt Him to be from His childhood (Luk 2:49). So He addressed Him in prayer (Mat 11:25 f., Mar 14:36, Luk 23:46); so He spoke of Him to others (Mat 10:32 f., Mat 11:27; Mat 18:19; Mat 18:35, Luk 22:29). He knew Himself to be in a special sense the object of the Divine love. He had been anointed of the Spirit for the performance of the work for which He was sent (Mar 1:10, Luk 4:18-21), and endowed with a power whereby He might triumph over every hostile influence (Luk 10:19; Luk 11:20). In a remarkable utterance (Luk 10:22, Mat 11:27) Christ describes the intimate relationship in which the Father and He stand to one another, 'All things are delivered to me of my Father; and no man knoweth who the Son is but the Father; and who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him.' The mutual knowledge which Father and Son have of one another is based upon that mutual love indicated by the terms Father and Son. Christ claims to be able to reveal God in His character of Father ($\tau\iota\varsigma \acute{\epsilon}\sigma\tau\iota\nu \acute{\omicron} \pi\alpha\tau\eta\rho$) as no one else, for none can have such knowledge of the Father's love as the Son, who knows Himself to be in the supreme degree the object of that love (Mar 1:10), and can say of Himself that all things are delivered unto Him of His Father, i.e. all things necessary for the fulfilment of the Father's gracious purpose. And the Father can reveal Himself thus to the Son because of the love with which that Son responds to His love, and the meekness and submission with which He surrenders Himself to the Father's will (Mat 11:29, Mar 14:36). It is evident that in this striking word of Christ's regarding the mutual knowledge of the Father and the Son, the words 'Father' and 'Son' are not mere names to denote the persons concerned, but are used to suggest that mutual love upon which the knowledge is based. And indeed all through the Synoptic Gospels there is always a suggestion of this relationship of mutual love in the manner in which God and Christ are spoken of as Father and Son. Whether, when Christ is spoken of in the Synoptics as the Son of God, there is more than this ethical relationship implied, is a question upon which there is difference of opinion. But it is admitted, even by those who attach a deeper significance to the designation, that, in the first instance at any rate, it has an ethical content, and that, when Christ is called the Son of God, whatever more may be implied, so much in any case is suggested, that on the one hand He is the supreme object of the Father's love, and that on the other He exhibits in His Person in its perfection that loving obedience whereby man may become the son of God.

In the Fourth Gospel the references to the love of the Father and the Son to one another are more frequent and more express. Christ is the only begotten Son (Joh 3:16), loved by the Father before the foundation of the world (Joh 17:24), and now returned to the bosom of the Father (Joh 1:18). He and the Father know one another intimately (Joh 10:15). The Father loves Him, and has given all things into His hand (Joh 3:35). As in the Synoptic account of the announcement at the Baptism, Christ is called the beloved Son in whom God is well pleased (Mar 1:11), so in Jn. the love of the Father is occasionally represented as being based upon the Son's obedience to the Father's commandment (Joh 15:10) and willing sacrifice of Himself (Joh 10:17). The Father never leaves Him alone (Joh 16:32), for He does always those things that please Him (Joh 8:29). Because He keeps His Father's commandments He abides in His love (Joh 15:10). No higher estimate can be given of the Saviour's love for His disciples than to say that He has loved them as His Father has loved Him (Joh 15:9), nor of the love of God for believers than to compare it to that of the Father for the Son (Joh 17:23). Sometimes the love of God for believers is represented as based upon that of the Father for the Son (Joh 14:21; Joh 14:23, Joh 16:27).

And as the Father loves the Son, so the Son loves the Father. He alone has seen and known the Father (Joh 3:11; Joh 3:32, Joh 6:46, Joh 7:29, Joh 8:55, Joh 10:15). He does nothing of Himself, but only what He seeth the Father do (Joh 5:19). He speaks only as His Father hath taught Him (Joh 8:28, Joh 12:50). His meat is to do the will of Him that sent Him (Joh 4:34). It is love to the Father (Joh 14:31) no less than love to His brethren (Joh 13:1, Joh 15:13) that is the motive that animates Him in the fulfilment of His vocation. In virtue of the love which unites them one to the other, each may be said to be in the other, the Son in the Father and the Father in the Son (Joh 10:38, Joh 14:10; Joh 14:20, Joh 17:21; Joh 17:23). They have no separate interests. Whatever belongs to the one belongs to the other (Joh 17:10). The Father and the Son are one (Joh 10:30, Joh 17:22).

4. The love of man for God.—There is comparatively little under this heading to be found in the Gospels. It is true that Christ has Himself given as the first commandment of all, that which enjoins the love of God with the whole heart and soul and mind and strength (Mar 12:28 ff.), and in the same spirit in the Fourth Gospel He finds the final explanation of the unbelief of the Jews in their lack of this love of God (Joh 5:42). But so far as the former of these passages is concerned, it is evident that Christ's answer to the scribe is purposely couched in language borrowed from the Old Testament; and it is a noteworthy fact that at other times, when He has no occasion to conform to OT modes of expression, Christ does not give prominence to the duty of love towards God.

Ritschl has drawn attention to the fact of how small a part the love of man towards God plays throughout the NT as a whole. 'Love is reserved as the characteristic of God and God's Son in the foundation and guidance of the congregation, while of its members faith or trust in God and His Son is demanded' (Rechtf. u. Vers. ii. 100 f.). B. Weiss thinks that Christ keeps the commandment of love to God in the background, because where the love of God does not awaken such love in return it would be of no avail to demand it (Bib. Theol. of NT, § 25b). Wendt, while recognizing that the idea of love corresponds well, on the whole, to the filial relationship, believes that it is too general, and does not give sufficient prominence to the relation of subordination and complete dependence in which man stands to God. To express the feeling of whole-hearted devotion to God suggested by the idea of love, while at the same time giving full recognition to His infinite love and power, Christ selected the term 'trust' ($\tau\rho\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$) as the one most suitable to describe the disposition man should display (Lehre Jesu, ii. 227).

Whatever the reason, we must recognize the fact that neither in the Synoptics nor in the Fourth Gospel, with the exception of the passages referred to, do we find Christ dwelling on the love which man should cherish towards God. But though He speaks of man's trust in God rather than of his love towards Him, we must not overlook the fact that this trust which Christ seeks to inspire is but love under a slightly different form. It is the response of the human heart to the infinite love of God,—love on the part of man awakened by the love of God, yet humbling itself in the presence of One who, though the Father, is yet Lord of heaven and earth. Without love there can be no such trust as Christ seeks to inspire. The prayer in which this trust finds expression must be the outpouring of a heart full of love to God and of zeal for the establishment of His Kingdom. The righteousness which becomes the members of the Kingdom must be righteousness not of outward conduct alone, but of a heart which takes delight in the performance of the Divine will. The believer is to seek first the Kingdom and the righteousness of God (Mat 6:33), to have his heart fixed on the heavenly treasure (Mat 6:21), to be filled with whole-hearted devotion to the service of God (Mat 6:24), and to renounce, no matter at what cost, whatever may hinder him in the attainment of the great end set before him (Mar 9:43-48, cf. Mat 13:44 ff.). Though there may be little explicit reference in the teaching of Christ to the love for God which man is required to cherish, we feel that in the case of the believer no less than in that of Christ Himself, it is the source from which springs all the strength for the performance of duty and the endurance of suffering, and that, just as Christ accounted for the unbelief of the Jews by the utter lack in them of this love of God (Joh 5:42), so, if we trace back to its beginnings the faith which the gospel inspires, it will be found to issue from the love to the Father who has revealed Himself in Christ.

5. The love of man for Christ.—Of love for Christ there is almost no mention in the Synoptics. In one utterance, indeed, Christ requires His followers to love Him more than their closest earthly relatives (Mat 10:37). But the purpose of that saying, as is proved by the parallel passage, Luk 14:26, is not so much to insist on a personal affection for Himself as the condition of discipleship, as to emphasize the supreme worth of the good represented by His own Person, compared with which the joys of family life are to be esteemed as nothing. The nearest approach to any reference to love of Himself as a motive for conduct is to be found in those passages in which He puts His own Person in the foreground, requiring of His disciples a readiness to sacrifice themselves for His sake (Mar 8:35; Mar 10:29), and attaching high importance to the most trivial acts done in His name (Mar 9:37; Mar 9:41). On these occasions He identifies Himself with His cause. When He requires devotion to Himself, it is only another way of requiring devotion to the truth revealed in His Person. Thus He speaks of sufferings borne for His sake and the gospel's (Mar 8:35; Mar 10:29, cf. Luk 18:29), and of being ashamed of Him and of His words (Mar 8:38, Luk 9:26). In this spirit He welcomed the love displayed by the woman who anointed His feet in the Pharisee's house, as a proof of the sincerity of the repentance which filled her heart, and of the vastness of the blessings she was conscious of having received (Luk 7:47).

In the Fourth Gospel, where the personal relation to Christ is so strongly emphasized, there is more direct reference to love as the disposition the believer may be expected to display towards Christ. Jesus tells the Jews that if God were their Father they would love Him, for He proceeded forth and is come from God (Joh 8:42). Of the disciples He says, on the other hand, that the Father loveth them because they have loved Him, and have believed that He came from God (Joh 16:27). Something is, indeed, still lacking in their love. He tells them in His farewell address that if they loved Him they would rejoice because He said that He went unto the Father (Joh 14:28). But though their love be not perfect, He can confidently reckon upon it. He would only remind them, as He does more than once in the course of that address, that a true love for Him will manifest itself in the keeping of His commandments (Joh 14:21; Joh 14:23 f.). So it had been with His own love for the Father (Joh 14:31). So let it be with the disciples. Let them prove the sincerity of their love to Him by the loyalty of their obedience. Such a relationship to Himself, love manifesting itself in faithful fulfilment of His commandments, is the condition upon which the giving of the Paraclete is promised (Joh 14:15 ff.). Where it exists, Christ promises the enjoyment of the closest communion with the Father and Himself (Joh 14:21; Joh 14:23). It is quite in keeping with the emphasis that has been laid upon love throughout the Gospel as the relation which must exist between the disciple and Christ, that in the final scene with Peter in the Epilogue He should thrice address to him the question, 'Lovest thou me?' (Joh 21:15-17), as if to suggest that such love is the indispensable qualification on the part of one who would be a true shepherd of Christ's flock.

In view of these quotations, it is difficult to understand Ritschl's statement (Rechtf. u. Vers. iii. 560), that, apart from Joh 21:15-16, there is no reference in the NT to love towards Christ. Certainly it is the case that, for the most part, faith is the usual formula to indicate the relation of the believer to Him. But it is quite in accordance with the general character of this Gospel, with its conception of a mystical union between the believer and Christ (Joh 15:1 ff.), to use warmer colours to paint the devotion of the believer, and to describe that complete self-surrender to Christ, which is the true relation to Him, as the work of love.

6. The love of man to man.—Alongside of the first great commandment to love the Lord our God, Christ places a second, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mar 12:31). The high importance He assigned to this duty is evident from the place He gives it alongside of the commandment to love God. 'There is none other commandment greater than these' (ib.). Both are ethical in their nature. The ceremonial observances in which Christ's contemporaries thought to find the fulfilment of this first commandment are never to be allowed to stand in the way of the performance of the offices of love towards our fellow-men. These latter, because they are ethical, are the weightier matters of the Law which are on no account to be omitted (Mat 23:23). To refuse to support one's parents, on the plea that one desires to make an offering of the money that might be used for this purpose, is to make a travesty of religion (Mar 7:9-13). The ethical stands above the ceremonial. God desires mercy, not sacrifice (Mat 12:7). The first commandment may be to love the Lord our God, but when it is a question of showing love towards our brother man or performing some act of worship towards God, there can be no doubt which is to come first, 'Leave there thy gift before the altar, and first go thy way; be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift' (Mat_5:23 f.).

In the enunciation of this second great commandment, Christ specifies the love which men are required to show for one another as the love of one's neighbour. Doubtless the word was suggested by the precept from Leviticus which He quoted, just as the form of the first commandment is based, as we have seen, upon the language of Deuteronomy. When we inquire as to the wideness of the circle denoted by the term 'neighbour,' we seem to find an answer in the parable of the Good Samaritan, which was told, according to Lk., in response to the question that had been put, 'Who is my neighbour?' (Luk_10:29-37). But in its present form that parable gives no satisfactory answer to the question. After telling the story of what befell the traveller, how he was maltreated by the thieves and passed by in his miserable plight by the priest and the Levite, and how at last the Samaritan took compassion on him, Christ asks, 'Which now of those three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?' The answer is, the Samaritan; and the conclusion of the parable seems to be that it was the traveller's duty to love the Samaritan, i.e. that the term 'neighbour' is wider than the lawyer who had put the question seemed to imagine, and must be held to embrace any who by their conduct prove themselves worthy of the name, whether they be Jews or not (so Wendt, Lehre Jesu, ii. 268). This is certainly the logical conclusion from the parable as it at present stands, but it is questionable whether this can have been the lesson Christ desired to enforce by it. It starts with the object of proving who is one's neighbour in the sense of diligendus (Luk_10:29), and ends by proving who is the traveller's neighbour in the sense of diligens, Luk_10:36 (Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, ii. 596). The nearest approach that it reaches to a definition of the term 'neighbour' in the sense required is contained in the 'Go and do thou likewise' with which it concludes. The usual method of interpreting the parable is to find the answer to the question in the practical lesson enforced by that exhortation, and to conclude that our neighbour is anyone who requires our help. But in view of the immediately preceding statement that the neighbour of the traveller was the Samaritan who had compassion on him, it seems utterly incongruous to conclude that the design of the parable is to teach that one's neighbour is not one's benefactor, but anyone that one can benefit, i.e. in this case that the traveller was the neighbour of the Samaritan. So we can only conclude that Lk. is responsible for the introduction of the parable in connexion with this question of the lawyer's, and that whatever the original purpose for which it was related, it was certainly not designed to give an answer to the question, 'Who is my neighbour?' in the sense of 'Who is the person I am required to love?'

But the precise scope of the term 'neighbour' in the mouth of Christ is of the less importance, as it is only on the occasion of His interview with the scribe

(Mar 12:28-34, Mat 22:35-40) that He thus defines the limits within which one is to show love towards one's fellow-men, and there, as we have seen, He is evidently formulating His answer in the language of the OT commandment. In opposition to the narrow sense in which the term 'neighbour' was interpreted by His contemporaries, who could add to the injunction to love their neighbour a corollary to the effect that they were to hate their enemy (Mat 5:43), Christ enjoined a love which was to embrace both friend and enemy (Mat 5:44 f.). The Golden Rule which Christ has given men to guide them in their offices of love takes us far beyond the circle of neighbours in the narrow Jewish sense. The command runs, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men (not your neighbours) should do unto you, do ye even so to them' (Mat 7:12). We are to show love to all. 'Whosoever shall smite thee,' 'if any man will sue thee,' 'whosoever shall compel thee,' 'he that asketh thee,' 'he that would borrow of thee,'—these are the phrases with which Christ introduces those to whom He commands His disciples to show love (Mat 5:39-42). Sometimes He describes them as 'brothers' (Mat 5:22; Mat 5:24, Mat 7:3-5, Mat 18:15; Mat 18:21 f., Mat 18:35), not in the sense of those who are bound to us by natural ties, in which sense brotherly love is practised by the Gentiles as well (Mat 5:47), nor in the sense of fellow-citizens of the Kingdom of God (so B. Weiss; Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, note on 1Jn 2:9), in which sense the word would reproduce in a new form the limitation that attached to the Jewish interpretation of the term 'neighbour,' but in the same wide sense as He applies the term 'Father' to God. He is the Father not only of the members of the Kingdom, but of all mankind (Mat 5:45), and by using the term 'brother' to denote the objects of our love, Christ will suggest that it is to be a love as wide and all-embracing as that of the Father in heaven, who bestows His bounties on good and evil,—a love not only of those who are members of the Kingdom of God, but of all who have the right to look up and claim God as their Father in heaven (Wendt, Lehre Jesu, ii. 270 f.). The command to forgive our brother his trespasses (Mat 18:35) is interpreted in the widest sense in Mat 6:14 f., when, in place of forgiving our brother, Christ speaks of forgiving men their trespasses.

From various occasional utterances of Christ we can form a general idea of the nature of the love which He expects men to display in their relations to one another. Its unselfishness on the one side, and its interest in the welfare of others on the other, are features which continually appear in the exhortations in which He seeks to inculcate it. In illustration of the unselfish spirit which He commends, He urges His hearers to invite to their banquets not their friends and kinsmen who may invite them in return, but the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind, who cannot recompense them (Luk 14:12 ff.). In the same spirit He bids men lend, hoping for nothing (Luk 6:35, according to the translation of μηδὲν ἀπελπίζοντες best suited to the context). Another aspect of the unselfishness which is characteristic of the spirit of love Christ would instil, is the suppression of those vindictive feelings which are prone to rise when we experience ill-treatment from others. We are required to forgive those who have wronged us, not seven times, but seventy times seven (Mat 18:21 f.): to be so far from resenting injury we receive from another that we turn the other cheek to the smiter, allow him who would take away our coat to have our cloak also, and go two miles with him who would compel us to go one (Mat 5:38-42); to love our enemies, and to pray for them that persecute us (Mat 5:44). Again, this unselfishness will exhibit itself in the absence of all self-assertion or desire to attain pre-eminence among our fellows. Such self-exaltation is characteristic of the scribes and Pharisees (Mar 12:38 f., Mat 23:5 ff.), and of the Gentiles (Mar 10:42, Luk 22:25). But the follower of Christ, who came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and who was among His disciples as he that serveth, will be ready to stoop to the lowliest service (Mar 10:43-45, Luk 22:26 f.), and will seek for self-exaltation only through self-abasement (Luk 14:11).

But while love is thus regardless of self, it will ever seek to advance the good of others. It will give readily to supply their demands (Mat 5:42, Luk 6:30). Nay, it will be quick to anticipate them. It will teach us to put ourselves in their place and realize what they stand in need of. 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mat 7:12, Luk 6:31). We shall not hesitate to share with them our earthly goods. 'It is more blessed to give than to receive' is a saying of Christ's preserved by St. Paul (Act 20:35) which is not recorded in the Gospels. In the picture which Christ has painted of the Judgment, He claims as offices of love performed towards Himself acts of kindness done to our unfortunate fellow-creatures (Mat 25:34-40). That is the wise use of our riches whereby we make to ourselves friends of those whom we benefit (Luk 16:9). But we shall care not only for our brother's worldly interests, but also for his spiritual welfare. We are solemnly warned to give heed lest we cause him to stumble (Mar 9:42, Luk 17:1 f.). It is not the will of our Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones, i.e. the humblest member of the Kingdom of God, should perish (Mat 18:14). And while we are careful to avoid the censorious spirit which takes delight in uncharitable judgment of the faults of others (Mat 7:1 f.), we shall still feel it our duty to rebuke our brother when he trespasses, and to endeavour to reclaim him from his sin (Mat 18:15 f.).

One other point worthy of notice in connexion with the duty of brotherly love which Christ inculcates, is the light in which this duty is presented in view of the love which we experience at the hands of God. At the root of all that Christ says regarding the love which we should display to one another lies the great truth of the Fatherhood of God. That word of St. John's, 'We love because he first loved us' (1Jn 4:19), expresses the position which Christ takes up. To forgive another his trespasses and to recompense an injury with kindness, to love one's enemies and to pray for them that persecute one, appears the height of magnanimity from the standpoint of the natural man. But Christ puts the matter in a new light. He reminds us of the love with which God treats man, undeserving as he is, and of the readiness with which He forgives us our offences. In the parable of the Unforgiving Servant (Mat 18:23-35) He exhibits in its true light the conduct of the man who, freely forgiven at the hands of God, yet refuses to forgive his brother who has offended him. And as our indignation burns at the behaviour of the unforgiving servant in the parable, we realize that so far from the forgiveness of those who have offended us being the magnanimous conduct we had imagined, it is a simple duty, the non-fulfilment of which calls for severest condemnation.

In the Fourth Gospel the duty of love to our brother is laid down with the utmost distinctness, though the references are comparatively few. As in the Synoptics Christ had summed up the Law and the Prophets in the Golden Rule to do unto others whatsoever we would that they should do to us, so here He concentrates His ethical teaching to His disciples in the new commandment to love one another as He has loved them (Joh 13:34; Joh 15:12). It was a new commandment in the new emphasis with which it was enjoined, in the new place assigned to it as the one principle in which the Law and the Prophets find fulfilment (Mat 7:12; Mat 5:17 ff., cf. Rom 13:9, Gal 5:14), in the new sanction it received through the appeal to Christ's own example. He declares that the keeping of this commandment is the sure test whereby His disciples may be recognized by others (Joh 13:35). It is by their fulfilment of it alone that they may enjoy such close communion with Him as He enjoys with His Father (Joh 15:10; Joh 15:12). He has given them an example in His own Person of the love they are to practise. At the last meal with His disciples, at which this new commandment was given, He had Himself washed their feet, to enforce the injunction to lowly service which He laid upon them (Joh 13:14 ff.). But this act of condescension on the part of the Master was typical of the self-denying love which He had displayed throughout His whole intercourse with them, that love which reached its culminating point in the willing sacrifice of His life. It is to this that He points when He urges them to love one another as He has loved them. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends' (Joh 15:13).

It has been urged that the brotherly love which is thus commended in the Fourth Gospel falls short of that enjoined in the Synoptics, in respect that it is limited to the circle of the Christian brotherhood. While Christ in the Synoptics commands us to love our neighbour, and insists that the love which He enjoins must embrace not only our friends but our enemies, we read in the Fourth Gospel of a love for one another (Joh 13:34-35; Joh 15:12; Joh 15:17). The reciprocal pronoun points to a limitation of the love to the Christian brotherhood. The Christians are known not by their love for others, but by their mutual love amongst themselves (H. Holtzmann, Handcom. on Joh 13:13, Neutest. Theol. ii. 388 f.; O. Holtzmann, Johannesevang. 76, 266). And as the love which the believer is exhorted to practise is limited to the Christian brotherhood, so also, it is maintained, is that of Christ Himself, which is held up as an example. The Fourth Gospel and St. Paul both cite the death of Christ as the highest proof that can be given of His love; but St. Paul finds in it a proof of His love for His enemies (Rom_5:6 ff.), whereas the Evangelist adduces it as a proof of His love for His friends (Joh_15:13). Such love of friends, it is maintained, is the highest love the Gospel recognizes. Of love for one's enemies it knows nothing (O. Holtzmann, ib. 87, 276; H. Holtzmann, Handcom. on Joh_15:13, Neutest. Theol. ii. 477).

We must admit that there is so much truth in the contention that, as a matter of fact, the love referred to in Joh_13:34 f., Joh_15:12; Joh_15:17 is a love of Christian brethren for one another. It would be quite unwarrantable to find the novelty of the commandment Joh_13:34 in the wideness of its scope, to which there is no reference at all in the context. But it is equally unwarrantable to explain that novelty as consisting in the narrowness of the circle within which Christ, in the context, insisted on its fulfilment, as if this commandment to practise brotherly love were an advance upon the old injunction to love one's neighbour. (So Grotius: 'Novum autem dicit, quia non agit de dilectione communi omnium, sed de speciali Christianorum inter se, qua tales sunt'; cf. Kölbinger, SK [Note: K Studien und Kritiken.], 1845, pp. 685-694). It is a mistake to take the commandment in any exclusive sense, as if there were any contrast implied to the wider commandment of the Synoptics. Christ speaks of the love of Christian brethren for one another, either because He had had occasion immediately before to give His disciples a lesson on the manner in which they should be ready to render loving service to one another (Joh_13:4-17), or because it was natural to look for the display of this spirit of love He would inculcate first of all within the smaller circle of those who stood in close relation to Him and to one another. It is not a question of confining their love to their Christian brethren, but of displaying it towards those with whom they come into closest contact.

In the same way as Christ urges them to show their love to those who stand nearest to them, He represents His own love as issuing in the sacrifice He made for them, His friends. He does not mean that it was because of the love they had shown Him as friends that He responded with this culminating proof of love in return. On the contrary, He calls them friends because they are the objects of His love (Joh_15:15 f.). His sacrifice has not been evoked by the friendship they have displayed. It is rather their friendship that is the response to the love He has cherished for them, of which that sacrifice was the culminating proof.

While we recognize, then, that in this farewell conversation with His disciples, the love which Christ urges them to display is in the first instance a love of one toward another, we cannot admit that there is any intention on the part either of the Evangelist or of Christ Himself to limit the practice of it to the Christian brotherhood. The circumstances in which the address was spoken sufficiently explain the form in which the commandment is given, and the manner in which Christ's example is appealed to. The Teacher who had inculcated a love which was to embrace friend and enemy alike might well feel constrained to give His own disciples the commandment to love one another. And He who had given His life as a ransom for many might well remind those who stood nearest to Him that they were among the many for whom the sacrifice was made, and appeal to them to love one another as He had loved them.

☩ Lowliness

LOWLINESS.—The modest attitude of mind and demeanour which characterized our Lord as a man. It is in contrast with, though not in contradiction to, the greatness both of His station and of His claims. He describes Himself (Mat 11:29) as ‘lowly in heart,’ and the word employed (ταπεινός) is accurately translated by the English ‘lowly’ and the Lat. humilis as denoting that which is near the earth, low as opposed to lofty, bowed down as opposed to erect. Though sometimes used in a bad sense, as indicating meanness of spirit, this is not at all its necessary or common signification. In the moral sense it is opposed to proud, haughty, self-assertive. The adjective occurs elsewhere in the NT (Luk 1:52, 2Co 10:1, Jam 1:9; Jam 4:6, 1Pe 5:5); and the noun ταπεινοφροσύνη and the verb ταπεινῶω are even of more frequent occurrence. Both noun and verb are used by St. Paul (Php 2:3; Php 2:8) in describing the κένωσις of Christ, where a twofold lowliness is declared of Him: (1) in becoming man, (2) as a man. In the prophecy of Zechariah (Zec 9:9) the Messianic King is foretold as being ‘lowly and riding upon an ass’; but in the passages where the prophecy is quoted (Mat 21:5, Joh 12:15), the action is given in both cases. The adjective is altogether omitted by St. John, and is rendered ‘meek’ (πραύς) by St. Matthew. See also artt. Meekness and Humility.

☩ Luke

LUKE.—The only reliable sources for the life of Luke are his Acts of the Apostles, and, in a very slight degree, his Gospel, and the Epistles of St. Paul. The biography found in many Manuscripts of the Gospel in Latin, and printed, for example, in Wordsworth and White's Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Iesu Christi Latine, Pars i. (Oxonii, 1889-1898), pp. 269-272, can hardly be considered reliable, by whomsoever composed. Some of its statements will be quoted below.

1. Name.—The name Λουκᾶς appears to be unexampled elsewhere. The modern accentuation is no doubt correct, and this at once proclaims it as a contraction or shorter form of some other name. It belongs in fact to the class of pet names (Lallnamen, Kosenamen in German), as a glance at the long list of such in Jannaris' Historical Gr. Gram. (London, 1897), § 287, will show. The NT itself is not without examples of such names; Σίλας (Σιλῆας) for Σιλουανός, Ἀμπλιᾶς (Rom_16:8) for Ἀμπλιᾶτος, Ὀυμπᾶς (Rom_16:15) for Ὀλυμπιόδωρος, Δημᾶς (Col_4:14) for Δημήτριος, Ἐπαφρᾶς (Col_4:12) for Ἐπαφρόδιτος, Ἀπολλῶς for Ἀπολλώνιος, Ζηνᾶς (Tit_3:13) for Ζηνόδωρος, Ἀντιπᾶς (Rev_2:13) for Ἀντίπατρος, Στεφανᾶς (1Co_16:15) for Στεφανηφόρος. The shorter names are less technical and more friendly than the others. There can be little doubt that Λουκᾶς is short for Λουκανός, and indeed this latter form is very frequent in the oldest forms of the Latin Bible, in the title of the Gospel. There appears to be no example of the nominative in Manuscripts, but the accusative lucanum is regular (see C. H. Turner in JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.], vi. (1904-1905), pp. 256-258). Monsignor Mercati, of the Vatican Library, has found an instance even of the nominative, on the sarcophagus of Concordius at Arles, matteus marcus lucanus iohannes (ib. p. 435).* [Note: The present writer has recently seen it on the mould of this sarcophagus at the Museum of St. Germain near Paris.] The name Lucanus suggests 'Lucanian,' a native of the district of Southern Italy; it also suggests the Latin poet, a member of the gens Annaea, nephew of Seneca the philosopher. But neither of these suggestions seems to lead us further in the attempt to trace the ancestry or family of the Third Evangelist.

2. Origin.—The Latin biography above referred to calls Luke a Syrian of Antioch. This is almost certainly due to a mistaken interpretation of Act_13:1, where a different person, with a different name, Lucius, is mentioned. If that be not the explanation, the selection of Antioch may be due to a guess, which sought to connect him with an important city. Some have thought that 'Antiochensis' is right, but that 'Syrus' is wrong, and would claim him for Pisidian Antioch, a place of much less importance. In the absence of other evidence, this second theory would be possible, as Pisidian

Antioch is much nearer the historical scene on which he first appears and figures prominently in the missionary journeys of St. Paul. The Book of Acts itself, however, seems to yield up the secret. If we concentrate our attention on that part of the narrative which tells of St. Paul's visit to Philippi, we observe certain peculiarities about it which distinguish it from the other parts. In the first place, we observe that in Act 16:9 'a certain man of Macedonia' (τις implies that the author could name him if he chose) is mentioned as appearing to St. Paul in a dream at Troas, and inviting him to cross over into Macedonia. In the following verse, the first 'We' passage begins:—'we sought immediately.' The Macedonians did not differ from other Greeks in their appearance or dress, and why should the author conceal the name of the Macedonian, if not from modesty? The present writer can feel no doubt that Luke and Paul met in Troas, and conversed together, expectant of a sign of the Spirit's will; that, as the result of their impressive talk, St. Paul saw a vision of his companion of the previous day, who appeared to be addressing him in the words of Act 16:9; and, in accordance with the belief of the time, considered—who shall say wrongly?—that the Spirit had spoken through this dream. Act 16:12 of ch. 16 is even more important in this connexion for the information it supplies:—'Philippi, which is a city of Macedonia, the first of its district, a Roman colony.' The characterization of Philippi might almost be styled gratuitous. Since the battle of b.c. 42 this place was well known to all persons of any education. Further, one might judge from this passage that it was the only Roman colony mentioned in Acts. This is far from being the case. Corinth, Lystra, Ptolemais, and Pisidian Antioch, to mention no others, were also Roman colonies; yet the author affixes the title to Philippi only. Again, we know that Philippi was not regarded by all as the chief town of its district. The author is clearly taking a side as against those who regarded Thessalonica or Amphipolis as the chief town of that district. The rivalry between cities was a characteristically Greek quality, which finds a parallel in the more modern rivalry between Dôle and Besançon. An instance in Asia Minor was that between Smyrna, Ephesus, and Pergamum. We shall not be wrong in regarding the author as a native of Philippi. His fondness for the sea and all matters nautical, as well as his choice of a profession almost entirely confined to Greeks, already proclaim him a Greek. There are other indications that point to Philippi as his native place. Act 16:13 of ch. 16, 'where we thought there was a place of prayer,' is quite natural, if the author, being a Gentile, had only a rough idea where the Jewish place of prayer in his native town was. Again, when Paul and Silas go to Thessalonica (Act 17:1), Luke is left behind in Philippi, and reappears in that neighbourhood afterwards (Act 20:4-5).

3. Notes on his Life.—Of Luke's early life little can be said, and that little is inference derived from his two books. If he were the son of a Greek freedman of a Roman master, this would account both for his name and his history. From the character of the language of his writings it is evident that he had a good education, both rhetorical and medical. It is impossible to say where he was educated, as higher education was widespread in the Greek world. About his disposition something can be said. From the frequent references to the poor in his Gospel and his loving attachment to Paul, as well as his self-effacement, it seems not too fanciful to picture him as a man of modest, tender, sympathetic, and constant nature. His circumstances appear to have been good; otherwise he could hardly have followed Paul as he did, ministering to his ailing body. The present writer has little doubt that the reason why Titus, though a valued coadjutor of St. Paul, is not mentioned in Acts, is that he was Luke's brother, especially as the only natural way to take the words τὸν ἀδελφόν in 2Co_12:18 is as 'his brother,' i.e. the brother of the man previously mentioned, that is, of Titus. Luke as a teacher was not so prominent as Titus, and hence is not named there. The true meaning of the passage would have been understood long ago, had it not been for the obscuration produced by the ecclesiastical sense of the term 'brother.'

The only part of Luke's life of which we know much is the part he spent travelling in St. Paul's company. They met first at Troas, and journeyed together from there by Samothrace and Neapolis to Philippi (Act_16:10-12). In Philippi Luke remained after Paul had gone, and they appear to have been separated for a little over five years (according to Ramsay's chronology). After meeting again, almost certainly at Philippi (Act_20:3-5), they appear to have remained together till the death of St. Paul. Certainly they were together on St. Paul's last journey along the coast of Asia Minor and Syria, up to Jerusalem (Act_21:15), and on the eventful voyage to Puteoli and Rome (ch. 27). In Rome he appears with St. Paul (Col_4:14, Phm_1:24). It is probable that he devoted himself mainly to medical and literary work, and not so much to evangelization. The Latin biography states that he never married, and that he died at the age of 74 in Bœotia (some Manuscripts, Bithynia). Another tradition has it that he died at Constantinople, and his sarcophagus, said to have been brought from there, is now pointed out in the Church of Santa Giustina, at Padua.

i. The Synoptic Problem.—To a student of the Synoptic Problem St. Luke's Gospel is the most interesting of the three. Indeed, we may confidently affirm that, but for St. Luke, the Synoptic Problem would never have existed. For the connexions between St. Matthew and St. Mark are comparatively simple and are easily explained. It is only when we read St. Luke that the perplexing questions which constitute the Problem arise. We have first to explain the fact of his omissions (a) of Markan matter, (b) of Matthaean; next, his additions (a) of narrative, (b) of discourse; thirdly, his variations from the other Gospels in arrangement (a) of Markan matter, (b) of Matthaean; then we must examine his editorial work, which consists (a) of prefaces to introduce a section, (b) of conclusions to wind it up, (c) of explanatory notes, (d) of corrections, alike in fact, in style, and in grammar; lastly, we must consider cases where he agrees with St. Matthew against St. Mark, and cases where he alone of the Synoptists has some contact with St. John. Anyone who attempts to solve the Problem by neglecting one or more of these factors, may fascinate the reader by the simplicity of his proposals, but he does so at the expense of success. He has not really grappled with the Problem, and therefore has not solved it. If, on the other hand, the reader thinks the proposals which are here offered too intricate; if he accuses the writer of vacillation, because two or more solutions are frequently offered of the same difficulty, let him reflect that in mathematics—the most exact of sciences—a similar fact may be observed. For every quadratic equation has two solutions, and when the Radeliffe Observer published his calculation of the distance of the sun from the earth, the answer came out as a double quadratic with four variations. Similar complications should be expected in an intricate literary problem like this. Let the beginner cultivate patience and suspense of judgment. He will have made good progress, if he learns to suspect the man who is too simple or too confident.

1. Solutions offered in the past.—Augustine, bishop of Hippo, at the close of the 4th cent., was the first writer who made a serious attempt to solve the Synoptic Problem. He was guided partly by tradition, but chiefly by a careful examination of the internal evidence which the Gospels offer. In that age it was perhaps inevitable that he should assume, what modern critics are almost united in denying, that the Apostle Matthew was the author of the First Gospel in its present form. From this fundamental error it inevitably followed that he assumed the priority of St. Matthew, and spoke of St. Mark as the ‘abbreviator and humble follower of St. Matthew.’ St. Luke he held to have copied from the other two. Augustine’s influence in the Western Church was so transcendent, that his opinion on these intricate questions was accepted without examination until quite modern times. Strange to say, the founders of the famous Tübingen school in theology, though they reversed most of the traditional beliefs, adhered to this. They upheld the priority of St. Matthew, not for any literary reason, but for a dogmatic one. The miraeulous element is somewhat less prominent in St. Matthew than it is in St. Mark; therefore, they argued, he must be the earlier writer.

2. Priority of St. Mark.—The notion of the priority of St. Matthew has, however, been so completely beaten off the field, that we need not spend time in refuting it. Suffice it to say that even so conservative a writer as Dr. Salmon, the late Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, admitted that St. Mark’s is the arehaic Gospel. And no wonder, for it is simple where the others are complex; it is meagre where they are rich; it is a chronicle while they are histories; it contains Latin and Aramaic words which they have translated or removed. For example, in Mar 15:39 we find the Latin word κεντυρίων, but in the parallel passages St. Matthew writes ἐκατόνταρχος and St. Luke ἑκατοντάρχη. Both Evangelists felt that they must not disfigure their pages with St. Mark's 'barbarism,' and the different forms which they used indicate independent action. Who, on the other hand, could suppose that St. Mark found ἐκατόνταρχος in St. Matthew, and deliberately altered it into κεντυρίων, or that St. Luke found ἑκατόνταρχος, and deliberately altered it into ἑκατοντάρχη? For these and other reasons it is maintained in all orthodox schools of criticism that St. Matthew and St. Luke made use of St. Mark. Indeed, St. Mark's Gospel furnishes the historical framework for the others. Equally certain is it that St. Matthew and St. Luke were unacquainted with each other's writings. Whatever agreement exists between them in non-Markan sections comes from their use of a common source. Augustine therefore is wrong in every particular.

3. The doctrine of a proto-Mark, of a deutero-Mark, and of a trito-Mark.—It has, however, long been debated whether St. Mark's Gospel in its complete form lay before St. Matthew and St. Luke. Many critics have held that St. Luke, at any rate, had only an Urmarkus—a term which has been used in Germany to signify a document shorter than our St. Mark, earlier in date, and free from those 'picturesque' additions which strike the reader of St. Mark's Gospel. Of late years there has been a growing tendency, both in Germany and in England, to repudiate the doctrine of an Urmarkus. Dr. Swete, without arguing the question at length, expresses the opinion that we can dispense with it. The Dean of Westminster is more positive in setting it aside. Nor is this surprising. Those who reject the oral hypothesis are beginning to feel that they cannot multiply documents at pleasure. Litera scripta manet. If St. Mark's Gospel circulated in the Apostolic age in three widely different editions, it is impossible to believe that the first and second editions perished without being noticed by such scholars as Origen and Jerome. Nor is it conceivable, as some maintain, that St. Mark entrusted his first edition to St. Luke, who incorporated it into his Gospel, but allowed no one else to make use of it. No wonder that with men who have an historical sense such hypotheses are unpalatable. But the oral hypothesis readily admits of, nay requires, these gradual growths in St. Mark. Under it there is no difficulty whatever in believing that St. Luke's (oral) St. Mark was much shorter than St. Matthew's, and that St. Matthew's had not received the final touches. In fact, the oral hypothesis solves the Synoptic Problem. The documentary hypothesis fails to do so. Both are equally hypothetical. And those who declare the oral hypothesis to be incredible have never, as yet, fairly tackled the arguments on which it rests, or sufficiently taken into account the habits of the East and of that age. This, however, is not the place to plead for the oral hypothesis, nor has the present writer any wish to do more than demand for it a dispassionate consideration. In the examination which follows he will not assume its truth.

ii. Analysis of St. Luke's Gospel according to the sources used

1. First Source—St. Mark.—St. Mark's Gospel (oral or written) was not merely used by St. Luke, it forms the backbone of his Gospel. It is hardly too much to say that without St. Mark there would have been neither a St. Luke nor a St. Matthew. But, as we have already intimated, there is strong reason for concluding that St. Luke used a much shorter work, not merely than our St. Mark, but than the St. Mark which lay before the redactor of St. Matthew. In short, he used an Urmakus or an (oral) proto-Mark. By adopting this view we account at once (a) for his omissions, (b) for his variations from St. Mark's order. He omitted nothing which his St. Mark contained: he adhered to St. Mark's order in every section which he took directly from St. Mark. The marvellous simplification of the Synoptic Problem which this view offers can be appreciated only by those who have seriously endeavoured to explain to themselves and justify to others St. Luke's omissions and his order.

But St. Luke's omissions are so important that we must consider them at some length. In the Synopsis St. Mark's Gospel is divided into 223 sections, of which St. Luke omits 54. A group of sections is omitted between Mar 3:22; Mar 4:1. A much larger group—amounting to more than two out of St. Mark's 16 chapters—is omitted between Mar 6:17; Mar 8:26. The remaining omissions consist of single sections scattered over the rest of St. Mark's Gospel. Only from Mark 2, 5 are no sections omitted. It is manifestly the duty of the critic to account for these omissions, and attempts have been made by harmonists to do so. Thus they have suggested (1) that St. Luke omitted what his readers would not value: being a Gentile himself, and writing for Gentiles, he naturally omitted sections which dealt with questions of Jewish interest; (2) that he objected to repetition, and left out what he regarded as dittographies; e.g. having given the feeding of 5000, he thought it unnecessary to narrate the feeding of 4000; having described the anointing of our Lord's feet, he deemed it superfluous to record the anointing of His head. These reasons, however, are quite inadequate. St. Luke is particularly fond of alluding to Jewish customs, and Gentile Christians have always taken a deep interest in them. Furthermore, the great majority of his omissions cannot be accounted for under either of the above heads. Thus he omits 25 out of St. Mark's 86 proper names. He does so in defiance of his instincts as an historian (Wright, NT Problems, 56-90). Again, he omits the healing of the Syrophœnician's daughter (Mar 7:24-30)—the only case in which our Lord is recorded to have healed a Gentile. He omits the only journey which our Lord is said to have taken through Gentile lands (Mar 7:31 to Mar 8:10). He omits our Lord's teaching about the inferiority of the moral precepts of the Old Testament to those of the New (Mat 5:27; Mat 5:31; Mat 5:33; Mat 5:38; Mat 5:43). All these topics were of overwhelming interest to Gentile readers, and we find it impossible to believe that St. Luke deliberately rejected them. The only satisfactory hypothesis is that he was not acquainted with them, as he would not be if he used a shorter recension of St. Mark and of the Logia.

(a) Now, if St. Luke used an earlier recension of St. Mark, whether oral or written, it is reasonable to suspect that in several places he has preserved for us the primitive Petrine wording. He will occasionally be nearer to St. Peter's teaching than is either St. Matthew or St. Mark. For, if the trito-Mark has made many additions to the primitive records, so also has he sometimes altered the tradition. In the index to the Synopsis nine passages are pointed out in which St. Luke's account is held to be the oldest, but there are probably many more. At any rate it is of the greatest advantage to the critic to feel that he is not always bound to vindicate the priority of St. Mark in details, however highly he may value it on the whole. And although subjective reasoning must always be received with caution, it ought not to be altogether discarded.

(b) Although St. Luke omits, as we have seen, 54 out of St. Mark's 223 sections, he does not always omit them entirely, but has preserved short fragments or 'scraps' of 24 out of the 54. These 'scraps' are always misplaced in his Gospel. In fact, the departure from St. Mark's order is our chief means of detecting them. (They may be seen in the Synopsis, Table I. a). No one is likely now to maintain that these 'scraps' were copied directly from a written St. Mark. It is surely incredible that they should have been torn from their context and misplaced. But if these 'scraps' came to St. Luke orally, is it conceivable that he was so careless as never to have discovered that he had a full account of them in writing before him? To the present writer's mind the very existence in St. Luke's Gospel of these 'scraps' is conclusive proof that he used an abbreviated St. Mark. When, therefore, these 'scraps' reached him, he was not aware that they were Markan. For, if we mistake not, there were in the Apostolic age two kinds of oral tradition, both of which contributed much to the composition of St. Luke's Gospel. First there was a vast body of uncodified fact, rudis indigestaque moles. Striking sayings were remembered apart from their surroundings, striking deeds were recorded without mention of place or person. These passed from mouth to mouth informally. Secondly, there was the regular course of catechetical teaching preserved by those catechists to whose ill-requited toil St. Paul bears testimony in Gal 6:6. From these men St. Luke derived the sections of the proto-Mark in their invariable order: from the former source he derived the 'scraps' of the deutero-Mark together with much other matter.

(c) St. Matthew's redactor frequently introduces non-Markan material into a Markan section, mixing the two together to the reader's confusion. St. Luke avoids doing this, as a rule, rightly feeling that his sources ought to be treated with respect. But, of course, all the 'scraps' are amalgamated with and lost in other matter.

(d) There are cases in which St. Luke corrects the proto-Mark or forsakes it in favour of other sources. Not only does he polish St. Mark's style in a multitude of instances, but in his third chapter he gives (with some additions) the account of the Baptist which he found in the second Source, preferring it to the much shorter account which is found in St. Mark. The same thing is done in Mar 3:22-26. He differs from the proto-Mark in holding that only one of the malefactors who were hanged reviled our Lord, the other turned to Him for help (Luk 23:39). In the account of the Eucharist (according to the true text) he puts the administration of the Cup before that of the Bread (Luk 22:17-19), following in all probability a local liturgical usage of which several traces remain. These changes must have been made deliberately. And in all cases in which St. Luke or St. John corrects St. Mark, it is reasonable to believe that they had good warrant for doing so.

(e) It used to be argued that the testimony of four men is true, and those passages which are found in more than one Gospel were held to be doubly or trebly attested. Criticism has considerably altered our view of this matter. No doubt the 'Triple tradition' deserves special respect. When three Gospels agree verbatim (as they seldom do for more than a few words at a time), they are reproducing a source which must be as old as, and may be considerably older than, any of them. Tradition assigns St. Mark's Gospel to St. Peter's teaching, and we are entitled to claim that at least the proto-Mark may in large measure be regarded as his work. In this there is scope for apologetics. But it is evident that, if three Evangelists are reproducing the same Source, they may be reproducing its defects as well as its excellences. Their agreement proves the antiquity, but not the infallibility, of the original. Now Papias expressly asserts that St. Mark's Gospel is defective in order. And when we examine it critically we find that it is arranged topographically. It takes us first to the Jordan valley for our Lord's Baptism, then to Galilee for His ministry; after that comes a journey to Jerusalem, followed by the Passion. Finally, the lost verses must have contained a journey into Galilee, for such a journey is expressly enjoined on the disciples. All three Synoptics adopt this arrangement, except that the final journey into Galilee is omitted by St. Luke, belonging, as it does, to the deutero-Mark. Can we accept St. Mark's arrangement, supported, as it is, by St. Matthew and St. Luke? Is the testimony of three men true? No one until quite modern times has ever thought so. The traditional account is that it is partly true. The Galilaean ministry was broken by visits to Jerusalem, which St. John alone records. In ignoring them the Synoptists were wrong. But the ministry in Jerusalem which the Synoptists give is assumed to have been unbroken by visits to Galilee, and must therefore merely be adjusted with John 12-20. This is improbable. St. Mark assigns 360 verses to the ministry in Galilee, which is commonly supposed to have lasted three years, 251 to the ministry in Jerusalem, which lasted about a week. Events in real history seldom move so rapidly. Our contention is that St. Mark is, as Papias says, and as his contemporaries probably well knew, defective in arrangement. Not only ought the ministry in the North to be broken by several visits to Jerusalem, but St. Mark's account of the ministry in Jerusalem ought to be broken by several visits to Galilee. Both ministries must be split up and dovetailed together, if we would attain to the true sequence of events. St. John corrects St. Mark by putting the Cleansing of the Temple into the first year's ministry (Joh 2:13-22) instead of the last. The traditional view that there were two cleansings is discredited in every other case, and is particularly incredible here. But if St. Mark has misplaced it, he has misplaced also some other sections which adhere to it. And although we cannot with any confidence decide at which particular visit to Jerusalem each of the recorded events happened, it is an enormous gain to the historian to be at liberty to distribute them.

2. Second Source—St. Matthew's Logia.—When Papias wrote that 'St. Matthew compiled the Logia (or Utterances of our Lord) in the Hebrew dialect, and each man interpreted them as he was able,' he cannot, as the traditionalists suppose, be alluding to our First Gospel, which was written (at Alexandria?) in Greek. Critical opinion is fast coming round to the view that St. Matthew compiled, not a formal Gospel, but a collection of our Lord's Utterances, which was incorporated into our First Gospel, and formed so distinctive a feature of it, that the whole book was with some justice called 'the Gospel according to St. Matthew.' And if this collection was originally oral, as many who deny an oral Mark are ready to admit, there is nothing strange in our contention that St. Luke used it, when it was much shorter: in fact, he used a proto-Matthew. In that way we explain his omissions, which are more glaring even than his omissions from St. Mark.

The question of order, which was complex in the case of the first Source, is simple here. For St. Luke's order is entirely different from St. Matthew's. Except on the rare occasions when St. Mark furnishes a clue, as he does in the account of the Baptist and of the Temptation, St. Luke arranges the Logia in one way, St. Matthew in another. Which, then, of these arrangements is to be preferred? Which Evangelist reproduced St. Matthew's order? Not the redactor of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, for he has massed most of the Logia into five huge Discourses, which are impressive for Church reading, but can hardly correspond to any actual Sermons. Many critics, however, incline to believe that St. Luke has preserved the original order, because he has so scrupulously followed the order of the proto-Mark. Even if he has done so, we must not assume that he is any nearer the truth, for we have no right to suppose that St. Matthew, any more than St. Mark, had regard to anything else in arrangement than convenience in Church teaching. It seems to us, however, that there is considerable evidence to show that originally the Logia were piled one upon another in confused disorder, as they are in the Oxyrhynchus fragment, with no other prefaces than 'Jesus said' or 'John said.' Their arrangement into speeches was the work of later hands (Synopsis, xxv). If so, this was done by the art of conflation, which consists in picking out all the Utterances which dealt with one subject and arranging them into an artificial speech on that subject. Such speeches, of which the Sermon on the Mount is a typical example, do not correspond to any Sermon that was ever preached, but are compiled for the simplification of teaching, and for the preservation of important Utterances which were in danger of being lost. St. Matthew prefers long confluations. One of these covers three chapters (Matthew 5-7), another two (24, 25), and three more one each (10, 13, 23). St. Luke's confluations are shorter, never filling one chapter. They are therefore more numerous (we reckon nineteen of them) and more compact; for, whereas it is difficult to say what is the subject of the Sermon on the Mount or of the Charge to the Twelve, there is no such difficulty with St. Luke. In St. Matthew's Eschatological Discourses (24, 25) the prophecies respecting the destruction of Jerusalem and those respecting the Second Coming of the Son of Man are inextricably blended together, as though the redactor regarded the two events as synchronous, whereas St. Luke separates them (Luk 17:20-37; Luk 21:5-38), and it may well be that our Lord habitually did so.

The hypothesis of confluations may come as a shock to those who have been brought up in the belief that the Sermon on the Mount is a single discourse. We credit the Evangelists with some audacity. Their literary morality must not be judged by the standard of this century. They were composing Gospels and not formal histories. They were providing for the need of an age which lived in daily expectation of the return of their Lord. The work was done wisely and well, for it has stood the test of time; but we must understand its limitations if we really care to attain to the truth.

That the art of conflation was a real thing, actually practised by the Evangelists, can be fully proved only by a detailed examination into all the confluations; and for that we have no space now; but it may help to remove prejudice if we compare St. Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5-7) with St. Luke's Sermon on the Plain (Luk 6:20-49). Both begin with Beatitudes, and both end with the same Warning. We conclude, therefore, that the source contained the nucleus of a sermon. But the proto-Matthaeus had only three short and one long Beatitude, for St. Luke gives no more. In St. Matthew five others have been added by the deutero-Matthaeus. St. Luke's Beatitudes, short and long, are all expressed in the second person, owing to an editorial change made by him for the purpose of securing literary uniformity. In St. Luke, Woes follow the Blessings. St. Matthew contains Woes, but not here. Either, therefore, St. Luke borrowed these Woes from another source unknown to us, or they are mere editorial work to enhance the Blessings. Their close uniformity to the Blessings favours the latter view. The wording of the Warning, with which the Sermons end, has been slightly altered in St. Luke to suit the comprehension of readers who did not live in Palestine, and would not know the action of winter torrents on a wady. Between the Beatitudes and the Warning the Source must have contained some Utterances setting forth the Law of Love. Besides these, St. Matthew has collected much material, St. Luke comparatively little; for St. Matthew's Sermon contains 107 verses, St. Luke's only 30. Yet we cannot regard St. Luke's Sermon as an abbreviation of St. Matthew's. True, he reproduces 26 out of St. Matthew's 107 verses; but he reproduces 32 more of them in other parts of his Gospel, spreading them over no fewer than seven chapters. Again, he gives in his Sermon four passages (Luk 6:24-27; Luk 6:34-35; Luk 6:37-38) which are not found in St. Matthew at all, and therefore do not come from the Logia. He adds two (Luk 6:39-40) which are given by St. Matthew in a different context. We are justified, therefore, in regarding the Sermons as in large part independent confluations. St. Luke's subject, as usual, is precise, being simply the statement of the Law of Love; but the most that we can say for St. Matthew is that he seems here to be setting forth the duty of Christian laymen, while in the charge to the Twelve he gives our Lord's teaching about the duty of the clergy.

It is a further proof of the fact of conflation that in some cases, where the subject-matter is so clearly marked that two Evangelists have collected the utterances respecting it, which may have been widely separated in the Source, into one conflation, they have nevertheless arranged the sections in different order. Thus in the Temptation, St. Matthew gives the second and third Temptations in one order, St. Luke in another. In the passage about the Ninevites, and Solomon and the Queen of the South (Mat 12:38-45, Luk 11:24-32), two such differences of arrangement occur. In the Woes on the Pharisees, St. Luke's order (Luk 11:37-54) differs repeatedly from St. Matthew's (Mat 23:13 ff.), and the deuterio-Matthaeus supplies fresh Woes. It is, of course, possible that St. Luke was dissatisfied with St. Matthew's order, and thought to improve upon it; it is more probable that he was not acquainted with it.

In cases where the subject is less clearly marked, the Evangelists collect the utterances into independent confluations. But there is one very instructive example. Both Evangelists have gathered together our Lord's teaching on the subject of prayer. St. Matthew has put it into the Sermon on the Mount (Mat 6:5-13), St. Luke into an independent conflation (Luk 11:1-13). St. Luke, however, has very properly included in his conflation the utterance, 'Ask, and it shall be given you,' etc. St. Matthew has put this also into the Sermon on the Mount, but in a different department (Mat 7:7-11). Why is this? The words 'pray' or 'prayer' do not occur in it, and the redactor of St. Matthew, acting, as we are all liable to do, mechanically, did not perceive that this Logion dealt with prayer. St. Luke was more observant.

That the original Logia had no prefaces beyond 'Jesus said,' etc., is shown by four remarkable cases in which St. Matthew (Mat 3:7; Mat 12:24; Mat 12:38; Mat 16:1) applies to the scribes and Pharisees, i.e. to the ruling class, denunciations which in St. Luke (Luk 3:7; Luk 11:15-29; Luk 11:16) are addressed to the lower orders. Plainly the Evangelists were left to gather from the contents of the Logion the persons to whom it was addressed. St. Luke's pronounced dislike of the rabble made him incline to them, while St. Matthew's indictment of the upper class led him into the opposite direction. It may well be that both Evangelists were mistaken. At any rate the limitations under which they worked must be acknowledged by all seekers after truth.

The contents of the second Source may be seen in the Synopsis, 187-239. St. Luke's parable of the Pounds is identified with St. Matthew's parable of the Talents, and St. Luke's parable of the Great Dinner with St. Matthew's of the Marriage Feast.

3. Third Source—a Pauline Collection.—If the first Source contained a good deal of triple tradition, and the second Source a good deal of double tradition, the remaining sources consist almost entirely of single tradition. Again, St. Mark contains a small quantity of single tradition, added (we believe) by the trito-Mark. St. Matthew gives a considerable amount; but St. Luke surpasses them both in respect of quantity and interest. And first we must recognize in his Gospel a collection of nineteen discourses, parables, and stories which stand by themselves, and may be called Pauline from their character (Synopsis, 241-250). We do not mean that St. Paul had much, if anything, to do with their wording; but some one in sympathy with Pauline teaching must have edited them. Our Lord spoke the words, but credit must be given to the collector who preserved them from oblivion. And if in St. John's Gospel it is more and more recognized that the mind of the Evangelist cast the utterances of our Lord into the peculiar form which they there hold, the same process of redaction may be observed in St. Luke, who comes nearest of the Synoptists to the methods of St. John. The story of the Prodigal Son is the crown of this division, but the stories of the Good Samaritan, of the Pharisee and the Publican, of the woman who washed our Lord's feet with her tears, are scarcely of inferior interest, while the parable of the Unjust Steward, when properly interpreted, is full of interest, and that of the Rich Man and Lazarus of difficulty. The more we consider this collection, the more entranced we are with it. It is the very cream of the Gospel, and yet (strange to say) it is peculiar to St. Luke.

In all cases, but especially in those of the single tradition, the question arises, How near do our records come to the actual words of Christ? The traditionalists, although they are forced to admit that in the triple and the double tradition some doubt may exist through the divergences in three, or two, Gospels, quietly assume that in the single tradition we have a verbatim report. To this assumption the critic is unable to assent. If the triple tradition was first taught by St. Peter, and confirmed by the general consent of the Churches; if the double tradition was taught by St. Matthew and diffused extensively, the single tradition was later in formation, lays no claim to Apostolic origination, and must have been known to few, or else by its intrinsic interest it would often have found its way into more Gospels than one. It is possible that St. Philip the Evangelist was the worker to whom we are indebted for the third Source; but it is mere guesswork to say so; there are no solid grounds for argument. We do not therefore claim for the single tradition the same authority that we claim for the others. The work of an editor is often conspicuous in it, and always to be suspected. And yet it would be mere scepticism to throw much doubt on these utterances, many of which vindicate their claim to have been given by Him who spake as never man spake. When a witness recollected only one or two sayings of our Lord, his memory would be specially trustworthy. The apologist has no cause to fear, but he must recognize the human element which plays its part in all Scripture. In this division the human element, if we are not mistaken, may be most clearly seen in the narrative of the washing of our Lord's feet by the woman who had been a sinner (Luk 7:36-50). Our view of this most perplexing section is that its groundwork belongs to the deutero-Markan, being identical with the Markan account of the anointing of our Lord's head. It has been misplaced by St. Luke, but he misplaces all the deutero-Markan sections which he gives. St. Luke agrees with St. John in saying that the feet, not the head, were anointed. In this, according to our contention, St. Luke and St. John are simply following St. Mark's original narrative. In the Gospels according to St. Matthew and St. Mark the feet have been changed into the head, because the Psalmist wrote, 'Thou anointest my head with oil' (Psa 23:5). The early Christians were always searching for fulfilments of Scripture, and in some cases the primitive records have been changed to secure a more complete fulfilment. Such changes appeared legitimate to the literary morality of that age, and we have no right to object (Synopsis, 269).

4. Fourth Source—Anonymous Fragments.—To this Source we assign 80 fragments of St. Luke, of which nine are found also in St. Matthew, but, of course, in a different context. If the sections in the third Division lack Apostolic authority, still more probable is it that these do so. Nay, to some of us it may appear their chief glory, as it is of the Epistle to the Hebrews, that their authors are unknown. Hundreds of Christians in Palestine had seen our Lord in the days of His flesh, and every one of them would treasure up some personal reminiscence. The great majority of these have inevitably been lost, but a few were so widely known and so much valued that they forced their way into local Church tradition and so passed into one—seldom into two—Gospels. All this is quite certain to the historian. But, of course, difficulties about chronology arise. Probably most of these fragments are widely misplaced. Thus St. Luke (Luk 5:1-11) by a conflation blends the Draught of fishes with the deutero-Markan account of St. Peter's Call. St. John places it (in what we believe to be its true position) after the Resurrection (Joh 21:1-14). Now, as St. Luke leaves no room either in his Gospel or in the Acts for a visit to Galilee after the Resurrection, it is at last being confessed that he was not aware of such a visit, and therefore it was quite natural for him to infer that the Draught of fishes belonged to St. Peter's Call, and indeed explains his readiness to rise and follow Christ without question. But, if this had been the true connexion of events, it is incredible that St. Mark, if he gives St. Peter's account of the call, did not mention it (Synopsis, 13).

If in the deutero-Mark and in the Logia St. Luke was content to find a literary connexion for many of our Lord's Utterances, it is no wonder if he did so in the fourth Source. He certainly endeavoured to write, as he says, 'in (chronological) order,' but in many cases he had not the detailed information which was necessary for doing so. St. Luke's Gospel is probably the least chronological of the three (as we shall show hereafter more fully), but in all the Gospels criticism teaches us to value the picture more than the frame; to treasure the Utterance, but esteem at a much lower value the setting which the Evangelist has given it.

5. Fifth Source—a Private Collection (from the Holy Family?).—St. Luke's first two chapters, together with the Genealogy, the Sermon at Nazareth, and the Raising of the widow's son at Nain, form our fifth and last Division. Marcion rejected the first two chapters and many other sections from his canon. Wellhausen omits them from his edition of St. Luke. The Bishop of Ely infers from Act 1:1; Act 1:22 that they were no part of the first edition of the Gospel. The present writer has long taught that they are among the latest additions to the Gospel, and that they never were part of the oral teaching: beyond that we can hardly go. The idea that St. Luke issued two editions of his Gospel has gained few converts, and Dr. Blass, its chief advocate, assigns these chapters to both supposed editions. That they proceed from St. Luke is shown by the literary connexions which Sir John Hawkins has traced.

This Division bears testimony to the fact, which Irenaeus records, that there was difference of opinion in the early Church on the question of the Virgin Birth. St. Paul is silent on that subject, showing, perhaps, that it had not been raised in his day. St. John alludes to it in his own peculiar way (Joh 1:45). Both Genealogies seem to have issued from Ebionite circles, in which our Lord's descent from Joseph was affirmed. They have been altered with some rather clumsy editorial changes, to make them square with orthodox belief. But the trito-Mark has altered the wording of a passage (Joh 6:3) with a view to support the Virgin Birth (Synopsis, xli), while St. Matthew's first chapter and St. Luke's second strenuously assert it. There can be no doubt that, when once the question was raised, it was answered in widely different Churches in no hesitating way. East and West, at Rome and in the provinces, belief in the Virgin Birth became a test of orthodoxy.

In St. Matthew, Joseph is the hero, and all action is taken by him. Mary is kept in the background, in accordance with Eastern feeling. But in St. Luke, Elisabeth and Mary are brought forward. Honour is claimed for women, as it is throughout the Third Gospel.

It is obvious that the story told in these chapters, unless it be regarded as a free invention, must have been derived, directly or indirectly, from the Virgin Mary herself. The style is strangely Semitic, in striking contrast to the four verses of preface. Not only was the original narrative told in Aramaic, but the translator has closely imitated the language and manner of the LXX Septuagint, feeling that he could thus best convey the meaning. Few parts of the Gospel have been more popular than this. The Sermon at Nazareth (Luk 4:16-29) is conflated, much of a (misplaced) deutero-Markan section having been worked into it. But it shows additional information; and long ago the observation was made, that St. Luke's knowledge of events at Nazareth is unique. If he had intercourse with some member of the Holy Family, the mystery is explained.

6. Editorial Notes.—The editorial element in all the Gospels is very great, for ancient authors took immense pains to reduce the crude chronicles which they used into literary form. In Herodotus, Thucydides, Livy, and Tacitus the charm of style is all their own, and it must have been gained by unsparing labour. Nor did inspired authors deem it unnecessary to take pains. Nay, the Divine treasure which they held in earthen vessels demanded and received all the skill which they possessed. Both St. Luke and the redactor of St. Matthew are artists of a high order.

Editorial changes, however, though they often improve upon the original, do so at some sacrifice. The substitution of a more elegant word alters the precise meaning of the original. The critic's endeavour must always be to recover the primitive wording. And in the triple tradition he can generally feel sure of his ground; in the double tradition there is more room for subjective preferences; while in the single tradition he has little else to guide him. Just where the records are most likely to be obscured, the means of verifying them disappear. We cannot attain to greater certainty than God has given.

St. Luke's editorial contributions are manifold and important. He had sources of information which are closed to us. Even his own opinion is of high value. But, nevertheless, he worked under limitations, and an exact scrutiny throws some doubt upon many of his assertions.

Let us first consider the general arrangement of his Gospel, which, as we have said, depends almost entirely on St. Mark. The first thing which strikes us is the extraordinary fact, that whereas St. Mark describes our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem in 52 verses, which St. Matthew expands to 64, St. Luke devotes to it no fewer than 408: more than one-third part of his whole Gospel. How are we to understand this amazing disproportion? First, let us look at the 'Travel Narrative' in itself. It contains a very few and slight Markan 'scraps': so few, that we are entitled to call the whole of it non-Markan. There is a good deal of matter which has been taken from the second Source; this, of course, is arranged by St. Matthew in an entirely different way. But much of the material is peculiar to St. Luke. For example, sixteen out of the nineteen sections of the third Source are embedded here.

Harmonists say that St. Luke is giving us a Peraean ministry, in which our Lord repeated much of what He had taught in Galilee. But who were these Peraeans, that the wealth of the third Source should have been reserved for them? St. Luke gives us no help in answering that necessary question. Not a single town or village is named until we reach the Markan Jericho. If there was a door open to our Lord at all in Peraea, it would seem to have been among those Galilaeen pilgrims who passed through Peraea on their way to keep the Feast. But there are other difficulties. We are distinctly taught that our Lord gradually withdrew from public teaching, first speaking only in parables, and finally confining Himself to the training of the Twelve. But here within a fortnight of His death (though harmonists try to lengthen the journey, and, indeed, change it into several journeys, with visits to Jerusalem and retirements into Galilee of which St. Luke says nothing) some of the simplest and plainest of His teaching is set forth. Again, why does St. Matthew put so many of these sayings into the Sermon on the Mount or the Charge to the Twelve? The theory of repetition is entirely unsatisfactory (NT Problems, 30-39).

We have little doubt that a different explanation must be found. If St. Luke's sole guide to chronology was St. Mark, what was he to do with non-Markan matter? The difficulty confronted him continually. New materials reached him, while he taught at Philippi, by every ship which arrived. Seldom did the new fragments contain any clue to their date or occasion. If they were not worked into his oral teaching they would soon be forgotten. Some niche must be found for them. And he began, it would seem, by placing them into this last journey. Slowly they accumulated until they reached their present proportions. The famous 'Travel Narrative' is therefore really a collection of undated material. The extraordinary vagueness which characterizes this Division favours that view. It is discourse matter, but quite indeterminate. Some of the most striking parables have no further preface than 'He said,' and there are no indications of locality except that He was still on the journey. St. Luke's idea was that our Lord brought forth the best of His treasures as the time of His departure drew nigh: it is a noble conception, but not in agreement with what we learn from the other Gospels. The matter (we believe) is scarcely arranged at all, and always wrongly.

If this be so, it is no wonder that we attach low historical value to those editorial prefaces with which St. Luke introduces so many sections in this 'Travel Narrative,' and, indeed, outside it also. Such prefaces appear usually to be inferences from the contents of the passage or transferences from other occasions. Thus the parable of the Marriage Feast according to St. Matthew (Mat_22:1-14) was spoken in the courts of the Temple. But the parable of the Great Dinner, which we identify with it, was, according to St. Luke (Luk_14:15-24), part of a long discourse at a Pharisee's dinner table: the machinery of the dinner table is made much of by St. Luke in binding the conflation together. St. Luke stands alone in telling us that our Lord on three occasions (Luk_7:36; Luk_11:37; Luk_14:1) accepted hospitality from Pharisees. There is reason to think that the last two of these occasions are due to transference or assimilation.

St. Luke, like the other Synoptists, seems to have thought that our Lord's ministry lasted one year only—'the acceptable year of the Lord' (NT Problems, 182-194). He appears to have placed our Lord's Birth after Herod's death, though St. Matthew distinctly places it before that event. For a discussion of this difficult question the present writer may be allowed to refer the reader to his edition of St. Luke's Gospel. Suffice it here to record the conviction that, though St. Luke has done much for us in connecting our Lord's life upon earth with secular history, his Gospel is very far from being arranged with the chronological accuracy at which he aimed. He was working in a place and amid surroundings which precluded historical research, and, when he visited Palestine, it was too late to recast the whole work of his life.

Philosophy was sedulously cultivated among the Gentiles for whom St. Luke wrote. All the more earnest thinkers, who were attracted by Christianity, had been brought up as neo-Platonists or Stoics. They would, of course, bring their philosophy with them into their new religion. Christianity became to a considerable extent leavened by Hellenistic thought. This is what our Lord foretold in the parable of the Leaven, rightly interpreted. Now Plato taught the indestructibility of the soul. But in Mat_10:28 God is declared to be 'able to destroy both soul and body in hell,' which is the usual Biblical doctrine. St. Luke (Luk_12:5) has altered this into 'him who has power to cast into hell.' It would seem that he, or his informant, did this to avoid giving offence to the Platonists. In the Markan account of the Agony in Gethsemane (Mar_14:32-42) there is much to perplex a Stoic, who believed that a good man is never perturbed. All trace of agony is absent from St. Luke's account (cf. (Revised Version margin) at Luk_22:43 f.); perhaps because the proto-Mark did not contain it; more probably because St. Luke has deliberately struck it out.

St. Luke has long been accused of Ebionism, because the rich are severely handled in his pages, and because he expressly commands us to part with all our property (Luk_12:32-34); whereas St. Matthew (according to the Greek) bids us only think more highly of the heavenly than of the earthly treasure (Luk_6:19-21). St. Luke was certainly not an Ebionite, or he would not have defended the Virgin Birth or praised Joseph of Arimathaea. In speaking words of severity against the rich he is probably faithfully reproducing our Lord's words, which were wont to be incisive. The strongest of all these sayings against the wealthy is preserved in the proto-Mark (Mar_10:25), and it is followed by a declaration in which our Lord Himself cautions us against interpreting His utterances with prosaic literality. Nor have Christians generally supposed that He intended us to pluck out our right eye or cut off our right hand and foot.

The most striking example of editorial addition in St. Luke is that in which he attributes the three hours' darkness to a solar eclipse (Luk_23:45). In saying so he cannot be right for many reasons (Comp. of the Gospels, 119).

iii. Points of contact with St. John.—If St. John's teaching was esoteric, intended for advanced disciples only, we shall better understand the rarity of the occasions on which allusions to it are found in the sub-Apostolic age. But that it existed orally for many years before it was committed to writing, is indicated not only by its own characteristics, but by several cases in which it is simpler to assume that one of the Synoptists learned a fact from St. John than that St. John learned it from him. Many passages are pointed out in the index to the Synopsis in which the trito-Mark is held to have drawn from St. John's oral teaching. There is one case where St. Matthew does so. And we have now to consider cases where St. Luke appears to have followed their example. We have already seen that St. Luke agrees with St. John that our Lord's feet were anointed and not His head. But in that matter we held that St. Luke is reproducing the original deutero-Markan statement which has been corrupted in St. Matthew and in the trito-Mark. The trito-Mark tells us that the day of the Crucifixion was Friday (Mar_15:42). This statement St. Luke repeats (Luk_23:54), but in a different context and in different language. The simplest explanation of these peculiarities and of the absence of the words from St. Matthew is that both Evangelists, directly or indirectly, derived their information from St. John. Finally, St. Luke and St. John tell us that the sepulchre in which our Lord's body lay was a new one, 'where no one had yet lain' (Luk_23:53).

iv. St. Luke's characteristics.—St. Luke the Gentile was cosmopolitan in his sentiments. St. Luke the beloved physician had sympathy for the sorrows of mankind. The words of pity which he records were drawn from the all-compassionate heart of the Saviour, but to St. Luke is due the credit of preserving them from oblivion. To his literary skill we are probably right in attributing some of the beauty of their form. St. Luke the disciple of St. Paul tells of the publican, who durst not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven, but kept smiting his breast and saying, 'God be merciful to me the sinner' (Luk_18:13). He tells of the traveller by the wayside, stripped, wounded, and half-dead, and how the good Samaritan had pity upon him (Luk_10:30-37). He tells of the Prodigal, wandering in thoughtless levity from home, spending his substance in riot and revelry, and then eating the husks which were thrown to the swine; and how the father had compassion upon him and welcomed him home (Luk 15:11-32). He tells of the poor woman who had been a sinner in the city, coming behind and washing the Saviour's feet with her tears (Luk 7:36-50); of the robber's appeal on the cross, 'Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom' (Luk 23:39-43). These and other passages which set forth the freeness and fulness of pardoning love have been preserved to us only in the writings of St. Luke, who had more pity for the weak and for the suffering, for widows and for the poor, than any other NT writer.

St. Luke was no idealist. He had a literal, matter-of-fact mind, which blurted out facts without glossing them. We have seen how he records without reservation the command to part with our possessions, as St. Barnabas and others in their first love did (Act 4:36-37). Being a physician, he nevertheless had the strongest belief in the truth of demoniacal possession, understanding literally what was originally given as a burst of insanity (Mar 5:9 with parallels). He stands alone in affirming that our Lord, after His resurrection, ate a piece of broiled fish before His disciples (Luk 24:41-43). To this he refers, probably in Act 1:4, certainly in Act 10:41. Many persons in modern times have felt some difficulty in reconciling this with the general Scripture account of the nature of our Lord's resurrection body. It may be one side of the truth which is apt in these days to be ignored; in a coarser age it was the only side that was accepted. Ignatius supports it in the saying which he preserves: 'I am not an incorporeal demon' (Smyr. iii. 1).

v. Date of Writing.—St. Luke's Gospel is not, like St. Mark's, a bare record of our Lord's deeds and words, but, to a considerable extent, a theological exposition of their meaning. St. Luke, like his master St. Paul, has reflected on them, and is anxious to impress on the reader his own ideas about them. Such action demands time. In spite of 1Ti 5:18, we cannot admit that St. Luke wrote before St. Paul's death.

Again, if we observe the treatment in his pages of the destruction of Jerusalem, contrasting his precise language (Luk 21:20) with the vague predictions in St. Mark (Mar 13:14), we can hardly doubt that he wrote after the event, and edited the wording accordingly. The end of the world was not with him, as it was with the redactor of St. Matthew, synchronous with the burning of the Temple. He carefully puts our Lord's teaching about the last days into a separate conflation, which he prefaces with a remarkable saying which warns us against a literal interpretation: 'The kingdom of God is within you' (Luk 17:21).

But there are no 2nd cent. ideas in the Gospel, nor anything to throw doubt upon the unanimous and early tradition of St. Luke's authorship. Nor would so obscure a member of the Church have been selected as author if there had not been good ground for the belief. Probably his name stood on the original title-page.

We are, therefore, probably right in assigning the date to about 80 a.d.

Literature.—Plummer's Commentary (T. & T. Clark) is good on the linguistic side. The Commentaries of Meyer (German) and of Godet (French) have been published in English by T. & T. Clark, but the later German editions of Meyer, edited by B. and J. Weiss, are preferable. In the Expositor's Greek Testament the Synoptic Gospels are treated from the side of the higher criticism by A. B. Bruce, but unfortunately the Textus Receptus is used. Wellhausen has translated the Gospel into German with a few critical notes. For comparative study Wright's St. Luke and his Synopsis may be used. In Horæ Synopticæ Sir J. C. Hawkins has collected statistics of great value. Hobart's Medical Language of St. Luke needs some weeding out, but has never been refuted. A. Resch, in Das Kindheits-Evangelium, as in his other writings, collects an immense quantity of illustrative matter, but the critical standpoint which he adopts is not generally acceptable. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?) successfully defends St. Luke as an historian of high rank, but insists too much on his accuracy in editorial details. Blass, in his edition of St. Luke's Gospel and of the Acts, follows Lightfoot in suggesting that St. Luke published two editions of his works—one for Theophilus and another for use by the Church. In this way he accounts for the Western readings, which, however, are found in other books of the NT.

Literature.

The word 'lunatic' in the Authorized Version of NT is the translation of σεληνιαζεσθαι (from σελήνη, 'the moon') which occurs in Mat_4:24; Mat_17:15, and nowhere else in the NT or in classical or Biblical Greek. Literally its meaning is 'to be moonstruck.' The Vulgate translates it lunaticus, and in Mat_17:15 lunaticus est, where Tindale gives 'is frantick,' and other versions practically follow the Vulgate. Sir John Cheke (1550) has the expression 'is moond' as the equivalent of 'lunatic,' putting into plain English the ancient thought expressed by the word. The influence of the moon on persons was believed to be injurious, and to be able to cause them to become moonstruck (Psa_121:6), an idea which has been widely prevalent and still persists. The fact that certain forms of insanity are periodical, no doubt gave rise in part to the idea. Dr. Menzies Alexander says: 'The popular idea that there is some connexion between the moon and epilepsy is partly due to the confusion of epilepsy with epileptic insanity. The bright moonlight of the Orient has a curious stimulating effect on such creatures as crows and dogs, making them restless and noisy. It has an exciting effect also on those afflicted with epileptic insanity. In both cases darkness acts as a sedative.'

The Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 of the two passages in Mt. above cited prefers 'epileptic' and 'is epileptic' as translation for σεληνιαζεσθαι, but without substantial warrant. The ground for the preference according to Eneye. Bibl. is that a Greek medical writer of the 7th cent. gives ἐπιλητιχός as the correct scientific term for the disorder referred to, and that δαιμόνιζόμενος and σεληνιαζόμενος were the popular terms for the same disease.

But the word ‘lunatic’ covers more than the cases in which Mt. uses σεληνιαζέσθαι.

The mentally deranged also are described by the Evangelists as δαιμονιζόμενοι, and no kind of doubt is possible that the latter term included many sufferers who are now called lunatic, as well as simple epileptics and epileptic idiots. The uncontrollable explosions of nervous energy which characterize these cases were not unnaturally attributed solely to demonic agency. The explanation is so simple and direct and apparently so adequate, that none other was sought for. But the term ‘lunatic’ must be restricted in its use to those who were mentally deranged, and ought not to be applied to those who were simply epileptic, or suffering from mental feebleness or imbecility.

The attempt to trace a differentiation between mental diseases on the part of the Evangelists cannot be pronounced successful, being based upon far too slender ground in a simple NT passage, Mat_4:24, where δαιμονιζόμενοι and σεληνιαζόμενοι are placed side by side. (1) We have no grounds for expecting such precision in writers like the Evangelists. (2) The same writer uses (Mat_17:15) the word σεληνιαζεσθαι of a case which is not simple epilepsy (see below). (3) He does not use the word for the Gerasene demoniacs of Mat_8:28, where we have undoubted cases of lunacy. (4) Luke the physician knows nothing of the distinction so far as his own usage is concerned. (5) It is not to be thought that Mt. alone of the Evangelists traced a distinction between the epileptic and the possessed, or that he would not attribute an attack of simple epilepsy to the domination by evil spirits.

The Evangelists class all the cases together, and use both words to cover the same trouble of mental derangement, while the latter word δαιμονιζόμενοι is also employed with a wider signification. The fact that the description given in the Gospels enables us to classify the instances under the broad types of mental disease is evidence of the faithful unsophisticated narration of what the Evangelists had seen or heard, not of their having any scientific understanding of the phenomena in question.

i. Difficulty of classifying NT cases.—The Gospels record and describe three clear cases which may be included under the general head of lunacy. Others are probably indicated with no kind of description; or only the very vaguest is given. But the task of determining to which particular class of lunacy the cases described are to be assigned is not without difficulty, and perhaps cannot at present be accomplished without some degree of uncertainty. The difficulty is twofold.

1. The current classifications, in vogue amongst alienists, of the various insanities are very numerous, and by common consent far from being final. Certain of these systems, some adopted by International Congresses and others determined by representative associations, and generally in use among the leading mental physicians of Great Britain, are valuable chiefly as giving facilities, the one for international conference, the other for national comparison and correspondence. Clouston in his Clinical Lectures provides a good working classification. Following the example of many illustrious predecessors, he divides mental diseases: (1) according to the mental symptoms manifested, and (2) according to the causes of the disorder and to the relationships of the disease to the great physical periods of life and to the activities other than mental. But the researches of the present day, and especially in respect of the causes of mental derangement, with their suggestions of toxic and bacteriological origin, are profoundly modifying the generalizations which only a few years ago were accepted as satisfactory. Brilliant and enthusiastic investigators in Italy, France, Germany, America, and in our own country are 'settling much and unsettling more' (Clouston), and while this condition of science is full of promise for the ultimate goal of all such research in the alleviation and recovery of the malady and the removal of its causes, the prevalent uncertainty does not lessen the difficulty of classifying the NT cases. The difficulty arises largely from the facts that (a) the symptoms from one class are combined in ever-varying proportions with symptoms of other classes, rendering the task of deciding which is the predominant symptom according to which the malady must be classified well-nigh impossible; and (b) a similar combination is discovered among the causes producing the disorder. Accordingly some have scoffed at the attempt to classify mental diseases with all the divisions and technology of a botanical or zoological system. And perhaps it is more important to mark carefully all the symptoms in each case and study the predisposing and actual causes so far as they can be ascertained.

2. The difficulty from the Biblical side lies in the following facts. (a) The descriptions of the cases mentioned in the Gospels are non-scientific. They do not profess to give a complete methodized account of the ailments with which the power of Jesus dealt. The Evangelists give no sign that they themselves understood what they describe. (b) They deal only with symptoms. Causes of the disorder were not sought for, the prevalent theory of demonic possession being to them adequate to account for the trouble, and this possession the only possible cause. Our Lord Himself speaks and acts as though upon the whole He shared the conceptions of the time. Possibly because in this realm, as in others, He in His incarnate condition shared the limitations of the race, or because He could not take upon Himself the task of correcting and remoulding the deep-lying misconceptions of that generation with respect to these matters, without withdrawing His strength from far more vital concerns on which in the short time at His disposal He must concentrate all His attention. (c) The Evangelists' descriptions probably do not give all the symptoms which a modern alienist would have noted, but only those which for one reason or another were pressed particularly upon their observation.

ii. Leading cases of lunacy reported in NT.

1. The case in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mar_1:21-28, Luk_4:31-37). The symptoms indicated by the Evangelists are—

(1) The predominance of unclean habits and instincts. Mk. speaks of the man as being under the influence of an unclean spirit; Lk. of the spirit of an unclean demon. This might possibly mean no more than that the victims of this malady habitually haunted unclean places, as tombs, and desert regions believed to be the habitation of demons. But the greater probability is that it points to ‘moral alienation,’ which Esquirol (Maladies Mentales) declared was the proper characteristic of mental derangement. ‘The subtle influence of epilepsy, or rather of that condition of the nervous system which gives rise alike to epileptic seizures and certain mental symptoms, is most strikingly manifested in the change which takes place in the moral character’ (Bucknill and Tuke).

(2) Convulsive seizures. This feature is not made prominent in the case before us, but is indicated by the words of Mar_1:26, ‘And the unclean spirit tearing ((Revised Version margin) ‘convulsing,’ σπαράξεν) him and crying with a loud voice.’

(3) Uncontrolled impulse, leading the victim in defiance of all that was fitting and customary to burst into the assembly at the hour of worship.

(4) The patient’s belief in and identification of himself with an alleged evil spirit. He speaks of himself and the evil power as one—‘What have we to do with thee?’ This may be explained as an example of a well-known delusion classed as demonomania, but the question must not be fore-closed (see below). At least, however, an element of delusion may be traced in the feeling of entire and inevitable subjection to the monstrous control.

(5) The acknowledgment of Messiah. This has been claimed as the classical criterion of demonic possession, all cases where it is not found being regarded as not due to this cause even although the Scripture so attributes them (Menzies Alexander). But argument from silence is always perilous, and especially so in dealing with the Gospel narratives. And other cases might yet be genuinely demonic where the confession is apparently or really absent. And, on the other hand, the acknowledgment might reasonably be regarded as the last vestige of rationality in the otherwise deranged nature.

Attempting to classify the above, it may be ranged symptomatically under Clouston’s head—‘States of Defective Inhibition, or Impulsive Insanity,’ the chief characteristic of which is uncontrollable impulse, and which includes general impulsiveness, epileptiform impulse (indicated by the convulsions), animal, sexual and organic impulse (pointed to by the term 'unclean' applied to this and other instances). Clinically considered (according to the causes) it most nearly approaches epileptic insanity. This 'means insanity with epilepsy, whether the convulsive affection has preceded the insanity and has seemed to be the cause, or whether it has appeared during the course of the mental disease only as a symptom or complication' (Bucknill and Tuke). The presence of epileptic insanity is not always indicated by epileptic fits but by the character of the mental disturbance, the paroxysmal gust of passion, the blind fury. And therefore Defective Inhibition is difficult to distinguish from Mania. Out of 385 epileptic women observed by Esquirol (Maladies Mentales, vol. i.), only 60 were free from mental derangement, and nearly all were unstable, peculiar, easily enraged.

2. The case at the foot of the Mt. of Transfiguration (Mat 17:14-20, Mar 9:17-29, Luk 9:37-43).—Two sides are plainly marked in this disorder: (1) The physical. Uncontrollable paroxysms accompanied by foaming at the mouth and gnashing of teeth, succeeded by utter prostration. The affliction had been from infancy, pointing to some congenital disease involving the other physical features—deafness and dumbness. (2) The mental. At least idiocy, but more probably lunacy, a feature of which was the suicidal mania manifested. The indication is that during the time while he was free from convulsions and their effects the patient was not mentally disturbed. The suicidal impulse was apparently spasmodic and periodical, but no very solid ground is given to theorize upon.

The epilepsy is more pronounced than in the previous case, and the suicidal tendency is added. But possibly, if the previous instance had been fully described, it might more nearly approximate to the one under consideration. The classification must be under the same general head—Defective Inhibition or Epileptic Insanity (rather than Epileptic Idiocy—as Alexander).

3. The Gerasene victim (Mat 8:28-34, Mar 5:1-20, Luk 8:26-39).—The physical symptoms, the convulsions, that characterize 1 and 2, are here absent, and the features of mental derangement become all-prominent. The victim is possessed by an ungoverned violence, having the command of a morbid muscular energy. This uncontrollable power was one that increased, for the description implies that in the earlier stages they had been able to control him in some measure by binding, but that the binding had increased the violence of the power so that he could no longer be bound (Mar 5:3-4). 'The tenses used (δεδέσθαι, διεσπᾶσθαι, συντετριφθαι) denote the relation of these past acts to the present inability' (Gould, Internat. Crit. Com. on 'St. Mark'). The malignant power controlling the life drove him into the tombs and mountains, causing him to utter frenzied cries and leading to impulses of self-mutilation, apparently also to homicidal tendencies (Mat 8:28). Loss of personality is the dominant feature of the case, evidenced by the absence of the sense of all fitness, causing him to destroy his clothing and rush about in nakedness, and by his positive feeling of being possessed by a legion of devils which tore his life asunder. At times he thoroughly identifies himself with the power that controlled his life ('we are many'), and is terrified by the fear lest he and they should be driven from their hiding-place. A conspicuous feature also was the homage paid by the evil power, or by the man in spite of the evil power, to the authority of Jesus (Mar 5:7, Luk 8:28).

The case belongs to those described by Clouston as 'states of mental exaltation or mania,' which includes the varieties simple, acute, delusional, chronic, ephemeral, homicidal; and the indications all point to acute mania with delusions. The fixed idea of plural possession would lead to the medical classification 'Demonomania,' a variety of 'religious mania.'

4. Other cases.—(1) The daughter of the Syro-phœnician woman, Mat 15:21-28, Mar 7:24-30. (2) The dumb demoniac, Mat 9:32-34, Luk 11:14-15. (3) The blind and dumb demoniac, Mat 12:22-24. These cases are not described except in most obscure terms. In (2) and (3) the interest of the narrator was fixed upon other elements of the occasion. And they would all be doubtfully classified as cases of lunacy. (4) Mary of Magdala (Mar 16:9, Luk 8:2), with whom are classed other women healed of evil spirits and infirmities. Mary Magdalene is said to have been delivered from seven demons. The expression may be due (a) to the Evangelist's sense of the violence of the derangement to which she had been subject, or (b) to the current idea of manifold possession among the disciples, to which Jesus gave no sanction, or (c) to mania and delusion of manifold possession. But nothing can be determined beyond the fact that Jesus had delivered her from grievous bodily or mental distress, or a combination of these.

The Evangelists give full prominence to the physical side of these distressing afflictions, not because they understand the symptoms they describe, but because they testify simply and artlessly to what they had themselves witnessed, or what had become part of the common tradition from the testimony of eye-witnesses. But the physical is not the only side. Even in bodily disorders it is being more fully recognized that there is the mental or psychical factor in the problem as it faces the physician (see art. Cures). And the NT plainly sets forth this psychical element in the cases now before us. They ascribe the trouble directly to an intangible spiritual influence which possesses the being of the sufferer, takes the use of the bodily organs, and controls the will. And thus emerges—

iii. The question as to possession by evil spirits.—How far does the NT in attributing these disorders to demonic possession give a true account of the phenomenon? The question is not to be determined by invoking authority, either that of the NT or of our Lord Jesus Christ. The authority of the Gospels is of a totally different order, and moves in a higher sphere than that of writers who were ‘supernaturally’ lifted above the current conceptions of their generation. We have no warrant for believing the Evangelists to have been granted knowledge of mental disease in advance of the scientific attainments of their own day. Nor can inquiry be silenced by the appeal to the fact that our Lord Himself habitually spoke and acted as if He recognized the presence of evil spirits in mental disease. The Christian apologist takes unnecessarily perilous ground when he declares that for our Lord to have been limited in knowledge invalidates His authority as Prophet and Saviour. In His condition as incarnate our Lord did share the limitations that belong to our human lot, and advanced in knowledge of human affairs and scientific problems by normal human processes.

But it is equally important that the matter should not be dogmatized off the roll of discussion by those who claim to speak in the name of science and declare that the NT explanation is ‘impossible’ on the ground that spiritual agencies do not exist. The question, if left open, must be open on both sides; and there are certain considerations which must be borne in mind while we examine the possibility of spiritual agencies being concerned, as concomitants of the physical disease or nervous instability, in cases of mental derangement, whether in NT times or in the present day.

(1) We must guard ourselves from the conception of these evil spiritual agencies as semi-sensuous beings, possessed of bodily form, appetites and passions. The conception has vitiated human thought from early Semitic times, in the NT age, through the Middle Ages down to the present, when it is even yet strangely persistent. The popular thought of Satan is grotesquely dominated by that idea, and much of the prevalent disbelief in the existence of a spiritual adversary can be traced to that gross misconception.

(2) Kindred to this is the thought of a multiplicity of demons being concerned in the possession of a human life. This idea has been responsible for much false conception in the case of the Gerasene sufferer. And it cannot be too strongly emphasized that nowhere does our Lord give the least sanction to any such notion. He never speaks of more than one evil or unclean spirit (see Alexander, Demonic Possession, ch. vii.).

(3) In place of misconceptions, a right conception needs to be grasped of the malignant powers that can make a prey of an otherwise disordered human life. So far from the idea of semi-sensuous beings representing the truth, it would be far truer to think of possession as akin to the condition seen in intense anger, or extreme fear.

‘Anything is a possession that dispossesses the man of himself, from whatever world it comes’ (Bushnell). We are yet far from being able to define the nature of mind or spirit. We believe in mind on the ground of its manifest action in the directing of our human activities, because of the things it creates and destroys. But what mind is, passes our power to conceive and define. And the same is true of spirit. But we can make no progress in understanding the Universe and our human life within it, except on the assumption of a Supreme and Holy Intelligence and Will behind all physical and mental phenomena. We believe in a living Personal God, and the faith illumines all life and being. Moreover, we are ourselves personalities constantly acting upon, and being acted upon by, other personalities. A moral world is inconceivable on any other terms. And is it unreasonable if we decline to admit the impossibility of other superhuman personalities, some of them centres of benignant and others of malignant moral energy, being present and active in and upon our life here? Who can reasonably deny that such evil agencies may conceivably take advantage of an unstable nervous system or a disordered physical constitution, and possess and control the whole being?

(4) It must also be made clear that the physical disease may be the effect of a potent psychical disorder. The whole mischief may come from the side of the mental or psychical. A long-continued yielding of the mind or spirit to evil agencies may result in physical deterioration, just as truly as physical deterioration may give the opportunity for an evil spiritual possession. ‘Prolonged mental enfeeblement is followed by brain atrophy, and prolonged mental disturbances by structural brain changes’ (Clouston). A consideration of our Lord’s method in dealing with this disaster in humanity will increase our unwillingness to bar out the ‘demonic’ element in lunacy. See also artt. Accommodation, vol. i. 20 f., and Demon, ib. 441 ff.

iv. Our Lord’s restoration of the ‘lunatic.’—The Synoptic Gospels all ascribe to Jesus a unique command over these afflicted persons and over the alien power that possessed them. He was able to restore the lost self-control and also to deal with the disease which was commonly the physical basis of the mental derangement. The latter portion of the process is akin to our Lord’s healing of bodily diseases (see Cures); but the action of Jesus is upon the body through the mind, and upon the mental or psychical directly. Mental physicians who treat lunacy from the physical side yet fully recognize the existence of the psychical, and the possibility and actuality of alleviation being brought by action upon that side of the ailment. ‘The action of “mind on mind” in healthy brains is direct, intense, and most subtle. The same is the case when the brain is disordered, and hence in psychiatry mental therapeutics are a most important means of treatment’ (Clouston). Such facts are truly illuminative of the action of Jesus, and we may not unreasonably attribute His restoring power to a master-influence which, while it transcends all that is known of the human, yet is not on a totally different plane. In Jesus the power of mind was at its fullest and finest by reason of: (1) His intense and penetrating sympathy with mankind; (2) His vigorous will to bring help and deliverance to all human sufferers; (3) His continual and perfect alliance and moral union with the Divine Power in which He lived and moved and had His being. The Divine Will can and does manifest itself in every human unselfishness and sympathy and generous helpful impulse, and through a human personality healing forces of God Himself are at work amidst all human distress and oppression. And in our Lord that Divine healing might find full scope and unhindered freedom of activity, so that the Name of Jesus was a healing, restoring, life-giving Name, even empowering feeble disciples to cast out devils (see art. Miracles, c.).

The method of Jesus clearly suggests the exercise of a Holy Divinely-informed Will and Personality upon other wills and personalities. The features which most impressed those who witnessed His action were the rebuke, the command, the authority which claimed and obtained unhesitating homage and obedience (Mar 1:21-27, Luk 9:37-43), inevitably reminding them of 'the majesty of God.' Especially does His dealing with the Gerasene lunatic indicate His secret. He goes direct to the lost self-control, seeks to recover the submerged personality, and to remove that self-identification with the evil power. He endeavours to awaken the man to the true sense of his own individuality and to set it free from an alien domination. 'What is thy name?' He asks. By the efficient co-operation of the man He would break up that terrible sympathy and alliance which caused the victim to say, 'We are many.' (The suggestion of Schmiedel that in asking this question Jesus was, like a modern alienist, seeking to discover the delusions of the patient, amounts to an anachronism). And the unique Personality of Jesus had the power to evoke, and give once again its commanding controlling place to, this essential energy of the man.

Modern treatment of the insane bears a most suggestive likeness to the method of Jesus. By cheerful surroundings, by healthful labour, by the encouragement of all existing faculty in the patient, by amusement and music and religious exercises, and not least by human sympathy, the endeavour is made to conserve every vestige of self-possession, to keep alive and to develop all available capacity. The constant effort is to penetrate through all physical and psychical disabilities to the real and effective personality. It may fairly be said that medical skill and investigation into causes and remedies of this distressing malady are yet in their preliminary stages, and the progress of the years may be followed with the utmost hopefulness because in all such investigation the Divine Spirit energizes.

☞ Lust

LUST.—The noun 'lust' (ἐπιθυμία) occurs only twice in Authorized and Revised Versions of Gospels (Mar_4:19, Joh_8:44), and the verb 'to lust' (ἐπιθυμέω) only once (Mat_5:28). Both noun and verb, however, are of common occurrence in the rest of the NT. In modern usage, 'lust' is confined to sexual desire; but, when the Authorized Version was made, the word had a much greater elasticity of meaning, corresponding in this respect to ἐπιθυμία and ἐπιθυμέω. In NT, as in classical Gr., these words properly denote strong desire whether good or bad, then evil desire in particular, and finally sexual desire specifically. Even in the Gospels we find illustrations of these varying connotations of both the Gr. and the English terms. When our Lord says of His desire to eat of His last Passover ἐπιθυμία ἐπεθύμησα (Luk_22:15), He simply expresses a deep longing. When He speaks of the seed of the word being choked by the lusts (ἐπιθυμῖαι) of other things (Mar_4:19), these lusts are desires not necessarily evil, though the taint of evil is beginning to enter, because, while in themselves they may be harmless, these desires are allowed to hinder the operation of the word. When He says to the Jewish leaders, 'Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts (ἐπιθυμίας) of your father it is your will to do,' both 'lust' and ἐπιθυμία have passed into a distinctly bad meaning. And in Mat_5:28 the Gr. and the English word are alike equivalent to lascivious desire. See also art. Desire, vol. i. p. 453.

Very little is said explicitly about lust in the Gospels, because little is needed. Lust is not to be dallied with or compromised with; it is to be totally and continually shunned and avoided. Inward lust is as heinous as outward adultery to the eye of God, which views alike the inside and the outside of man (Mat_5:28).* [Note: See discussion of this passage in art. Adultery.] The lustful eye will make the whole body full of darkness (Mat_6:23). The single eye and mind are free from lustful fancies and thoughts (Luk_11:34). The honest and good heart brings forth only good fruit (Luk_8:15). Either the heart must be pure, and its fruit pure; or else impure, and its fruit impure (Mat_12:33). Adulteries, covetings, lasciviousness,—these delile a man (Mar_7:22). And lust, in its very nature, is unholy. Hence Christ's Holy Spirit is opposite to, and inconsistent with, the lustful demon which makes its foul abode in the neglected heart of the careless or heedless or wanton. There is no limit to the iniquity and abandonment to which such evil possession or corruption may drag the blinded, besotted soul intent upon brutish delights never realized. Herod's course was impeded only a little by the rebuke of a John Baptist (Mar_6:18). No man can serve two masters (Luk_16:13); and he that committeth sin is the bondservant of sin (Joh_8:34).

☞ Lysanias

LYSANIAS.—This name is given by St. Luke (Luk_3:1) among those who ruled in the various parts of Syria and Palestine at the time when John the Baptist entered upon his public work. The name does not again occur in the NT. A Lysanias is mentioned by Dio Cassius (xlix. 32) as having been made king of Ituraea by Mark Antony and afterwards put to death by him. This same Lysanias is also spoken of by Josephus (Ant. xv. iv. 1), who adds that Antony was moved to the step of putting Lysanias to death by Cleopatra, on the ground that he had conspired against her with the Parthians. The same Lysanias and his connexion with the Parthians are alluded to also elsewhere by Josephus (BJ i. xiii. 1; Ant. xiv. xiii. 3). The data agree in making him the son of Ptolemy, and locating his reign between b.c. 40 and 36. A Lysanias is mentioned again by Josephus in Ant. xviii. vi. 10 and XX. vii. 1. In both of these passages the territory over which he ruled is designated a tetrarchy (cf. BJ ii. xi. 5, xii. 8; Ant. xix. v. 1).

The question raised by these data is, Does Josephus know two men of the name or one? If he knows two, the Lysanias of St. Luke is evidently the second, and no further difficulty exists. If, however, he has the same man in mind throughout, the question next emerging is as to whether St. Luke knew and alluded to another and younger Lysanias, or erroneously identified the only ruler of that name with the times of the public appearance of John the Baptist and Jesus. In favour of the latter view, it is alleged that Josephus never gives any intimation of a difference between the two men of the name, and in fact does not at first reading seem to know two. His readers were bound, it is argued, to suppose that the Lysanias who was executed in b.c. 36 is meant wherever the name is used. St. Luke was acquainted with the writings of Josephus, but did not use them with accuracy, and an error is quite probable. He makes an error in defining the limits of the realm of Philip, Ituraea. It is not held that an error can be demonstrated in his statement regarding Lysanias, but the probability is said to be for such an error, and the grounds for believing in a second Lysanias are regarded as unsatisfying. This view was propounded by Strauss, and has been supported by Keim, Krenkel, and Sehmiedel.

Per contra, that there were two men of the name is argued from various considerations. (1) Though Josephus does not explicitly say that he is speaking of two distinct persons, his descriptions imply such a distinction. Lysanias the son of Ptolemy was not a tetrarch, but bore the title of king (so he is also called by Dio Cassius). (2) The limits of the territories over which the Lysaniases of Josephus ruled are different. The elder Lysanias inherited from his father a kingdom including Chalkis on the Lebanon. This was not, however, included in the realm of the tetrarch Lysanias. (3) Abila was associated with the name of the tetrarch, but not with that of the son of Ptolemy. (4) During the reign of Tiberius, or at least 50 years after the death of the first Lysanias, a certain Nymphaeus built a road and erected a temple, and left an account of these acts in an extant inscription (CIG [Note: IG Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum.] 4521). In this inscription he calls himself 'a freedman of Lysanias.' It is impossible that he should have been the freedman of the son of Ptolemy. He must be regarded as living under the tetrarch. (5) Another inscription at Heliopolis, whose lacunæ have been filled out by Renan, renders it exceedingly probable that there were more than one ruler bearing the name in question. (6) A coin discovered by Poeocke at Nebhi-Abel (Abila) bears the superscription Λυσσανίου τετράρχ. καὶ ἀρχιερέως. But as Dio calls the first Lysanias a king, it is at least doubtful that the lower title of tetrarch should appear on his own coin. In that case the coin must have been struck by the second Lysanias. (7) Finally, an inscription (CIG [Note: IG Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum.] 4523) informs us that Lysanias the son of Ptolemy left children behind him. It is probable that the names Lysanias and Zenodorus were dynastic names, and that the second Lysanias was given the name of him who was put to death in 36. This is the view supported by S. Davidson, Wieseler, Renan, Schürer, Plummer, and others.

An earlier effort to establish the historical accuracy of St. Luke's statement regarding Lysanias was made by Paulus (Com. i. 1) through the suggestion that the word τετράρχου should be erased from St. Luke's text, or that it should be connected with Φίλιππου, making Philip the 'tetrarch of Ituraea, Trachonitis, and the Abilene of Lysanias,' i.e. of that province of which Lysanias had been tetrarch in his day. But this has always been considered an arbitrary way of dealing with the text, resorted to solely for the purpose of saving the historical precision of the Evangelist, and has not found much favour in any quarter.

MAATH.—An ancestor of Jesus (Luk 3:26).

☞Machaerus

MACHAERUS.—A fortress on the east of the Dead Sea, in which, according to Josephus (Ant. xviii. v. 2), John the Baptist was imprisoned and put to death by Herod Antipas (Mat 14:3-12, Mar 6:17-29, Luk 3:19). It had been originally fortified by Alexander Jannaeus (Josephus BJ vii. vi. 2), and afterwards destroyed by Gabinius (ib. i. viii. 5; Ant. xiv. v. 4). It was restored by Herod the Great, who used it as a residence (BJ vii. vi. 1, 2.). On his death it passed into the hands of Antipas, as it lay in the Peraean portion of his tetrarchy. At the time of the Jewish revolt it was occupied by a Roman garrison, which was constrained to abandon it in a.d. 66 (ib. ii. xviii. 6). After the fall of Jerusalem it was recaptured, and finally destroyed by the Roman general Lucilius Bassus (ib. vii. vi. 4). The ruins, called Mkawr, on a projecting height near the Dead Sea on its eastern side, are supposed to mark the site of the fortress.

Madness

MADNESS.—It is somewhat remarkable that the OT ideas about madness should differ so much from those of the Gospels. In the OT madness is due to the influence of a spirit from God (1Sa 16:14; 1Sa 18:10), in the Gospels to a demon; in the OT it is conceived of as being closely connected with the ‘spirit of prophecy’ (which likewise came from God); this is clear from such passages as 1Sa 10:6; 1Sa 10:10-13; 1Sa 19:23-24, Hos 9:7, 2Ki 9:11, Jer 29:26; there is no sign of this in the Gospels.* [Note: See, however, Act 16:16 ff.] It was, no doubt, owing to the belief that madness was a sign of the indwelling of a spirit from God that a madman was looked upon (in the OT) as, in some sense, sacred;† [Note: This is still the case in the East.] in the Gospels the reverse of this seems to be the case, if one regards the demoniac described in Luk 8:26-39 as a madman [see Demon].

There are very few references to madness in the Gospels; in Luk 6:11 the word ἄνοια is used (the (Revised Version margin) renders it ‘foolishness’), its meaning is certainly nearer to ‘foolishness’ than to the modern notion of madness; perhaps its meaning is best expressed by the German ausser sich, lit. ‘outside of oneself,’ resulting in a temporary loss of mental balance; in 2Ti 3:9 the same word is translated ‘folly,’ which, taken with the words ‘corrupted in mind’ in the preceding verse, brings out the sense more fully. Another expression, used in Mat 4:24; Mat 17:15, is σεληνιαῖσθαι ‘to be lunatic,’ or ‘moonstruck,’* [Note: Macalister (in Hastings’ DB iii. 328a) quotes Vicary, who says of the brain that ‘it moueth and followeth the mouing of the Moone: for in the waxing of the Moone, the Brayne followeth upwardes: and in the wane of the Moone the Brayne discendeth downwardes, and vanishes in substance of vertue ...’; according to the Jewish conception, which connects epilepsy with demoniacal possession (Mat 17:18), the light of the moon drove demons away. [See Demon].] but from the context in the second passage there can be no doubt that this was epilepsy. Neither of these expressions answers to modern ideas of madness. There is, however, one other word (μαίνεσθαι, Joh 10:20) which seems to correspond with what would be understood by madness nowadays, viz. to be bereft of reason; in the passage in question it is certainly used in this sense; at the same time it must be remembered that μαίνεσθαι is connected with μαντεύεσθαι, which implies possession by some supernatural being.† [Note: See Trench, *Synonyms of the NT*11, pp. 21, 22, cf. Act 16:16-18.] The same word, as well as μανία, is used in Act 26:24-25, where ἀλήθεια and σωφροσύνη are placed in opposition to it, which confirms the meaning implied in Joh 10:20.‡ [Note:

A somewhat similar meaning belongs to παραφρονῶν in 2Co_11:23 and παραφρονα in 2Pe_2:16.] [See, further, Demon, Lunatic].

On two occasions in the Gospels we find madness or insanity definitely attributed to our Lord Himself. Once by His own friends, among whom, apparently, His mother and brethren were included (Mar_3:21, cf. Mar_3:31). We read that ‘they went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself’ (ἐξέστη). Commentators are for the most part agreed that in this passage ἐξέστη denotes insanity, or at least a mental excitement bordering upon it (cf. a similar use of the word by St. Paul, 2Co_5:13). The other occasion is that already referred to, when, according to St. John, certain of ‘the Jews’ said of Jesus, ‘He hath a devil, and is mad’ (δαιμόνιον ἔχει καὶ μαίνεται, Joh_10:20). In this case the madness is evidently ascribed to Satanic possession, and is not regarded merely as a derangement due to overwork and excitement. It is worth noting, however, that μαινομαι is applied to St. Paul in a less offensive way (μαίνη, Act_26:24) by Festus. Authorized Version renders, ‘Thou art beside thyself,’ which Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 consistently changes into, ‘Thou art mad,’ to correspond with ‘I am not mad (οὐ μαινομαι), most excellent Festus,’ in the next verse. The charge of madness brought against Jesus is characteristic and significant, and has many parallels in the history of Christ’s followers in the early (cf. Act_2:13 as well as Act_26:24-25, 2Co_5:13) and in the later Church. It is an illustration of the inability of the natural man to receive the things of the Spirit of God (2Co_2:14; cf. Joh_15:18; Joh_17:16).

☩ Magdala

MAGDALA.—The word ‘Magdala’ occurs once only in the Textus Receptus of the NT (Mat_15:39). In B and x̄ the reading is ‘Magadan.’ This reading is followed by Tisch., Alford, WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort’s text.], and is adopted in the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885. In the parallel narrative in St. Mark’s Gospel (Mar_8:10) the place to which Christ came is designated as ‘the parts of Dalmanutha’ (wh. see). These names evidently refer to the same district, but not necessarily to the same place. They seem to have been in such proximity, however, that the adjacent district might be named from either. With respect to their location, various sites on the south and south-east border of the Lake of Galilee have been suggested, but none of them can be regarded as satisfactory. There is no site in this locality whose name bears any resemblance to Magadan; and the only place which suggests a resemblance to Dalmanutha is a village known as ed-Delhemiyeh, near the mouth of the Jarmuk river. Apart from the name there is nothing else in or about the place to justify its identification with the town to which St. Mark refers in the passage above cited. Caspari and Edersheim would place Magadan within the limits of the Decapolis, but do not assign it to any definite location. The suggestion of Ewald that its site is identical with Megiddo, on the southern border of the Esdraelon plain, does not harmonize with the facts of the narrative, and apparently rests upon a very slender foundation.

In the light of all the information attainable at the present time, the probabilities strongly favour the view, which has long been held by eminent writers and explorers, that the district in which these places were located was on the western shore of the Lake of Galilee, and that Magadan represents the village now known as el-Mejdel, the traditional site of the town of Mary Magdalene. While the words in their present form are not identical, they may be regarded as variations of the same name. Stanley's suggestion is worthy of note in this connexion: 'It may be observed that, as Herodotus (ii. 159) turns Megiddo into Magdalum, so some Manuscripts in Mat 15:39 turn Magdala into Magadan' (SP [Note: P Sinai and Palestine.] 451, note 1). It has been suggested also by another writer, as a possible explanation of the substitution of one name for the other, 'that owing to the familiar recurrence of the word Magdalene, the less known name was absorbed in the better, and Magdala usurped the name and possibly also the position of Magadan' (art. 'Magdala' in Smith's DB [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] ii. p. 1734). On the supposition that Magadan was on or adjacent to the site of el-Mejdel, the probable location of Dalmanutha is at or near 'Ain el-Barideh, where the ruins of an ancient village have been traced and described by Porter, Tristram, and other explorers. This site is about a mile south of el-Mejdel. An incidental testimony in support of this identification is given by Rabbi Schwarz, who asserts that the cave of Teliman or Talmanutha was in the cliffs which overlooked the sea behind the site of el-Mejdel. In the same connexion he identifies Migdal (Mejdel) with Magdala (p. 189). To this may be added the testimony of the Rabbins, that Magdala was adjacent to the city of Tiberias (Otho, Lex Rabb. 353). In the travels of Willibald (a.d. 722), 'Magdalum' is located between Tiberias and Capernaum; and in the time of Quaresmius (17th cent.), Mejdel is mentioned as identical with the Magdala of Scripture (ii. 866).

The generally accepted view that the descriptive surname of Mary—'Magdalene'—used several times in the NT, and by all the Evangelists, was derived from her home or birthplace, is confirmed by the testimony of Edersheim, who asserts that several Rabbis are spoken of in the Talmud as 'Magdalene' or residents of Magdala. From the same source he gathers the statements that Magdala, which was a Sabbath-day's journey from Tiberias, was celebrated for its dye-works and its manufactories of fine woollen textures, of which eighty are mentioned. It was also noted for its wealth, its moral corruption, and for its traffic in turtle-doves and pigeons for purifications. The suggestion made by Lightfoot, that the name meant 'curler of hair,' is rejected by Edersheim, who regards it as founded upon a misapprehension (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, vol. i. p. 571).

Magdala is favourably situated at the S.E. corner of the plain of Gennesaret. It is three miles north of Tiberias, and almost the same distance south of Khan Minyeh. Before it lies the northward expanse of the Plain and the Lake; behind it rises a dark background of beetling cliffs, broken in one section by the deeply-cleft gorge of the Wady Hamam (Valley of Doves). Its precipitous sides are honeycombed with caves, which for centuries have been the refuge of robbers and outlaws. Mt. Hattin, the traditional mountain of the Beatitudes, is a conspicuous landmark on the plateau at the upper end of the wady. Through this natural passage-way the caravan route from the Mediterranean coast follows the line of the old Roman road to Khan Minyeh, and thence northward over the hills of Naphtali. A perennial stream, which waters the southern portion of the Plain, finds its way to the Lake a short distance north of the outskirts of the town.

Mejdel, which has little in itself to commend or distinguish it, is the only place of permanent habitation in the once densely populated 'land of Gennesaret.' It consists of twenty or more low, flat-roofed, grass-covered hovels, built of a conglomeration of dried mud, shells, and pebbles. Its degenerate inhabitants are the only resident farmers of the Plain, and go out from the town to cultivate a few patches of cleared ground in favourable locations. Near the centre of the village a palm-tree rises conspicuously above the objects around it, and a few thickly set thorn-trees on the outskirts afford a grateful shade to the loungers of the place in the heat of the day. A watch-tower on the north border of the town is a present suggestion of the derivation of the name Mejdel or its Greek form Migdol. It is possible also that Migdal-el (Jos 19:38) stands for the same place. The tower gives evidence of a date of construction comparatively modern, but it is doubtless the successor of an older outlook or watch-tower, which commanded the gateway to the southern section of the Gennesaret plain. The remains of substructions of a substantial character, hidden beneath the earth and its dense covering of undergrowth, afford satisfactory evidence of the antiquity of the site.

☩Magi

MAGI (μάγοι, Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘wise men’).—The only reference to Magi in the Gospels occurs in Matthew 2, where we have the well-known story of the visit of the Oriental Magi to the infant Jesus. The following article will deal with (1) certain difficulties in the narrative, (2) the historical value of the narrative, (3) the legendary additions to the narrative.

1. The difficulties are occasioned chiefly by the vague and indefinite character of the record. The first question that suggests itself is, What class of people had the Evangelist in his mind when he used the term μάγοι? Now, according to Herodotus (i. 101), the Magi were a Median tribe which in the time of Gaumata, the pseudo-Smerdis, made a determined attempt to substitute Median for Persian rule (ib. iii. 61 ff.; Ctesias, Pers. [Note: Persian.] 41 (10) ff.; Justin, i. 9, 10; Agathias, ii. 26). Through the failure of this revolt the Magi lost all political importance, but they were influential as the priestly caste (Herod. i. 132; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6; cf. the Levites among the Hebrews, SBE [Note: BE Sacred Books of the East.] iv. pp. lxii, lxiii), and as religious instructors of the Persian kings (Cic. de Divin. i. 41; Philo, de Special. Leg. 18; Pliny, HN xxx. 1). The introduction of this Magian priesthood is ascribed to Cyrns (Xen. Cyr. viii. 1. 23); and classical writers conversant with Persian affairs use the word magus as synonymous with ‘priest’ (Apul. Apol. i. 25, 26; cf. Strabo, pp. 732, 733; Philo, Quod omn. prob. lib. 11; Dio Chrysost. Or. 36, p. 449, 49, p. 538; Diog. Laert. proæm. 6; Porphyry. de Abstinens. iv. 16; and the lexicons of Hesych. and Suidas). Darius Hystaspis made Mazdaism the religion of the Empire (Behistun inser., and Sayce, Ancient Empires of the East), and from his time, at any rate,—for how long before, if at all, is disputed,—the Magi are identified with the Zoroastrian worship, and are represented as the disciples of Zoroaster (Plato, Alcib. i. 122; Plutarch, de Is. et Os. 46, 47; Pliny, HN xxx. 1; Apul. Apol. 26; Diog. Laert. proæm. 2; Amm. Marc. 23:6; Agathias, ii. 24; Aug. de Civ. Dei, xxi. 14). In the Avesta, however, the priests are called, not magi, but âthravans; though even in the sacred texts the word ‘magi’ is found in a few instances. Finally, it may be noted that these Median magi are credited with skill in philosophy (Strabo, pp. 23, 24; Nicol. Damasc. fr. 66; Diog. Laert. proœm. 1), natural science (Philo, Quod omn. prob. lib. 11; Dio Chrysost. Or. 49, p. 538), and medicine (Pliny, HN xxx. 1, cf. xxiv. 17). They are also described as interpreters of dreams (Herod. i. 107, 120, vii. 19), astrologers (ib. vii. 37; Pliny, HN xxxvii. 9; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6), soothsayers and diviners (Cic. de Divin. i. 41; Strabo, p. 762; Pliny, HN xxx. 2; Diog. Laert. proœm. 7; Aelian, Var. Hist. ii. 17; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6).

In a technical sense, then, magi denoted the members of the sacerdotal class in the Persian Empire. But in the LXX Septuagint Daniel the word is used to render the Heb. ‘ashshâphim Authorized Version ‘astrologers,’ of Babylonia (Dan 1:20; Dan 2:2; Dan 2:10; Dan 2:27; Dan 4:7; Dan 5:7; Dan 5:11; Dan 5:15. Some would explain the title Rab-mag in Jer 39:3; Jer 39:13 as = ‘chief magician,’ but without probability). Moreover, classical writers sometimes confuse the words magi and Chaldæi (Ctes. Pers. [Note: Persian.] 46 (15); Justin, xii. 13). The latter term, however, is properly used in Daniel (Dan 1:4; Dan 2:2; Dan 2:4-5; Dan 2:10; Dan 4:7; Dan 5:7; Dan 5:11) and by classical authorities (Herod. i. 181, 183; Diod. Sic. ii. 29-31) to represent a class, or the class, of Babylonian priests or learned men (Driver, Daniel, pp. 12-16), renowned for their skill in astronomy, astrology, and sorcery (Cic. de Divin. i. 41, de Fato, 8, 9; Diod. Sic. ii. 29-31; Strabo, p. 762; Curtius, v. 1; Apul. Flor. 15; Porph. Vit. Pyth. 6; Diog. Laert. proœm. 6; cf. Lenormant, La magie chez les Chaldéens; R. C. Thompson, Reports of the Magicians and Astrologers of Nineveh and Babylon; W. L. King, Babylonian Magic and Sorcery; Chantepie de la Saussaye, Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte; Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria).

Lastly, the words magi and Chaldæi came to be applied not only to the members of a sacerdotal caste, but in a secondary sense to all those who cultivated magic arts (Soph. Œd. Tyr. 387; Tac. Ann. ii. 27, xii. 22, 59; Juv. Sat. x. 94, with Mayor’s note; Dio Chrysost. Or. 36, p. 449). In Rabbinical writers this bad sense is predominant (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. p. 210), and the same may be said of the passages in the NT (other than Matthew 2) in which magi are referred to (Act 8:9; Act 8:11 Simon Magus, Act 13:6; Act 13:8 Elymas). In the LXX Septuagint the Egyptian conjuring is described as μαγική τέχνη (Wis 17:7). And Jerome says: ‘Consuetudo et sermo communis magos pro maleficis accepit’ (Hieron. Com. in Daniel 2, cf. Isid. Ety. viii. 9).

In what sense, then, did the author of Matthew 2 understand the term? The majority of the Fathers affix the worst interpretation, and lay stress on the idea that magic was overthrown by the advent of Christ (Ign. Ephes. 19; Justin M. Dial. 78; Tertull. de Idol. 9; Origen, c. Ccls. i. 60; Max. Taur. Hom. 21; Hilar. de Trin. iv. 38, Com. in Matthew 1; Aug. Serm. 200, § 3; Theophylact, in loc.); and this was the common opinion even in the Middle Ages (Abelard, in Epiph. serm. 4; Aquinas, Summa, III. xxxvi. 3). But the consensus of later commentators rejects this view. There is no hint or suggestion of reprobation in the Gospel narrative. On the other hand, there is no indication that the Evangelist is alluding to any particular class of magi. He appears, on the contrary, to use the term in the general sense of sages from the East, who busied themselves with astronomy (Mat 2:2; Mat 2:7; Mat 2:9-10) and perhaps with the interpretation of dreams (Mat 2:12). There is certainly no attempt in the narrative to contrast Christianity with Zoroastrian or Babylonian worship.

Closely connected with the above is the further question of the region whence the Magi are supposed to have come. Mt. calls them simply μάγοι ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν, i.e. ‘Oriental magi.’ The expression is quite indefinite (cf. Mat 8:11; Mat 24:27, Luk 13:29, Rev 21:13). Various attempts have been made, however, to identify the particular part of the East whence the Magi may have come (Patritius, de Evang. iii. p. 315 ff.; Spanheim, Dub. Evang. ii. p. 291 ff.). The oldest opinion inclines to Arabia (Justin M. Dial. 77, 78; Tertull. Jud 1:9; Epiph. Exp Fid. 8, and most Roman commentators, e.g. Corn. a Lapide, in loc.), partly on account of references such as Psa 72:10, Isa 60:5, partly on account of the character of the gifts, partly by reason of the close intercourse that subsisted between Arabia and Palestine (Edersheim, i. p. 203). On the other hand, Arabia is to the south rather than the east of Judaea (cf. Mat 12:42 βασιλίσσα νότου), and in the NT it is usually specified by its geographical name. Other places suggested are Persia (Clem. Alex. [Note: Alexandrian.] Strom. i. 15; Chrysost. in Mt. Hom. 6. § 1, 2, 3, 4; 7. § 5; Op. Imp. in Matthew 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.; Diodorus Tars. ap. Phot. cod. 223; Theophylact, in loc.; Juvenius, Evang. Hist. i. 276), Chaldaea (Max. Taur. Hom. 21; Origen, C. [Note: circa, about.] Cels. i. 58), Parthia (Wetstein, in loc.; Hyde, Rel. Vet. Pers. [Note: Persian.] c. 31), and Egypt (Möller, Neue Ansichten). But the language of the Evangelist is ‘too indefinite, and perhaps intentionally too indefinite, to justify any decision’ (Trench, Star of the Wise Men, p. 4), and it is unsafe to draw any inference from the nature of the presents (Weiss, Life of Christ, i. p. 266). One thing alone seems clear—the Magi were heathen and not Jews (see references in Meyer, Com. in loc.). The form of their question (Mat 2:2) would be sufficient to establish this, apart from the ecclesiastical tradition which represents their homage as the first-fruits of the Gentile world (Aquinas, Summa, III. xxxvi. 8).

The cause of the coming of the Magi is roughly indicated in the words, ‘we have seen his star in the rising’ (ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ). It seems clear that they were induced to make the journey by some sidereal appearance; but what exactly this appearance was is not conclusively determined (see art. Star). From this phenomenon, however, whatever it may have been, the Magi inferred the birth of a Messiah-king of the Jews. We cannot say precisely by what means they arrived at this inference. It is unlikely, for chronological and other reasons, that their expectations had been excited by the Zoroastrian prediction of the coming of Soshyos (SBE [Note: BE Sacred Books of the East.] iv. p. xxxvii); nor is it probable that an independent tradition of Balaam's prophecy (Num. 24:17) had been preserved by their ancestors and handed down to them (Origen, c. [Note: circa, about.] Cels. i. 60, Hom. in Num. 13:7; Op. Imp. in Matthew 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.); nor is there any historical evidence that there was at this time among the nations any widespread expectation of the advent of a Messiah in Palestine (Tac. Hist. v. 13 and Suet. Vesp. 4 are derived from Josephus BJ VI. v. 4, and refer to the Flavian dynasty). On the other hand, the Jews themselves were undoubtedly expecting the Messiah (Charles, Eschatology, p. 304; Toy, Judaism and Christianity, p. 330), and a Rabbinical tradition, which may be previous to Christ's birth, declared that a star in the East was to appear two years before the Messiah's advent (Edersheim, i. pp. 211, 212; Strauss, Life of Jesus, English translation p. 174 and references; cf. the name Bar-Cochba). Hence the source whence the Magi derived their inference that a king of the Jews was born may well have been the Jews of the Diaspora, whose tenets would doubtless be known to the wise men of the lands in which they sojourned.

The time of the visit of the Magi is quite uncertain. By ancient writers it was usually supposed that they arrived at Bethlehem on the 13th day inclusive after the birth of Christ, i.e. Jan. 6 (Aug. Serm. 203. 1). Most commentators, however, place their coming after Christ's presentation in the Temple; and some, as an inference from Mat. 2:16, delay it till Jesus had reached or nearly reached His second year (see Patritius, iii. 326 ff.; Spanheim, ii. p. 299 ff.; Trench, p. 109 ff.; Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? pp. 215-220). Here also the evidence is insufficient to warrant a definite conclusion.

2. The historical value of the narrative has been frequently impugned, the principal objections being as follows. The account of the Magi is found in the First Gospel only, and is not corroborated by either Lk. or Josephus or any pagan historian. (The references in Macrobius, Sat. ii. 4. 11, and Chalcidius, Tim. 7. 126, cannot be regarded as independent evidence). Moreover, it is not easy to see how Mt.'s narrative can be harmonized with that of Luke. Many of the details, again, are suspicious; the conduct of Herod, as here represented, seems inexplicable (Meyer, in loc.). Finally, the story in general is vague, and on a priori grounds may even be held to be improbable. These objections are not without force. Doubtless too much stress has been laid on the absence of confirmatory evidence, and the argument from the silence of Josephus can scarcely be sustained (Edersheim, i. pp. 214, 215; Trench, p. 102 ff.). The difficulties in connexion with Herod's attitude have also been overestimated (Weiss, i. p. 269). Yet the divergence between Mt. and Lk., though certainly not incapable of explanation (Ellicott, Huls. Lect. p. 70), is sufficiently serious; and the positive evidence for the truth of the narrative is slender. It may be urged, however, that there is no reason for denying the existence in the narrative of at least a substratum of historical fact, though possibly the facts have been treated with a certain amount of freedom. Such a view, at any rate, appears to account for the story better than any rationalistic explanation hitherto put forward.

Of these attempted explanations the most important may briefly be summarized. (a) The older school of critics sought for the basis of the history mainly in the prophecies of the OT. Thus Strauss laid great stress on Num 24:17, while Keim emphasized Is 60. From these and other prophetic passages (e.g. Isa 9:2; Isa 42:6; Isa 49:6-7, Psa 68:29; Psa 68:31; Psa 72:10), supplemented possibly by Jewish or pagan tradition, the Evangelist is supposed to have built up his story. But it is incredible that the history could have been constructed from such material, or that such a fulfilment could have been deliberately devised for prophecies which at the time were understood to have so different a significance (Edersheim, i. p. 209). Moreover, it should be noted that 'the Evangelist who at other times searches zealously for the fulfilment of OT predictions, nowhere refers in this narrative to one of these prophetic passages, from which it is said to have arisen (Weiss, i. p. 267). (b) A different, and very fanciful explanation has been offered by W. Soltau, Usener, and others (Soltau, Birth of Jesus Christ; Usener in Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Nativity,' cf. his Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, i. 'Das Weihnachtsfest'). According to this, Mt.'s account is the outcome partly of the operation of heathen superstitious ideas, partly of the transformation of a story recorded by Dio Cassius and Pliny. Thus, for the incident of the star, Soltau appeals to the widespread belief that such portents were manifested in connexion with the birth and death of kings and heroes (for instances see Wetstein, in loc.; Winer, Biblisches Realwörterbuch, vol. ii. p. 613); and, for the Massacre of the innocents, Usener refers to the story of Marathus concerning the birth of Augustus (Suet. Aug. 94). The visit of the Magi is represented as a Christian transformation of the story related by Dio and Pliny about the visit of Tiridates and his Magians to Nero (see the passages quoted by Soltau, op. cit. pp. 73, 74). In the year a.d. 66 the Parthian king Tiridates, the Magus, bringing other Magi with him, journeyed to Rome, worshipped Nero as the sun-god Mithra, and afterwards travelled home by another way through the cities of Asia. Now to the Christians of the East Nero was Antichrist: hence it is argued that just as, in the early legends, the miraculous events of Christ's life were transferred to Antichrist, so the story of being worshipped by Magi may have been transferred from the Antichrist Nero to the Christ. The whole narration of the Magi, then, Soltau dismisses as an insertion 'of Hellenistic origin' (op. cit. p. 49). But he does not explain how this insertion received so characteristic a Jewish form, or why such alien elements should have 'crystallized themselves in just the most markedly Jewish part of the New Testament, while they are passed over in silence elsewhere' (Interpreter, Jan. 1906, pp. 195-207). On the whole it is easier to suppose that the events recorded actually took place, than to believe the far-fetched explanations of them offered by Soltau and Usener. (c) Other critics, again, resort to a mythological solution, and regard the adoration of the Magi and the attendant events as 'not history, but pious transformations of current mythic stories.' Réville believes that it was suggested by the Mithraic legend, though he admits that the supposition is incapable of proof (Études publiées en hommage à la faculté de théologie de Montauban, 1901, p. 339 ff.). Pfleiderer and Cheyne maintain that the star, the worship of the wise men, and the persecution of the Holy Child have many prototypes in tales concerning heroes of old, and belong to a pre-Christian international myth of the Redeemer (Pfleiderer, Early Christian Conception of Christ; Cheyne, Bible Problems); on which it may be remarked that although striking parallels can undoubtedly be produced, yet resemblances do not necessarily presuppose an imitation. (d) Another suggestion is that the narrative exhibits the characteristic features of Jewish Midrash or Haggâdâ, and is governed by an apologetic purpose. The writer's object is to show that the prophecy of Deu 18:15 was fulfilled in Jesus, and he endeavours to do this by drawing a parallel between the early career of Moses and that of the Christian Messiah (see the Midrash Rabbâ to Exodus in the section which deals with the birth of Moses, and cf. Josephus Ant. ii. ix. 2). Jesus is throughout represented as the antitype of Moses. This is the underlying motive of the narrative, to which may be added another influential idea, viz. the desire to suggest the homage of the Gentile world (G. H. Box in Interpreter, loc. cit.). The simplicity of the Gospel story, however, seems to be at variance with this hypothesis.

Allusion may here be made to the theory that the history of the Magi was added to the Gospel as late as the year a.d. 119. The evidence for this is a Syriac document, ascribed to Eusebius of Caesarea, which was published with an English translation by W. Wright in the Journal of Sacred Literature, vols. ix., x., 1866, from a 6th cent. British Museum codex, Add. 17, 142. The title is, 'Concerning the star; showing how and through what the Magi recognized the star, and that Joseph did not take Mary as his wife.' This tractate relates that the prophecy of Balaam about the star was recorded in a letter written by Balak to the king of Assyria, and preserved in the Assyrian archives. At last, in the reign of king Pir Shabour, the star appeared, and the Magi were sent with great pomp to do homage to the Messiah. The colophon at the end states: 'And in the year 430 (= a.d. 119), in the reign of Hadrianus Caesar.... this concern arose in (the minds of) men acquainted with the Holy Books; and through the pains of the great men in various places this history was sought for and found and written in the tongue of those who took this care.' As to the meaning of this statement, however, critics are not agreed (see F. C. Conybeare, Guardian, April 29, 1903; and, on the other side, Church Quarterly Review, July 1904, p. 389). The more probable explanation seems to be that 'the Holy Books' refers, not to the OT but to the narrative in Matthew 2, already, therefore, incorporated in the Gospel in a.d. 119; and that the 'history' is not Matthew 2, but the legend about the preservation of Balak's letter and the coming of the Magi in the reign of Pir Shabour.

To conclude this part of the subject, it may be pointed out that the story of the Magi must stand or fall with the other Matthaean narratives of the Infancy. All were probably drawn from some written source, Jewish-Christian in character, and perhaps originally Aramaic in language. The value of this source cannot here be determined (see artt. Birth of Christ, Matthew). It is sufficient to point out that if a Palestinian or semi-Palestinian origin of the narratives can be sustained, the hypothesis of direct pagan influence in their formation must be rejected.

3. Of the legendary accretions to the story of the Magi, the following deserve notice. From the 6th cent., if not before (Tert. Marc. iii. 13, Jud 1:9 are not decisive), the opinion prevailed that the Magi were kings. This belief is first unambiguously stated in a sermon ascribed to Caesarius of Arles (Aug. Opp. v. Append. Serm. 139. 3); and it prevailed universally during the Middle Ages (cf. Paschasius, Exp. in Mt. ii. 2). Hence the festival of Epiphany received the name Festum Trium Regum. The idea would, of course, find support in such passages as Psa 68:29; Psa 68:31; Psa 72:10, Isa 49:7; Isa 49:23; Isa 60:3; Isa 60:10; Isa 60:16; but there is no suggestion of it in the Evangelic narrative. (For discussions see Patritius, iii. p. 320 ff.; Spanheim, ii. p. 273 ff.; Barradius, Com. ix. c. 8).

The number of the Magi is not specified in the Gospel. Eastern tradition fixed it at twelve (Op. Imp. in Matthew 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.; cf. the curious MS fragment quoted in Classical studies in honour of Henry Drisler, p. 31—'Twelve kings set out from Persia to go to Jerusalem,' etc.), or thirteen (Bar Bahlul in Hyde, Rcl. Vet. Pers. [Note: Persian.] c. 31). But in the West the number of the Magi was reckoned at three (Max. Taur. Hom. 17, 20; Leo M. Serm. 31. § 1, 2; 34. § 2), probably on account of their threefold gift (Abelard, Serm. 4: 'Quot vero isti magi fuerint, ex numero trinae oblationis tres eos fuisse multi suspicantur'), though allegorical reasons were also found (Patritius, iii. 318 ff.).

The familiar names of the Magi—Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthasar—first occur in Bede, where also is given a remarkable description of their persons, derived most probably from some early work of art. 'Primus fuisse dicitur Melchior, senex et canus, barba prolixa et capillis... aurum obtulit regi Domino. Secundus nomine Gaspar, iuvenis imberbis, rubicundus... thure, quasi Deo oblatione digna, Deum honorabat. Tertius fuscus, integre barbatus, Balthasar nomine... per myrrham filium hominis moriturum professus est' (Collect. v. 541. For the association of the gifts with the several Magi, contrast the familiar verse, 'Gaspar fert myrrham, thus Melchior, Balthasar aurum'). Other names are found, e.g. Appellius, Amerius, Damascus: Magalath, Pangalath, Saracen: Ator, Sator, Peratoras, etc. (Patritius, iii. p. 326; Spanheim, ii. pp. 288, 289; Hebenstreit, de Magorum nomine, patria et statu dissert., Jenae, 1709). Hyde quotes thirteen names, among which the three familiar to Western tradition do not occur (Rel. Vet. Pers. [Note: Persian.] c. 31).

Symbolical meanings were early attached to the gifts. Thus Irenaeus says: 'Matthaeus autem Magos ab Oriente venientes ait.... per ea quae obtulerunt munera ostendisse quis erat qui adorabatur: myrrham quidem quod ipse erat qui pro mortali humano genere moreretur et sepeliretur: aurum vero quoniam rex, cuius regni finis non est: thus vero, quoniam Deus, qui et notus in Judaea factus est, et manifestus eis qui non quaerebant eum' (Hær. iii. 9. 2, cf. Max. Taur. Hom. 21; Leo, Serm. 34. 3; Origen, c. Cels. i. 60; Ambros. in Lk. ii. 44; [Aug.] Serm. 139. 2; Hilar. Com. in Matthew 1; and Christian poets, Juvencus, Ev. Hist. i. 285; Prudent. Cath. xii. 69 ff.; Sedulius, Carm. Pasch. ii. 96; [Claudian] Carm. Append. 21). Mediaeval tradition invented histories for these gifts. The gold consisted of thirty pennies, which had once been paid by Abraham for the cave of Machpelah, and which were afterwards given to Judas. Some of the myrrh is said to have been administered to Jesus on the cross (Quarterly Review, vol. lxxviii. p. 433 ff.).

Miraculous elements were increasingly introduced into the narrative, and the whole history was gradually amplified. Thus the star is alleged to have shone with surpassing brilliance (Ignat. Ephes. 19; Leo, Serm. 31. 1; Protevang. Jacob. 21; and pass. quoted in Barradius, Com. ix. 9), having the sun, moon, and other stars as 'chorus' to it (Ignat. loc. cit.). According to Eastern tradition, there was in the star an appearance of the Virgin and Child (Lightfoot, ap. Fath. ii. 81), or of a young child bearing a cross (Op. Imp. in Matthew 2 ap. Chrysost. vi.). The star was alleged to be an angel (Suicer, Thes. s.v. ἀστήρ); and according to Greg. of Tours it was still, in his time, to be seen in a well at Bethlehem (Mirac. i. 1). Similarly a mass of details were invented about the Magi themselves, their journey, and their later life and death. Here it need only be noticed that they are reported to have been baptized by St. Thomas. (A full account of the Magi-legends will be found in Crombach's monumental monograph, Primitiæ gentium sive historia et encomium SS. Trium Magorum. See also the epitome in the Quarterly Review, vol. lxxviii. p. 433 ff., of the mediaeval stories collected by John of Hildesheim; and the Boll. AA. SS. Jan. d. i. vi, and xi.).

The bodies of the Magi are said to have been discovered in the East in the 4th cent. (according to one tradition, by St. Helena herself), and to have been brought to Constantinople and deposited in the Church of St. Sofia. When Eustorgius became bishop of Milan, they were transferred to that city, whence, in the year 1162, they were again removed by Frederic Barbarossa to Cologne (Boll. AA. SS. Jan. d. vi.). The festival of Epiphany (the celebration of which in the West is mentioned first by Amm. Marc. xxi. 2) commemorated originally Christ's manifestation to the Magi, together with His baptism, His miracle at Cana (Max. Taur. Hom. 29; Isid. de Off. Eccl. i. 27; Abelard, Serm. 4), and the miracle of feeding the 5000 ([Aug.] Append. Serm. 36. 1). But soon the manifestation to the Magi became in the West, if not exclusively, yet principally, dwelt upon (see, e.g., Leo's Epiphany Sermons); and the common Western synonym for Epiphany was Festum Trium Regum (Bingham, Ant. xx. 4; DCA [Note: CA Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.] i. p. 617 ff.; Boll. AA. SS. Jan. d. vi.). In the Middle Ages the Magi were considered the patron saints of travellers, and inns were called after them. Their names were also used as charms to cure epilepsy and snake-bite (Spanheim, ii. pp. 289, 290). See also art. Star.

☞Magistrate

MAGISTRATE.—This English word occurs only twice in the Gospels (Authorized Version), viz. in Luk 12:11; Luk 12:58, where the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 gives the same translation. By our use of the word we usually mean one entrusted with the duty and power of putting laws into force, but the Greek ἄρχων (of which 'magistrate' is the translation in the passages before us) has a wider meaning, and may denote ruler, captain, chief, king. In the Gospels, ἄρχων (as well as the similar word ἡγεμών) occurs frequently, and will be referred to in the articles Rule and Ruler.

In the first of the instances to be noticed here our Lord prepares His disciples for the persecutions that await them. One form of persecution will be arrest and accusation before magistrates. In such an event, however, Christ's followers are not to concern themselves unduly about their defence, for the Holy Ghost shall teach them in the same hour what they ought to say. Their presence before the magistrates and their utterance in such a situation will constitute a twofold testimony—a testimony against the unbelief and injustice of their accusers, and perhaps also of the magistrates (Mar 13:11)—and a testimony to the truth of the gospel and to their own fidelity (Luk 21:13). The Lord's prediction and promise were alike fulfilled. Persecutions did ensue, and nothing is more remarkable than the dignity and wisdom of the words spoken by disciples thus accused before magistrates, the Holy Ghost being a mouth and wisdom unto them (Luk_21:15; cf. Act_4:13 et al.).

This policy of submissively trusting to the Holy ‘Ghost for defence is not to be taken as justifying Tolstoi’s theory of non-resistance. But our Lord’s counsel indicates that He looked upon existent magistracies as a part of the providential order, not to be overturned in any revolutionary way by His first disciples. Similarly, Christ taught that, the political circumstances being what they were, tribute should be paid to Caesar, the supreme magistrate (Mat_22:21). The capital instance of submission to the magistrate is Christ’s own demeanour before Pilate (styled ἡγεμόν in Mat_27:2, Luk_3:1). The subject of the relation between Christ and the magistrate runs into questions of Church and State, the spiritual and the civil power, individual conscience and public law.

In the second instance (Luk_12:58) Christ seems to warn against a litigious spirit, and to commend that ‘sweet reasonableness’ which is one of the gifts of His own Spirit, and which may obviate the necessity of going before a magistrate. This does not condemn as un-Christian all reference to a magistrate, but Christ hints that to agree with an adversary quickly may prove to be the highest prudence as well as the most Christian-like conduct. The advice is sometimes spiritualized to mean that the sinner ought to settle accounts with God quickly.

☛Magnificat

MAGNIFICAT.—Our primary interest in the hymn Magnificat (Luk_1:46-55) is centred in the question of (1) its authorship, upon which must largely depend the scope of (2) its interpretation. Then (3) the history of its liturgical use may be briefly summarized.

1. Authorship.—Opinions are divided as to the source from which St. Luke derived the materials of his first chapter. Völter suggests that it is based on an Apocalypse of Zacharias, a Jewish document which has been edited by a Christian, who found the Magnificat attributed to Elisabeth, and transferred it to Mary. Weizsäcker thinks that St. Luke simply inserted an early Christian hymn. A more satisfactory view is that of Sanday (Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible ii. 639, 644), who suggests that St. Luke was supplied with a special (written) source, through one of the women mentioned in Luk_8:3; Luk_24:10, possibly Joanna, who, being the wife of Herod’s steward, may also have supplied information about the court of Herod. We know from Joh_19:25

(cf. Act 1:14) that the Virgin Mary was brought into contact with this group. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 88) calls attention to ‘a womanly spirit in the whole narrative, which seems inconsistent with the transmission from man to man, and which, moreover, is an indication of Luke’s character; he had a marked sympathy with women.’ On the supposition that St. Luke used an Aramaic tradition or document, it is possible to account for all the characteristics of style by which Harnack (see below) seeks to prove that he was the author both of the Magnificat and of the Benedictus.

Having described the visit of the Virgin Mary to Elisabeth, and Elisabeth’s salutation, the Textus Receptus has καὶ εἶπεν [Μαριάμ] with the variant reading Ἐλισάβετ. Then follows the hymn, the text of which has been excellently preserved, the only other doubtful reading being μεγάλα, for which we should probably read μεγαλεῖα.

Μαριάμ is the reading of all Greek Manuscripts, of the great majority of Latin Manuscripts, and of innumerable Patristic testimonies, back to the 2nd cent., when Tertullian wrote (de Anima, 26): ‘Exsultat Elisabet, Johannes intus impulerat, glorificat dominum Maria, Christus intus instinxerat.’

Ἐλισάβετ is the reading of three Old Latin Manuscripts. a (Vercellensis, saec. iv.), b (Veronensis, saec. v.), rhe (Rhedigeranus-Vratislaviensis, saec. fere vii.), in Burkitt’s phrase ‘a typical European group,’ to which may be added the testimony of Niceta of Remesiana, de Psalmodiae Bono, c. 9: ‘Nec Elisabeth, diu sterilis, edito de repromissione filio, Deum de ipsa anima magnificare cessat; c. 11: Cum Elisabeth Dominum anima nostra magnificat.’

So also Origen, or his translator Jerome, in the 5th Homily on Luke 5 (Lommatzsch, t. v. p. 108 f.): ‘Inuenitur beata Maria, sicut in aliquantis exemplaribus reperimus, prophetare; non enim ignoramus, quod secundum alios codices et haec uerba Elisabet uaticinetur Spiritu itaque sancto tunc repleta est Maria,’ etc. Harnack thinks that Jerome, if he had been responsible for this reference, would have mentioned whether the reading was in Latin or Greek Manuscripts. But as Jerome was writing in Latin, and the evidence of Niceta shows that the reading Elisabeth was more persistent and widespread in the very district from which Jerome came,—having been born in Pannonia, not a great distance from Remesiana,—it must be considered still possible that he interpolated the reference.

Lastly we come to Irenaeus, iv. 7. 1 (Cod. Clarom. et Voss.): ‘sed et Elisabet ait: Magnificat anima mea dominum,’ etc. Cod. Arund. ‘Maria.’ In iii. 10. 1: ‘Propter quod exultans Maria clamabat pro ecclesia prophetans: Magnificat anima mea dominum,’ etc. Here the context proves that Irenaeus intended to write 'Maria.*' [Note: In iii. 14. 3, Irenaeus refers to Luk_1:42-45 as exclamatio Elisabet.] Thus it seems probable that it was the translator of Irenaeus, or a copyist, who introduced the reading Elisabet from his Old Latin Bible, and we may safely carry it back to the 3rd century.* [Note: Burkitt still adheres to his view, that 'Irenaeus regarded Elisabeth as a type of 'the ancient Jewish Ecclesia prophesying by a Divine Spirit about the Christ.']

How then are we to account for the reading? Bardenhewer thinks that, Μαριάμ having dropped out, Ἐλισάβετ was supplied by a copyist. But most critics (Burkitt, Harnack, Wordsworth) agree that the original text must have been καὶ εἶπεν without either name. Burkitt puts it concisely: ' "Mary" was read by Tertullian as well as by all Greek and Syriac texts. This is fatal to "Elisabeth"; yet, if "Mary" were genuine, the actual occurrence of "Elisabeth" in the European branch of the Old Latin would be inexplicable. But if the original text of the Gospel had καὶ εἶπεν Μεγαλύνει, κ.τ.λ., without either name, all the evidence falls into line.'

On the question, which is the right gloss, critics are divided. Harnack and Burkitt argue for 'Elisabeth,' Wordsworth and Spitta for 'Mary.' (1) Harnack does not think that the exclamation of Luk_1:42-45 covers all that is implied in Luk_1:41 καὶ ἐπλήσθη πνεύματος ἁγίου ἢ Ἐλισάβετ. In Luk_1:67 similar words are used about Zacharias, and are followed by the Benedictus. Nothing is said about Mary being filled with the prophetic spirit. It does not seem necessary, on the other hand, to resort to the extreme remedy of Spitta, who refuses to consider that the Benedictus supplies a parallel case, because he thinks that it has been interpolated at this point. The 'glowing words' of Elisabeth's address need some reply. 'Could St. Mary, who answered so freely and so bravely, yet so humbly, to the angel, have been silent at such a moment when addressed by one whom she knew so well?' (Wordsworth). Though undoubtedly she is kept, or more probably keeps herself, in the background of this history, and is not spoken of as 'filled with the Holy Ghost,' there is no question of deepest communing with God (Gottinnigkeit, Spitta), and this suffices to explain the outpouring in devotion and faith of a mind stored with OT phrases.

In the OT 'when any question is addressed to a person or persons whom the reader knows to be present, the formula of reply is frequently and perhaps generally without proper name and without pronoun'; cf. Luk_2:49. Later in his Gospel Lk. generally uses ὁ δὲ εἶπεν; but the first chapters have 'a special OT colouring' (Wordsworth), in view of which Harnack's argument, that 'if in Luk_2:46 the subject was to be changed, Lk. would have written εἶπεν δὲ Μαριάμ,' falls to the ground. Further, the words μακαριοῦσί με πᾶσαι αἱ γενεαί of Luk 2:48 seem to be a reply to Elisabeth's μακαρία ἡ πιστεύουσα. On the other hand, it is only fair to point out that Prof. Burkitt seeks to prove that St. Luke was 'remarkably fond of inserting καὶ εἶπεν or εἶπεν δὲ between the speeches of his characters without a change of speaker.'† [Note: JThSt vii. p. 223.] (2) Another argument has been based on the words ἔμεινεν δὲ Μαριάμ σὺν αὐτῇ, which are said to make it probable that Elisabeth has been the speaker, otherwise Lk. would have written ἔμεινεν δὲ Μ. σὺν τῇ Ἐ. or ἔμεινεν δὲ σὺν τῇ Ἐ. 'The Peshitta as well as the Sinai Palimpsest renders, "Now Mary remained with Elisabeth." But the Greek has retained "the tell-tale αὐτῇ" ' (Burkitt).

In the OT the personality of the singer is, as a rule, sunk in the song, and the name is mentioned at the end as if to pick up the thread (cf. Balaam, Num 24:25; Moses, Deu 32:44; Deu 34:1 etc.). It is true that Hannah's name is not mentioned in 1Sa 2:11, but it has been mentioned at the beginning. The name marks 'the whole section Luk 1:39-56 as what we may call a "Mary section," ' the Syriac reading being an attempt to clear up ambiguity (Wordsworth).

On the whole, then, so far as external evidence goes, the balance of probability is in favour of the reading or gloss 'Mary.' But the more difficult question of internal evidence remains for discussion. Does the Magnificat seem more suitable on the lips of Elisabeth?

Harnack thinks that it was modelled on the lines of Hannah's song, that it expresses the feeling of a mother from whom has been removed what Jewish women felt as 'the reproach of childlessness.' Burkitt suggests that 'the Λόγος ἀπὸ Σιγῆς προελθῶν more corresponds to the fitness of things than a burst of premature song.'

Apart from the question raised by Wellhausen whether Hannah's song has been interpolated in 1 Samuel 2, Spitta thinks that it is the song of a warrior rather than a woman, and looks elsewhere for parallels to the Magnificat. Any way, either Mary or Elisabeth would regard it as the song of Hannah, which is the main point before us. We cannot do better than quote the text at this point, with Harnack's parallels, to introduce his argument that St. Luke is thereby proved to be the actual author of the hymn which he puts into the mouth of Elisabeth.

In regard to these parallels Spitta argues with some force that there are nearer parallels in the Psalms; e.g. Psa 33:3-4 ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ ἐπαινεθήσεται ἡ ψυχὴ μου ... μεγαλύνετε τὸν κύριον σὺν ἐμοί; Psa 34:9 ζ μου ἀγαλλιάσεται ἐπὶ τῷ κυρίῳ, τερφθήσεται ἐπὶ τῷ σωτηρίῳ αὐτοῦ; LXX Psalm 34:27 =Psa 39:17 = Psa 69:5 ἀγαλλιάσαιντο καὶ εὐφρανθήσων ἐπὶ σοὶ πάντες οἱ ζητοῦντές σε κύριε, καὶ εἰπάτωσαν διὰ παντός, Μεγαλυνθήτω ὁ κύριος, οἱ ἀγαπῶντες τὸ σωτήριόν σου.* [Note: He quotes Psa 9:14 f. Psa 12:4-6; Psa 30:8 as parallels to Luk 1:53.] This is true; but at the same time we cannot doubt that a Jewish woman would turn to Hannah's song as, so to speak, a model, even though the phrases of the psalms which she used often in devotion would come more readily to her lips while working out her idea.

Harnack picks out certain words as having no place in his parallels, and suggests that they are not found in the LXX Septuagint, and being characteristic of Lk.'s style, prove that he was really the author of the hymn. Spitta, however, proves that the phrases in question are not only found in the LXX Septuagint, but are not so characteristic of Lk.'s style; e.g. (1) ἰδοὺ γάρ is found not only in Luk 1:44; Luk 2:10; Luk 6:23; Luk 17:21, Act 9:11, but also in 2Co 7:11;* [Note: Psa 50:7-8; Psa 53:6, Isa 32:7; Isa 38:17; Isa 44:22; Isa 62:11; Isa 66:15.] (2) ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, said to be found in Luk 5:10; Luk 12:52; Luk 22:18; Luk 22:69, Act 18:6 only, is also found 2Co 5:16.† [Note: Gen 46:30, 2Ch 16:9, Tob 10:13, 11:9, Isa 48:6, Dan 10:17.] These instances alone will suffice to prove how unsafe the foundations are upon which Harnack's argument is based.

There is one other possible source for some of the phrases which has not been mentioned, i.e. the 18 Benedictions of the Synagogue (quoted by Warren, Liturgy of Ante-Nicene Church, p. 243).

Luk 1:49

Ben. 2: 'Thou art mighty, O Lord, world without end.'

Luk 1:51

Ben. 12: 'Let the proud speedily be uprooted, broken, crushed, and humbled speedily in our days. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who breakest down the enemy and humblest the proud.'

Luk 1:54-55

Ben. 1: 'Blessed art Thou who rememberest the pious deeds of our fathers, and sendest the Redeemer to their children's children. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, the shield of Abraham.'

On the whole, then, in spite of Harnack's arguments, there is still room to believe that St. Luke translated, or perhaps to some extent worked up into a Greek hymn, the materials supplied to him in an Aramaic tradition or document. There was no unnatural seeking after effect. In reply to Elisabeth's address no conventional answer would seem in place. On the other hand, Prof. Burkitt regards the whole of Elisabeth's words as the acknowledgment of Mary's salutation, and finds 'a striking parallel in Luk 2:25-35, i.e. the conversation of Mary and Simeon. In both cases Mary's interlocutor is said to have a holy Spirit, in both cases the whole of the words recorded is assigned to the interlocutor, and the words themselves consist partly of pious meditation, partly of words addressed exclusively to Mary' (JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] vii. p. 225). This is a question perhaps of sentiment. But few devout believers in the Incarnation would hesitate to express their profound gratitude for the words of simple faith and hope, grounded, as Spitta has certainly shown, as much on the Psalms as on Hannah's song, a spontaneous offering of praise from a lowly spirit continually in communion with the Divine, and therefore never lacking words of praise. We may regard these words as spoken in substance by the Virgin Mary, and yet maintain the truth of the phrase of Ignatius about 'the Word proceeding from silence.' The silence remains unbroken. No personal dread of the possible reproach not of childlessness but of shame, no personal exultation in this transcendent blessedness among women, find expression.

2. Interpretation.—The scope of interpretation varies in accordance with the view held concerning the authorship. Harnack's description is correct so far as it goes: 'The artistic arrangement of the pronouns, which governs the hymn, expresses exactly the progress of thought, advancing from the subjective to the objective in order to return again to the subjective, though in a higher form.’ But he fails to express the situation so clearly described by Liddon (p. 13) from the internal evidence.

‘Like the songs of Zacharias and Simeon, it is something more than a psalm, and something less than a complete Christian hymn. A Christian poet, living after the Resurrection of Christ, would surely have said more; a Hebrew psalmist would have said less than Mary. In this Hymn of hers we observe a consciousness of nearness to the fulfilment of the great promises, to which there is no parallel even in the latest of the psalms; and yet even Mary does not speak of the Promised One, as an Evangelist or an Apostle would have spoken of Him, by His Human Name, and with distinct reference to the mysteries of His Life and Death and Resurrection. Her Hymn was a native product of one particular moment of transition in sacred religious history, and of no other; when the twilight of the ancient dispensation was melting, but had not yet melted, into the full daylight of the new.’

In Strophe i. (Luk_1:46-47) she offers praise to God as His due, with all powers of the soul, that is, of imagination and impulse; and of the spirit, with the faculties of reason and memory and will.

In Strophe ii. (Luk_1:48-49) she dwells on the distinction vouchsafed to her in becoming the Mother of the Incarnate Son. She is to live in the memory of mankind not because she deserves it, but because He whose Name is holy so wills.

In Strophe iii. (Luk_1:51; Luk_1:53), turning away from self, she rises, as in moments of spiritual enlightenment any one may rise, to larger views of God’s purposes in the shaping of human history. His presence and power are vindicated in the humbling of the proudest dynasties and the triumph of the meek. This thought is characteristic of a group of psalms (9, 10, 22, 25, 35, 40, 69, 109; cf. 4 Ezr (2 Es) 11:42, Ps-Son_5:13 f.) which must often have been in the minds of the little group—Joseph, Mary, Zacharias, Elisabeth, Simeon, Anna—who were looking for the redemption of Israel.

In Strophe iv. (Luk_1:54-55) she comes back to the thought of the Messianic time now beginning: the assurances given to the fathers should be fulfilled. The source of the Incarnation is found in God’s attributes of loving-kindness and truth.

3. Liturgical use.—In the Eastern Church the Magnificat is sung as a morning canticle. This also was its use in the West at one time. In the directions at the end of the Rule of Aurelian, bp. of Arles, c. [Note: circa, about.] 540, it is mentioned as used in the Office of Lands ‘with antiphon or with alleluia, following OT psalms and canticles, and followed by Gloria in excelsis.’* [Note: Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 393.]

In the treatise of Niceta, de Psalmodiae Bono, to which we have already alluded, the primary reference is to Vigils, to the use, therefore, of the Magnificat in the evening. The list of canticles mentioned corresponds to that in use in the Church of Constantinople at that time. When the later-hour offices were developed in the West, it was, in accordance with such usage, attached to Vespers, with varying antiphon. Thus it passed into the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI., and has since been used in Evensong after the first Lesson.

In Julian's Dict. of Hymnology there are references to several metrical versions which found favour from the 16th century. But these are of no importance.

☩ Mahalaleel

MAHALALEEL.—An ancestor of Jesus, Luk_3:37.

☩ Maid

MAID.—The English words 'maid,' 'maiden' represent three Greek words: κοράσιον (Mat_9:24 f. Authorized Version 'maid,' Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'damsel'); ἡ παῖς (Luk_8:51 Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'maiden'; Luk_8:54 Authorized Version 'maid,' Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'maiden'); and παιδίσκη (Mat_26:69, Joh_18:17 Authorized Version 'damsel,' Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'maid'; Mar_14:66; Mar_14:69, Luk_22:56 Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'maid'; Luk_12:45 Authorized Version 'maidens,' Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'maidservants').

The first two clearly signify ‘young girl,’ answering to the Aramaic talîtha (cf. Mar 5:41 and Luk 8:54 : for a discussion of the Aramaic form see art. Talitha cumi). Talîtha seems to have been frequently employed in the sense of ‘young woman.’ In the Targums it is used of Dinah, Miriam, and Esther. It and its Greek equivalents have almost that meaning as applied to the daughter of Jairus. κοράσιον seems to have lost its diminutive force in later Greek and to have been no longer employed as a familiar term, but to have been virtually equivalent to κόρη, παιδίσκη, the feminine of παιδίσκος, originally a diminutive of παῖς, meant in the first instance ‘girl’ and then ‘domestic female servant’ or ‘slave.’ It has the latter meaning in the Gospels. In some passages in the LXX Septuagint (Exo 20:10, Lev 25:44 etc.) it represents ’âmâh (cf. art. Handmaid). It seems to have been used especially of a doorkeeper (Gospels, Act 12:13, Lysias cited by Wetstein). That it often referred to a slave, not a hired servant, is evident from the passages quoted by Wetstein from the grammarians, and seems to be implied in the contrast between παιδίσκης and ἐλευθέρως in Gal 4:22.

☞ Maimed

MAIMED.—This term signifies disabled by wounding or mutilation; deprived of the use of a necessary constitutive part of the body; mutilated; rendered unable to defend oneself or to discharge necessary functions. In Mat 15:30 and Mar 9:43 κυλλός is the word employed and is translation ‘maimed’ in both Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 . It is kindred with κοῖλος, ‘hollow,’ and signifies originally ‘crooked,’ ‘bent,’ and so crippled and halt. κυλλῆ χεῖρ is the hand with its fingers bent so as to make a hollow palm. ἔμβαλε κυλλῆ (sc. χεῖρι) = ‘put it into the hollow of the hand.’ In Luk 14:13; Luk 14:21 the word used is ἀνάπηρος, i.e. πηρός = ‘deprived of some member of the body’ (Lat. mancus), preceded by ἀνά intensive. The composite word indicates an extreme form of bodily mutilation, and Jesus is never said to have restored one so suffering. The word is not employed in connexion with our Lord’s miracles, but only in His invitation to the blessings of the Kingdom, to which all outcast sufferers were with Divine compassion called.

☒ Majesty

1. The term.—In the NT the word ‘majesty’ is associated with Christ in three different connexions. (1) In Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 of Luk 9:43 we read that the people ‘were all astonished at the majesty (μεγαλειότης, Authorized Version ‘mighty power’) of God.’ The immediate occasion of their astonishment was the healing of the lunatic boy, but v. 43b, and esp. the ἐποίηι which critical editors substitute for ἐποίησεν of Textus Receptus, seems to show that the miracles of Christ generally are to be thought of as producing this impression that the Divine μεγαλειότης was manifesting itself through Him.

(2) In 2Pe 1:16 the writer, who claims to have been present with Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration, says of that experience, ‘We were eyewitnesses of his majesty’ (Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885; Gr. μεγαλειότης). The word μεγαλειότης is found in only one other passage of the NT, viz. Act 19:27, where it is used to describe the ‘magnificence’ (Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885) of the great goddess Diana. It is thus an interesting coincidence that the two instances of its use in connexion with Christ belong to the episode of the Transfiguration and the incident of the healing of the lunatic boy which followed immediately after. On the ‘holy mount’ the favoured three received a revelation of Christ’s inherent μεγαλειότης (the word ἐπόπται, ‘eyewitnesses,’ is a technical term denoting those who had been admitted to the highest grade of initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries). And when He came down from the mountain, the μεγαλειότης of God shone forth through His works in the eyes of all the multitude.

A comparison of the uses of μεγαλειότης in Luk 9:43, Act 19:27, and 2Pe 1:16 raises a doubt whether ‘majesty’ is the most adequate rendering of the word in the first and third passages, and whether ‘magnificence’ (as in Act 19:27 Authorized and Revised Versions) or ‘splendour’ would not more correctly reproduce the original idea. This is suggested by the ordinary use of the adj. μεγαλειος in class. Greek, and even by the two instances of its employment in the NT (Luk 1:49, Act 2:11). The evidence of the LXX Septuagint also points in the same direction; for while μεγαλειότης is used in Jer_33:9 to translation ἰστησῶν (Authorized Version ‘honour,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘glory’)—a word which is usually rendered by δόξα—the terms ordinarily taken to express the idea of greatness or majesty are μεγαλωσύνη and μεγαλοπρέπεια (e.g. 2Sa_7:23, Psa_145:3; Psa_145:5-6; Psa_145:12).

With this idea of Christ’s miracles, or of His miraculous being, as an effulgence of the Divine splendour or magnificence, compare the statement of Joh_2:11 that by the miracle of Cana Jesus ‘manifested his glory’ (ἐφανερώσε τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ). Cf. also the ἐπόπται τῆς ἐκείνου μεγαλειότητος of 2Pe_1:16 with what is said in 2Pe_1:17 of the ‘glory’ (δόξα) which Jesus received upon the mount from God the Father.

(3) In Heb_1:3; Heb_8:1 we see Jesus seated ‘on the right hand of the Majesty on high.’ The word for ‘Majesty’ in these two cases is μεγαλωσύνη, a term that does not occur again in the NT except in the doxology at the end of Jude (Jud_1:25). The idea of Christ as seated at God’s right hand, which is so frequent in the NT (Mat_26:64 ||, Act_2:33; Act_7:55 f., Rom_8:34, Eph_1:20, Col_3:1 etc.), was no doubt taken in the first case from Psa_110:1 (cf. Heb_1:3 with Heb_1:13). It seems always to be used with reference not to His pre-existent dignity, but to the exaltation that followed His incarnation and suffering. Moreover, in the two passages in Hebrews there is no direct ascription of the Divine majesty to Jesus. The idea is that of His exercise of a supremely exalted office as the Great High Priest who is the Mediator between God and men.

2. The quality of majesty in Christ.—Apart from its infrequent use of the word, the NT affords abundant material for a consideration of the majesty of Christ, whether in His estate of humiliation or of exaltation.

(1) With regard to His life on earth, (a) it is evident that there was nothing of the majestic in His outward circumstances. From His birth in a stable to His death on a cross, it was a life of ‘no reputation,’ His form being that of a servant and not of a king (cf. Php_2:8). And on the one occasion when He assumed a kind of royal state, and suffered the multitudes in the streets and the children in the Temple to hail Him with Hosannas (Mat_21:9; Mat_21:15 f.), His majesty, after all, as the Evangelists subsequently perceived, was but the majesty of meekness, for Zion’s King came to her gates, as the prophet had said, ‘lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass’ (Mat_21:1 ff., Joh_12:14 ff.; cf. Zec_9:9).

(b) Was there no majesty, then, in His personal appearance? The Gospels are completely silent on this point, and in the lack of any trustworthy tradition the Fathers seem to have fallen back chiefly on the prophetic pictures of the Messiah, with the result that a wide diversity of view came to exist, according as one passage or another was taken as the norm. The earlier tendency, inspired without doubt by prevailing ascetic ideals, was to fasten upon the words of Deutero-Isaiah with reference to the Suffering Servant (Isa_53:2-3), and to represent Jesus as utterly devoid of all beauty and dignity of face or form. ‘Base of aspect’ (αἰσχρὸς τὴν ὄψιν) is the verdict of Clement of Alexandria (Paed. iii. 1), who was preceded in his estimate by Justin Martyr, and followed by Tertullian. There came a reaction by and by, represented in the East by Origen and in the West by Jerome, when men bethought themselves of such a prophetic Psalm as the 45th, with its vision of One ‘fairer than the children of men’ (Isa_53:2) and girded with glory and majesty (Isaiah 53 :). Jerome in particular maintained this high view of the majesty of Christ’s outward aspect. There was ‘something starry’ (sidereum quiddam), he affirmed, in the Saviour’s face and eyes (Ep. ad Principiam); ‘the brightness and majesty of His Divinity ... shed their rays over His human countenance’ (in Mat_1:8). This was the view that ultimately prevailed in the Church, and finds expression in the so-called ‘Letter of Lentulus’ (see vol. i. p. 315). It gave rise to a type of presentment that has dominated Christian art ever since; but it is right to remember that this conventional conception of a Christ who was tall in stature, beautiful in countenance, dignified and even majestic in figure and bearing, rests upon no real basis of authentic tradition, as it is supported by no single word of the NT; and that Augustine has stated the simple truth when he says, ‘Qua fuerit ille facie penitus ignoramus’ (de Trin. viii. 5).

(c) But there is a moral majesty, a majesty of purity and truth and goodness, that is independent of all outward seeming; and the Gospels give abundant illustration of Christ’s endowment with this majesty of soul. Milton tells us how, face to face with the cherub:

‘abash’d the devil stood,

And felt how awful goodness is’ (Par. Lost, iv. 846).

And no one can read the Gospel narratives without perceiving how good men and bad alike were smitten at times with a sense of subduing awe as they stood in the presence of Jesus Christ. This was the experience of the Baptist when he exclaimed, ‘I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?’ (Mat_3:14). It was the feeling of Simon Peter when he cried, ‘Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord’ (Luk_5:8). This majesty of Christ’s character forces itself upon us at every point, rising higher and higher until it reaches a culmination in the awful scenes of the judgment-hall and the cross. Was it not this majesty of a pure soul that arrested and troubled Pilate himself in the midst of his keen concern for his own selfish interests and his lofty Roman contempt for a mere Jew? And was it not this same majesty of holiness that smote upon the heart of the very centurion who carried out the sentence of crucifixion, so that he exclaimed, 'Certainly this was a righteous man' (Luk_23:47)? Sometimes we see Christ's moral majesty flashing out so overwhelmingly that it works with a kind of physical effect, as when the profane traffickers in the Temple cringe and flee before Him; or when, in the Garden, as He steps out of the shadows, saying, 'I am he,' His enemies go backward, and fall to the ground (Joh_18:5 f.).

(d) But besides the unconscious majesty of goodness, we see in Jesus Christ throughout His public ministry a conscious majesty of the most positive kind. This man, so meek and lowly in heart, does not hesitate to make the most astounding claims. He claims a personal authority that sweeps aside in a moment all the traditional learning of the nation's religious teachers (Mat_7:28-29). Never, surely, in the world's history has there been another series of utterances so clothed in the majesty of spiritual power as the Sermon on the Mount. And this poor Carpenter of Nazareth further assumes without the least hesitation the name and dignity of the promised Messiah of Israel; He affirms, in a sense altogether unique, that He is the Son of God, unto whom all things have been delivered of the Father (Mat_11:27, Luk_10:22; cf. John 14-17); He invites every burdened and weary soul to come unto Him for rest (Mat_11:28). And what could be more majestic than the language in which Christ assumes the office of the universal Judge of men, and describes the events and issues of that solemn day when the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the nations shall be gathered before Him? (Mat_25:31 ff.).

(2) It is unnecessary to dwell in any detail upon the majesty of the exalted Christ. From St. Peter's first sermon on the Day of Pentecost (Act_2:33 ff.) down to the last utterance of the Apostolic Church, the Christ of the NT is the Christ enthroned in glory, dignity, and power. His followers do not think of Him 'according to the flesh' (2Co_5:16)—as the Prophet of Galilee or the Man of Sorrows. The Christ of whom they do habitually think is risen, ascended, glorified, and set down on the right hand of the Majesty on high (cf. Rom_8:34, 1Co_15:14 ff., Gal_2:20, Php_2:9 ff., 1Th_4:13 ff., Heb_1:2 ff. and passim). Apart from the evidence of their own writings, no better proof of this can be found than the fact that for more than a century after the death of Jesus the Church appears never to have concerned itself in any way as to His earthly appearance, or to have had any desire for pictorial representations of His human face and form. And is it not highly significant that, on the one solitary occasion on which a NT writer has set himself to describe the Lord's personal appearance, the attempt is based upon no recollections or traditions regarding Jesus of Nazareth, but upon a splendid conception of the majesty of the exalted Christ—His eyes as a flame of fire, His voice as the sound of many waters, in His right hand seven stars, and His countenance as the sun shineth in his strength (Rev. 1:13 ff.)?

Malchus

MALCHUS (Μάλχος).—The name of the man whom Peter wounded in the right ear at the arrest of Jesus (Joh 18:10).

Malchus was a common Semitic name, though not certainly met with among the Jews proper. By both Delitzsch and Salkinson it is vocalized מַלְכוּ, which is no more than a transliteration. Josephus (see Niese's index) mentions five persons who bore it under the form of Μάλχος or Μάλιχος, whence an original מַלְכוּ has been inferred (Dalman, Gram. Aram. Aramaic 104). But the true Greek form seems to have been Μαλιχας (Periplus maris Erythraei, cf. Müll. Geogr. Gr. Min. i. 272); and מַלְכוּ, pronounced מַלְכוּ, appears in three inscriptions (CIS [Note: IS Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum.] ii. 158, 174, 218) that may be dated with some confidence between b.c. 40 and a.d. 40. In these inscriptions the name is Nabataean; but the root מַלְכוּ is common to all the Semitic languages, and appears to belong to the unhistorical period prior to the separation of the various peoples. In Assyrian it is a designation of a subordinate ruler (Schrader, COT [Note: OT Cuneiform Inscriptions and the OT.] i. 23), a prince rather than a king. While there are instances of its use in relation to a god (cf. Boehmer in Expos. Times, xvi. [1905] 473 ff.), there is no need to see in it anything more than an allusion, serious or playful, to superiority in rank or in pretence.

The bearer of the name in the Gospel narrative held a position of trust in the household of the high priest, probably Caiaphas (Joh 18:13). It has been assumed that the other Evangelists suppressed the name (Mat 26:51, Mar 14:47, Luk 22:50) with a view to protect Peter from revenge or an action at law on the part of the Jews. It is at least as likely that they were ignorant of the name, or of opinion that no purpose was to be served by its mention. There is no evidence that Malchus was exceptionally active in the arrest, or anything more than an onlooker. Peter's forward rush, when his indignation could be restrained no longer, towards the group of which Jesus was becoming the centre (Joh 18:4), suggests rather that Malchus was on the skirt of the group, and not immediately engaged in binding Jesus. He happened to be in Peter's way in his attempt to rescue his Master, and may well have been personally unknown to the majority of the disciples. If John was the unnamed disciple who was 'known unto the high priest' (Joh 18:15), possibly because he supplied the family of Annas with fish (according to an old tradition; cf. David Smith, Days of His Flesh, 465), he would be acquainted with both Malchus and his kinsman (Joh 18:26); and the mention of the name in the Fourth Gospel may be taken as one of the undesigned indications of Johannine authorship. The healing of the ear of Malchus is recorded by Lk. alone, but is an essential part of the story (cf. Expos. Times, x. [1898-99] 139, 188), and exactly such an incident as would be likely to attract the notice of a physician, and so to calm the soldiers as to make the subsequent remonstrance preserved by each of the Synoptics possible. The natural order of events was first the healing of the wound, followed, while Malchus' friends were crowding around him, by the rebuke of Peter, and then, as soon as the people were ready to listen, by the taunting protest in regard to the manner of the arrest. Thereupon Jesus consented to be seized, and in perfect self-possession passed on to His trial and death.

⚡ Malefactor

MALEFACTOR.—Two Gr. words, whose shades of meaning are indistinguishable, are thus translated in NT: (1) κακοποιός or κακὸν ποιῶν (lit. 'evil-doer'), Joh 18:30, 1Pe 2:12; 1Pe 2:14; 1Pe 4:15; (2) κακοῦργος (lit. 'evil-worker'), Luk 23:32-33; Luk 23:39, 2Ti 2:9. Authorized Version renders κακοποιός 'malefactor' in Joh 18:30, 'evil-doer' elsewhere; but Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 gives 'evil-doer' throughout. Again Authorized Version renders κακοῦργος 'malefactor' in Luk 23:32-33; Luk 23:39, 'evil-doer' in 2Ti 2:9, while Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 makes it always 'malefactor.' This illustrates the NT Revisers' uniformity in the translation of words.

In Luk 23:32 the best attested text is ἕτεροι κακοῦργοι δύο, not ἕτεροι δύο κακοῦργοι (Textus Receptus). Hence it is maintained by Alford and others that we ought to read 'two other malefactors' (without a comma after 'other') instead of 'two others, malefactors' (Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885). There is really no difficulty about adopting this rendering, which does not imply that St. Luke assents to the judgment that Jesus was a malefactor, but merely states the fact that He was led to execution as such.

☒ Mammon

MAMMON, or more accurately 'Mamon,' is the transliteration of the Gr. equivalent for a late Aram. Aramaic or Syro-Chald. term denoting 'wealth' or 'riches' or 'treasure,' whose etymology is still a matter of dispute (cf. the articles s.v. in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible and Encyc. Bib.). In the Gospels it means worldliness in the form of wealth, and occurs twice—(a) in Mat 6:24 = Luk 16:13 ('ye cannot serve God and mammon'); and (b) in Luk 16:9; Luk 16:11, where it is defined, or rather described, as unrighteous, the latter epithet being applied to it not only in the Targums, but as early as 1Enoch 63:10 ('our souls are satisfied with the mammon of unrighteousness, yet for all that we descend into the flame of Sheol's pain').

The genuineness of the logion (a) there is no need to question, although its present position is probably due to editorial arrangement. Of the two settings, Matthew's seems preferable. Mammon here represents a sort of personified worldliness, a Plutus of the age, and Christ exposes the impossibility of combining devotion to this end with devotion to the true God. The spiritual life, He explains in Mat 6:19-24, must have the two notes of inwardness and unity. Compromise here is out of the question. The object of a man's confidence determines ultimately his character; and single-mindedness is the supreme condition of health and effectiveness in religion. Jesus 'warns them that it is impossible to be at once high-minded and just and wise, and to comply with the accustomed forms of human society, seek power, wealth, or empire, either from the idolatry of habit, or as the direct instruments of sensual gratification' (Shelley). Objection is sometimes taken to this counsel as inapplicable to a group of good disciples. But Jesus had rich people among His adherents, and besides it is not the rich alone who are tempted to make a god of their money. Poor people are just as prone in some ways to attach an exaggerated importance to wealth, to overestimate its power, and thus to let it exercise a control over their desires. No written comment on the verse, however, can equal the impression made by Mr. G. F. Watts' picture of 'Mammon,' with its coarse, gross limbs crushing human life; to which one pendant is the same painter's picture entitled, 'For he had great possessions.'

The Lukan setting is as apt in its own way, placing the same logion amid a cluster of characteristic (see Theophilus) sayings and parables on the dangers and abuse of money (cf. Luk 16:14). Luk 16:13 forms one of several rather heterogeneous fringes to the parable of the Unjust Steward (Luk 16:1-8 or Luk 16:1-7), arranged with almost as little connexion as the logia in Luk 16:16 f. So far as it stands, however, it has the same meaning as in Mat 6:24. The main difficulty is to correlate it with what immediately precedes, and this opens up the unpersonified use of mammon in the second class of passages (b). The point of Luk 16:1-8, which is certainly a genuine parable of Jesus, is to inculcate the wisdom of making provision in the present life for the life which is to come. The temper commended by Jesus is that of a man who has wit enough to see that his future prospects depend on his present exertions, and who inferentially has no illusions whatever about himself. He is open-eyed to the present situation. He does not flatter himself into a rosy view of his case, or look to some happy chance to bear him through. A prudent regard to self-interest is the saving feature of his character and conduct. So much is clear. The trouble is to adjust Luk 16:9-13 to this standpoint. If, with critics like J. Weiss, Wernle, and Jülicher, all five verses are regarded as editorial glosses, the solution becomes fairly simple, the original parable having nothing to do with the use of money at all, as Christ meant it. But Luk 16:9 may well be the original sequel to Luk 16:8 (so Wellhausen recently), in which case 'the mammon of unrighteousness' there and in Luk 16:11 is explained by 'what belongs to another' in Mat 16:12. Wealth, Jesus teaches, does not really belong to a Christian. It is something alien to him. Yet, as the steward used wealth that was not his own for his own ends, so the Christian can and must employ his wealth in order to promote his eternal interests. Money given in alms makes friends for him in heaven, just as it lays up a treasure for him there (Luk 11:41, Mat 12:23 etc.). Instead of serving God and mammon alike, he is to use mammon wisely in the interests of his relation to God and the heavenly Kingdom, the wisdom consisting in the practice of charity (cf. Mat 12:19 f.). If not, the prospect held out is ominous. 'God,' as Kingsley once said, 'will yet take account of the selfishness of wealth; and His quarrel has yet to be fought out.' This is true to the spirit of the Lukan sayings, except that they threaten an eschatological ruin rather than one wrought out on this side of the grave.

In any case Luk 16:10-13 (Luk 16:10 coming from Luk 19:17) form a conglomerate appendix, added to prevent misconceptions, 'another instance of editorial solicitude on the part of an Evangelist ever careful to guard the character and teaching of Jesus against misunderstanding' (Bruce). Luk 16:11, especially, indicates the right use of money (as in the parable of the Talents): Use it faithfully, i.e. for the good of the needy, instead of hoarding it up selfishly. Honesty in money matters (Luk 16:10) is vital to the Christian. And honesty, in this particular application, is viewed under the light of liberality (Luk 16:11), in accordance with the tenor of Luke's social sympathies throughout his Gospel. Thus the use of mammon brings out two elements in the teaching of Jesus upon money—(a) the need of administering it wisely, and (b) the essentially inferior and even irrelevant position of money in the religious life. The latter is brought out by the epithet unrighteous (almost equal to 'secular' here); money is less by far than a Christian's other interests (Luk 16:10), alien (Luk 16:12), and unreal (Luk 16:11), even when it is not allowed to be a positive rival to God (Luk 16:13). By its nature it belongs to the present (i.e. this evil) generation, not to the real order of things which forms the sphere of the children of light, i.e. Christians. Yet even so it is a test; it furnishes opportunities for the exercise of certain virtues (cf. Morley's Voltaire, p. 107). Christians are trusted with money, as the steward was. But what in his case was fraud, in their case is both honest and shrewd. Forethought is the quality commended by our Lord, as opposed to a selfish and shortsighted policy. Faithfulness in dealing with money means giving it away. And the two, faithfulness and forethought, are different sides of the same habit—pretty much as in the proverb, 'What I gave, I have' (cf. Pro 11:24). The steward dispensed his goods; no doubt, for selfish ends. Still he dispensed them, and so proved his wisdom at least.

On this interpretation 'the mammon of unrighteousness' does not mean money or worldly advantages wrongfully gained, as though the point of the parable were that wealth, dishonestly come by, should be disbursed in charity (so Strauss, and O. Holtzmann in Stade's Geschichte Israels, ii. 584-585). The steward is not commended because he atoned by beneficence for ill-gotten gains, as if he represented a sinner who insured forgiveness and welcome in heaven by means of charity to his fellows on earth, finding it impossible to restore, as Zacchaeus did, his fraudulent profits (so even Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Jesus, pp. 373-374). 'The mammon of unrighteousness' means money as essentially secular and unchristian (cf. Weinel's Wirkungen des Geistes, 1899, p. 15), pertaining to the order of the Evil One. Jesus does not deal here with any question of reparation. The object of the parable is to point out how one may best use this tainted possession in view of the future, and the teaching is on the lines of the later Jewish Rabbis, who attached high religious significance to alms (cf. Luk 12:15-21; Luk 18:22 etc.), though it must be borne in mind that some allowance has to be made for St. Luke's 'ascetic' bias in estimating some of Christ's sayings on wealth in the Third Gospel, where logia, perhaps originally genuine, have been sharpened (e.g. in Luk 6:24 f.) into exaggerated emphasis. In calling mammon 'unrighteous,' Jesus means that great wealth is seldom gained or employed without injustice. The stain of abuse is upon it. The mark of the evil world is stamped on it. At best, then, it is a means, not an end, for the Christian, and a means which demands care and conscience for its wise employment, lest life degenerate into the mercenary and narrowing spirit which devotes itself to what Bacon called 'a Sabbathless pursuit of fortune,' a culpable love of acquisition and material goods, and an insidious appetite for self-gratification which deadens the higher faculties of the soul and stunts the instinct of self-sacrifice.

Bezold criticises unfavourably Mr. Pinches' derivation of the term from an Assyr. [Note: Assyrian.] mimmu or memmu = 'anything,' 'everything,' 'property,' etc.

☞ Man

MAN* [Note: ἄνθρωπος and ἀνὴρ are used by Jesus with the ordinary classic distinctions. Generally ἄνθρωπος = a human being, male or female (e.g. Mat 4:4; Mat 5:16); ἀνὴρ, a man as distinguished from a woman (Mat 7:24; Mat 7:26, Luk 14:24). In keeping with this distinction, and by a Hebrew idiom (cf. the use of שׂוֹאֵל), He employs ἄνθρωπος in the sense of the Gr. τις, Lat. quidam, to denote 'someone,' 'a certain one' (Mat 21:28; Mat 22:11 etc.). As the converse of this, it may be noted that not infrequently (esp. in Jn.) where $\tau\iota\varsigma$ occurs in the teaching of Jesus, EV renders it 'a man.']

1. Christ's relation to men.—(1) The first aspect of Jesus in His relation to men, is the relation of a Master to His disciples, and of a Brother, who is also Leader and Teacher, to His brethren. This relationship is unmistakable. 'Ye did not choose me, but I chose you' (Joh 15:16). The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord' (Mat 10:24). They were not to accept the title 'Rabbi'; they were brethren; they had but one teacher, even Christ (Mat 23:8-10). The relationship was no external one. The disciples were not simply the servants of Jesus; they were His friends (Joh 15:14-15), and knew His thoughts and purposes. To them He was about to show the very height and greatness of His love by laying down His life. The best way for them to show that they were His friends was by keeping His commandments (Joh 15:14). They were also under His Father's care; they were the Father's flock, and no one should snatch them out of His hand (Luk 12:28; Luk 12:32, Joh 10:29). They were called to a vocation in some respects similar to His own: they were to be 'fishers of men' (Mat 4:19); they, too, would know persecution and trial and death; but these, in their essence, were but temporal things, and could not really injure or destroy (Mat 10:17-18; Mat 10:28, Luk 10:19). As contrasted with others who were 'wise and prudent,' the disciples were but 'babes'; but it was to them that God had made the revelation of Himself in Jesus Christ (Mat 11:25-26). The disciples responded to this attachment. When they found the teaching of Jesus difficult and obscure, and were almost tempted, like many others, to go no more with Him, He asks them plainly, 'Will ye also go away?' and the answer rises within them with all the strength of passionate loyalty and conviction: 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life' (Joh 6:66-68). It is significant also that one of the strongest utterances of devotion is recorded of Thomas. Other references to this disciple show him as a practical man, who lives on the earth and not in the clouds, and who withholds his faith and support until plain proof be shown (Joh 20:24-25). But when Jesus expressed His determination to go up to Bethany and wake His friend Lazarus out of his sleep, it was Thomas who first saw his Master's danger, and that death was near at hand, and who exclaimed with vehemence, 'Let us go up also with him, that we may die with him' (Joh 11:16). Peter is called blessed when, at Caesarea Philippi, he answers Christ's question and confesses, 'Thou art the Christ of God' (Luk 9:20); and John is the disciple whom Jesus loved (Joh 19:26), the man who at the Last Supper sat next to His Master and leaned upon His breast (Joh 21:20), and the one to whom Mary the mother of Jesus was entrusted by Jesus as He hung on the cross (Joh 19:26-27). When His disciples are weary, Jesus bids them go with Him to a desert place and rest a while (Mar 6:31); and after their last meal together, He kneels down and washes their feet, thus teaching them the duty of service (Joh 13:3-5). The discourses recorded in John 14-16 are doubtless in some measure ideal; but they are true to the main lines of Christian tradition. The relationship between Jesus and His disciples was very intimate and sacred, and the disciples were filled with sorrow at the prospect of that relationship being snapped.

(2) But Jesus was also a Jew and a citizen. His mission was, first and foremost, to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mat 15:24); and it was only when they repeatedly rejected Him and His doctrine that He turned and went elsewhere. Jesus found that His own people were spiritually dead. They had now no prophets, and scarcely any teacher who might quicken their interest in things beyond the present hour and day. They had made the Temple (which was to Jesus His Father's house) a den of robbers (Mat 21:13), and they had forgotten that mercy was better than sacrifice (Mat 9:13); and Jesus, in the strength of His moral indignation, upset the tables of the money-changers, and drove those who sat there out of the Temple. His people honoured the prophets, but in their lifetime they stoned them; and now the greatest of the prophets had come, and they knew it not (Mat 23:29-39, Luk 11:29; Luk 11:32). He had come to His own, and they that were His own received Him not (Joh 1:11). There was woe to come upon Chorazin and Bethsaida. Had Tyre and Sidon seen the things which they had seen, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes (Mat 11:21). Jesus looked upon Jerusalem and its people with a citizen's and a patriot's love, and was moved even to tears (Mat 23:37, Luk 19:41). Let them weep for their city, themselves and their fate, and not for Him! (Luk 23:28-31). How often would He have gathered her children together as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings!

(3) It seems certain that the Jews, as a body, could never have accepted Jesus as their Messiah. It was the Pharisee who, with all his faults, had remained true in some measure to his national tradition; and it was in him that the teaching of Jesus found its strongest opponent. It was, above all, the universalism of Jesus that the Pharisee could not bear. He despised the Greek and Roman, and especially his kin and neighbour the Samaritan, as 'Gentile' folk—outsiders. If the God of the Jews should show Himself favourable unto such, it would have to be by some special act of grace. But Jesus followed out the prophetic ideal. He submitted to be baptized by John, and He expressed in no stinted way His feeling about the Baptist and his work. In His first public utterance Jesus reminded His hearers of the nature of Israel's God. He was the God of men, no matter what their race and no matter what their moral character. It was this God who despatched Elijah to Zarephath on an errand of mercy, when there were many widows in Israel. Elisha also was sent to heal Naaman the Syrian, although there were many lepers nearer home (Luk 4:25-27). It was by utterances such as these that Jesus gained at the outset the opposition of the national party. Men felt—and felt rightly—that if Jesus triumphed Judaism was undone. The Pharisees were also deeply troubled by Jesus' manner of life. He received 'sinners,' and ate with them; He dined with tax-gatherers, and spoke kindly and compassionately to a woman of ill fame (Luk 5:27-39; Luk 19:1-10, Joh 8:1-11). The official class—the Sadducees and priests—also felt that new wine like this would burst the old skins, and that a new society might arise, in which they themselves might be anywhere save at the top. And from the moment Jesus set foot in Jerusalem, the priests and Sadducees, as the ruling official party, set themselves to work, not to confute Him, but to compass His death (Mat 21:23; Mat 26:3-4, Luk 19:47-48; Luk 19:20; Luk 19:22).

It follows from this that Jesus was a lover of man, irrespective of his race or condition. He began His ministry with teaching and healing. He was often moved to compassion by the multitudes which followed Him; they were as sheep without a shepherd; they heard Him gladly, and even tarried with Him a whole day, and that in a desert place (Mar 1:41; Mar 6:30-36). On one occasion they would have made Him their king (Joh 6:1-15). And to Jesus, though He refuses their proffered sovereignty, they were as ‘fields white unto the harvest’ (Joh 4:35). Many of the most striking sayings of Jesus, however, occur in utterances addressed to individuals. It was while sitting and talking with a Samaritan—a Samaritan woman—that He said: ‘God is Spirit’ (Joh 4:24); it was in the house of Zacchaeus that men first heard that ‘the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost’ (Luk 19:10); while it was in answer to ‘a certain lawyer’ that Jesus related the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luk 10:25-37). Men were amazed at and charmed by Jesus’ power of speech; they ‘wondered at the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth’ (Luk 4:22). Police officers on one occasion were disarmed by it. ‘He taught,’ says the Evangelist, ‘as one having authority, and not as the scribes’ (Joh 7:45-47, Mat 7:28-29).

What was it that led Jesus to teach and to associate Himself, not simply with Jews, but with men as men? What was it that carried Him willingly and of set purpose into all classes of society, and especially among the outcast and unfavoured folk? What led Him to seek, not the righteous, but sinners, and not the whole, but the sick? To answer this question we must pass to—

2. Christ’s teaching on man.—With Jesus the doctrines of God and man are closely akin. They pass into each other, and are deeply interfused; so much so, that at times we seem but to have been looking at different sides of the same fundamental truth. Central, basal, a pole around which everything else centres and revolves, is His conception of God. To know Him is to share His life, and to seek His Kingdom and His righteousness is alike the highest duty and the highest joy of man (Joh 17:3, Mat 6:33). He is Spirit (Joh 4:24). Without Him nature would cease to be; its beauty, its order, and the creatures which have within it their home, derive all their life and sustenance and joy from Him. The hairs of a man’s head are all numbered; not even a sparrow falls to the ground without His notice. The common flowers and grass owe their life to Him (Mat 6:25-34; Mat 10:29-30).

What, then, does Jesus, with this high doctrine of God, say about man? He tells us that man is distinct from the natural world and natural creatures; he is God's child; God is his Father; he is God's son (Mat 5:43-48; Mat 6:25-34). Such words may not define man's present condition; they look at him in the light of the ideal; they describe his duty, his highest destiny and ambition. The loftiest hope and purpose that any man may cherish is to become a son of his Father who is in heaven, and to become perfect as his heavenly Father is perfect (Mat 5:45-48). It is noteworthy that Jesus never mentions the fall of man, nor is there any very conclusive passage in which He speaks of man as a sinner. But He implies that man is such in that He makes 'Repent' the keynote of His opening ministry (Mat 4:17). There is but one who is good, even God (Luk 18:18-19); yet men, who are evil, can render good gifts to their children (Mat 7:11). It is possible for a man's eye to be evil, and for his whole body to be filled with darkness rather than with light (Mat 6:23). Men cannot serve two masters, mammon and God (Mat 6:24). A rich man can with difficulty enter into the Kingdom of God (Mat 19:24). Ultimately, too, men are sifted out and their destiny is determined by their attitude to Himself and His brethren; some will sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the Kingdom of God; others will be cast into the outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Mat 25:31-46).

But, generally, it is the ideal which is present with Jesus; He prefers to look at the possibilities; He does not see capacity for evil; He tries rather to discover the latent powers and potencies of good. An incident such as that recorded in Joh 8:1-11 is striking proof of this. Jesus there sees not simply the sinner, but the possibility of good in the sinner. His final word to her, therefore, is not one of condemnation: 'Neither do I condemn thee; go thy way; from henceforth sin no more.' Man, therefore, is crowned with high dignity and solemn grandeur because he is akin to the Divine. If Jesus had not believed in the capacity for good even in the most unlikely and unexpected people, what we read recorded of Him and His work would never have happened. Of set purpose He turned from folk who were reputable, respectable, and, in the conventional sense, righteous and holy. He came not to the whole, but to the sick; not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance (Luk 5:31-32). He turned to those without repute, to the so-called 'sinners,' in the faith that goodness lived within their hearts; and history tells us that He was not disappointed. He sought for the common man, unsophisticated, unconventional; and we read that He was often surprised and astonished at what the common man revealed to Him (Mat 8:5-13); Jesus may thus be said to have been the first to discover the true significance of common men and common things. They were significant because they led up to and implied more than themselves; at the base and heart of each there was God.

But to Jesus man was not one object or thing among other objects or things in the natural world. He was not simply a part of Nature. 'How much then is a man of more value than a sheep!' (Mat 12:12). If the recovery of one sheep brought joy to the shepherd in charge of the flock, a man, by his choice and pursuit of the good, could bring joy to the heart of God (Luk 15:3-7). He was of value, as a lost coin is of value, for which a woman sweeps the house and searches diligently until she finds it (Luk 15:8-10); or as a son is of value, who, even if he has left home for a far country and there wasted his substance in riotous living, is still dear to his father's heart (Luk 15:11-32).

To Jesus, man, as a spiritual being, made in the image of God, who is Spirit, took precedence of all material things. The death of the body was merely a temporal event; but to think and believe and act as if the material world was all, was the death of the soul (Luk 12:13-21). It was to deny God by forgetting Him, and at bottom meant the surrender of one's life as a person and the endeavour to become a thing. Such was the act of a fool. To Jesus the spiritual side was all; or, in relation to other things it was the central, controlling principle, the fons et origo of all besides. The life is 'more than the meat, and the body than the raiment' (Mat 6:25). 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth' (Luk 12:15). 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and forfeit his life?' (Mat 16:26).

From a strictly moral standpoint the same truth held good of man; he alone of all natural creatures was capable of good and ill; things could not defile; they were unmoral, and knew neither good nor bad; defilement could come only from spirit, from man, and it proceeded from the thoughts and purposes of his heart (Mat 15:10-11; Mat 15:18-20). If the inner life was watched, and its waters and streams kept pure, all was well; from without there was no danger, because things had no power. It was similar in regard to the nature of the true good. It was an inward possession; moth and rust consumed material things, but they could not touch spiritual treasure, which made up the wealth of the soul; this was treasure in heaven, and as such would abide (Mat 6:20). It was the good incorporated, as it were, into the very life and spirit of man. Such also was the Kingdom of heaven. Men could not see it; it did not come by observation; it was within (Luk 17:20-21).

There is a revelation of God in Nature; there is a revelation of God in man; above all, in the moral consciousness of man. People often asked Jesus for a sign or miracle to show them that His teaching was true. But Jesus gave no sign. The teaching itself was its own sign and witness (Luk 11:29-32); its presence was also an argument; it 'doth both shine and give us sight to see.' The rich man in the torments of hell-fire might ask that a messenger be sent to his brethren—that some one should rise from the dead to warn them from his fate;—surely at a miracle they would repent? But the appeal of Jesus ever addressed itself to the moral consciousness of man. 'They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them.... If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rise from the dead' (Luk 16:19-31). In this aspect John also, in the Prologue to his Gospel, defines for us the nature of man. There was a light which lighted every man as he came into the world. The source of this light was God. Its supreme manifestation was in Jesus; in Him was life, and the life was the light of men (Joh_1:1-9).

Man, then, as spiritual, takes precedence of everything else that is. He is not a means or a thing; he is an end in himself. In the time of Jesus, however, as has also happened in other periods of history, the customs and institutions which man had made had become his master, were obscuring his vision and keeping him from his true good. One of these institutions was that of the Sabbath. A man might not heal another man on the Sabbath; yet if a sheep had fallen into a well he might get it out, or if his ox or his ass were thirsty he might lead them to the pool. Jesus enforces the true order; the Sabbath was made for man; it was a means for his good; it was a custom, an institution, a thing, and, as compared with spirit, occupied a strictly subordinate place. It was similar with every custom and institution man had made (Mat_12:1-21, Mar_2:23-28).

In saying this, Jesus stood emphatically for progress; He practically said also that there was something in the life of man which neither institutions nor the social order nor civic legislation could ever fully express; man bore the infinite within him; deep and ineradicable, within his life, there was the life of God. Man was therefore immortal. If we admit the premises, no other conclusion is possible. The fact, said Jesus in effect, that we can stand in relation to God, that we can speak with Him and commune with Him, is itself the promise and pledge of immortality. Because He lives, we live also (Joh_14:19). God 'is not the God of the dead, but of the living, for all live unto him' (Luk_20:38). And thus the chief end of man was to know God and Jesus Christ whom He had sent (Joh_17:3); his true vocation was to seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness (Mat_6:33). Because he was made in God's image, and was able, in some measure, to represent Him and reveal Him, man was endowed with a peculiar dignity. But here again Jesus spoke in the language of the ideal. Immortality was a possibility for man; it was in some sense an achievement; it was also something that could be lost. But it was something of which every man was capable.

In conclusion, the strongest argument for the dignity and worth of man is to be found in Jesus Himself. He called Himself the Son of Man; whatever touched man and his well-being was His concern. His teaching and His life were such that men find it impossible to regard Him from the ordinary human standpoint. They have conceived of Him as Divine; they say that His entry into human life to share the common pain and toil and death was a purely voluntary act. Such is not only a view held by theologians, but one which is entertained to-day by men of science. Sir Oliver Lodge speaks of Jesus as being willing to share the life of a peasant, and as being the best race-asset that men possess (Hibbert Journal, Oct. 1904). From whatever standpoint, however, He is viewed, the presence of Jesus in humanity can only add incalculably to its worth and dignity. In set doctrine Jesus taught very little as to the nature of man. To really see what He thought about man and the value He set on him, we must look at Jesus' life. He came to do the will of His Father and to accomplish His work (Joh_6:38; Joh_9:4); He came to give life, and to give it abundantly (Joh_10:10); He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many (Mat_20:28). That He loved men is a commonplace. He, beyond all other teachers and leaders whom we know, 'stood stoutly for the human,' and made the cause of man—the true well-being of man—take precedence of every other thing and cause. It was not that men were better in His than in any other age; it was that He ever saw men in the light of the ideal, and ever found at the root of man's life the life of God. To say this is to say also that among all the benefactors of humanity, Jesus of Nazareth is, par excellence, the Friend of Man. He thought that the common weal—man and man's true cause and good—was worth living for with absolute devotion; should things so require, it was also worth dying for. And, as Jesus Himself has said, greater love hath no man than this (Joh_15:13).

Psychologically, man, in the thought of Jesus, is made up of two parts, soul and body, or spirit and flesh. But He speaks, as a moral teacher, of man in his broad general aspect, and is not concerned with minute psychological distinctions (cf. Mat_10:28-29; Mat_16:26; Mat_26:41, Mar_8:36, Luk_16:22).

☞ Manaen

MANAEN (Μανναήν, Act_13:1 = Menahem, מנחם, 'comforter,' 2Ki_15:14 etc.).—Two facts only are recorded in Scripture concerning Manaen. In his old age he was a Christian minister; in youth he was foster-brother of Herod the tetrarch, i.e. Antipas (Act 13:1). But this must be read side by side with a statement of Josephus, who tells us (Ant. xv. x. 5) that, some few years before, another Manaen (or Manaem) had come into touch with another Herod,—the Great. The double parallel appears too striking to be mere coincidence. It seems more reasonable to assume a connexion between the two stories, and from them we may inferentially derive much light.

1. The connexion between the Manaen of Josephus and Herod the Great.—When Herod was yet a schoolboy, he was one day greeted in the street by this Manaen, who patted him on the back, and saluted him as future king of the Jews. As Antipater, Herod's father, was only a military governor, the prediction seemed absurd. But Manaen was an Essene, one of the stalwart Puritans of that day, who had a reputation not only for austerity but for predictive powers (Josephus BJ ii. viii. 12); and the words induced the lad to make further inquiry. Manaen persisted, adding that the coming dignity would not be accompanied by righteous living, and that God's punishment would visit his later life. About fifteen years later (b.c. 37), when the first part of the prophecy was fulfilled, Herod sent for the old Essene, and ever after honoured him and his sect. If, as Lightfoot conjectures, he was the same Manaen who, being vice-president of the Sanhedrin under Hillel, led away eighty others to the service of Herod, and inaugurated a system of laxer living, then the connexion did not issue in the moral profit of the older man, and he may have been alluded to (as Plumptre thinks) by our Lord under the figure of the shaken reed (Mat 11:7), and as a soft-clad dweller in royal households. Perhaps, too, this defection was the origin of the sect of the Herodians (Mar 3:6, etc.).

2. Connexion between the later Manaen and Herod Antipas.—The facts related above seem to constitute an intelligible foundation for the circumstances of Manaen's life noted in Act 13:1. Antipas was a son of Herod the Great, and if the old king had an elder Manaen living in his household, nothing would be more natural than that a young Herod and a young Manaen (perhaps a grandson, since Manaen the elder was a man of standing when Herod the Great was a boy) should be brought up together. What this implied it is difficult to determine, since 'foster-brother' (σύντροφος) has both a narrower and a wider meaning. It may only indicate that the children were much together. Manaen may well have shared both the home-life and the subsequent education, under a private tutor at Rome, which Antipas and Archelaus enjoyed (Ant. xvii. i. 3). On the other hand, Archelaus is not mentioned here, so perhaps the narrower sense of σύντροφος may be pressed, that Manaen's mother was also nurse to Antipas. In either case it is suggestive to contemplate the murderer of John the Baptist and paramour of Herodias, side by side with the man of ascetic Essene stock, subsequently a teacher in the Church of Christ.

3. Manaen's religious development and influence.—One wonders how the companion of Herod became the servant of Christ. His name ('consoler') may indicate that his parents were of that spiritually watchful circle who waited for the consolation of Israel (Luk 2:25). According to the Talmud (Jerus. [Note: Jerusalem.] Ber. ii. 4), Menahem was to be one of the titles of the Messiah, and indeed it became so (see 1Jn 2:1 παράκλητος, used in Job 16:2 [Aq. [Note: Aquila.] Theod. [Note: Theodotion.]] as translation of מנחם). The name was sometimes given to children at this period, with Messianic thoughts and hopes. Manaen is like a ferry-chain whose ends are visible and whose centre is submerged. We know of his childhood and old age: his mature manhood we can only conjecture. But we know at least that he passed through the Gospel period of John the Baptist's preaching and Jesus Christ's ministry. He may have been amongst the number of those who listened on the Jordan's banks, and brought tidings to Antipas. At any rate, in Herod's household he must have heard the stirring words of the rugged prophet of the old Essene type, and if Herod 'heard gladly,' how much more Manaen! The twin-texts, 'Repent ye' and 'Behold the Lamb,' may well have become the head-lights of his course, and the forerunner's words have led to Christ one more fruitful servant. There is much to indicate that the lonely ministry in the castle of Machaerus was not barren of results. Besides Manaen, we know of spiritual interests kindled in Joanna, wife of Herod's major-domo (Luk 8:3), in the king's courtiers (βασιλικός, Joh 4:46), perhaps in Herodion (Rom 16:11), whose name indicates court connexions; we know, further, that there were servants to whom Herod talked on religious topics (Mat 14:1 f.). And among these Manaen may well have been one of those unseen influences for good which alone can account for some of the better impulses of Herod's inconsistent life. What passed between the foster-brothers after John's murder? Was Manaen a silent or a protesting spectator when Jesus was mocked? Did the death of Christ complete a work of grace already begun at the death of John? Did the Resurrection of Christ (no rumour this time, Mat 14:2, but a well attested fact) seal for ever the allegiance of a halting disciple? Did he remain in the train of his foster-brother till the latter left for Rome in a.d. 39? If so, he may have gone to Antioch at that date, and been one of the founders of the Church in that city, which comes into view about a.d. 41 (Act 11:19). He would then rank amongst that honoured company whose consistent practice of the faith they professed first won them the name 'Christian,' Christ's man,—honoured since with world-wide acceptance wherever the gospel message has spread. At Antioch, in any case, we find him four years later occupying a position of authority (Act 13:1). If he was a prophet, we have an interesting link with the old Essene foreteller of Herod the Great's reign. But perhaps the copulative particles, strictly pressed, rank him as teacher and not as prophet. He must by this time have become somewhat advanced in years. If St. Luke also came from Antioch (Euseb. Historia Ecclesiastica 3, 4), it may have been from Manaen that he learned certain details concerning Herod and John which are peculiar to his Gospel. We last catch sight of Manaen in that hallowed gathering when he and his fellows in the ministry willingly surrendered their two ablest men, Barnabas and Saul, for the evangelization of the world. He who was called by his parents 'the comforter' cheerfully yielded to the higher voice of the heavenly 'Comforter' (Act 13:2), and tarried by the staff, while others went forth to the fight.

MANASSEH.—The well-known king of Judah, mentioned as a link in our Lord's genealogy, Mat 1:10.

☩ Manger

MANGER.—The Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 translation of φάτνη in Luk 2:7; Luk 2:12; Luk 2:16. In Luk 13:15, the only other place where φάτνη occurs in NT, Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 both render it 'stall,' though (Revised Version margin) gives 'manger.' The precise meaning of φάτνη is somewhat uncertain, opinions differing as to whether it denotes a stall or a manger within a stall.

Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 73) supposes that Mary and Joseph, who could not find room in the κατάλυμα, were obliged to go to some poor house hard by, where there was 'an upper platform' for people and 'a lower platform' for cattle, and that 'in the lower portion allotted to the cattle the Infant when born was naturally laid at once in the long earthen trough which serves for a manger, and into which the fodder is pushed from the floor.' If the κατάλυμα was like a modern Eastern khan, and if the φάτνη belonged to it (see below), Mary and Joseph went to one of the stalls for cattle and beasts of burden within the outside wall, and there the babe was born. Meyer (on Luk 2:7) favours the view that φάτνη means a feeding-trough placed in a stable. In any case, φάτνη, as its derivation implies, designates a feeding-place for animals.

Opinions further differ as to whether the φάτνη in question was a cave or grotto in the limestone rock of the neighbourhood used as a stable, or an enclosure fenced in.

The former view, which has the weight of persistent tradition, is due to Justin Martyr, who tells us that Christ was born 'in a certain cave near the village,' which cave, he says, had been pointed out by Isaiah as 'a sign.' For this latter circumstance he founds upon Isa 33:16 LXX Septuagint, 'He shall dwell in the lofty cave of the strong rock' (Trypho, 70 and 78). A similar statement is made by Origen, who affirms that in his day there was shown at Bethlehem 'the cave where Jesus was born, and the manger in the cave where He was wrapped in swaddling bands' (c. Cels. i. 51).

There is, of course, nothing improbable in this traditional view that the place where Mary sought shelter was a cave, for throughout Palestine such caves or grottoes were and are commonly used as stables. The other view, that the φάτνη was an enclosure, is favoured by many. According to Schleusner, it was the open courtyard attached to the inn and enclosed by a rough fence, into which the cattle would be shut at night, and where poorer travellers might lodge, when from want of room in the inn, or want of means to pay for room, they could find no other place. This view is supported by the Vulgate (præsepium) and the Peshitta. It is, moreover, significant that the earliest Christian artists represent the Nativity as in an open courtyard.

Stanley, who opposes the view that the φάτνη was a cave, does so partly on the ground of Mat 2:11 and partly on the ground of the superstitious tendency to associate sacred events with caves. He says (SP [Note: P Sinai and Palestine.] p. 440): 'As soon as the religion of Palestine fell into the hands of Europeans, it is hardly too much to say that it became "a religion of caves." ' He further notes that when the Convent of the Nativity was dismantled during the invasion of Ibrahim Pasha, it was found that the traditional cave had been, in pre-Christian times, a place of sepulture, and was therefore not at all likely ever to have been used by Jews as a manger.

It has been commonly but too readily assumed that the precise meaning of φάτνη in St. Luke's account must be determined by our interpretation of κατάλυμα. This appears to be a groundless assumption. It is not said by St. Luke that the φάτνη was connected with the inn. In Luk 2:7; Luk 2:12 the definite article is not used; for, though it appears in the Textus Receptus and a few Manuscripts of minor importance, in which it was probably inserted to designate the well-known φάτνη, preponderating evidence is altogether against it. It occurs, as the best Manuscripts show, in Luk 2:16, but there it clearly refers to the φάτνη spoken of in Luk 2:7; Luk 2:12. It is at least possible that the φάτνη did not belong to the κατάλυμα at all, and it is worth noting as subordinate evidence for this that the Protevangel of James and the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy do not connect 'the cave' of which they both speak with the inn.

Our conclusion, then, seems clear that, whether the φάτνη was a cave or an enclosure, it was certainly a place where cattle were housed or fed. It cannot be maintained that there is anything improbable or unreasonable in the continuous Christian tradition which goes back to the first decade of the second century. Nor is the pious sentiment groundless which has pictured the birth of the world's Redeemer in circumstances so humble, and has lingered in loving and grateful meditation over His manger cradle. ☩ Manifestation

MANIFESTATION

1. The historic manifestation.—We shall not attempt in this article to say anything about such manifestations of Christ as those alluded to in Joh 1:9, where He is spoken of as the Light which lighteth every man coming into the world. Our first point must obviously be that manifestation in the flesh of which St. Paul speaks in his letter to Timothy (1Ti 3:16). We are so accustomed to its outward form that to some extent we have lost its significance. Not in the court as a king's son, not in the Temple as the member of a priestly family, not in the wilderness as the son of some aged solitary who had given up the world, but in the familiar commonplace surroundings of a peasant family, as the Son of Mary, the wife of a village carpenter. This was the presentation of God to the world. Any of the other forms would have been more in accord with human expectations. But we are learning more and more every day that God loves the natural, not the out-of-the-way, as a means for manifestation. And this manifestation, first in the manger at Bethlehem, then in the home at Nazareth, was the outward setting of the Divine Life, both simple and natural. There were no miracles, no strange exhibitions of unseen powers, no external signs that led the men of Nazareth to mark out that home as being specially remarkable. Mary and Joseph, who alone knew the secret, read the wonder of it in the spotless life which from infancy to manhood unfolded new beauties every day. Nothing like it had they ever seen or heard.

2. Manifestation by signs.—But this manifestation of God in human character, though the only one seen during thirty out of thirty-three years, was not the only one. His mother evidently expected something further. When He left His home to begin His ministry, she felt sure that this reserve and silence would be broken. It might come at any place, and at any time. And it was in accord with the humility and kindness of her character that she should believe it might come at a small village feast to meet a temporary social need. It is plain from our Lord's reply (Joh_2:4) that she was looking for some manifestation, for He told her that the hour for such had not come. It is equally plain that she read in His words only a correction of her eagerness and supposition that she best knew the occasion. She had no doubt that He would help, and gave directions accordingly. And in that secret miracle, apparently unperceived at the time, and discovered only when there was an opportunity to ask the servants, He manifested forth His glory.

This is typical of the many manifestations that followed during the three years. They were not wonders wrought to force men's belief, but signs of Divine character. They were bits of teaching by illustration, object-lessons as we should call them. He never would work a miracle for the sake of astonishing men, though He was often asked to do so (Mat_12:38 ff; Mat_16:1 ff.). They were all signs of God's sympathy with the needs of men, and the desire He had to relieve them. (See Wace, Some Central Points of Our Lord's Ministry, p. 133).

3. Manifestation of the Transfiguration.—For some eighteen months there had been wonderful manifestations of Divine character and power, but no personal manifestation. Like any one else, Christ was seen tired, hungry, asleep, and in pain through the infirmities and sicknesses of others that He carried. He did not strive nor cry, neither was His voice heard in the streets (Mat_12:19). All was singularly quiet and unassuming, and men might well wonder what there was at the back of this astonishing teaching and these wonderful works. But once the disclosure was made (Mat_17:1 f. || Mar_9:2 f., Luk_9:28 f.). See art. Transfiguration.

4. Manifestations after the Resurrection.—It is very difficult to realize the character of these revelations of the Risen Lord. In one He is like a gardener (Joh 20:15), in another, a traveller walking to a country village (Luk 24:15), in another, a stranger standing on the beach of the Lake (Joh 21:4). Mk. speaks of the appearance to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus as being in ‘another form’ (Mar 16:12). They were manifestations marked by sudden appearances and disappearances. His home was elsewhere, but He came and went according to the disciples’ needs. The body was real—could be touched as well as seen. Indeed, He was anxious that they should not suppose Him to be mere spirit, and actually ate a piece of broiled fish before them in order to show them the reality of His bodily existence (Luk 24:42). But these manifestations are characterized by two features: (1) they were made only to His friends; (2) they were not apparently surrounded with glory and majesty.

With regard to (1), we may believe that only His friends could have perceived them. They might have seen something, as St. Paul’s companions did on the road to Damascus (Act 9:7), but not the face of Christ. Faith and love were necessary to interpret the manifestations. (2) They were not apparently surrounded with glory and majesty. They disturbed and frightened, not because they were expressions of His eternal majesty, as that of the Transfiguration was, but because they were unexpected and sudden. This, we think, is singular, and certainly one of the marks of the truthfulness of the narrative. We expect it to be so different, as is shown by the shining figures that represent the Risen Lord in picture and stained-glass window. But just as the graciousness of a king leads him to adopt the dress of his guest so as to make him more completely at home, so our King, when He comes to those poor labouring folk whom He had chosen for His Apostles, comes as one of them.

5. Manifestations to disciples since the Ascension.—There is a striking promise in the words our Lord spoke after the Last Supper, in which He declares that He will manifest Himself to the man that loves Him. That this does not refer to the manifestations of the Resurrection, which were so soon to follow, is clear from His reply to Jude’s very natural question as to how He would manifest Himself to the disciples and yet not to the world (Joh 14:22). It is interesting, to note that St. John does not use the ordinary Greek word (φανερόω) for manifestation, but takes another word (ἐμφανίζω), which is employed in this sense in only one other passage (Mat 27:53), where the dead bodies of the saints are said to have appeared to many in the holy city. That passage would seem to indicate a bodily appearance; but our Lord’s explanation contradicts such an interpretation. When asked how He could appear to the men who loved Him and yet not to the world, He replies that in the first place the man who loves Him will keep His word, i.e. will give his mind to Him, and observe His teaching, and then in his fixed contemplation and obedience will realize not only His own presence, but the presence of the Father. Such manifestations as these, then, are secret, personal realizations of Christ's presence, according more nearly with the revelations of a friend's character that we have in his letters, or in his pictures if he is an artist, in his music if he is a musician. Not, however, that we are to think of them as entirely, subjective. The words 'We will come unto him' teach an actual spiritual movement on our Lord's part towards those who love Him, which they will feel and enjoy.

To St. Paul, who did enjoy some actual appearances of Christ, the spiritual revelations were everything; and in one difficult passage he declares that though he had known Christ after the flesh, i.e. in bodily form, henceforth he knew Him no longer in that way (2Co 5:16), evidently finding more in the indwelling manifestation of Christ than he had known in the joy of Christ's visible form.

6. Manifestation of the Second Advent.—In 2Th 2:8, where Authorized Version gives 'with the brightness of his coming,' Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 renders 'by the manifestation of his coming,' the Gr. word being ἐπιφάνεια. Similarly Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 substitutes 'shall be manifested' for Authorized Version 'shall appear' in Col 3:4, 1Pe 5:4, 1Jn 2:28; 1Jn 3:2, the Gr. word in each case being φανερώω. See artt. Parousia, Second Coming.

☞ Manliness

MANLINESS.—To the Christian, Jesus is the perfect man, and therefore in His character is to be found the perfect type of manliness. At the same time, when we speak of the manliness of Jesus, there is an element of challenge in the phrase, and we make an assertion that is felt to require justification. This is due partly to the fact that the conventional idea of manliness seems too poor a standard to apply to Jesus, and partly to the fact that the courage of Jesus is not often emphasized. Gentleness, meekness, and forgiveness are the qualities by which His character was pre-eminently distinguished, and it is too often assumed that these preclude the possession of courage. A somewhat complex problem is thus raised by the discussion of manliness in relation to Jesus, which involves two questions: (1) What is the conventional or worldly conception of manliness? (2) How far do the character and teaching of Jesus agree with this, and how far do they modify it?

1. The conventional or worldly conception of manliness cannot be described in a word, for a number of qualities go to make up what the world accepts as a manly man. (1) There must be a basis of adequate physical strength. Men have always admired the athlete, and they reject the claim to manliness of those who are puny and feeble in body. The vigour and energy of a strong, well-disciplined body form the substratum of the world's idea of manliness. A proof of this is to be found in the many efforts made by Christian people to remove the prejudice that there is an opposition between Christian faith and bodily strength. The combination of Christian faith with athletic vigour has seemed and does seem to many extremely desirable (cf. 'muscular Christianity'). (2) There must be a sufficient degree of intelligence. As, however, the standard of intelligence demanded for manliness is not very high, this element is not greatly emphasized. (3) There must be the moral qualities of courage, temperance or self-control, perseverance, and love of personal honour. Of these courage is fundamental, and it may be defined as the assertion of self against opposing influences. It is recognized by the world in many forms, from the animal quality of bold disregard of physical danger up to steadfast adherence to conscientious conviction. At the same time, however courageous a man may be, the world holds him to come short of true manliness if he is not able to control his impulses, whether of mind or body, to persevere patiently in any course of action he has adopted, and to be scrupulous in guarding his personal honour with life itself if necessary.

There are three points which may be noticed in connexion with this analysis of the conventional idea of manliness. (a) All the virtues involved are compatible with pride, and indeed are conceived as ministering to and supporting pride. This is obvious in regard to courage and love of honour. Self-control, again, is desirable largely because its opposite brings ridicule; and perseverance, because to give in is intolerable to the proud man. (b) This idea of manliness corresponds very closely to the ideal of the perfect man of the Greek and Roman moralists. The starting-point of pagan ethics is the analysis of the term 'happiness' (εὐδαιμονία), regarded not as a subjective state of feeling, but as an objective form of being. Happiness is held to be found in the harmony of character and experience. Hence the qualities which give a man rule over his circumstances are to be desired as good. By Plato and Aristotle an optimistic view of the world's capacity to satisfy the requirements of a good man is assumed. With the Stoics, and still more with the Cynics, pessimism about the world leads to strong emphasis being laid on the power of the individual to be sufficient to himself. With the Epicureans the optimistic assumption that the world will not fail to give the gratification necessary to happiness, leads to the emphasis being laid on the regulation rather than the suppression of desire. The ethics of Greek and Roman writers may be generically described as the science of the relation of man to his environment. The variations in theory are determined by the view taken of the responsiveness of the environment to man's needs. Thus, from the practical point of view, all the various theories aim at self-development. Self is the beginning, centre, and aim of pagan ethical thought. Harmonies with Christian teaching are largely accidental. The essence and root are different. The virtues of the pagan are ‘inflated and arrogant’ (Augustine), even where they inculcate the same conduct as the Christian virtues (cf. Luthardt, Hist. of Christian Ethics, i. 25). (c) This idea or manliness corresponds very closely to the ideal of manhood to be found in the Ethics of Evolution. Phrases such as the ‘survival of the fittest’ and the ‘struggle for existence,’ which suggest that men are engaged in a constant war from which only the conquerors emerge, indicate at once an ideal of manliness of which self-assertion is the fundamental quality.

2. How far do the character and teaching of Jesus agree with the worldly conception of manliness, and how far do they modify it?—Was Jesus a manly man according to the world’s idea? To this the answer must be that His manliness can be vindicated in relation to all the qualities which go to make a manly man, but that allowance must be made for the very different ideal in relation to which these qualities were exercised. About physical strength and intellectual ability it is not necessary to say anything. There is a degree of human excellence which makes even the latter inconsiderable, and we have passed that degree when we discuss the character of Jesus. Courage, however, is on quite a different plane, and the courage of Jesus can be triumphantly vindicated. The cleansing of the Temple (Mat 21:12-13, Mar 11:15-18, Joh 2:13-16), the attitude of Jesus towards the throng who would have made Him king (Joh 6:15 f.), His denunciations of the Pharisees (Matthew 23), His woes against the cities of Galilee (Mat 11:20-24), His acts of healing upon the Sabbath, His rebuke to the people of Nazareth (Luk 4:16-30), His statement about the Temple (Joh 2:18-22), His refusal of a sign to the scribes (Mat 12:38-42; Mat 16:1-4, Mar 8:11-12, Luk 11:16 f.), His last journey and entrance into Jerusalem (Luk 9:51), His demeanour before the high priest and before Pilate (Mat 26:57 f., Mar 14:53 f., Luk 22:66 f.)—all show courage of the very first quality. He is undismayed before an unparalleled combination of adverse forces. And the overwhelming forces opposed to Him give an added lustre to His courage in dealing faithfully with those who took or were ready to take His part. His disciples are fearlessly rebuked when they are in the wrong (Luk 9:54-56, Mat 16:23, Mar 8:33, Mat 18:1 ff., Mar 9:33, Luk 9:46; Luk 24:24 f., Mat 19:14, Mar 10:13-15, Luk 18:15-19). He never modifies His demands in order thereby to secure influential supporters (Joh 3:1 ff., Mat 19:16 f., Mar 10:17 f., Luk 18:18 f., Mat 8:19-22, Luk 9:57-62). Moreover, the inevitable result of His faithfulness was clear to Him from an early point in His public career. So there was not lacking in His courage that element which arises from the vision of the cruel and shameful death awaiting Him. The self-control of Jesus, again, is very apparent in His life. We see it in the fact that He remained subject to His parents (Luk 2:51), and was 30 years of age before He began His ministry. It is displayed in a different relation in the temptation in the wilderness (Mat 4:1-11, Luk 4:1-13), when neither the pangs of hunger nor the splendid prospect of worldwide dominion could overcome His resolution. And once more, before the high priest, before Pilate, and in the brutal hands of the soldiers, He never spoke one bitter or unworthy word, even though Peter denied Him and the other disciples had forsaken Him. Of His perseverance it is only necessary to say that He was 'obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross' (Php 2:8).

It is in regard to love of personal honour that the transcendent difference between the world's idea of manliness and the manliness of Jesus becomes apparent, just as also very varying views are to be found even among worldly men as to what honour really is. However, an integral element in honour in the worldly sense is the good opinion of a man held by his fellows. To be an inconsiderable person was regarded by Aristotle as incompatible with happiness. High-mindedness is one of the virtues which go to make the perfect man, and 'by a high-minded man we seem to mean one who claims much and deserves much' (Nic. Ethiopic iv. 3, § 3; cf. Mat 23:12). Even the proud indifference of the Cynic to the opinion of his neighbours by its vehemence betrayed its hollowness. It is the last refuge of pride to despise all who do not acknowledge the superiority on which it is based. In the life and teaching of Jesus the centre of morality is changed from self to God. Right conduct consists in obedience to the law of God. The essential nature of the Law is to love God and one's neighbour (Mat 22:37-40, Mar 12:30-31, Luk 10:27). The approval of God is thus the supreme practical consideration for the Christian, while his relations to others are to be governed by love and a desire for their good. There is no exception to this rule. It is to guide the conduct of Christians towards those who have injured them. Now the right and duty of avenging an affront or an injury have always seemed to men bound up with the love of honour, and the division of others into friends and enemies has seemed inevitable. But Jesus teaches that His followers are to forgive injuries, and to love their enemies (Mat 5:39 f., Mat 18:21-22, Luk 6:27 f., Luk 17:3-4). Moreover, they are not to meet violence with violence. And of these precepts He has given a perfect illustration (Luk 4:24-30, Mat 26:52-56, Mar 14:65, Mat 27:30, Joh 8:59; Joh 10:39; Joh 19:17).

It is in regard to this duty of forgiveness that the world has found the greatest difficulty in assimilating the views of Jesus, and has been inclined to treat them as counsels of perfection which cannot be put in practice. Three degrees of opinion on this question may be distinguished: (1) that of those who altogether ignore the teaching of Jesus as impracticable; (2) that of those who find in His teaching the condemnation of all resistance to evil, whether private or public, and so condemn alike war between States and private quarrels, whether settled by physical force or by an appeal to courts of law, the decisions of which ultimately rest on force; (3) that of those who find in the teaching of Jesus primarily the inculcation of a spirit of love the manifestation of which is determined in every case by the circumstances, and which accordingly condemns neither war nor an appeal to force, nor an appeal to courts of law, apart from the occasion which gives rise to them.

With the first of these opinions we are not concerned. The second has always been held by many Christians. It is based especially on Mat 5:18-48; Mat 26:52, Luk 6:27; Luk 17:3. In the early Church it led to a strong feeling against the propriety of Christians serving as soldiers (cf. Tertullian, de Idol. ch. 19—‘the Lord in disarming Peter unbelted every soldier’). In later times the Society of Friends have been the most prominent adherents of similar ideas. And Tolstoi, among modern writers of distinction, holds such views in their most extreme form. It has to be remembered, however, (a) that the illustrative sayings of Jesus cannot wisely be generalized into universal precepts. To do this is to ignore the clearly marked feature of His teaching, in which He aimed ‘at the greatest clearness in the briefest compass.’ (b) If Jesus said, ‘To him that smiteth thee on one cheek offer also the other’ (cf. Mat 26:52, Joh 18:11), He also told His disciples to sell their garments and ‘buy a sword’ (Luk 22:36, cf. Mat 10:34-35). (c) Jesus laid down a method of dealing with one who has trespassed against another which cannot be brought within the boundary of strict non-resistance, though, indeed, the motive of this dealing is undoubtedly to be a desire for the good of the offender (Mat 18:15-17). The third opinion is that which has generally prevailed among Christians. According to it, the ruling principle of a Christian’s conduct is love towards all. This involves at once and without question or limit the forgiveness of all injuries and the crucifying of the spirit of emulation and self-esteem which so often leads to strife. But the manifestation of heart-forgiveness is to be regulated by a wise conception of the injurer’s welfare and the welfare of others. These principles, in their mutual interaction, condemn all personal vindictiveness and malice, such an appeal to violence as duelling, that litigious spirit which aims at getting the better of another in a law-court, and all wars of aggression, as well as those which spring from national or personal pride. They do not condemn, however, the establishment of just government by force of arms, nor an appeal to justice and a desire for its vindication by force, nor the use of arms in the protection of the weak.* [Note: Tolstoi, with remorseless logic, declares that a Christian should not interfere with force to prevent murder—a precept which ignores the moral nature of the murderer no less than the claim of the person attacked for protection.]

There is thus open to the Christian a sphere for the exercise of aggressive courage consecrated to the furtherance of noble ends. To right wrong and to protect the weak are the natural aims of Christian manliness. At the same time it remains true that the Christian is called upon to exercise the courage of endurance much more frequently than that of aggression. And the endurance of the martyr shows a quality of manliness which transcends all others, inasmuch as his courage is made sublime by self-sacrifice.

☩ Manna

MANNA.—The miracle of the loaves and fishes, by which Jesus fed five thousand men, stirred the multitudes to fanaticism (Joh_6:1-15). Their first impulse was to make Jesus king by force. On the morrow they followed Him across the sea to Capernaum, hoping that He would feed them again in some supernatural way, and suggesting the giving of bread from heaven as a suitable sign in confirmation of His high claims. Would not the prophet of Nazareth imitate the great lawgiver, who gave their fathers bread from heaven? Jesus turns their thoughts away from Moses to God: ‘It was not Moses that gave you the bread out of heaven, but my Father giveth you the true bread out of heaven.’ As God gave the fathers literal bread from heaven, so now He is giving to their children spiritual food that nourishes the soul eternally. ‘I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall not hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.’ ‘Your fathers did eat the manna in the wilderness, and they died.’ God has a far better gift than the manna that was gathered day by day in the wilderness. ‘I am the living bread that cometh down out of heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever; yea, and the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world’ (Joh_6:51).

In Rev_2:17 the spiritual blessing promised by the glorified Christ to the victor in life’s battle is called ‘hidden manna.’

☩ Mansion

MANSION (μονή, Joh_14:2; Joh_14:23).—1. ‘Mansion,’ like μονή, is properly an abstract noun, meaning ‘a staying,’ ‘an abiding.’ In English literature it is first found in Hampole’s Psalter, 5. 8 (c. [Note: circa, about.] 1340 a.d.), ‘pai entire in til God is house of heuen and takis þaire joy and þaire mansyon in þaire perfeccioun.’ So in the B text of Piers Plowman, Langland says of Pride (B xiv. 26): ‘Arst in the maister than in the man some mansioun he hath’ (he dwelleth in the master rather than in the man). The C text (c. [Note: circa, about.] 1393) keeps the word while it extends the limits of Pride's abode (xvii. 59): 'Other in the maister, other in the man, some mancion he shewith.' But Hampole and Lydgate (1420) also use 'mansion' of a dwelling-place. A charter of Henry vi. (1444) uses it of a hostel, and Fabyan (1512) of the chief residence of a lord, whence it gains its modern meaning of 'an imposing abode,' which is seen even in Shakspeare (2 Henry IV. iii. ii. 351). Bacon, however, still uses the word in its abstract sense in the Advancement of Learning (1605), and both Shakspeare and Milton use it of 'an abiding-place' without the suggestion of a building (Timon of Athens, v. i. 218; Paradise Lost, i. 268, viii. 296). From the Vulgate mansiones it is used by Wyclif for 'halting-places' in Exo_17:1, but in translations from the Greek (as Whiston's Josephus, 1737) this meaning represents σταθμός, not μονή, and so has no bearing upon the sense of Joh_14:2. The Vulgate also uses mansiones in Joh_14:2, and is responsible for Hampole's use of the English form of the word in the sense of 'dwelling-places.' That sense was confirmed in the language, partly by Chaucer (Knight's Tale, 1116), but mainly by the influence of Tindale's Version of the NT (1526), 'In my fathers housse are many mansions,' and (2Co_5:1) 'Our erthy mancoun wherein we now dwell,' copied by Milton in Il Penseroso, 92.

2. But while the English 'mansion' and the identical French word maison have retained from their common original only the developed meaning of 'dwelling-place,' the Greek μονή is nowhere in extant literature found with this meaning, save only in Joh_14:2. Westcott (with Liddell and Scott) explains its use in this verse by the supposed occurrence of the word in Pausanias (x. 31:7) in the sense of 'a halting-place for the night.' But the ordinary reading in that passage seems impossible Greek, and is certainly corrupt (see J. G. Frazer's note): τέτμηται δὲ διὰ τῶν μονῶν ἡ ὁδός is not an intelligible expression for the traditional meaning, 'there are halting-places at intervals upon the road.' One MS reads μηνῶν, from which W. M. Ramsay conjectures διὰ τῶν Μηρινῶν, 'the road has been carried through the country of the M. (beside Minos' tomb).'

Apart, then, from Joh_14:2, μονή remains a purely abstract noun, meaning (1) abiding, (2) continuance, (3) rest. The ease with which it passes from the first to the last of these meanings can be seen from Plato, Crat. 437 B, where μνήμη is defined as a μονή, and not a φορά; Ar. Phys. v. 6. 8 (ὥστε κινήσει μονὴ ἐναντία); Polybius, iv. 41, 4, 5, where it is twice coupled with στάσις; and most of all in Plutarch, whose writings (a.d. 80-120) are contemporary with St. John's Gospel.

Like the classical authors, Plutarch still uses μονή, in the literal sense of ‘a stay’ or ‘a continuance’: οὔτε μονήν ἐν τῷ βίῳ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς οὔτε ἐξαγωγὴν τοῖς κακοῖς (1042 D), ἀλλὰ καὶ τούτοις μονήν οἶονται καθήκουσαν εἶναι κάκεινοις ἐξαγωγὴν, 1063 D. But in 1024 F, though μονή answers to τὸ μένου, Plutarch opposes it, like Aristotle, to κίνησις: ἔστι γὰρ ἡ μὲν νόησις τοῦ νοοῦτος κίνησις περὶ τὸ μένον, ἡ δὲ δόξα μονὴ τῶ οὐ αισθανομένου περὶ τὸ κινούμενον. So in 927 A the material elements as conceived by Empedocles are reduced to order by the introduction of the principle of love (φιλότιμος ἐγγενομένης), ἵνα ... τὰ μὲν κινήσεως τὰ δὲ μονῆς ἀνάγκαις ἐνδεθέντα ... ἀρουονία ν καὶ κοινωνίαν ἀπεργάσῃται τοῦ παντός, where μονή has the complete meaning of rest as opposed to motion. And in 747 C he uses the plural of ‘rests’ in dancing; ἐνταῦθα δὲ αἰ μοναὶ πέρατα τῶν κινήσεων εἰσίν.

In Joh 14:2, however, the immediate mention of ‘a place’ seems to demand a concrete meaning for μοναί, though it has no parallel elsewhere. If so, the senses of ‘abode’ in vv. 2 and 23, concrete and abstract respectively, will be derived from the idea of rest that has become attached to the word, as well as from the original idea of remaining. The difference is seen at once when the μονήν ποιεῖσθαι of Joh 14:23 is compared with the same phrase in Thuc. i. 131: Pausanias the victor of Plataea, intriguing with the Persians in Asia Minor, was ‘prolonging his stay to no good purpose’ (οὐκ ἐπ’ ἀγαθῶ τὴν μονήν ποιούμενος), μονήν, as the Scholiast remarks, being practically equivalent to ἀργίαν, ‘idleness.’ In Joh 14:23 the phrase combines, like μοναί in Joh 14:2, the meanings of ‘abiding’ and ‘rest’ with that of the ‘home’ in which the rest is found. All the same suggestions are found in 1Ma 7:38, the only passage in the LXX Septuagint where μονή occurs: μνήσθητι τῶν δυσφημιῶν αὐτῶν, καὶ μὴ δὸς αὐτοῖς μονήν (‘and suffer them not to live any longer,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885).

3. The μονή of the Christian in the spiritual world (Joh 14:2) and the μονή of God in the Christian (Joh 14:23) are evidently intended to be correlative: ‘Abide in me, and I in you’ (Joh 15:4). Their consummation realizes the ideal of Joh 17:21; Joh 17:23; meanwhile they are the NT fulfilment of the two OT ideals of rest: ‘Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him’ (Psa 37:7), and ‘Arise, O Lord, into thy resting-place; thou, and the ark of thy strength’ (Psa 132:8). Joh 14:2, that is, refers not only to the perpetual 'rest' or 'home' in the life hereafter, but, like v. 23, to the 'abiding' fellowship with the Divine in this life (Mat 28:20, Rev 21:8). See artt. Abiding, and Father's House.

MANUSCRIPTS.—The aim of the present article is to give a select list of the more ancient or interesting Manuscripts of the Gospels, with a description of the most important or interesting of these. The simplest course will be to divide them into the languages in which they are written, premising that the Gospels were originally written in Greek, and that the versions in other languages are translations, generally direct, from the Greek. The symbols employed to indicate these manuscripts, whether letters or numbers, were invented for the sake of brevity, when they are referred to in an apparatus of variant readings. The standard collection of variants contained in Gospel manuscripts is that of C. Tischendorf (Novum Testamentum Graece: Editio Octava Critica Maior, vol. i., Lipsiae, 1869), and the standard lists of Manuscripts are those contained in the Textkritik des Neuen Testaments (2 vols., Leipzig, 1900, 1902) of C. R. Gregory, an American scholar domiciled in Germany. The new numbers which von Soden (Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, Band i., Berlin, 1902) has given to the Greek Manuscripts are added for the sake of completeness, but it is very doubtful whether they will gain wide currency. Capital letters are used to indicate Manuscripts with uncial writing, which is never later than the 10th cent.; numbers, for those in minuscule writing (9th to 15th centuries and later).

I. Greek Manuscripts :

(a) Uncials:—

⌘ (= δ 2, von Soden), Codex Sinaiticus (of the 4th or 5th cent.), now in the Imperial Library, St. Petersburg, with the exception of a small portion, which is in the University Library, Leipzig, contains OT (with considerable losses), NT (complete), followed by Ep. Barnab. and the Shepherd. The MS, found by Tischendorf in the Convent of St. Catharine, Mt. Sinai, in 1844, consists of 346½ (NT 147½) leaves of fine parchment, measuring 48 × 37.8 cm., with four columns to the page and 48 lines to the column. The ink is now brownish; the letters are not very large, and are painfully regular, without breathings or accents, the use of which is only sporadic till the 9th century. The hands of seven revisers, dating from the 4th (5th) to the 12th centuries, can be observed in the MS. This MS shares with B the honour of being considered the purest MS of the Gospels. Tischendorf has been charged more than once with having stolen this MS, but the charges are successfully refuted by Gregory.

A (= δ 4, von S.), Codex Alexandrinus, in London, British Museum, Reg. I. D. v.-viii. (the NT is in showcases). This MS is of the 5th cent., and consists of 773 leaves (NT 143 leaves) of parchment, measuring 32 × 26.3 cm., with 2 columns to the page and 49-51 lines to the column. It contains, with some losses, the whole Greek Bible. It was probably written in Egypt, and came in 1098 into the possession of the patriarch of Alexandria, from which place it gets its name. Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, and former patriarch of Alexandria, sent it as a gift to Charles I. of England in 1628. About a century afterwards it was presented to the nation. A few lines at the beginning of each book are written in red. The following portions of the Gospels are lost: Mat 1:1 to Mat 25:6, Joh 6:50 to Joh 8:52. It is quite clear that Joh 7:53 to Joh 8:11 never formed a part of the manuscript. A complete facsimile was published in 1878-1880.

B (= δ 1, von S.), Codex Vaticanus, Vat. Lib. MS Gr. 1209 (in showcases). The MS is of the 4th cent., and consists of 759 (NT 142) leaves of parchment, measuring 27 cm. square, with 3 columns to the page and 42 lines to the column. The parchment is very soft and fine. The uncial letters are small, simple, and written, without breaks between the individual words; the first hand wrote no breathings or accents, and punctuation is very rare. The MS is of uncertain origin, and, when complete, contained the whole of the Greek Bible with perhaps the exception of the Books of Maccabees and the Prayer of Manasses. No gaps occur in the Gospels. It has been twice revised, once by a corrector contemporary with the original scribe (called B² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred]), and again by another of the 10th or 11th cent., who worked over the letters and often added accents and breathings. WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] consider it our very best MS, and regard the combination BN as practically infallible. A splendid facsimile of the NT part was published by Hœpli of Milan in 1904 (see the notice of it by Nestle in the Theol.

Literaturblatt for 6th Jan. 1905), superseding the inferior photograph issued by Cozza-Luzi at Rome in 1889.

C (= δ 3, von S.), Codex Ephraemi rescriptus, Paris Bibl. Nat., gr. 9, a palimpsest of the 5th century. Contains, in present form, 209 leaves, written in single columns. The NT portion consists of 145 leaves, and contains parts of every book except 2 John and 2 Thessalonians. Edited by Tisch. (Leipzig, 1843 and 1845).

D evv. act. (= δ 5, von S.), Codex Bezae, in Cambridge University Library, Nn. 2, 41 (in a showcase in Cockerell's Building). This MS is of the 6th cent. (according to Burkitt, of the 4th), and is bilingual (Greek and Latin). It is on parchment, 26 cm. in height and 21.5 in breadth, and contains now 415 (406 + 9 added later) leaves, with one column to the page. When the book is open, the left side is Greek, the right side Latin. Originally it contained probably Mt., Jn., Lk., Mk. (the regular Western order of the Gospels), Apocalypse, Apocalyptic, 1, 2, 3 Jn., Acts (Dom Chapman in Expositor, 1905, ii. p. 46 ff.). Now the Gospels and Acts are almost complete, the Apocalypse and 1 James, 2 nd. Jn. have disappeared, and of 3 Jn. there remain only a few verses in Latin. Many hands have been engaged in correcting the MS. It was probably written in Italy, or South France, where it was when Beza acquired it and gave it to the University of Cambridge in 1581. The MS is the only representative of the Western text in Greek, a form of text which was widespread already in the 2nd century. It contains, therefore, many original elements, which have been worked over at a very early date. In spite of this revision, it often agrees with the neutral Manuscripts, ⚭ B. Scrivener published an accurate and handy edition of the MS at Cambridge (1864), which retains its use side by side with the gorgeous facsimile published by the Cambridge University Press in 1899.

N (= ε 19, von S.), Codex Purpureus Petropolitanus, incomplete and mutilated, the parts being distributed between St. Petersburg, Rome, Patmos, London, and Vienna. It is an uncial, probably of the 6th cent., measuring 32 by 26.5 cm.; has 2 columns to the page, 16 lines to the column, and 227 leaves. The leaves are stained with purple, and the writing is silver, the Divine names being in gold. The MS is very like Σ both in text and external character. The only complete edition is that of H. S. Cronin in TS [Note: 5 Texts and Studies.], vol. v. No. 4 (Cambridge, 1899). He considers N and Σ to be copies of the same lost original. The text is of a mixed character, representing a sort of transition stage between the purity of the older uncials and the corruption of the majority of cursives. While it sometimes supports the former, it also at times provides the earliest known authority for readings which are subsequently almost universal. For particulars see Cronin's valuable introduction.

Σ (= ε 18, von S.), Codex Purpureus Rossanensis, in the charge of the Archbp. of Rossano, S. Italy. An uncial of the 6th cent., probably later than its brother MS N, it is, like it, purple with silver writing. It measures 30.7 by 26 cm., has 2 columns, to the page, 20 lines to the column, and comprises 188 leaves. It contains Matthew and Mark (the latter without Mar 16:14-end). Edited by von Gebhardt (Die Evangelien des Matthäus und des Marcus aus dem cod. purp. Rossan., Leipzig, 1883). See under N. The credit of the discovery of this MS belongs to von Gebhardt and Harnack (1879), It contains eight pictures of Gospel scenes, the oldest known.

Ψ (= δ 6, von S.), Athos, Laura 172 (β 52), an uncial of the 8th or 9th cent., measuring 20.8 by 15 cm., has 31 lines to the page, and comprises 262 leaves. It contains the greater part of the NT, but lacks Mt., and Mk. down to Mar 9:3. The ending of Mk. is like that in L and T¹ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] . After Mar 16:8 ἐφοβοῦντο γὰρ, it proceeds as follows: πάντα δὲ τὰ παραγγελλόμενα τοῖς περὶ τὸν Πέτρον συντόμως ἔξηγ γειλαν: Μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα, καὶ αὐτὸς ἰησοῦς ἐφάνη ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς καὶ μέχρι δύσεως ἐξαπέστειλεν δι' αὐτῶν τὸ ἱερὸν καὶ ἄφθαρτον κήρυγμα τῆς αἰωνίου σωτηρίας ἀμὴν: ἔστιν καὶ ταῦτα φερόμενα μετὰ τὸ ἐφοβοῦντο γὰρ:—Ἀναστὰς δὲ, κ.τ.λ., up to Mar 16:20, and at the end Εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μᾶρκον. It is only in this Gospel that the text is of interest. The character of its readings, is set forth in Lake's edition (Studies Biblica et Ecclesiastica, vol. v. (Oxford, 1903) pp. 94-122), [pp. 89-186 can be obtained separately].

T^X (= ε 02, von S.), Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. ii. No. 208. We mention this papyrus uncial fragment of the 3rd cent. (Joh 1:23-31; Joh 1:33-41; Joh 20:11-17; Joh 20:19-25), because it is probably the oldest fragment of Gospel MS in existence.

(b) Minuscules:—

1 (= δ 50, von S.), Basel University Library, A.N. iv. 2 (formerly B vi. 27), of the 12th (others say 10th) century. This MS was used for Erasmus' Gr. Test., the first published edition. It gives a good text, which is often in agreement with 118 (= ε 346, von S.), 131 (= δ 467, von S.), and 209 (= δ 457, von S.). Lake has edited the four, taking 1 as the basis, and showing the variants in the others ('Codex 1 of the Gospels and its Allies' in TS [Note: 5 Texts and Studies.], vol. vii. No. 3, Cambridge, 1902). He has also discussed with thoroughness the relations between them. The reader will find his Introduction a valuable lesson in textual criticism. It is sufficient here to quote his conclusion with regard to the text in Mark, which escaped a good deal of the assimilating process which affected the texts of Matthew and Luke: ‘(1) *fam*¹ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] in St. Mark seems to form part of a larger family of which the most certain members are *fam*¹³ [Note: 3 designates the particular edition of the work referred] 22, 28, 565, 700; (2) this larger family seems to represent a local text or local texts which were current in a comparatively limited region in the East; (3) the only definite localities which there is any reason to suggest are Jerusalem and Sinai, and even for these the evidence is insufficient to justify confident assertion’ (p. liv). The most noticeable features in the other Gospels are an element akin to \aleph B and a Western element (cf. p. lv).

13 (= ϵ 368, von S.), Paris, Bibl. Nat., gr. 50, of the 13th century. This MS is one of the group 13-69-124-346-543-788-826-828-983- ϵ 1053 (von S.)— ϵ 1054 (von S.), conveniently named by Lake *fam*¹³ [Note: 3 designates the particular edition of the work referred] . The group is also called the Ferrar group, because the relation between 13, 69, 124, and 346 was discovered by Ferrar of Dublin (A Collation of Four Important Manuscripts of the Gospels, by W. H. Ferrar and T. K. Abbott, Dublin, 1877). The studies of Rendel Harris (On the Origin of the Ferrar Group, Cambridge, 1893; Further Researches into the History of the Ferrar Group, London, 1900), Lake (JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] , vol. i. [1899-1900] pp. 117-120), and von Soden have shed further light upon this group. The archetype appears to have been in Calabria or Sicily in the Middle Ages. Its most remarkable characteristics are the transposition of Joh 7:53 to Joh 8:11 to Luk 21:38, and Luk 24:43 f. to Mat 26:39 (on the first transposition see von Soden, Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, i. (Berlin, 1902) p. 486 ff.). The importance of the group lies in the great support which it gives to the Western text.

II. Syriac Manuscripts :—

(a) of the Old Syriae translation (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, ‘Gospel of the Separated Ones’):—

1. London, British Museum, Additional Manuscripts , No. 14,451 (No. 119 in Wright’s catalogue), and Berlin, Royal Library, Orient. Quart. No. 528. This MS, Codex Nitriensis Curetonianus (Burkitt’s C), consists of 82½ leaves in the British Museum and 3 leaves in Berlin; and came from the great Library of the Convent of St. Mary Deipara in the Nitrian Valley, west of Cairo. The greater portion of the MS reached England in 1842. In its original state it contained Mt., Mk., Jn., Lk. (in this unusual order). The portions still extant are Mat 1:1 to Mat 8:22; Mat 10:32 to Mat 23:25, Mar 16:17-20, Joh 1:1-42; Joh 3:5 to Joh 8:19; Joh 14:10-12; Joh 14:15-19; Joh 14:21-24; Joh 14:26-29, Luk 2:48 to Luk 3:16, Luk 7:33 to Luk 16:12; Luk 17:1 to Luk 24:44.

The early part of the 5th cent. is the latest possible date for it. Each page has two columns, each with lines varying from 22 to 26. Each leaf measures 30 by 24 cm. The first edition of this MS is that of Cureton (London, 1858) supplemented by Rödiger (Berlin, 1872), but the definitive edition is that of F. C. Burkitt, who has edited this MS and the following together, the only representatives of the Old Syriac version, with an English translation, copious Introduction and Notes (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, etc., 2 vols., Cambridge, 1904). From this work the details here are taken. A photograph of a page of C is in vol. ii. opposite p. 7, also p. 38 two pages; also in Kenyon's Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, facing p. 155.

2. Sinai, Monastery of St. Catharine; Syr. [Note: Syriac.] 30, Codex Palimpsestus Sinaiticus (Burkitt's S). The MS was discovered by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, of Cambridge, in 1892, and has been since studied repeatedly by Mrs. Lewis and other scholars. The MS consists of 182 leaves of vellum (one leaf was stolen in 1902, but afterwards restored; see Exp. Times, xiii. 405; xvii. 396). The upper writing is of the 8th cent., and consists of Lives of Saints. In its original form the MS had 166 leaves, containing the four Gospels in the usual order. Its date is early 5th, perhaps 4th century. Each page contains 2 columns, with from 29 to 21 lines each, and measures 21.9 by 15.8 cm. The Gospels are nearly complete. Of the two Manuscripts this must be regarded as the better representative of the original translation. Complete photographs of it are in Cambridge University Library; Westminster College, Cambridge; Rylands' Library, Manchester: photos of separate pages in Burkitt, vol. ii. pp. 28, 257, and elsewhere.

The Evangelion da-Mepharreshe was so called to distinguish it from Tatian's Diatessaron or Harmony, in which form the Gospels were regularly read in the Syrian Church at first. This Church had its centre at Edessa near the Euphrates, and its language must not be identified with the Aramaic our Lord spoke. The value of the Old Syriac Version consists in the fact that it reproduces the Greek text current in Antioch at the end of the 2nd cent., with a certain amount of contamination from the use of the Diatessaron, which is in origin Italian. It is of the first authority for the constitution of the text of the Greek Gospels. For all problems connected with it the reader is referred to Burkitt's second volume.

(b) of the Peshitta ('simple') translation:

2. Earl of Crawford's MS 1, now Rylands' Library, Manchester, of the 6th cent. (Gwilliam, No. 11).

13. London, British Museum, Addit. Manuscripts 14,470, of the 5th or 6th cent. (Gwilliam, No. 17).

15. London, British Museum, Addit. Manuscripts 14,453, of the 5th or 6th cent. (Gwilliam, No. 14).

22. London, British Museum, Addit. Manuscripts 12,140, of the 6th cent. (Gwilliam, 31).

There are many other codices, complete or incomplete, of equal antiquity, in other libraries. See Gwilliam's list of 42 Manuscripts in the Tetraeuangelium Sanctum by Pusey and Gwilliam (Oxonii, 1901), which is the best edition of the Peshitta, and is provided with a literal Latin translation. As to the date of the Peshitta itself, Burkitt's view that it was prepared by Rabbula, bp. of Edessa from 411 to 435 a.d., has gained wide acceptance. He regards it as 'a revision of the Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, undertaken mainly with the object of conforming the translation more closely to the Greek text as read at Antioch early in the 5th century' (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, vol. ii. p. 5).

(c) of the Palestinian or Jerusalem translation:

1. Rome, Vaticanus Syr. [Note: Syriac.] 19 (formerly 11), of the year 1030 (Codex A, Lewis-Gibson).

6. Sinai, Monastery of St. Catharine, of the year 1104 (Codex B, Lewis-Gibson).

7. Sinai, Monastery of St. Catharine, of the year 1118 (Codex C, Lewis-Gibson).

Edited by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson in the Palestinian Syriac Lectionary of the Gospels (London, 1899). This version is perhaps more closely related to the Old Syriac than to the Peshitta, and may be a revision of the former.

(d) of the Philoxenian-Harklean translation:

1. Belonging to the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut, but lent to the Union Theological Seminary of New York. Of the 9th cent., and somewhat defective.

22. Florence, Laur. i. 40 (Assem. 3). Of date 757.

25. Rome, Vat. Syr. [Note: Syriac.] 266. Of the 7th century.

26. Rome, Vat. Syr. [Note: Syriac.] 267. Of the 8th century.

This, the youngest of the Syrian versions, is a revision by Thomas of Harkel (Heraclea) in the first half of the 7th cent. of an earlier version made at the instance of Philoxenus, Monophysite bp. of Hierapolis (Mabog) in the early 6th century. The earlier translation was perhaps made from the Peshitta by reference to the 'corrected' form of the Greek text, and Thomas found in Egypt older Greek Manuscripts, which had escaped the enthusiasm of the destroyers, who favoured the 'corrected' text, and inserted some readings from them, adding others in the margin.

III. Egyptian (Coptic) Manuscripts :

(a) of the Bohairic translation:

Complete manuscripts are all of late date, none being earlier apparently than the 12th century. On all questions connected with this translation and its Manuscripts, see The Coptic Version of the New Testament in the Northern Dialect [ed. G. Horner]; 4 vols. (Oxford, 1898-1905).

1. Oxford, Bodleian Library, Huntington, 17,* [Note: Gregory wrongly 'Huntingdon, 11.'] Horner's A, printed entire by him as the basis of his edition. This MS was written in 1174, and contains the Gospels complete, both in Bohairic and Arabic. It is on paper, contains 457 (+ 5) leaves, and 2 columns to the page, with 20 lines each. It measures 34.5 by 26 cm. The MS has a number of omissions: see the valuable tables of omissions in the chief Bohairic Manuscripts in Horner's edition, vol. i. p. cxxvi ff.

21. Paris, Bibl. Nat., copt. 16, Horner's C. The MS was written in 1196, and contains the Gospels almost complete, both in Bohairic and Arabic. It is on paper, contains 369 (+2) leaves, and 2 columns to the page, with 26 lines each. It measures 28.5 by 21 cm. The text is perfect, with the exception of a small lacuna, Joh_16:6-18.

33. Paris, Institut Catholique, Horner's H. This MS was written in 1250, and contains the Gospels complete, both in Bohairic and Arabic. It is on paper, contains 235 (+2) leaves, and 2 columns to the page, with 33 lines each. It measures 25 by 17.5 cm., and contains some beautiful pictures.

(b) of the Sahidic translation:

Of this there exists only a considerable quantity of short fragments (Gregory gives 91). Some are as old as the 5th century. One is still older (No. 48 Rome, Propag. 65).

(c) of the Fayyum translation:

Gregory gives fragments of 5 Gospel Manuscripts only, one (No. 2), in the possession of Flinders Petrie, of the 4th century. Of (b) and (c) there is as yet neither a comprehensive edition nor a complete study. Further fragments of both are certain to be discovered.

The Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, Persian, and Arabic translations may be here passed over.

IV. Latin Manuscripts :—

(a) of the pre-Vulgate (otherwise called ‘Old Latin,’ or ‘Itala’) translation(s):— a: Vercelli, Cathedral. This MS is of the 4th cent., measures 25.5 by 16 cm., has 2 columns to the page, and 24 lines to the column. The order of the Gospels is Mt., Jn., Lk., Mk., the regular Old Latin order. Much is wanting in Matthew 20-27; Jn. is slightly defective; in Lk. much of chs. 1, 11 and 12 has disappeared; in Mk. chs. 1, 4, 5, 15, 16 have suffered greatly; a second but ancient hand has supplied Mar 16:7-20. The text is good, and was, according to tradition, copied by the famous bishop Eusebius of Vercelli, martyred in 371. The book has suffered greatly from neglect and bad treatment. Editions by G. A. Irico (Sacrosanctus Evangeliorum Codex S. Eusebii Magni, Milan, 1748), J. Bianchini (Evangeliarium Quadruplex, Rome, 1749; very accurately reprinted in Migne’s Patrologia Latina, vol. xii.), and J. Belsheim (Codex Vercellensis, Christiania, 1894).

b: Verona, Cathedral Library (Biblioteca Capitolare). The MS is of the early part of the 5th cent. (or of the end of the 4th), and is written in silver. The following parts are wanting: Mat 1:1-11; Mat 15:12-23; Mat 23:18-27, Joh 7:44 to Joh 8:12, Luk 19:26 to Luk 21:29, Mar 13:9-19; Mar 13:24 to Mar 16:20. Edited by Bianchini (see under a) and by J. Belsheim (Codex Veronensis Quattuor Euangelia, Prag, 1904). It was probably a MS like this which was the chief basis of Jerome’s revision known as the Vulgate. It is perhaps the best representative of the European Latin versions of the 4th century. There is a photograph of one page in Monumenta Palæographica Sacra (Turin, 1899).

c: Paris, Bibl. Nat. 254 (Colb. 4051), of the 12th century. Edited by P. Sabatier (Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinæ Versiones Antiquæ, vol. iii., Paris, 1751; there is also an edition with ‘Reims’ on the title-page), and by J. Belsheim (Codex Colbrcrtinus Parisiensis, Christiania, 1888). The work of P. Sabatier is still un superseded as the most complete repertory of the readings of the Old Latin Bible.

e: Palatinus; all that is left is in Vienna (Kais. Lat. 1185) except one leaf, which is in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin (N. 4, 18). The MS is of the 5th cent., and is, with k (see below), representative of a form of text used in the Roman province of Africa (corresponding to modern Tunis). It is very defective, containing about half of Mt., nearly the whole of Jn. and Lk., and about half of Mark. A copy of the MS made before its present mutilation exists in the Vallicellian Library, Rome, as U. 66. The Vienna part was edited by Tischendorf (Evangelium Palatinum, Leipzig, 1847), the Dublin leaf by T. K. Abbott (Par Palimpsestorum Dublinensium, etc., London, 1880); reports on the copy in the Vallicellian Library were published by H. Linke (Sitzungsberichte der Königl. bayer. Akad. der Wissenschaften [Phil-Philolog. und Hist. Classe], Munich, 1893, Heft 2, pp. 281-287). See also Belsheim (Evangelium Palatinum, Christiania, 1896), and Old-Latin Biblical Texts, vol. ii. (Oxford, 1886), pp. lxxvii-lxxxv, by W. Sanday.

f: Brixianus; in the Capitular Library of Brescia. It is of the 6th cent., and is written in silver. It lacks the last quarter or so of Mark. It was edited by Bianchini (see under a), and is also printed under the Vulgate in Wordsworth and White's edition (Oxford, 1889-1898), as in the opinion of these editors and Hort the type of text which Jerome used as the basis of his revision. The other view with regard to it, namely, that of Burkitt, is that it is an Old Latin text deeply contaminated with the Vulgate (see JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] , i. [1899] pp. 129-134). With Burkitt's view the present writer agrees. If it be correct (see under q), the result is the disappearance of Hort's 'Italian' class altogether.

ff1 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] : St. Petersburg, Imperial Library, formerly Corbeiensis 21 (10th cent.): Matthew.

ff2 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] : Paris, Bibl. Nat. 17225, formerly Corbeiensis 195. It is of the 5th cent. (C. H. Turner in JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] , vol. vi. [1904-1905] p. 257), not the 7th (Tischendorf, Gregory, and the Paris authorities). The following parts of the four Gospels are wanting: Mat 1:1 to Mat 11:16, Luk 9:48-62; Luk 11:45 to Luk 12:7; Joh 17:15 to Joh 18:9; Joh 20:22 to Joh 21:8. Published reports of this MS are incomplete and inexact. An exact edition is expected from Rev. E. S. Buchanan, who has made a very careful study of the MS, and has already published a translation of its text of some Gospels (e.g. The Latin Gospels in the Second Century, Part I. 'S. John,' Sevenoaks [1904]), and prolegomena (JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] vii. 99 ff.).

g¹ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] : Paris, Bibl. Nat. 11553, formerly Sangermanensis 15, of the 8th cent., edited by the Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. John Wordsworth) in Old-Latin Biblical Texts, No. I. (Oxford, 1883).

k: Turin, Nat. G. vii. 15 (formerly of the Irish monastery of Bobbio). This, perhaps the most precious of all Old Latin Manuscripts, is of the 4th (Burkitt) or 5th cent., and represents the text habitually used by St. Cyprian in the early 3rd century. The MS measures 18.7 by 16.7 cm., and consists now of 96 leaves. It contains Mar 8:8-11, Mar 8:14-16; Mar 8:19 to Mar 16:8; Mat 1:1 to Mat 3:10; Mat 4:2 to Mat 14:17; Mat 15:20-36. The only reliable edition is that of Wordsworth, Sanday, and White (Old-Latin Biblical Texts, No. II., Oxford, 1886), which is enriched by discussions of the greatest value for the study of all Biblical texts. Side by side with this edition should be consulted the article of Turner and Burkitt, 'A Re-Collation of Codex k of the Old-Latin Gospels' (JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.], vol. v. [1903-1904] pp. 88-107).

m: Rome, Sessorianus lviii. This MS, of the 8th or 9th cent., contains the so-called Speculum, falsely attributed to St. Augustine, a series of extracts from nearly all the books of the NT. The compilation appears to be of Spanish origin, as the text closely resembles that used by the Spanish heretic Priscillian. Edited by F. Wehrich in the Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, vol. xii. (Vienna, 1887).

q: Munich, Lat. 6224, formerly of Freising. It is of the 6th cent., and contains the Gospels, except Mat 3:15 to Mat 4:2; Mat 5:25 to Mat 6:4; Mat 6:28 to Mat 7:8, Joh 10:11 to Joh 12:39, Luk 23:22-36; Luk 24:11-39, Mar 1:7-22; Mar 15:5-36. This, like f, belongs to Hort's 'Italian' class, and stands or falls with f (see above). Edited by H. J. White as Old-Latin Biblical Texts, No. III. (Oxford, 1888).

(b) of the Vulgate revision (made by St. Jerome in 383), the two best Manuscripts out of thousands which exist are:—

am: in the Laurentian Library, at Florence, formerly in the monastery of Monte Amiata, No. 1. This MS was written about the year 700 in the North of England, probably by an Italian scribe, and was taken by Ceolfrid, the abbot of Jarrow, to the Continent as a present to the Pope in the year 716. It measures 50 by 34 by 20 cm. (without the cover), and comprises 1029 leaves, with 2 columns to the leaf, and 43 or 44 lines to the column. It contains the whole Bible. The NT was published by Tischendorf (Leipzig, 1850, and again 1854), but not with perfect exactness. (See Nouum Testamentum Domini Nostri Iesu Christi Latine, rec. Wordsworth and White, Pars Prior, Oxonii, 1889-1898, p. xi; and Studia Biblica et Ecclesiastica, vol. ii., Oxford, 1890, pp. 273-324). Wordsworth and White's A.

fuld: in the library of Fulda, Prussia. The MS was written about the year 540 at the wish of Victor, bishop of Capua. The Gospels are written in the form of a harmony. Edited by E. Ranke (Codex Fuldensis, Marburg and Leipzig, 1868), with specimens of the handwriting. (See Nov. Test. etc. Latine, rec. Wordsworth and White, Pars Prior, p. xii). Wordsworth and White's F.

V. Gothic Manuscripts :—

1. Upsala University, the 'Codex Argenteus.' The MS is of the 6th cent., and now consists of 187 leaves, which are stained with purple and bear silver writing. The contents are fragments of Mt., Jn., Lk., Mark. MARK

1. Name and identity.—One, two, and even three Marks have been discovered in the NT. But the identity of the 'John Mark' of Acts with the 'Mark' of St. Paul's Epistles is clearly proved by Col 4:10, where he is called the cousin of Barnabas, and his identity with the 'Mark' of 1 Peter is clearly proved by Act 12:12. These two passages show that in all the nine places where the name occurs (Act 12:12; Act 12:25; Act 13:5; Act 13:13; Act 15:36 ff., Col 4:10, 2Ti 4:11, Phm 1:24, 1Pe 5:13) the same person is referred to. The curious notion has widely prevailed that the 'young man' of Mar 14:51-52 was the Evangelist himself, but there is no evidence whatever in its support. Indeed, the words of Papias, 'he neither heard the Lord, nor accompanied Him,' would seem to exclude this and other similar suggestions. In accordance with a well-known custom (cf. 'Jesus Justus,' Col 4:11), Mark had both a Hebrew and a Latin name, and the Roman prænomen Marcus is of frequent occurrence. From Act 12:11 ff. we gather that Mark occupied a position of some prominence socially in the Church at Jerusalem. His mother's house was evidently a well-known rendezvous for believers. When St. Peter is released from prison, he turns naturally to this place, and on his arrival finds a company of Christians at worship. Several slight indications in the description suggest the house of a person of means (the porch, the slave-girl, the large upper room). The only other information we possess as to Mark's family history is his connexion with Barnabas, who seems to have been a man of standing in the Christian community.

2. Relations with Paul and Barnabas.—When Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch from Jerusalem, whither they had gone with the offering for the poor, they took Mark with them as assistant, perhaps owing to his kinship with Barnabas (Act 12:25). A little later, he again accompanies them on their first missionary journey as their 'attendant' (Act 13:5). This word (ὑπηρέτης) emphasizes his secondary position and function. Probably his work was of the nature of business management. He had to look after such matters as lodging, routes, conveyance, and the like. At Perga, Mark withdrew from the mission, for what reason is not stated. That Paul deeply resented his conduct is shown by the refusal to employ his services on a later occasion. It has been assumed that he shirked the dangers of the enterprise, or that he tired of the work. But Ramsay (Ch. in Rom. [Note: Roman.] Emp. p. 61 f.) has taken a more favourable view of his conduct. He holds that there was a change of plan at this point, that the journey into the interior was not in the original arrangement, and that Mark might consider this a good ground for refusing to go on. He had not the same necessity laid upon him as those who had been solemnly designated by the Spirit for this service. He was an 'extra hand,' taken on for casual labour. Barnabas, at any rate, judged Mark's conduct more leniently than Paul, and later on Paul himself modified his attitude. At the outset of the second missionary journey, however, his objection to Mark's co-operation was so strong that it led to a separation between himself and Barnabas (Act 15:36 ff.). The latter took Mark with him on a mission to Cyprus, and we hear no more of him in the Book of Acts. When Mark next appears (Col. and Philem.), it is as the 'fellow-labourer' of Paul, who had by this time become completely reconciled to him, and had found him a comfort (παρηγορία, Col 4:11) in his imprisonment. Paul speaks in Col 4:10 of a projected visit of Mark to the Colossian Church, and urges his friends there to receive him kindly, 'if he comes' to them. If it is probable, therefore, that Mark's previous desertion had created an unfavourable impression over a wide area. Harnack thinks the visit was paid, and that, when St. Paul wrote to Timothy to bring Mark with him (2Ti 4:11), Timothy was to pick him up at Colossae on his way from Ephesus. Paul had evidently missed the attentions which Mark had been able to give.

3. Relations with Peter.—St. Peter refers to Mark in his First Epistle (1Pe 5:13) as 'my son.' This may imply only a peculiarly close intimacy, but more probably it means that Mark had been converted through Peter's influence. Peter was evidently a frequent visitor at Mark's home (Acts 12), and the friendship had begun there which afterwards became so deep and fruitful. St. Peter's reference in his letter shows also that at this date Mark was with him at 'Babylon,' which most writers now consider to mean Rome. From the familiar words of Papias (see Mark [Gospel acc. to], Mar 2:1) we learn that Mark had become the 'interpreter' of Peter, and that Mark 'accompanied' or 'attended' him. Swete thinks he acted as Peter's dragoman, and translated the Apostle's words for his audiences. Peter, it is supposed, would not be fluent in Greek. It is not easy to fit in this ministry to Peter in Rome with the ministry to Paul. Swete thinks it occurred after Paul's death; but it is at least doubtful whether Peter survived Paul. Harnack and Lightfoot may be quoted to the contrary. It is by no means impossible, of course, that Mark may have 'attended' Peter in Rome, and transferred his services to Paul. It would be much simpler, however, to suppose that the ministry was exercised much earlier, and in the real, not the spiritual, Babylon. In any case, Mark's association with Peter was a fruitful one, as it resulted in the composition of the Second Gospel. In this matter Mark seems to have been little more than an amanuensis. According to Papias, the Gospel is really Peter's, and Mark was simply his 'interpreter' on this as on other occasions.

4. Character and position in the Apostolic history.—Mark was thus associated with three notable men in turn, and always in the same subordinate capacity. Jülicher calls him 'Apostelschüler.' Swete thinks this humble position decidedly implied in the terms used of him in Acts and the Epistles. The συνπαραλαβόντες of Act 12:25 suggests an assistant 'of inferior rank.' The ὑπηρέτης of Act 13:5 indicates personal and not spiritual service. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 71) holds that Mark's subordinate character is displayed by the 'haphazard reference' to him in Act 13:5. The same conclusion may be drawn from St. Paul's language in 2Ti 4:11 ('he is useful to me εἰς διακονίαν'). His services to the Apostle in prison probably concerned his comfort and convenience. If, again, Mark was Peter's dragoman, he exercised very much the same 'ministry' for Paul also. We gather, then, from these references, that Mark was a person with a large capacity for being useful in practical matters, but without any special spiritual gifts, and probably without any very great force of character. This opinion may be regarded as receiving confirmation from his conduct at Perga, on the most charitable view of that incident. He does not appear to have been fitted for heroic enterprise, or for a separate responsibility, or for spiritual functions. It is only fair to say, however, that a more favourable opinion has been expressed by writers like Westcott (Introd. to Study of Gospels) and Jülicher (in *PRE [Note: RE Real-Encyklopädie für protest. Theologie und Kirche.]*³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred]). Jülicher points out that St. Paul ultimately came round to the lenient judgment of Barnabas, that Mark never lost his missionary zeal, and also that he remained unaffected by the prevalent party spirit, serving both St. Paul and St. Peter with equal loyalty.

5. Traditions.—Tradition has been busy with Mark's name. The most widely spread is that which assigns to him a mission in Egypt, and the evangelization of Alexandria. This mission is regarded as occupying the gap between the history in Acts and the later ministry to the Apostles. It was also widely believed that he died at Alexandria, receiving (according to some versions) the crown of martyrdom. These traditions cannot be traced back further than a hundred years after the supposed events. One curious fact is preserved in some of the Western traditions. Mark is said to have been κολοβοδάκτυλος, which means either mutilated or stunted in one or more of his fingers. Explanations of this deformity have been offered which possess no probability. But the reminiscence itself may quite possibly preserve a genuine fact; and it is not impossible that this defect may have had some influence in determining the possibilities of Mark's career.

Literature.—The best accounts of Mark are given by Swete (Gospel acc. to St. Mark, 1898) and Lindsay ('St. Mark' in T. & T. Clark's Handbook series) in their introductions. Literature.

i. The problems to be discussed.—No book of the NT has experienced such a change in public estimation as the Second Gospel. Formerly regarded as comparatively unimportant and receiving little attention from commentators, who in effect re-echoed Augustine's opinion that it was but an abbreviation of the First Gospel, it has of late years been more carefully studied, and has received a juster appreciation. It has now been recognized as a book of supreme importance, as giving us the narrative of the life of Christ in a most primitive form, and as being not improbably the foundation, if not directly at least indirectly, of all the Gospels. It will be necessary, then, in this article first to investigate the statements about its composition in the earlier Fathers and their use of it, and then to examine the Gospel itself, to see what picture it gives of our Lord's Person and work, and what relation it bears to the other Synoptic Gospels. We shall then be able to come to a conclusion about questions of date, authorship, and place of writing, of the original language, and of the integrity of the Gospel. Finally, we will consider the question of an 'Ur-Marcus,' that is, if the Gospel in our hands is the original work of St. Mark.

It will be convenient here to state the results arrived at in this article with regard to some points. The present writer thinks it most probable that the Second Gospel as we have it, or at any rate with the very slightest differences, was in the hands of all the other Evangelists when they wrote; and that the latter freely used the material before them, altering it, or adding to it, or omitting parts of it, as they thought right when following other guides. The theory put forward by Alford (Prolegomena to his Greek Testament, i. 2) and other holders of the 'oral hypothesis,' that the later writers would not have so treated a book which they regarded as inspired or even as authoritative, does not greatly commend itself, as it appears to interpret the feeling of the Christians of the 1st cent. by those of a later age.—The very style of Mk., with its roughness and inelegances, is of great value, and still more is its description of the Saviour in words which were often in after times misunderstood, of the utmost importance as showing a very early record. For these and other reasons a date at least before the Fall of Jerusalem seems to be probable. Further, it is considered likely that the Gospel was written in Greek, and primarily for Roman readers, the last twelve verses being an appendix, not composed as an ending to the Gospel, but having once had an independent existence, and being added later to the Gospel to supply a lost leaf.

ii. The Second Gospel in the Early Church

1. Statements as to its composition.—We will first consider those passages of early writers which may be thought to throw light on the composition of Mk., before discussing those which only quote or refer to it; later (§ vii.) we will consider whether the Gospel known to these writers is the same as our Mark.

The first passage which may refer to Mk. is St. Luke's prologue. This shows that some who were not from the beginning eye-witnesses and ministers of the word had already written narratives of the Gospel history, and by implication avers (Luk 1:3) that these narratives were incomplete in not beginning 'from the first' (ἀνωθεν); also we perhaps gather that they were not in St. Luke's judgment in good chronological order (καθεξῆς, cf. ἀκριβῶς just before). Internal evidence leads us to think that not improbably St. Luke knew Mk. (see below, § iii.), and, if so, we may have here the first criticism on the Second Gospel; it has some striking resemblances to Papias' account, for which we are indebted to Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica iii. 39). Eusebius says:

Ἀναγκαιῶς νῦν τροσθήσομιν ταῖς προεκτεθείσαις αὐτοῦ [σχ. τοῦ Πατία] φωναῖς ταράδουσιν, ἢ τιρὶ Μάρχου τοῦ ὑαγγίλιον γιγραφότος ἰχτεθίεται διὰ τούτων. Καὶ τοῦτα ὁ τρισβύτιρος ἔλεγε μάρχας μὲν ἐρμηνευτῆς Πέτρου γενόμενος, ὅσα ἐμνημονευσιν, ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν, οὐ μέντοι τάξει, τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἢ λεχθέντα ἢ τραχθέντα, εὔτε γὰρ ἤχουσι τοῦ κυρίου, οὔτε ταρηχολούθυσεν αὐτῷ ἴσιραν δε, ὡς ἴφην, Πέτρω, ὅς τορὸς τὰς χρεῖας ἰσοιετε τὰς διδασχααλίας, ἀλλ' οὐχ ὥσσερ σύνταξιν τῶν χυριαχῶν ταιούμενος λογῖων [ς. λ. λογων], ὥστε οὐδὲς ἡμαρτε Μάρχος, οὔτως ἴνια γράψας ὡς ἀπεμνημονυσιν. ἰνὸς γὰρ ἐτοιήσατο πρόνοιας, τοῦ μηδὲν ὧν ἤχουσε ταραλετεῖν ἢ ψεύσασθαί τε ἐν αὐτοῖς.' Ταῦτα μὲν οὖν ἰστόρηται τῷ Πατία τεριτοῦ Μάρχου. Lightfoot's translation (Apost. Fathers, compend. ed. p. 529) is here appended, and some points where Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Gospels') differs from him are noted: 'For our present purpose we will merely add to his [Papias'] words which have been quoted above, a tradition which has been set forth through these sources concerning Mark who wrote the Gospel: "And the Elder said this also: Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately everything that he remembered [Schmiedel: 'mentioned'], without, however, recording in order what was either said or done by Christ. For neither did he hear the Lord, nor did he follow Him; but afterwards, as I said, (attended) Peter, who adapted his instructions to the needs (of his hearers), but had no design of giving a connected account of the Lord's oracles [v.l. 'words']. So then Mark made no mistake [Schm. 'committed no fault'; but see Lightfoot's Essays on Sup. Rel. pp. 8, 163], while he thus wrote down some things as he remembered them [Schm. ‘repeated them exactly from memory’], for he made it his one care not to omit anything that he heard, or to set down any false statement therein.” Such, then, is the account given by Papias concerning Mark.’

Here Papias vindicates Mark from inaccuracy, and from errors of omission, as far as his knowledge went, but finds fault with his chronological order, which was due to his being dependent only on Peter’s oral teaching. If this is a correct interpretation of Papias, which account of the Gospel story did he prefer? Lightfoot (Essays on Supernatural Religion, pp. 165, 205 f.) thinks John, Salmon (Introd. Lect. vii.) thinks Luke; while Schmiedel, in a not very convincing argument, thinks that Papias did not recognize Jn. and Lk. as being of equal authority with Mt. and Mk. (Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1813; see, further, § vii. below). Schmiedel takes no account of Lightfoot’s essay ‘On the Silence of Eusebius’ (Sup. Rel. ii.). However this may be, Papias describes the Second Gospel as being limited to Peter’s reminiscences, the writer being the ‘interpreter’ of that Apostle. This phrase may mean (Zahn, Einleit. ii. 209, 218) that Mark, being Peter’s scholar, made Peter’s teaching widely known through his written Gospel, or (Swete, St. Mark, p. xxiv) that he was the secretary or dragoman who translated Peter’s words into a foreign tongue during the Apostle’s lifetime. Papias does not call the work of Mark a ‘gospel,’ and the word εὐαγγέλιον is not undoubtedly found in the sense of the record of good tidings before Justin (Apol. i. 66, see below), though some find this sense in Ignatius, Philad. 5, 8, and in the Didache 8, 11, 15. In these places, however, it is probably not the written word that is referred to. [For a complete discussion of the Papias fragment see Lightfoot, Ess. on Sup. Rel. v., vi., and Sanday, Gosp. in Second Cent. v. 2].

Justin Martyr (Dial. 106) says that Christ changed Simon’s name to Peter, and that this is written ‘in his memoirs’ (ἐν τοῖς ἀπομνημονεύμασιν αὐτοῦ), and also that He changed the name of the sons of Zebedee to ‘Boanerges, which is Sons of Thunder.’ But these last words actually occur only in Mar 3:17, where we read of both names, Peter and Boanerges, together, and in no other Gospel. We may probably dismiss the idea that αὐτοῦ refers to Christ, as if Justin meant ‘Christ’s memoirs,’ and conclude that Justin is speaking of a Petrine Gospel. Harnack (Bruchstücke d. Ev.... d. Petrus, p. 37) proposes to find this in the apocryphal Akhmîm Fragment which goes by St. Peter’s name, and Sanday (*Inspiration*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] [Bampton Lectures], p. 310) agrees that Justin used pseudo-Peter. But as there is no other reason to suppose that this apocryphal Gospel ever contained the passage in question,—the fragment lately discovered beginning in the middle of the story of the Passion,—and as Justin elsewhere probably refers to our Second Gospel (see below), it is more reasonable to suppose with Swete (Gospel of St. Peter, p. xxxiii), Salmond (Hastings, DB [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] iii. 256), and Stanton (JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] ii. 6, and Gospels as Hist. Doc. p. 93 ff.) that he refers to it here. If so, we have another authority for regarding St. Peter as a chief source of Mark. In considering the question whether Justin refers to Mk. or to the apocryphal Gospel, we must note that while some points of contact are found between pseudo-Peter and Justin, there are also some considerable differences (see esp. Stanton, loc. cit.), and that if one borrowed from the other, it is as likely that pseudo-Peter is the borrower as Justin.—The Evangelic narratives are in Justin commonly called ‘memoirs’—e.g. Apol. i. 66, ‘the memoirs composed by them [the Apostles] which are called Gospels.’ From Dial. 103 it appears that he included in the term some not composed by the Apostles themselves but by their followers. He speaks of ‘the memoirs drawn up by the Apostles and by those who followed them,’ and in this context recalls the (Lukan?) account of the Agony and the drops of blood.

Tatian, Justin’s pupil, affords evidence that Mk. was received in his time (c. [Note: circa, about.] 170 a.d.) as one of the four Gospel narratives pre-eminently above, and on a different platform from, all others. His Diatessaron is now known to be a harmony of our four Gospels, and probably it was not the first of its kind.

Irenaeus is the first explicitly to expound the doctrine of the necessity of a fourfold Gospel (ἔδωκεν ἡμῖν τετράμορφον τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, iii. 11. 8). As the world has four quarters, and as the Church is spread over the whole world, and as the pillar and ground of the Church is the Gospel and the Spirit of life, so it is right that there should be four Gospels. Irenaeus finds other equally fanciful reasons for a fourfold Gospel, and identifies our Evangelists with the fourfold appearance of the cherubim, St. Mark being the eagle (see § iii. 1 below). This reasoning, however erroneous, shows that our four Gospels had a position entirely by themselves in Irenaeus’ estimation; and Dr. Taylor conjectures that he borrowed the idea from Hermas (Witness of Hermas, § 1). In an earlier passage (iii. 1. 1) Irenaeus says that Mark was Peter’s disciple and interpreter (ἑρμηνευτής, as Papias), and that he handed on to us in writing the things preached by Peter, after the departure of Peter and Paul. In iii. 10. 6 (where the Greek is wanting), Irenaeus calls Mark ‘interpres et sectator Petri.’

Tertullian (adv. Mare. iv. 5, Migne, P. L. ii. 396) gives similar witness (‘... licet et Marcus quod edidit, Petri affirmetur, cujus interpres Marcus’).

The Muratorian fragment (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 170? or perhaps a little later) begins in the middle of a sentence thus: ‘... quibus tamen interfuit, et ita posuit. Tertium Evangelii librum secundum Lucan.... Quarti evangeliorum Johannes ex discipulis....’ Thus the writer had been speaking of two Gospels, which were neither Luke nor John. It is generally recognized that the opening words of the fragment refer to Mk. rather than to Mt., and that the latter had come first, as in Irenaeus; but there is some difference of opinion as to their meaning. Swete, Lightfoot, and Chase interpret them to mean that Mark was present at some discourses of Peter; he reported Peter's teaching as far as he had the opportunity. The first word 'quibus' may be the second half of 'aliquibus' some; Chase (Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 24) takes 'quibus tamen' as the equivalent of an original οἷς δὲ—for the fragment is a Latin translation from Greek. Zahn (Einleit. ii. 200 f.) thinks that the author of the fragment had quoted Papias as saying that Mark was not a hearer of our Lord, and then qualified Papias' assertion by saying that Mark had been present at some of our Lord's discourses. Compare this with the idea of some later writers (e.g. Epiphanius, Hær. xx. 4, li. 6) that Mark was one of the Seventy (Seventy-two) Disciples; and with the modern opinion that the young man of Mar_14:51 was the Evangelist. But, as Swete shows (St. Mark, p. xxxiii), this is against the words that follow about Luke: 'Neither did he [Luke] himself see the Lord in the flesh.'

Clement of Alexandria (Hypotyp., ap. Euseb. Historia Ecclesiastica vi. 14) says that while Peter was preaching the gospel at Rome, many of those present begged Mark to write down what was said. Peter neither forbade nor urged it. There is a story similar to this told in the Muratorian fragment about John. In Historia Ecclesiastica ii. 15, Eusebius says, on the authority of Clement and Papias, that Peter confirmed the writing; but the passage afterwards quoted by Eusebius from Papias does not bear out this detail. Origen (quoted by Euseb. Historia Ecclesiastica vi. 25) says that Mark composed the Gospel at Peter's instruction (ὡς Πέτρος ὑφηγήσατο), being acknowledged as his son (1Pe_5:13).

It is unnecessary to quote later writers, who could scarcely have other means of information than we have; but we may notice that Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica ii. 16) makes Mark go to Egypt and found the Church at Alexandria after he had written his Gospel, and says (ib. 24) that Annianus succeeded him as bishop there in the eighth year of Nero, a statement which Jerome improves upon by saying that St. Mark died then (de Vir. Illustr. § 8). It is also desirable to quote Augustine, as his opinion has had such weight in the Church. He says (de Consensu Evangelistarum, i. 3, aliter i. 6) that of the four Evangelists, Matthew wrote first, then Mark, and that Mark was, as it were, Matthew's follower and abbreviator ('Marcus eum subsequutus tanquam pedisequus et breviator ejus videtur'). Seldom has one short sentence had such an unfortunate effect in distorting a judgment on a literary work; and largely in consequence of it Mk. has been generally neglected. The Second Gospel seems hardly to have engaged the attention of commentators; and the writer known as Victor of Antioch (quoted by Swete, St. Mark, p. xxxiv) in the 5th cent. (or later), says that he had not been able to find a single author who had expounded it.

2. Early quotations, references, and use.—The use of Mk. by the Apostolic Fathers is not certain, though in some cases quite probable. The quotation in Clement of Rome (Cor. 23) and pseudo-Clement (Ancient Homily, 11), which in the latter is introduced by λέγει γὰρ καὶ ὁ προφητικὸς λόγος, is more likely to be from some lost Christian writing than to be a fusion of Mar 4:26 ff. and other NT passages; but Polycarp, Phil. [Note: Philistine.] 5, διάκονος πάντων, seems to come from Mar 9:35. In other cases it is probable that one of our Gospels is referred to, but we cannot be sure that it is Mk. in particular that is before the writer. As an example we may take Polycarp, Phil. [Note: Philistine.] 7, which quotes Mat 26:41 and Mar 14:38 exactly, and both in Polycarp and in the Gospels the context is about not going into temptation. Pseudo-Clement (§ 2), after quoting Is 54:1 LXX Septuagint, continues: ‘Another Scripture saith, I came not to call the righteous, but sinners,’ exactly as Mat 9:13, Mar 2:17, where ‘to repentance’ is not in the best manuscripts, but comes from || Luk 5:32. But Mt. and not Mk. might have been before Polycarp and pseudo-Clement, though in the latter case the omission of the γὰρ of Mt. makes Mk. more likely. And so with Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and others. The Didache apparently refers to Mt. and Lk., and the name itself seems to be derived from Act 2:42; but though a probable reference (x. 5) to 1Jn 4:18 makes the writer’s knowledge of Jn. likely, there is no trace of his knowing Mark. For the possible references to the last twelve verses in Barnabas, etc., see below, § vi. The use of Mk. by Hermas is very probable. He apparently refers to Mar 3:29; Mar 10:24 where they differ from Mt. and Lk., in Mand. ii. 2 (οὕτως οὖν ἔνοχος ἔσῃ ἁμαρτίας τοῦ καταλαλοῦντος), and Sim. ix. 20. 3 (τοῖς τοιούτοις δύσκολόν ἐστιν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ εἰσελθεῖν). Indirectly the Shepherd of Hermas supplies a great argument for the antiquity of the Gospels, because it shows the uniqueness of our Lord’s parables as there narrated. Hermas essays the same method of teaching, but his attempt is utterly feeble. If the Gospels were 2nd cent. productions, and the words of our Lord had been handed on only by oral tradition, the parables could never have been kept so pure. They would in the course of time, before the narratives reached us in their present form, have assimilated features such as we find in Hermas. [For further references in the Shepherd see Zahn, Hirt d. Hermas, p. 456 ff.; Stanton, Gosp. as Hist. Doc. p. 45].

To Justin’s probable reference to the Boanerges passage (see above) must be added Dial. 88, where he speaks of Jesus as ‘supposed to be the carpenter’ (τέκτονος νομιζομένου; but Otto’s text has νομ. Ἰωσήφ τοῦ τέκτ. υἱοῦ ὑπάρχειν). Only Mark (Mar 6:3) calls Jesus a carpenter (see § iii. 4 (j) below). Justin also probably quotes from the last twelve verses (below, § vi.).

The use of Mk. by heretics is presumed from references to it in Heracleon, the Valentinians, pseudo-Peter, and the Clementine Homilies (the first two as reported by Clement of Alexandria and Irenaeus), for which reference may be made to Swete's St. Mark, p. xxxi; and Sanday's Gospels in the Second Century, ch. vi. p. 177 ff.

The Gospel is found in all the old Versions—Curetonian and Sinaitic Syriac (of the former only 16:17-20 is extant), Old Latin, Bohairic, Sahidic; and in all catalogues and Greek manuscripts of the Gospels.

Putting together the statements, references, and quotations, and deferring the question of an editor later than the original writer of the Gospel (see § vii.), we may conclude, (a) that there is valid evidence that Mk. was in circulation before the middle of the 2nd cent.; (b) that ecclesiastical tradition almost uniformly connects the Second Evangelist with St. Peter—the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 57, Lagarde, p. 85, c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 375) being the only writing which undoubtedly connects him with St. Paul (οἱ συνεργοὶ Παύλου ... Λουκᾶς καὶ Μάρκος, cf. Phm_1:24, Col_4:11); (c) that there was a difference of tradition as to whether he wrote while St. Peter was alive or after his death (see § iv. below). Further, (d) the Alexandrian Fathers Clement and Origen do not mention Mark's preaching at Alexandria—a strange silence; and (e) there is no hint till Hippolytus that there was more than one Mark; apparently the other writers identified the cousin of Barnabas and the disciple of Peter.

iii. The Character of the Gospel as shown by itself and by comparison with the other Gospels.—If we had no information from ecclesiastical writers, we could have made no conjecture as to the authorship of the Second Gospel, as we can in the case of Lk. (by comparing it with Acts) and Jn. (by comparing it with the Synoptics). But from internal evidence we should gather that the author was either an eye-witness of the events described or at least that he had first-hand information. Further, a close examination of the Gospel makes it exceedingly probable that the writer's informant was St. Peter. So that, while we should never from the NT itself have arrived at the name Mark, yet the internal evidence fully corroborates the external, that the author was the 'interpreter of Peter.' The impression left from a study of Mk. is that we have here in effect, though not in form, and not without some additions due to the Evangelist himself, that Apostle's Gospel. It begins the narrative at the point when Peter could give his own recollections—at the preaching of the Baptist and the baptism of Jesus. This, not the Birth-narratives, as in the case of Mt. and Lk., nor yet the account of our Lord's pre-existence, as in the case of Jn., was to Mark 'the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God' (1:1), whether these words are part of the record or are the title prefixed by an early scribe.

1. Presentation of Christ's Person and work.—Beginning with the preaching of John and our Lord's entering on His ministry, St. Mark describes at length the Galilaean ministry and the slow unfolding of Jesus' claims. Our Lord, for example, does not at once proclaim His Messiahship, nor does He allow evil spirits to proclaim it in-opportunely (Mar 1:25; Mar 3:12; cf. Mar 1:44 etc.). Even after Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi, when the Galilaean ministry was nearly ended, the disciples were charged to tell no man (Mar 8:30). At first Jesus begins by calling Himself the Son of Man (Mar 2:10). Then the crowds begin to see in Him a prophet; His own people and the learned scribes from Jerusalem think Him mad. We might even think, at first sight, especially if we have the Matthaean account (Mar 16:16) of Peter's confession chiefly in mind and not the Markan, that the disciples then and then only found out that Jesus was Messiah. But this deduction would be precarious. The account in Jn., which makes the Baptist begin by calling Jesus the Lamb of God and the Son of God, and makes Andrew, Philip, and Nathanael at once recognize Him as Messiah (Joh 1:29; Joh 1:34; Joh 1:41; Joh 1:45; Joh 1:49), bears all the marks of probability. A Judaeae ministry, as to which the Synoptists are almost silent, must have been carried on simultaneously with the Galilaean preaching. We should expect Jesus, as a religious Jew, to visit Jerusalem frequently; and indeed, if the last Passover were His first visit during the ministry, we could not explain the sudden enmity of the Jerusalem Jews, or the fact of there being Judaeae disciples—Judas Iscariot (probably from Kerioth in Judaeae), Joseph of Arimathaea, the owners of the colt at Bethphage and of the room where the Last Supper was celebrated (these evidently knew Jesus), the household at Bethany, and Simon 'the leper.' Also non-Markan portions of Mt. and Lk. imply visits to Jerusalem or a wider ministry than that in Galilee (Mat 23:37, Luk 4:44, BC \times , Luk 13:21; Luk 13:33 f.); and in Acts the Apostles at once make their headquarters at Jerusalem, which would have been unlikely if they had only just arrived there for the first time. On that occasion they were perfectly familiar with places and people. But if this be so, we should expect two methods of proclaiming the Person of Christ to have been adopted for these two quite distinct people, of such different characteristics, and separated by hostile Samaria. In Jerusalem, where religious controversy was rife, the question of Jesus' Personality and office could not be postponed; this is shown by the way in which the Pharisees questioned the Baptist. But in Galilee this was not the case, and the revelation consequently was much more gradual. The Apostles, doubtless, had heard the questions asked in Judaeae, and did know the claim of Jesus to be the Christ, though perhaps they did not fully realize all that it meant until the incident at Caesarea Philippi. Thenceforward Jesus speaks to them of His future glory (Mar 8:38; cf. Mar 9:7) and of His Passion (Mar 8:31, Mar 9:12; Mar 9:31 etc.). After the Galilaean ministry (which ends at Mar 9:50) Mark gives some short account (ch. 10) of journeys in Judaeae and Peraea, and it is only on the final approach to Jerusalem that all reserve passes away. In common with all the Evangelists, Mark gives a detailed account of the last days at Jerusalem.

In describing our Lord's Person, Mark emphatically brings out His Divinity. Jesus claims super human authority—e.g. Mar 2:28 (lord of the Sabbath), Mar 8:38 and Mar 14:62 (coming in glory, the latter in answer to Caiaphas' question, 'Art thou the Christ?'), Mar 12:6 ff. (the beloved Son and Heir); and especially authority to forgive sins, Mar 2:5; Mar 2:10 (the paralytic). He is a supernatural Person: Mar 1:11, Mar 9:7 ('my beloved Son'), Mar 1:24 ('the Holy One of God'), Mar 3:11 ('the Son of God'), Mar 5:7 ('Son of the Most High God'), Mar 15:39 ('the Son of God' or 'a son of God'). He knows the thoughts of man, Mar 2:8; Mar 8:17; Mar 12:15, and what is to happen in the future, Mar 2:20 (fasting), Mar 8:31 and Mar 9:31 etc. (the Passion), Mar 8:38 (the Second Advent), Mar 10:39 (the sufferings of the Apostles), Mar 13:2 (destruction of the Temple), Mar 13:10 (the universal gospel), Mar 14:27 (scattering of the sheep). His death has an atoning efficacy, Mar 10:45 (λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν), Mar 14:24 ('my blood of the covenant which is shed for many').

But still more striking is the emphasis laid on the true humanity of our Lord. The reality of His human body is referred to much as in the other Evangelists—e.g. He is wearied and sleeps (Mar 4:38; sleep is perhaps implied also in Mar 1:35); He eats (Mar 14:3) and drinks (Mar 15:36); His 'touch' is frequently spoken of (Mar 1:41 etc.) (see Gestures); the burial of His body is dwelt on in Mar 15:43 ff. But Mark pre-eminently describes the human soul and spirit of our Lord. Note especially His human compassion (Mar 1:41) and love (Mar 10:21), and the more painful emotions (Mar 1:43, Mar 3:5, Mar 6:6, Mar 10:14 Mar 14:33 f., Mar 15:34), for which see below, § iii. 3. Note also the reference to our Lord's human soul and spirit in Mar 2:8, Mar 14:34, and to His human will in Mar 14:36. Mark also refers to the sinless limitations of Jesus' human nature. Questions are asked apparently for information (Mar 5:30, Mar 8:5, Mar 9:16)—for in these cases an 'economical' questioning seems scarcely worthy. The Evangelist also records the one perfectly certain instance of Jesus' ignorance qua man, Mar 13:32 (the Day of Judgment—so Mt.). It is because so much stress is laid in Mk. on our Lord's true human nature that St. Augustine assigns to the Second Evangelist the symbol of the man. Other Fathers vary much in assigning the four symbols, but it is remarkable that each one of the four is assigned to St. Mark in some one or other of the Fathers, Irenaeus making him the eagle, Victorinus the lion, Augustine the man, pseudo-Athanasius the calf (see Swete, St. Mark, p. xxxviii).

2. Autoptic character.—In many passages Mk. shows, equally with Jn. and much more than Mt. and Lk., clear signs of first-hand knowledge. In these places Mk. often gives a lifelike touch, though Mt. and Lk. in their parallels have lost it. Such are the stooping down of the Baptist to loose the shoe-latchet (Mar 1:7), the heavens in the act of opening (σχιζομένους [present], Mar 1:10), the ‘incoherent and excited remarks of the crowd’ at the healing of the Capernaum demoniac (Mar 1:27 best text, see Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ; they are softened down by later scribes of Mk. and by Lk.), the ‘house of Simon and Andrew’ (Mar 1:29, where || Mt. and Lk. omit Andrew; in the East it is common for several brothers, even when married, to live in one house, but it required first-hand knowledge to know that Andrew and Peter lived together), Simon starting in pursuit of Jesus (Mar 1:36), the breaking up of the mud roof to let the paralytic down through it, with other details (Mar 2:4, where Mt. tells none of the small points, and Lk., writing for a Roman nobleman, as has been conjectured, translates these, to him, unintelligible details into the language of Western Europe, and says that the man was let down through the tiles; see Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 63), the single pillow, τὸ προσκεφάλαιον, probably a wooden headrest, in the boat in the storm (Mar 4:38, Mk. only), Jesus turning round in the crowd to see who touched Him (so Mt., not Lk.), and His glance at the woman (Mar 5:30 ff., Mk. only), His not allowing the crowd who were with Him to come near Jairus’ house, a very probable and lifelike detail (Mar 5:37, Mk. only; Lk. makes Jesus dismiss the crowd on His entering). The scene at Jairus’ house is especially vivid in Mk., and is instructive as showing who the Evangelist’s authority was. It must have been one of the inner circle of Apostles, i.e. Peter, James, or John (Andrew was not here present). As James died early, and another Gospel was written by (or, at least, depends on) John, we are led to think of Peter as the source. Further instances of lifelike touches are: the five thousand arranged ‘like garden beds’ πρασιοὶ πρασιαί (Mk. only) on the green grass (Mar 6:40), the details in the account of the Transfiguration (Mar 9:2 ff., where Mt. and Lk. also are vivid), but especially of the healing which followed, where the story is told from the point of view of the three Apostles, not of those who remained behind (Mar 9:14 ἐλθόντες ... εἶδον ὄχλον, Mk. only), and where Mk. only has the delicate touch (Mar 9:17) that the man brought the cataleptic boy to Jesus and applied to the disciples only when he found that Jesus was absent, and other autoptic details; Mt. and Lk. greatly abbreviate this narrative. So Mark alone relates that in the dispute about precedence and in the blessing of the little ones Jesus took the children into His arms (ἐναγκαλισάμενος, Mar 9:36, Mar 10:16), and in the latter case that He blessed them fervently (κατηυλόγει). Notice also how Mk. alone tells us of the searching glance of love cast by Jesus on the rich young man and the clouding over of the young man’s brow (Mar 10:21 f.), and of the colt tied at the door without in the open street (Mar 11:4; probably Peter was one of the two disciples sent), of Jesus refusing to permit vessels to be carried through the Temple (Mar 11:16), of the command to bring a denarius, the Roman coin, into the Temple (where only Jewish coins were current) at the question of paying tribute (Mar 12:15). For the Agony in the Garden, see below, 3; but here again we note that the source must have been Peter, James, or John. The account of Peter's denials is indecisive, as he must have been the ultimate authority for all the narratives; but the ἐπιβαλὼν of Mar 14:72 (see below, 4 (h)) argues the priority of our Evangelist.

Exceptional knowledge is evidenced by the mention of the names of Levi's father (Alphaeus, Mar 2:14), of the father of the blind man at Jericho (Timaeus, Mar 10:46), and of the sons of Simon of Cyrene (Alexander and Rufus, Mar 15:21). These and other instances lead us to see in the Second Gospel a graphic account of one who had first-hand knowledge at his command, and, to a large extent, confirm Papias' description of Mark as Peter's interpreter. Mk. consists almost entirely of things of which Peter had personal knowledge. As Eusebius noticed long ago (Demonstr. Evangel. iii. 5, Cologne ed. p. 120 f.), it is silent on matters which reflect credit on Peter. It alone records several Petrine touches. We have, in fact, here in all particulars the Petrine tradition in a far more exact form than in the other Synoptics.

3. Description of the inner feelings of our Lord and of the Apostles.—This is found in Mk. to an extent which argues an early narrative based on intimate personal knowledge of Jesus and of the Twelve. In Mt. and Lk. the painful emotions of our Lord are not mentioned, except in the case of the Agony, and even that disappears in the Westcott-Hort text of Lk. (Luk 22:43 f.); a fact probably to be accounted for by a feeling of reverence due to a slightly later age. In Mk. we find a more childlike boldness in describing Jesus' feelings. See the following instances, which are found in Mk. only: Mar 1:43 ἐμβρομησάμενος (denoting sternness: not necessarily anger, but deep feeling); Mar 3:5 righteous anger and grief; Mar 6:6 wondering at the people's unbelief (here Mt. retains διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν αὐτῶν, but omits ἐθαύμασεν; on the other hand, Mat 8:10, Luk 7:9 have the wonder of Jesus' human mind at the centurion's faith—an incident which was not part of the Petrine tradition and is not in Mk.); Luk 10:14, indignation when the disciples kept back the little children; and especially Luk 14:33 f., the Agony in the Garden, where Mk. alone speaks of the surprise (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι) added to the distraction from grief (ἀδημονεῖν) of Jesus' human soul. Mt. changes the former to λυπεῖσθαι while retaining the latter, and Lk. omits the whole passage. If, as seems probable, the passage Luk 22:43 f. is not an original part of the Third Gospel, it is perhaps a fragment older than Lk. and reflects the same stage of thought as Mark. It is referred to in Justin, Dial. 103.—It is not unlikely that the difference between Mar 10:18 (the rich young man) and Mat 19:16 f. in the best text (BD \times , Origen, etc.; see Westcott-Hort, Notes) is due to the same feeling. Possibly when the First Evangelist wrote, the Markan phrase, 'Why callest thou me good? none is good save one, even God,' may have been misunderstood to imply a merely human Christ. Or perhaps the Westcott-Hort text of Mt. is not original, but is due to an early scribe or editor who disliked the Markan form of the incident. Another example is the πτῶμα of Mar 15:43 (so \times BDL; Westcott-Hort with AC, etc., read σῶμα). This was a word used of the carcase of a dead animal or of a human being, with a touch of contempt. Mt. and Lk. have therefore altered πτῶμα to σῶμα, as also have some scribes in Mk., from feelings of reverence.

The same thing is true of another matter almost peculiar to Mk., the account of the inner feelings of the Apostles. See mark Mar 4:38, showing the Apostles' resentment against the Lord ('Carest thou not?'), and similarly Mar 4:41, showing their awe or holy fear at the revelation of Jesus' power and Divinity (cf., however, St. Peter at the miraculous draught of fishes in Luk 5:8); Mar 10:32, showing their amazement and fear, apparently arising from our Lord's manner as He went before them; and Mar 14:5 ἐνεβριμῶντο, here (unlike Mar 1:43) of anger.

A similar result follows from the passages where Mk. tells us that Jesus 'could not' do a thing. The inability is, doubtless, relative and conditional. Jesus 'could not' do that which was inconsistent with His plan of salvation. Yet here the other Synoptists, feeling that the phrases might be misunderstood as taking from the Master's glory, have altered or omitted them. See Mar 1:45, Mar 7:24, and the specially significant Mar 6:5 f., where οὐκ ἐδύνατο ἐκεῖ ποιῆσαι οὐδεμίαν δύναμιν εἰ μὴ, κ.τ.λ., καὶ ἔθαύμασεν διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν αὐτῶν = Mat 13:58 οὐκ ἐποίησεν ἐκεῖ δυνάμεις πολλὰς διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν αὐτῶν, the two possible causes of offence being removed in Mt.

4. Comparison with the other Synoptics.—The indications given in the last two subsections will lead us to believe that the Second Gospel, either in the form in which we have it now, or at least in a form very like that which we have, is chronologically the first of the Synoptics, and that it lay before the writers of the First and Third Gospels. This impression is greatly strengthened by the considerations which follow. We still postpone the question whether the Markan Gospel known to Matthew and Luke is the same as our Mark.

(a) Scope of Mark.—Except about thirty verses, all the narrative that we find in Mk. we find also (and in the same order) in either Mt. or Lk., or in both. This might tell both ways. If Mark were only an abbreviator, borrowing from Mt. and Lk., without much independent information, it would stand to reason that he would have little to tell us that was not found in them. But, then, his Gospel would not be the fresh and vivid, first-hand and autoptic, composition that it is. Therefore we are led to the conclusion that Matthew and Luke borrowed from Mark, and that one or other of them took almost everything that was found in his Gospel.

That Luke borrowed from Mark is seen from another fact. In the Third Gospel there is a long section which is not in the Second (Luk 9:51 to Luk 18:14). For this, Luke is dependent on some other source. But, having followed the Markan order somewhat closely up to the point where the section begins, he goes back, when the section ends, to within a few verses of the place in Mk. where he dropped it. Thus, Luk 9:50 = Mar 9:39 f.; Luk 18:15 = Mar 10:13. This looks as if Mk. (or something very like it) was lying open before the Third Evangelist as he wrote.

(b) Diffuseness and redundancy of Mk. as compared with parallel passages of Mt. and Luke.—The idea that Mark is an abbreviator of Matthew is at once shown to be wrong when we compare parallels. When we do so, we shall find, in almost every case, that Mk. is much fuller than either Mt. or Lk. taken singly. The greater bulk of the two latter is due to their relating many incidents and speeches which are not in Mark. The style of Mk. is somewhat diffuse, and it was necessary for the other Synoptists, if they were to make room for the new matter which they desired to introduce, to prune it considerably. This they did. Instances are: Mar 1:32 (Mt. omits ‘when the sun did set,’ Lk. omits ‘at even’); Mar 1:35 πρωτὶ ἔννυχα λίαν (= Lk. γενομένης ἡμέρας); Mar 2:15 f., Mar 4:1 ff., where the shorter form in Mt. and Lk. really omits nothing from the sense; Mar 5:22 f., Mar 5:35 (Mt., abbreviating, puts together the arrival of Jairus who said that the child was dying, and of the messenger who said that she was dead); Mar 5:25 (Mt. omits all the Markan details about the woman with the issue of blood, Lk. omits some of them); Mar 6:17 ff. (the parenthetical explanation about the Baptist’s death interrupts the course of the narrative in Mt. and Mk., but is greatly abbreviated in the former; in Lk. the story is put in its proper place, but abbreviated to one or two sentences; note Mk.’s redundant εὐθὺς μετὰ σπουδῆς, Mar 6:25); Mar 8:1 (the feeding of the four thousand, shortened in Mt., left out in Lk.); Mar 8:14 (the omission to take bread, abbreviated in Mr., whence we should have gathered, if we had not had Mk., that they discovered the omission only after landing, instead of when in the boat, as Mk., which is much more likely); Mar 9:38 ff. (the stranger exorcist, omitted in Mt., shortened in Lk.); Mar 13:19 ἀπ’ ἀρχῆς κτίσεως ἦν ἔκτισεν ὁ θεός (= Mt. ἀπ’ ἀρχόσμου, Lk. different). Many other examples might be given, e.g. Mar 7:13, Mar 8:15; Mar 8:37 (cf. Lk.) Mar 12:14; Mar 12:44, Mar 14:68, Mar 15:1, Mar 16:8. See also Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, pp. 100 ff., 110.

A similar instance of redundancy is the use of pleonastic forms in Mk., e.g. ἐκ παιδιόθ εν Mar 9:21 (A omits ἐκ, D [Note: Deuteronomist.] has ἐκ παιδός), ἀπὸ μακρόθεν Mar 5:6, Mar 8:3, Mar 11:13, Mar 14:54, Mar 15:40. These are very seldom found in Mt. and Luke.

(c) Correction of Markan details in Mt. or Luke.—In two or three instances we find a small slip of the pen corrected, as when Mark (Mar_1:2 f.) cites as from Isaiah a passage which is really partly from Mal_3:1 and partly from Isa_40:3, perhaps through using a book of quotations in which these passages followed each other, with ‘Isaiah’ at the top of the page; here the other Synoptists omit the Malachi passage (though they give it elsewhere, Mat_11:10 = Luk_7:27), thus silently correcting Mark. So Mar_2:26 has ἐπὶ Ἀβιάθαρ ἀρχιερέως, which can only mean ‘during the high priesthood of Abiathar’ (AC, etc., insert τοῦ, which might give the meaning ‘in the time of A., who was afterwards high priest’; D [Note: Deuteronomist.] , syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin}, and some Old Latin Manuscripts omit the whole phrase; these are scribes’ corrections). The || Mt. Lk. have the Markan sentence almost exactly, with the exception of these three words which they omit, no doubt because it is not correct to say that the events happened when Abiathar was actually high priest. In the account of the women at the tomb (Mar_16:2) there is some confusion of time (λίαν πρὸς ... ἀνατείλαντος τοῦ ἡλίου), probably due to compression, different events being put together, unless, indeed, we accept Wright’s suggestion (*Synopsis of the Gospels*², in loc.) that μήπω has dropped out before ἀνατείλαντος. In || Mat_28:1 there is a similar obscurity: ‘late on the Sabbath day, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene.’ But this is corrected in || Luk_24:1. The women came on the first day of the week ὄρθρου βαθέως (so John 20 :1 πρῶτι, σκοτίας ἔτι οὔσης).

Cases of explanations, or corrections of matter, as opposed to corrections of phraseology, may be seen in Mar_12:8, where the killing of the heir precedes the casting out of the vineyard, the order being inverted in Mt. and Lk. to make the parable fit the heavenly counterpart; in Mar_13:14 (‘abomination of desolation’) where || Mat_24:15 adds ‘spoken of by Daniel the prophet,’ and || Luk_21:20 explains by altering to ‘Jerusalem compassed with armies’; and Mar_15:39 where the words ‘Son of God’ (so Mt.) are explained by Lk. as ‘a righteous man.’ In this last case the Markan phrase is probably original, though the centurion would have borrowed it from the Jews without understanding it; Luke gives what the centurion meant in his own mind.

In several cases additions in Mt. or Lk. imply the priority of Mk., the added words probably coming from a non-Markan source, as in the confession of St. Peter, where the account in Mk. (Mar_8:29) could hardly have been derived from Mt. by abbreviation; and in the warning (Mar_13:18) to pray that the flight be not in the winter (χειμῶνος), where Mt. (Mat_24:20) adds μηδὲ σαββάτω, changing the case. Or, in some instances, the added words are a gloss; e.g. Mar_8:34 (taking up the cross—Lk. adds ‘daily’), Mar_10:40 (to sit on Jesus’ right hand or left hand is for those for whom it has been prepared—Mt. adds ‘by my Father’), Mar_12:1 (the owner of the vineyard goes away—Lk. adds χρόνους ικανούς, showing special knowledge of viticulture, as it would be several years before the grapes were allowed to ripen).

In some cases, by a turn of phrase, Mk.’s accuracy in minute points is lost in Mt. and Luke. Thus in Mar_4:36 our Lord was already in the boat (Mar_4:1); the other Synoptists, by an oversight, make Him embark here. In the Charge to the Twelve Mar_6:8 has ‘take nothin ... save a staff only’; || Mt. and Lk. show an early exaggeration of the command (see Swete, St. Mark, in loc.). In Mar_10:1 Jesus comes ‘into the borders of Judaea and beyond (καὶ πέραν) Jordan’; Mt. (Mat_19:1) omits καὶ, as do some lesser Manuscripts. in Mk. (A, etc., have διὰ τοῦ πέραν); but doubtless Mk. is right here,—Jesus went both into Judaea and into Peraea. The passage is not in Luke. On the general question of the alterations and omissions of Markan matter in Mt. and Lk. see Hawkins, Hor. Synopt. p. 96 ff. He suggests that several Markan passages might be misunderstood as derogatory to Jesus or to the Apostles, or might otherwise cause offence; and therefore were altered by Mt. or by Lk. or by both.

(d) Correction of Markan phraseology in Mt. or Luke.—The Second Gospel is distinguished by a rough and unpolished style, reflecting the Greek commonly spoken by the Jews in the 1st century. In the parallels of the other Synoptics there are numerous instances of toning down and pruning Mark’s unliterary forms of speech.

As an example, take Mk.’s frequent use of diminutives, often altered in Mt., almost always in Luke. Such are θυγάτριον Mar_5:23; Mar_7:25 (not elsewhere in NT) = θυγάτηρ Mt. Lk. (no Lukan parallel to Mar_7:25); παιδίον, κοράσιον (the latter a late colloquial word condemned by the Atticists) Mar_5:39 ff. = κοράσιον Mt. bis = παῖς Lk.; παιδία Mar_10:13 (so Mt.) = βρέφη Lk.; ιχθύδια Mar_8:7—Mt. has it once, but soon corrects to ιχθύας (not in Lk.); πλοιάριον Mar_3:9 (so Jn.), not in Mt. and Lk. (all the best Manuscripts in Mar_4:36 have πλοῖα as in Mt. and Lk., not πλοιάρια as Textus Receptus); ὠτάριον *⊗*BD Mar_14:47 (also in Jn.) = ὠτίον Mt. = οὖς Lk.; παιδισκη Mar_14:66; Mar_14:69 (so Mt. Lk. once, but Mt. soon changes it to ἄλλη, Lk. to ἕτερος); κυνάρια Mar_7:27 f. (so Mt., no Lukan parallel); ψυχία Mar_7:28 (so Mt., no Lukan parallel); ψυχίων in Luk_16:21 is not in the best Manuscripts).

(e) Other colloquialisms are frequent in Mark. These are often corrected in Mt., oftener still in Luke. [Those here marked with an asterisk are expressly condemned by the Atticists]. Such are κράββατος* or κράβαττος* Mar 2:4; Mar 2:9; Mar 2:11 (Mt. and Lk. κλίνη, Lk. also κλινίδιον) and Mar 6:55 (Mt. omits, Lk. has no parallel, Jn. also has the word); συμβούλιον ἐδίδουν [νν. ll. ἐποίησαν, ἐποίουν] Mar 3:6, ζ. ποιήσαντες Mar 15:1, neither elsewhere in NT (Mt. has ζ. λαμβάνειν five times, Lk. different); ὄρκιζω* Mar 5:7, avoided by Mt. and Lk. (Mat 26:63 has ἐξορκίζω); ἐσχάτως ἔχει* Mar 5:23, corrected by Mt. and Lk. (Josephus has ἐν ἐσχάτοις εἶναι, Ant. ix. viii. 6); σφυρίς* [best reading] Mar 8:8; Mar 8:20 (so Mt.), colloquial for σπυρίς (see Deissmann, Bibl. Stud. p. 158, English translation); βλέπετε ἀπό Mar 8:15, Mar 12:38. probably colloquial or coined by Mark, corrected or avoided in Mt. and Lk.; μονόφθαλμος* Mar 9:47 (so Mt., Lk. has no parallel); τρυμαλιὰ ῥαφίδος Mar 10:25 = Mt. τρῆμα ῥ. = Lk. τρῆμα βελόνης best text (τρυμ. is a late rare word, doubtless colloquial; ῥαφίς* is colloquial); κολλυβιστής* Mar 11:15 (so Mt. and Jn.; Lk. omits; Joh 2:14 f. has κερματιστής in addition); ἐκεφαλίωσαν Mar 12:4, ἄπ. λεγ. in Greek, altered in Mt. and Lk. (see § iii. 5 and § vii. below); ἀγρεύσωσιν Mar 12:13 (= Mt. παγιδεύσωσιν, both ἄπ. λεγ. in NT; Lk. has ἐπιλάβωνται); κατάλυμα Mar 14:14 (so Lk., but Mt. omits), a colloquialism, though the verb καταλύω is classical in the sense of ‘halting to rest’; εἷς καθ’ (κατὰ) εἷς Mar 14:19 (altered in Mt., no parallel in Lk., a colloquialism, εἷς being made an indeclinable numeral, or else κατὰ an adverb, see Deissmann, Bibl. Stud. p. 138); σύσσημον* Mar 14:44 (= Mt. σημεῖον); ῥάπισμα* Mar 14:65 (so Jn., but altered in Mt. and Lk.); εὐσχήμων* Mar 15:43 in the sense ‘rich’ or ‘of honourable estate’ (altered in Mt. and Lk.). It is noteworthy, however, that Luke is more particular when correcting Mark than when composing his later treatise, for we find κράβαττος in Act 5:15; Act 9:33, ὄρκιζω in Act 19:13 (cf. 1Th 5:27 ἐνορκίζω best text), and εὐσχήμων in the above sense in Act 13:50; Act 17:12.

(f) Mark’s so-called Latinisms must probably be reckoned as being in reality colloquialisms; see § iv. below. Such are κεντυρίων centurio Mar 15:39; Mar 15:44 (= ἑκατόνταρχος, ἑκατοντάρχης Mt. Lk.); ξέστης sextarius Mar 7:4, not in the best text of

Mar 7:8 (Mt. omits, abbreviating; no parallel in Lk.); σπεκουλάτωρ speculator
Mar 6:27 ἄπ. λεγ. in Greek (omitted in Mt., no parallel in Lk.); κοδράντης quadrans
Mar 12:42 (omitted in Lk., no parallel in Mt., but the word is found in Mat 5:26); λεγι ών or λεγεών legio Mar 5:9; Mar 5:15, i.e. ‘a large number,’ which seems to have been its meaning in colloquial Greek (the || Luk 8:30 has it, but || Mat 8:29; Mat 8:34 omits it; Mat 26:53 has the word in its literal, military sense); κῆνσος census Mar 12:14 (so Mt., but Lk. φόρος); τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιεῖν satisfacere Mar 15:15 (omitted in Mt. and Lk., cf. Act 17:9 λαβόντες τὸ ἱκανὸν satis accipientes). To these must be added δηνάριον denarius Mar 6:37, Mar 12:15, Mar 14:5 and μόδιος modius
Mar 4:21, which both the other Synoptics have retained.

(g) The Aramaic transliterations in Mk. are a source of some perplexity when we ask the cause of their presence (see below, § v.). But in this connexion they are significant, because almost all of them have been removed by the other Synoptists. Even in Mk. they are nearly always accompanied by an interpretation; the other Evangelists, writing later, probably thought it useless to retain them. They are marks of an early hand, desirous of retaining the ipsissima verba spoken.

(h) Corrections of grammar, awkward and difficult phrases, etc.—Under this head we note many instances of smoothing an unpolished style. Thus in Mar 3:15 ff. Mark writes καὶ Ἰάκωβον, κ.τ.λ., forgetting that he had added a clause about Peter after (⊗BC*, etc.) καὶ ἐποίησεν τοὺς δώδεκα (Westcott-Hort insert a bracket in endeavouring to make Mk. grammatical—surely a desperate expedient)—the difficulty disappears in Mt. and Lk.; in Mar 4:11 ὑμῖν τὸ μυστήριον δέδοται is awkward—in Mt. and Lk. γυῶναι is inserted and makes the phrase easy—this probably is not a correction proper, but a case of taking a smoother phrase from the non-Markan source of Mt. and Lk. rather than the rough phrase in Mk. (see § vii. 2 below). Note also Mar 4:15 οὗτοι δὲ εἰσιν οἱ παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ... καὶ ὅταν, κ.τ.λ., for οἱ ὅταν—simplified in Mt. and Luk 4:21 where ἔρχεται is very awkward—Luke removes it, as also Matthew, who narrates the passage in a different connexion; Mar 4:24 βλέπετε τί ἀκοῦετε—Luke’s gloss is πῶς (for τί), doubtless a true one (no parallel in Mt.); Mar 4:31, anacolouthon, removed in Mt. and Lk., which both insert δν λαβῶν ἄνθρωπος, here probably following in preference their non-Markan source (as in Mar 4:11); Mar 7:11 f. ἐὰν εἴπη ἄνθρωπος ... Κορβάν ... οὐκέτι ἀφίετε αὐτόν, κ.τ.λ., which is grammatical enough though the sense is rather strained—this is smoothed in Mt. (no parallel in Lk.); Mar_9:1 εἰσὶν τινες ὧδε τῶν ἐστηκότων more awkward than the || Mt. τῶν ὧ. ἐ. or the || Lk. τῶν αὐτοῦ ἐ. Mar_9:11; Mar_9:28 ὅτι in the sense ‘why?’ (i.e. ‘how is it that ...’) = Mt. τί or διὰ τί, not in Lk. (so ὅτι in Mar_2:16 = Mk. Lk. διὰ τί); Mar_9:12, no δέ corresponding to μέν, καὶ πῶς being used instead—in Mt. the order is inverted and the λέγω δέ provides the requisite antithesis; Mar_9:41 ἐν ὀνόματι ὅτι an awkward phrase for ‘because’ = Mt. εἰς ὄνομα, μαθητοῦ (the converse change would be impossible; Swete finds a classical parallel to Mk. in Thuc. iv. 60; there is no parallel in Lk.); Mar_11:3 the words in the best text: ‘And straightway he will send (ἀποστέλλει, historic present) him back (πάλιν) hither,’ are part of the message, but (perhaps as being ambiguous) have been omitted in Lk., and altered in Mt. to a prediction that the owner of the colt would comply with the request; Mar_13:14 βδέλυγμα is made ungrammatically masculine (ἐστηκότα), because it is taken to be a man (the participle corrected in Mt. to ἐστός—Lk. completely different); Mar_13:19, the harsh phrase ‘those days shall be tribulation’ (softened in Authorized Version to ‘in those days,’ etc.) is altered and smoothed in Mt. and Lk. to ‘there shall be,’ etc.; Mar_14:65, the difficult phrase ῥαπίσμασιν ἔλαβον is omitted in Mt. and Lk. (the reading of Textus Receptus ἔβαλλον in Mk. arises partly from confusion of βαλ- and βάλ-, partly from the harshness of the original); Mar_14:72, the difficult ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιεν altered both in Mat_26:75 and Luk_22:62 to καὶ ἐξεληθὼν ἔξω ἔκλαυσεν πικρῶς, but Westcott-Hort bracket the clause in Lk. as doubtful (it is wanting in some Old Latin Manuscripts)—if it is genuine in Lk. (and it has almost overwhelming attestation) we probably have here a case not of correction proper, but (as before) of both Matthew and Luke preferring their non-Markan source to the ambiguous Mk., which was perhaps misunderstood in early times as much as now; whether it means ‘when he thought thereon he wept,’ or ‘covering his head he wept,’ or as D [Note: Deuteronomist.] and the Latin, Syrian, Armenian, and other versions have it, ‘he began to weep.’

The corrections under this head are most significant, and appear to be conclusive as to the early date of Mk. as compared with the other Synoptics. For no writer, having before him a smooth text, would gratuitously introduce harsh or difficult phraseology, whereas the converse change is natural and common.

(i) We may notice some changes made for greater precision, especially by Luke, who, as one would expect, uses more correct medical language. Cf. Mar 2:3 ff., Mat 9:2 ff. παραλυτικός = Luk 5:18 ff. παραλελυμένος; Mar 2:17, Mat 9:12 ισχύοντες = Luk 5:31 ὑγιαίνοντες. [In Mar 5:42 = Mat 9:25 = Luk 8:55, Lk. Mk. (not Mt.) add the command to give the maiden something to eat,—cf. Luk 7:15 where Jesus gives the widow’s son back to his mother: ‘in each case He intimates that nature is to resume its usual course’ (Plummer, St. Luke, on Luk 8:55)].

Similar corrections for precision are: Mar 6:14 ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἡρώδης (cf. Mar 6:22; Mar 6:26 f.) = Mt. Lk. ‘Ὁ τετραάρχης (though Mt. has retained ὁ βασιλ. in Mar 14:9); perhaps also Mar 6:22 τῆς θυγατρὸς αὐτοῦ Ἡρωδιάδος if the reading of \aleph BD (so Westcott-Hort) be right, in which case either the girl was not Salome but her half-sister, or perhaps more probably αὐτοῦ is used in a loose way to denote that she was Herod’s step-daughter—Mat 14:6 has ἡ θυγάτηρ τῆς Ἡρωδιάδος, which is more likely to be the truth (the Markan reading is, however, very doubtful); Mar 1:16 etc., where Mark calls the Lake of Gennesaret ‘the sea (θάλασσα) of Galilee’ (so Mt.), but Luke always, with his superior nautical knowledge, changes the word to λίμνη; and Mar 15:32 which says that ‘they that were crucified (pl.) with him reproached him’ (so Mt.)—the plural is perhaps used only impersonally, or possibly both robbers began to revile and one repented; but Luke, who had independent knowledge of this incident (for he alone relates the penitence of the robber), emphatically corrects the phrase to εἷς δὲ τῶν κρεμασθέντων κακούργων (Luk 23:39).

(j) Doubtful cases.—We must finally consider some passages in which it is doubtful whether we must attribute to Mk. priority or posteriority. In Mar 6:3 we find οὐχ οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ τέκτων; where Mat 13:55 has ὁ τοῦ τέκτονος υἱός and Luk 4:22 υἱὸς Ἰωσήφ. Here the correction might be on the part of the First and Third Evangelists, who disliked the name ‘the carpenter’ being given to Jesus, and the fact that they use different phrases points to the probability that they are not here borrowing from their common source or sources; while the correction might be on the part of Mark, who thought that the phrase ‘son of Joseph’ might be misunderstood by his readers, inasmuch as they had not the birth-narrative before them to explain it. Origen asserts that ‘in none of the Gospels current in the Churches is Jesus Himself ever described as being “the carpenter” ’ (adv. Cels. vi. 36), and perhaps this reading was not in his copy of Mark—a few authorities now extant have a different phrase (but see Westcott-Hort, Notes on Select Readings, p. 24). If the correction is on the part of the Second Gospel, it is probable that our Markan reading is the work of an editor later than Mt. Lk. (but see § vii. below).—In Mar 14:30; Mar 14:68; Mar 14:72 the cock is said to crow twice, according to the usually received readings; in Mt. Lk. Jn. only one cock-crowing is recorded. Some Manuscripts omit δις in Mar 14:30, many (ⲛBC syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} etc.) omit καὶ ἀλέκτωρ ἐφώνησεν in Mar 14:68, some omit ἐκ δευτέρου in Mar 14:72, others omit δις in Mar 14:72. If a second cock-crowing was in the Petrine tradition, it is difficult to understand why the other Evangelists should have so completely omitted all trace of it; but it is equally difficult to understand why, if it belongs to the original Mk., and if that Gospel was later than Mt. and Lk., the Second Evangelist should have introduced it; or again why, if it is an editorial addition to Mk., the editor should have introduced it. Perhaps Dr. Salmon's solution is the right one (Textual Criticism, ch. v.)—that originally Mk. had only one cock-crowing, that of Mar 14:72 (i.e., not in the same place as in Mt. and Lk.); that the omission of ⲛB, etc., in Mar 14:68 is right; and that some early scribe having by error put in these words, without intending to introduce two cock-crowings, other scribes added δις and ἐκ δευτέρου in the other places to produce consistency. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the omissions in some Manuscripts of Mk. are easily explicable on the supposition that a harmonizing scribe, not finding two cock-crowings in the other Gospels, omitted these words in Mk.; if this be so, the enigma is inexplicable.—In Mar 14:58 the words χειροποίητον, ἀχειροποίητον may be a comment of the Evangelist's, the simpler words of Mat 26:61 being what the false witnesses really said (Lk. has no parallel). If so, the Markan form would probably be later than the Matthaean (see Schmiedel in Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1851). But the introduction of comments such as these, however much in the style of Mt., is not in that of Mk., and there is no reason why Jesus should not actually have used the words, and, if so, why the false witnesses should not have quoted them; their false testimony lay in giving a wrong sense to our Lord's words, rather than in quoting Him wrongly.

A case of possible correction of Mk. may be briefly noticed here, though it does not concern Mt. or Luke. In Mar 15:25 we read that the Crucifixion took place at the third hour; Joh 19:14 says that the trial was hardly over by the sixth hour (ὥρα ἦν ὡς ἕκτη), and this looks like a correction of Mk. as to time. But probably this is no correction, whether we take Westcott's solution that John's 'sixth hour' is our 6 a.m., or that of Ramsay (Expositor, 4th ser. vii. 216, 5th ser. iii. 457) and others that the word 'hour' is used in a loose and ill-defined way, or the more probable and ancient view (Euseb. ad Marin.) that there is an error of the digamma, Ϝ (= 6) for Γ (= 3) or vice versa, in the text of the Gospels. If so, our copies of Jn. are probably wrong, since Mk. has three separate notes of time which hang all together, Mar 15:1; Mar 15:25;

Mar 15:33 (see Wright, *Synopsis*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , in loc., and New Test. Prob. p. 147).

(k) Conclusion from the evidence.—The detailed comparison of Mk. with Mt. and Lk. leads us to the conclusion that either Mk. as we have it now, or at least a Gospel which differs from our Mk. in unessential particulars only, lay before the First and Third Evangelists when they wrote. If the doubtful cases mentioned above, and the instances given below in § vii., be held to argue the priority of Mt. or Lk. over Mk., that would apply only to editorial additions, and the main conclusion would not be affected. Some of the deductions made above may be questioned, yet the cumulative force of the whole is very great. And a careful study of them will at once dissipate the idea that Mark is an abbreviator of Matthew, and will lead us to the conclusion that here we come much closer to the bed-rock of the Gospel story than in either Mt. or Luke. This is the great value of Mk., and it has been left for modern scholars to discover it.

5. Other characteristics of diction in Mark.—The style of the Second Gospel may be gathered to a large extent from what has preceded. For its Aramaic tinge see below, § v. A few favourite modes of speech remain to be noticed. The use of the historic present is especially common, and this contributes largely to the vividness of the narrative. Yet there is great freedom of tenses; we find changes in the same sentence from a past tense to a historic present, and vice versa. Of a few particles Mark is very fond—e.g. εὐθύς 41 times; πολλά as adverb, Mar 1:45; Mar 3:12; Mar 5:10; Mar 5:23; Mar 5:38; Mar 5:43; Mar 6:20 ἄBL Mar 9:26, Mar 15:3; πάλιν Mar 2:1; Mar 2:13, Mar 3:1; Mar 3:20 etc.; πᾶς is used in exaggeration, e.g. Mar 1:5, Mar 2:13; accumulated negatives are common, e.g. Mar 1:44, Mar 2:3, Mar 3:20; Mar 3:27. In ch. 4 καὶ ἔλεγεν or καὶ λέγει is so frequent (8 times) that Swete has raised the question (on Mar 4:21) whether Mark had before him a number of detached sayings of Jesus which he here introduces.

Our Gospel has about ten somewhat striking words which are, as far as we know, ἄπαξ λεγόμενα in all Greek literature. Such are: ἔννουχα Mar 1:35 (cf. πάννουχα—A, etc., have ἔννουχον); ἐπιράπτει Mar 2:21 (D [Note: Deuteronomist.] has ἐπισυνράπτει); σπεκουλάτορα Mar 6:27 (see above, § iii. 4 (b)); πυγμῆ as adv. Mar 7:3, i.e. ‘with arm and elbow’ (a late Greek meaning—in classical Greek ‘with the list’), so ‘completely’ or ‘diligently’ (D [Note: Deuteronomist.] has πυγμῆ, ἄ πυκνά ‘frequently,’ and so several VSS [Note: SS Versions.] , obviously a correction); ὑπερπερισσῶς Mar 7:37 (D [Note: Deuteronomist.] has ὑπερεκπ.) and ἐκπερισσῶς Mar 14:31 (A, etc., have ἐκ περισσοῦ); τηλαυγῶς Mar 8:25, i.e. ‘clearly, though at a distance’ (ⲥ*CLΔ have δηλ-); ἐπι συντρέχει Mar 9:25; ἐκεφαλίωσαν Mar 12:4 (v.l. -λαίωσαν), see below, § vii.; προμεριμνᾷτε Mar 13:11. There are also about 70 other words which occur nowhere else in NT, though many are found in the LXX Septuagint. This, as compared with the other Gospels, is a small number; Lk. has some 250 words not found elsewhere in NT (see Swete, l.c. p. xliv, for careful lists of words peculiar to Mk., or used by him in common with one or more of the other NT writers).

6. Matter peculiar to Mark.—The Second Gospel relates very few incidents not given, or at least referred to, in Mt. or Luke. We have only one parable peculiar to Mk., that of the seed growing secretly (Mar 4:26 ff.), and only two miracles, the healing of the deaf stammerer (μογιλάλος—the v.l. μογγιλάλος, from μόγγος ‘thick-voiced,’ is not well supported) (Mar 7:31 ff.), and of the blind man at Bethsaida (Mar 8:22 ff.). Other paragraphs peculiar to Mk. are: the questions about the dulness of the disciples when they forgot to take bread (Mar 8:17 f.), and about the disciples disputing (Mar 9:33); and the incidents of the young man with the linen cloth (Mar 14:51 f.), of the smiting of Jesus by the servants (ὑπηρέται) of the chief priests (Mar 14:65), and of Pilate’s wonder, and his question put to the centurion (Mar 15:44). See also § vii. below.

iv. Authorship, Date, and Place of writing.—There is no reason to dispute the Patristic statements (§ ii. above) that Mark, the ὑπηρέτης of Paul and Barnabas (Act 13:5) and the disciple of Peter, was the author of the Second Gospel. And there is much probability that the statement of Clement of Alexandria, that Mark wrote in Rome, is correct. We cannot, indeed, argue from the Latinisms (see § iii. 4 (f)) that he wrote for the Romans, for these words are probably mere colloquialisms in common use in the whole Empire, and, moreover, the Christian Romans undoubtedly spoke, at least in the ordinary way, Greek and not Latin (see § v. 2). But that it was written for Gentiles appears from the general absence of OT quotations, except when our Lord’s words are cited (Mar 1:2 f. is an exception; Mar 15:28 must almost certainly be expunged from the text, being omitted by ⲠABC*D k syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} etc.); also from the interpretation of Aramaic transliterations and the explanation of Jewish customs: e.g. Mar 7:2 ff. (washing of hands, etc.) Mar 12:42 (two mites making a farthing; the λεπτόν or half quadrans, being a Jewish coin, has to be explained), Mar 15:42 (‘the Preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath’); from the absence of mention of the Jewish law; and from the geographical description of Mar 13:3 (‘the Mount of Olives* [Note: uses τὸ ὄρος τῶν Ἐλαιῶν here and in Mar 14:26; but in Mar 11:1 we must probably accentuate the last word as oxytone—τὸς τὸ ὄρος τὸ Ἐλαιῶν (B k r)—i.e. the substantive is Ἐλαιῶν, ‘an olive grove’ (as in Act 1:12 ἀπο ὄρους τῶν καλουμένου Ἐλαιῶνος). See Deissmann, Bibl. Stud. p. 208 f., and Swete, St. Mark on Mar 11:1.] over against the temple’). Chrysostom’s statement (Proœm. in Matt.), that Egypt was the place of writing, is negated by the silence of the Alexandrian Fathers Clement and Origen, and is probably a mistaken inference from Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica ii. 16, which says that Mark was sent to Egypt and preached there the gospel which he had composed. Some moderns have supposed a double publication, one in Rome and one in Alexandria.

The question of date is more difficult. From internal considerations we should certainly assign an early date to Mk., at any rate before the Fall of Jerusalem. The Discourse on the End (esp. Mar 13:13 f., Mar 13:24; Mar 13:30; Mar 13:33) is reported as if the fulfilment were only in prospect, and in a manner that would be hardly possible if the siege of Titus had already taken place. This conclusion becomes still more likely when we compare Mk. with Mt. and Luke. The discourse seems to join together two separate things, the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world. All the Synoptics begin with the destruction of the Temple. In Mk. and Lk. follows a discourse which apparently speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem, and then the passage Mar 13:24-27 seems to refer to the end of the world. But Matthew in his accustomed manner weaves together Jesus’ sayings which in the other Evangelists are distinct, and mingles together the two events spoken of. Thus the compiler of the Matthaean discourse (we need beg no question as to authorship) evidently thought that the two events would be synchronous, and therefore must have written his account of the prophecy (not necessarily the whole Gospel) before the Fall of Jerusalem. If so, the Markan discourse is earlier still.

So the reference to the shewbread (Mar 2:26 οὐκ ἔστι, present) seems to imply that the Temple was at the time of writing still standing, and that the presentation of the shewbread still went on. Also the considerations mentioned above in § iii. 3, 4, as to the description of Jesus’ inner feelings, the style and details of the Gospel, point strongly in the same direction. If, again, we were to hold the theory of an Aramaic original (but see § v.), we could hardly avoid supposing a still earlier date.

We have then to consider if the external evidence contradicts the internal. The date of two other NT books affects our judgment. (a) If we adopt the early date for Acts (c. a.d. 62), i.e. if we suppose that St. Luke tells us no more of St. Paul’s history after the two years at Rome simply because nothing more at the time of writing had happened, we must assign a still earlier date to Lk., and a fortiori to Mark. There is much to be said for this early date of Acts, though many hold that Luk 21:20 ('Jerusalem compassed with armies'), when we compare it with Mar 13:14, Mat 24:15 ('abomination of desolation'), betokens a writing after the event described. (b) Papias by implication, and Irenaeus (iii. 1. 1) explicitly, say that Mark wrote after Peter's death (see § ii. above)—Irenaeus also asserts that Matthew wrote first—while Clement of Alexandria and Origen say that he wrote in Peter's lifetime. Now, if we take the former statement as true, the date of 1 Peter is a difficulty in the way of accepting the internal evidence for the date of Mark. For we can hardly assign a very early date to it (e.g. 1Pe 4:16 '[suffer] as a Christian'). There is no great reason for believing that St. Peter died in the same year as St. Paul, and it is quite possible that he survived him for some considerable time, during which St. Mark acted as his interpreter. The indications of a later date in 1 Peter do not then militate against the Petrine authorship of that Epistle. But if Mark wrote his Gospel after Peter's death, the early date to which the internal evidence leads us becomes difficult. While, therefore, we might have agreed with Swete (St. Mark, p. xl) that the witness of Irenaeus and Papias is more probable than that of Clement and Origen, if we had nothing else to go by, in view of the strong internal indications of an early date, we are perhaps led to prefer the Alexandrian view that Mark wrote in the lifetime of Peter. Nevertheless Sweet's date, just before a.d. 70, is chronologically possible (the order would then be 1 Peter; death of St. Peter; Mk.), but it allows very little time for the Mt. Discourse on the End to be written. Possibly the theory of a double publication might reconcile the Patristic testimony; but, if so, the second edition probably differed hardly at all from the first (see §§ vi. vii. below).

§ v. The Aramaic characteristics and original language of Mark.—The external evidence would not lead us to any other conclusion than that the Greek St. Mark as we have it is an original composition, and not a translation from any Aramaic document. We have, however, to consider a noteworthy phenomenon which the Gospel itself brings out—the strong Aramaic tinge which goes all through it. This tinge has led some to postulate an Aramaic original, and to suppose that the Gospel which we possess is a translation. We may first collect together and comment on instances of this characteristic, and then consider how they bear on the question of the original language.

1. Aramaisms.—A characteristic of Mk. is the retention of several Aramaic words transliterated into Greek. Such are:— $\beta\omicron\alpha\nu\eta\rho\gamma\acute{\epsilon}\varsigma$ Mar 3:17 (= רִנְיָ בְנֵי?, the \omicron or the α being probably an intrusion in the text, or $\beta\alpha\nu\eta\rho\gamma\acute{\epsilon}\varsigma$ being perhaps the original reading, see Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 49, Gramm. d. Jüd.-Pal. [Note: Palestine, Palestinian.] Aramäisch, p. 112; the syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ܒܢܝ ܪܝܢܝ is ܒܢܝ ܪܝܢܝ , which the Nestorians pronounce bhé raysh, the Jacobites bné [or bnai?] ryesh, both with mute yudh—for a possible origin of these forms see Burkitt, Evang. da-Mephar. ii.

p. 280; the Armenian is ‘Banereges’); ταλειθα κούμ Mar 5:41 (= ܩܘܡܝ ܡܠܝܬܗ, syr [Note: yr Syriac.] psh ܩܘܡܝ ܡܠܝܬܗ, with yudh quiescent, syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin wanting: some Greek Manuscripts read κούμι; see also below); κορβάν Mar 7:11 (= ܩܘܪܒܐܢ, syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin ܩܘܪܒܐܢ, syr [Note: yr Syriac.] psh ܩܘܪܒܐܢ, ܩܘܪܒܐܢ being the usual Syriac name for the Eucharist); ἐφραθά Mar 7:34 (= ܦܫܬܐ); ἄββᾶ Mar 14:36 (= ܐܒܒܐ, again in Rom 8:15, Gal 4:6, see Abba). These occur in Mk. only of the Gospels, as does the redundant Βαρτιμαίος (ὁ υἱὸς Τιμαίου Βαρ.) Mar 10:46 (Mt. Lk. give no name; Bartimaeus could not be the blind man’s own real name, though he may have been known by it; cf. Barjona, Barabbas). Two others are found also in Mt. and Jn., ὁ αββεί Mar 9:5; Mar 11:21; Mar 14:45 (= ܒܒܝ, syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin cu puh ܒܒܝ), ὡς αννά Mar 11:9 (= ܐܢܢܐ, Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin cu puh ܐܢܢܐ); a third in Jn., ὁ αββουνεί Mar 10:51 (= ܒܒܝܢܝ, syr^{sin} ܒܒܝܢܝ, syr^{cu} waiting in Jn. also, syr^{psh} ܒܒܝܢܝ syr hkl ܒܒܝܢܝ, perhaps a diminutive); these three are not found in Luke. The Heb. Aram. Aramaic ἀμήν (ܐܡܝܢ, syr ܐܡܝܢ) is retained by all the Evangelists, but much less often by Luke than by the others; note also that Mar 3:28 ἀμήν λέγω becomes in Mat 12:31 διὰ τοῦτο λέγω, and so sometimes elsewhere. The Aramaic Word from the Cross is remarkable, Ἐλωί, Ἐλωί, λαμὰ σαβαχθανεί Mar 15:34 (ܐܠܘܝ ܐܠܘܝ ܠܡܢܐ ܫܒܚܩܝܢܝ ܠܡܢܐ syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin puh ܐܠܘܝ ܐܠܘܝ ܠܡܢܐ ܫܒܚܩܝܢܝ with both yudhs quiescent; vv.ll. are ἡλεί D [Note: Deuteronomist.] and some old latt., λεμὰ and ζαφθανεί D [Note: Deuteronomist.] , zaphtani d, zaphani k). The Divine name here is a Hebraized form of the pure Aramaic ܐܠܘܝ (syr. ܐܠܘܝ). Ἐλωί recurs in the ⲛB text of Mat 27:46 (so Westcott-Hort), but the Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 text, following other Manuscripts, have ἡλεί or ἡλί (so syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin ܐܠܘܝ; syr [Note: yr Syriac.] psh ܐܠܘܝ syr [Note: yr Syriac.] cu wanting), and this would be a correction by Matthew, or (as Westcott Hort, Notes, p. 21) by a Matthaean scribe or editor, to suit the Hebrew form יְהוָה, which was no doubt familiar from liturgical worship. This reading is probably confirmed by pseudo-Peter, for it apparently underlies his strange phrase ἡ δύναμις μου, ἡ δ., κατέλειπός με, being mistaken for ܕܝܢܐ (syr. ܕܝܢܐ) ‘strength.’ The object of the Matthaean correction would be to make it more obvious why the people thought that Elijah was being invoked, the form Ἐλωί

α, Mar 9:7 ἐγ. ἐπισκιάζουσα, both altered in Mt. and Lk.; and so whichever way we read Mar 1:4 (ἐγένετο Ἰωάνης ὁ βαπτίζων ... κηρύσσων, v.l. ἐγ. Ἰτβαπτ ... καὶ κηρ., altered in Mt. and Lk.).

The use of some prepositions after verbs, etc., is thought to be due to the same cause (Allen, loc. cit.), as ἔρχεται ὀπίσω Mar 1:7, ἐν σοὶ εὐδόκησα Mar 1:11, πιστεύετε ἐν Mar 1:15, λέγουσι περὶ Mar 1:30, ἐσθίει μετὰ Mar 2:16, ἵαται ἀπὸ Mar 5:29, ὑπαγε εἰς εἰρήνην Mar 5:34, ὑγιῆς ἀπὸ Mar 5:34, διὰ τῶν χειρῶν αὐτοῦ Mar 6:2 (but the Aramaic would have the singular), ἐλάλησε μετὰ Mar 6:50, λάβη ἀπὸ Mar 12:2.

Similarly also prepositions repeated after compound verbs, as ἔξελθε ἐξ Mar 1:25, and so Mar 1:26; Mar 1:42; Mar 1:45; Mar 2:1; Mar 5:2; Mar 5:8; Mar 5:13; Mar 5:17; Mar 6:54; Mar 7:17; Mar 7:26; Mar 7:29; Mar 7:31; Mar 9:25; Mar 9:28; Mar 9:45; Mar 9:47; Mar 10:15 etc.; the suggestion apparently being that these represent Aramaic forms like קָמַן, לָע לָ.

Phrases like δύο δύο Mar 6:7, συμπόσια συμπόσια Mar 6:39, πρασιαὶ πρασιαὶ Mar 6:40 are Aramaic or Hebrew idioms. Also several other Aramaic phrases have been noted, as ‘sons of the bridechamber’ Mar 2:19 (so Mt. Lk.), ‘sons of men’ Mar 3:28 (see § vii. 2 below), εἶπε δοθῆναι Mar 5:43, μία τῶν σαββάτων Mar 16:2 (positive for superlative), γίνεται καὶ Mar 2:15 (so Mt., not Lk.), ἐγένετο ἦλθεν Mar 1:9 (Mk. only); and the indefinite use of εἷς ἓν (for τις) Mar 9:17, Mar 10:17, Mar 12:28, Mar 13:1, Mar 14:18; Mar 14:66 (Allen, loc. cit.). Dalman also has made a collection of Hebraisms and Aramaisms in the Gospels (Words of Jesus, p. 20 ff.), though he considers that they do not constitute a proof of a Hebrew or Aramaic original. Of these the following are found in Mk.:—ἐλθοῦσα redundantly used with a finite verb Mar 7:25 (ἐ. προσέπεσε); ἀφείς with a term signifying departure where the idea of ‘leaving’ is not emphasized Mar 4:36, Mar 8:13, Mar 12:12; καθήμενον and στήκετε where they are superfluous Mar 2:14, Mar 11:25; ἀναστάς used redundantly Mar 2:14, Mar 7:24, Mar 10:1; Mar 10:50 (AC); ‘answer and say’ Mar 3:33, Mar 7:28, Mar 9:5, Mar 10:51, Mar 11:14, Mar 12:35, Mar 15:9, often when no question has been asked; ἐλάλησεν ... καὶ λέγει Mar 6:50 (?); ἤρξατο (-αντο) with infinitive when nothing follows developing the action, 26 times; εὐθέως or εὐθύς, a favourite form in Mk. (45 times) = Aram. Aramaic ἔμε; the use of πρόσωπον, not only in a quotation like Mar 1:2, but in the phrase βλέπεις εἰς πο. ἀνθρώπων Mar 12:14, and some others.

2. Original language of Mark.—The Aramaic tinge in our Gospel is thought by some, e.g. Blass (Philology of the Gospels, ch. xi.) and Allen (loc. cit.), to show that it was originally written in Aramaic. A large number of the real or alleged Aramaisms given above are found in Mt. and Lk.; but it is argued that as they had ex hypothesi Mk. before them, they merely retained a certain number of the Aramaisms of their source. Moreover, the Aramaisms are found not only in the words of our Lord, in which case they might be explained as being due to the faithful reporting of His ipsissima verba, but also in the framework of the Gospel. On the theory of an Aramaic original, Allen explains the frequent use in Mk. of καὶ as a connecting link (cf. Aram. Aramaic 1), and of five particles constantly used, εὐθύς (see above), πάλιν, δέ, γάρ, ἀλλά, other particles being rare. He also explains the favourite historic present in Mk. as coming from the use of an Aramaic present participle for this purpose. In Syriac it is so found only in the verb ܘܫܝܪܘܢ ‘to say’ (Nöldeke, Syr. [Note: Syriac.] Gramm. § 274, p. 190), except in syr [Note: yr Syriac.] hkl, where it is a literal translation. But in the other Aramaic dialects this usage is not so limited; the idiom is found with other verbs, e.g. in Daniel and Tobit, and its presence in an original Aramaic Mk. would bring us to the frequent historic presents in the Greek Mk. The irregularity noticed above (§ iii. 5) of their being mixed up with past tenses occurs also in Aramaic. It is also thought that the difficult εἰς τριάκοντα καὶ εἰς (v.l. ἐν Westcott-Hort) ἐξήκοντα καὶ εἰς (v.l. ἐν WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort’s text.]) ἐκατόν in Mar 4:8 (cf. Mar 4:20) is explained by the εἷς (i.e. εἷς) representing ܐܝܢ, cf. Dan 3:19 (but equally well εἷς might represent an Aramaic ܐܝܢ ‘at the rate of’); and that the ἔρχεται of Mar 4:21 and ἐν ὀνόματι ὄτι of Mar 9:41 and ἐπιβαλὼν of Mar 14:72 (see above, § iii. 4 (h)) come from a mistranslation of some (unknown) Aramaic original. In the JThSt [Note: ThSt Journal of Theological Studies.] ii. 298, Allen suggests that the word ἐκεφαλῶσαν (Mar 12:4) is due to a confusion of ܘܫܝܪܘܢ ‘they injured’ with ܘܫܝܪܘܢ, which would be a puzzle to the translator, who rendered it by this coined word, taking it from Aram. Aramaic ܘܫܝܪܘܢ ‘a head.’ Similarly, Prof. Marshall (Expositor, 4th series, iv. 377) thinks that Mar 5:10 ἔξω τῆς χώρας and || Luk 8:31 εἰς τὴν ἄβυσσον (Mt. different) are the result of translations of one Aramaic original, ܘܫܝܪܘܢ meaning both ‘earth’ or ‘land’ and ‘below.’

Blass brings different arguments on the same side. They run in two lines. (a) He suggests that St. Luke in Acts 1-12 used an Aramaic source, while the rest of the book was his own independent work. In these twelve chapters Aramaisms abound, while in the rest of the book they are comparatively scarce; and the style of the twelve chapters is rough as compared with St. Luke's own. Blass conjectures that Mark, who, as son of a prominent Christian lady in Jerusalem, was well fitted for the task, wrote the Aramaic source. [With this we may compare Weiss's idea that Mark ended his Gospel at Mar 16:8 because he went on to write a second work, which began with the Resurrection appearances]. If so, the first work, i.e. the Gospel, would be in Aramaic. (b) Blass thinks that the various readings in the present Manuscripts of Mk., and those shown by Patristic quotations, are relics of different translations of an original Aramaic.

In reviewing these considerations, we must remark that Dr. Blass's first argument rests on pure conjecture. Why should Mark be the writer of the supposed Aramaic source of Acts 1-12? And if so, why must he have written two books in the same language? He was confessedly bilingual, able to write in both Greek and Aramaic. This argument, then, is a halting one. And the second seems scarcely less precarious. The suggestions of Mr. Allen are more substantial. But these also appear to be inconclusive. They certainly show that the Aramaic tinge, strong in all the Synoptics, is strongest in Mark. But this need mean no more than that Aramaic was St. Mark's native language, that in which he thought, as most of the Palestinian Jews would do. The Greek spoken in Palestine was doubtless saturated with Aramaic forms and idioms, and Mark, whose style is comparatively unpolished, discarded them less than the other Synoptists. The theory of an Aramaic original has some formidable difficulties to overcome. Papias had evidently never heard of any but a Greek Mk., and no ecclesiastical writer suggests that the latter is a translation. The external evidence is all against the hypothesis which we have been examining. But so, also, when we look closely, is the internal evidence. It is true that there are many Aramaisms in Mark. Of these, however, we may dismiss, for our present purpose, the proper names, which would be used in Palestine equally whether an author wrote in Aramaic or in Greek. The influence of Aramaic grammar and diction may also probably be dismissed, seeing that the writer doubtless thought in Aramaic. There remain, then, the suggestions of mistranslation, which, however, are too ingenious for verisimilitude, and the transliterations like Talitha Cumi. But the fact that practically in each case of transliteration a Greek interpretation is added, is fatal to the idea that we have here traces of a conservative translator who incorporated bodily the words which he found in the book before him. As Swete remarks (St. Mark, p. xlii), a translator might have either translated the Aramaic or transliterated it; but transliteration followed by interpretation savours of an original writer. A still more fatal objection is the freshness of the style of our Gospel. Even the best translation loses the individuality of the author. But here we have a book in which the individuality is most strongly marked. It can hardly be a second-hand reproduction of any one's work.

If the Aramaic-original theory be true, we must put back the date considerably, as Mr. Allen (loc. cit.) sees, probably to a date before a.d. 60; and then the Gospel is not likely to have been written in Rome. In this last detail the ecclesiastical testimony is again contradicted by the theory.

There is a line of argument which, though interesting, does not really bear on this question. In Mar_5:41, for ταλειθά or ταλιθά, D [Note: Deuteronomist.] has θαβιτά, supported by Old Latin tabitha, or thabitha, or thabitha as if the girl's name were Tabitha (cf. Act_9:20). In a Syriac text the transition from ܬܒܝܬܗ to ܬܒܝܬܗ would be easy. The Old Latin MS e has the curious reading 'tabea acultha quod est interpretatum puella puella tibi dico exsurge.' But these variations show nothing as to the original language of Mk.; they show only that D [Note: Deuteronomist.] and the Old Latin Manuscripts were directly or indirectly influenced by the Syriac versions (see Chase, Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels, p. 109 f.).

Finally, we must consider the statement of some cursive Greek Manuscripts, that the Gospel was written in Latin (Ῥωμαϊστί). They add that it was written in Rome, and this is no doubt the explanation of the other statement. It was supposed that if Rome was the place of writing, the Gospel must have been written in Latin. But this deduction is known to be without warrant. Those in Rome for whom the Gospel was written would speak Greek. St. Paul wrote to the Christian community in Rome in Greek, and St. Clement wrote from Rome in the same language. Further, even a cursory examination of Mk. shows that, whatever it is, it is not a translation into Greek from Latin. Thus this idea may be very briefly dismissed.

vi. The last twelve verses.—The question of the end of the Gospel is one of great difficulty, whatever view we take of the paragraph which now brings it to a close. An endeavour will be made in this section to state and weigh all the principal arguments; it would seem that neither the supporters nor the impugners of the present ending have quite done justice to the strength of the arguments on the other side. The facts to be considered are as follows. There are three ways of ending the Gospel. The first, here called the 'Short Ending,' stops at Mar_16:8 ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ. The second, here cited as the 'Long Ending,' is that of our ordinary Bibles (Mar_16:9-20), the last twelve verses. But there is also a third, here called the 'Intermediate Ending,' which runs as follows: πάντα δὲ τὰ παρηγγελμένα τοῖς περὶ τὸν Πέτρον συντόμως ἐξηγγεῖλα
ν. μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Ἰησοῦς [ἐφάνη αὐτοῖς καὶ] ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς καὶ ἄχρη δύσεω

ς ἔξαπέστειλεν δι' αὐτῶν τὸ ἱερόν καὶ ἄφθαρτον κήρυγμα τῆς αἰωνίου σωτηρίας. 'And they immediately (or briefly) made known all things that had been commanded (them) to those about Peter. And after this Jesus himself [appeared to them and] sent out by means of them from the East even to the West the holy and incorruptible preaching of the eternal salvation.' This ending is found in four minor uncials, L (Codex Regius, 8th cent.), 12 [Note: 2 designates the particular edition of the work referred] (Fragmentum Sinaiticum, 7th cent.), ρ (Fragm. Parisiense, 8th cent.), and ψ (Codex Athous Laurae, 8th or 9th cent.), in all of them as an alternative to the Long Ending, though it would appear that the archetype of the first three, at any rate, ended at Mar 16:8. The Intermediate Ending is also found in the Old Latin k, standing alone, in several Manuscripts of the Ethiopic prefixed to the Long Ending, and in the margin of syr [Note: yr Syriac.] hkl, of two Bohairic Manuscripts, and of a cursive Greek MS. No one maintains its genuineness; it is clearly written as an end to the Gospel, and is not an independent fragment. It is probably due to an early scribe, who wrote it either because he had before him the Long Ending and objected to it, or because he had before him the Short Ending and thought it abrupt. Swete (St. Mark, p. cviii) conjectures that he was a Western, because of the emphasis laid on the West. Nestle makes him an Egyptian, without giving reasons (Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 13). Dobschütz (TU [Note: U Texte und Untersuchungen.] xi. 1, p. 73 f., quoted by Swete) thinks that the ending is part of the 'Preaching of Peter'; but the internal evidence is against this (see above). It is not found in any of the Fathers. Its presence, however, bears materially on the whole question. The only variation in the readings that need be mentioned is that ἐφάνη αὐτοῖς καί, which the sense clearly demands, is omitted by L7, αὐτοῖς καί is omitted by Ψ, and καί by all the Greek codices,—it has to be supplied from the versions.

The Short Ending is found in 8B, syr [Note: yr Syriac.] sin, and also in the oldest Manuscripts of the Armenian and Ethiopic versions. Eusebius says (ad Marin. Quae James 1, vol. 4) that the Long Ending was not in the 'accurate copies' of his day; later writers copy Eusebius, and do not add to our knowledge. Tertullian, Cyprian, Athanasius, and Cyril of Jerusalem are silent about the Long Ending; and this would be very significant if it were not that Cyril of Alexandria and Theodoret are also silent, though they must have known verses which were in wide circulation in their time. Here we must note, further, that the fact that the Short Ending could scarcely have been the original close of the Gospel (see below), is no argument for the genuineness of the other two extant endings.

The Long Ending is found in practically all the authorities except those mentioned above—in almost all the uncials and cursives, the lectionaries, in the great majority of versions. It is explicitly quoted by Irenaeus as a genuine part of Mk. (Mar_3:10; Mar_3:6 : ‘in fine autem evangelii ait Marcus, Et quidem Dominus Jesus,’ etc. = Mar_16:19). It is also probably referred to by Justin (Apol. i. 45: ἐξελθόντες πανταχοῦ ἐκήρυξαν = Mar_16:20); possibly by ‘Barnabas’ (xv. 9, φανερωθεὶς ἀνέβη εἰς οὐρανοῦς; cf. Mar_16:14 ἐφανερώθη) and Hermas (Sim. ix. xxv. 1, 2; cf. Mar_16:15). But these last two cases are quite uncertain, and there is no evidence at all that any Father before Irenaeus knew these verses as part of the Gospel; they may have known them from some other writer. Dr. Salmon argues with some force (Introd., appendix to Lect. ix.) that though \aleph B have not got these verses, yet in this part they are copied from one archetype which probably did contain them. The scribes seem to have purposely omitted something which was in the archetype, leaving a blank or distending the writing, and that something must have been of about the same length as the Long Ending. Salmon conjectures that the scribes of \aleph and B were of the school of Eusebius, and that they left out these verses, though they had them in their original, because Eusebius disapproved of them. No writer before Eusebius is known to have rejected them, and their presence in all later Manuscripts shows that the successors of Eusebius, in spite of his great authority, did not follow his judgment in the matter. If, however, Salmon’s argument on this part of the subject is sound, and if \aleph B when cross-examined give evidence, as he says, for the disputed ending and not against it, yet the absence of the ending in syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} and in Eusebius’ ‘more accurate copies’ remains a stumbling-block to accepting the further inference that the Long Ending is genuine. Mr. F. C. Conybeare has suggested (Expositor, 4th series, viii. 241) that these verses are the work of the Aristion mentioned by Papias as one of our Lord’s disciples. In an Armenian MS. of the Gospels written a.d. 986 (only discovered in 1891), the Long Ending is said to be ‘of the presbyter Ariston,’ and it is not unreasonable to understand Aristion to be meant, the iota having fallen in transcription into Armenian. But the evidence is too late to be of much worth.

The internal evidence is important. It is freely admitted by the supporters of the Long Ending that its style and vocabulary are entirely different from those of the main part of the Gospel; and this consideration is decisive against the authorship being the same. But this does not at once bring us to a solution of all our difficulties. As far as style goes, it does not necessarily follow that the Long Ending is not by St. Mark. Salmon (loc. cit.) suggests that our Second Gospel is, in its present form, the latest of the Synoptics, St. Mark having, indeed, followed the written Petrine tradition more faithfully than the others, and having incorporated it in his Gospel almost in its own words, prefixing Mar_1:1-15 and adding Mar_16:9 ff., inserting also various editorial touches (for which see § vii. 2 below). Certainly both the first fifteen and the last twelve verses of our Gospel show the same system of summarizing events,—Salmon suggests that it was these two passages which led Augustine to call Mark an abbreviator of Matthew,—and so far they might be by the same author. Yet the style of the ‘preface’ and that of the ‘appendix’ are not similar. A greater objection to this view is that it supposes in reality a Peter-Gospel not written by St. Mark; but ecclesiastical writers never represent St. Peter as writing a Gospel, either by himself or by any scribe or ‘interpreter’ except St. Mark. For we notice that this theory will not bear the weight of the additional hypothesis (not Salmon’s), that St. Mark wrote a first edition, perhaps at Rome, and afterwards a later one, with added matter, perhaps at Alexandria. The style-argument is decisively against this; moreover, some traces of the original ending would have survived, and the Church to which he gave his first edition would have preserved the words with which that edition closed.

There is one consideration which seems to the present writer decisive against Dr. Salmon’s view. The Long Ending could not, like the Intermediate one, have been written—whether by Mark or by another—expressly to finish the Gospel left unfinished at Mar_16:8. For the beginning of Mar_16:9 is not continuous with Mar_16:8. The subject of ἐφάνη had evidently been indicated in the sentence which had preceded; yet the necessary ‘Jesus’ cannot be understood from anything in Mar_16:8. Further, Mary Magdalene is introduced in Mar_16:9 as a new person,—she is indicated as one π α ρ ᾽ ἧς ἐκβεβλήκει ἑπτὰ δαιμόνια,—though she had just been mentioned by name in Mar_15:40; Mar_15:47, Mar_16:1, and though she was one of the women spoken of throughout the eight verses preceding the Long Ending. This paragraph, then, must be a fragment of a larger work, and could not have been composed on purpose to end the Gospel. It is, indeed, too much to say that it is a summary of events of the Forty Days, complete in itself, but at least it fits very badly on to the rest of the Gospel.

The presence of the Intermediate Ending also militates against the last twelve verses being the work of St. Mark. It shows that in very early times, how early we cannot say, these verses were not unanimously received. The evidence of Irenaeus, however, shows that they were adopted as an ending to the Gospel not later than the middle of the 2nd century.

We must probably, then, dismiss the idea that either the Long or the Intermediate Ending was the work of the Second Evangelist. We have, however, still to consider the problem suggested by the Short Ending.

It is inconceivable that Mar_16:8, with its abrupt and inauspicious ἐφοβοῦντο γὰρ, could possibly be the end of a Gospel; indeed, it seems to stop in the middle of a sentence. Against this it is said that abrupt terminations are not unknown in Greek literature (see Salmond in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 253). Yet in this case such an idea is hardly tenable. It is very unlikely that the Gospel should deliberately end without any incident of the risen life of our Lord and with a note of terror. We have therefore to suppose a lost ending; and the difficulty of accounting for its total disappearance is the strongest argument of the supporters of the last twelve verses. It is not sufficient to pass it by, as is often done by those who impugn them, as a matter of little importance.

It is suggested that the last leaf of the original was early lost, and that the other extant endings were supplied to take its place. The last leaf of a MS is undoubtedly the very one which is most likely, after much use, to disappear. Dr. Salmon points out (loc. cit.) that this idea is based on the supposition that the original completely disappeared. The hypothesis of a lost leaf would account for a partial circulation of shorter copies, but for the complete disappearance of the old ending only if it was Mark's own autograph that lost its leaf before any copy was made from it. But it is difficult to suppose that only one MS of the Gospel existed in Mark's lifetime, and that his autograph was not copied till he died; and if the leaf fell in Mark's lifetime before the autograph was copied, why did not Mark write another?

There is an equal difficulty in the kindred supposition that the Gospel was left accidentally unfinished at Mar 16:8. Salmon asks why, if Mark died before completing his work, the disciple who gave the work to the world did not add a suitable ending, as Tertius added something to Romans (Rom 16:22), and the presbyters (probably) to the Fourth Gospel (Joh 21:24)? If suitable endings were added afterwards, why not at the time when the Gospel was first published? And this supposition is against the ecclesiastical testimony, which makes Mark finish his Gospel, and in some cases makes him take it to Egypt.

It cannot be said that these difficulties have been very satisfactorily met. Perhaps in our present state of knowledge the best solution of them is that of Dean Armitage Robinson, who suggests (Study of the Gospels, p. 5) that the Second Gospel was not highly esteemed in the 2nd cent., and that all copies perished but one, which lost its leaf. We know that the Gospel was neglected later on (see above, § ii.), chiefly on account of its shortness, and because it apparently adds little to our information. This may well have been the case early in the 2nd cent.; and if that be so, the circulation of it would not have been nearly so large as that of the other Gospels. It is not, however, necessary to put the loss of the leaf so late. The same state of things might well have existed immediately after St. Mark's death.

The difficulties on neither side can be neglected. But our verdict must be given after weighing probabilities, and to the present writer they seem overwhelmingly to preponderate against the Markan authorship of the last twelve verses, or even against their being a real ending of the Gospel at all. But they are, nevertheless, like the Pericope Adulteræ, an exceedingly ancient and authoritative record of the words and deeds narrated in them.

vii. Is our Second Gospel the original which lay before the First and Third Evangelists?—Those who in the present day answer this question in the negative usually take a different line from that taken by Baur and his school. They regard our present canonical Gospel as an edited and augmented form of the original, yet as retaining almost all the characteristic features of that original. This hypothesis is much more tenable than the Tübingen theory, which made all our Synoptic Gospels 2nd cent. productions, and held that the Mk. known to Papias was not our Mk., but something entirely different. These two hypotheses are, in reality, inconsistent, and must be considered separately. [For an attempt partially to combine them see Sanday's Gosp. in Sec. Cent. v. 2, written in 1876, and not since reprinted. It is not known if Dr. Sanday would still maintain the opinions which he then held].

1. Baur, Schleiermacher, Wendt, Davidson, Renan, and others substantially agree in holding the latter hypothesis. Papias says that St. Mark wrote Christ's words and deeds 'accurately' but 'not in order' (see above, § ii.). From this it is concluded that the Mk. of Papias ('Ur-Marcus') was not written 'in order,' but was a disjointed collection of speeches and anecdotes; and, further, was not a Gospel in our later sense of the word, but something of the nature of the Clementine Homilies, a record of the sayings and teachings of Peter. Again, Papias says that Matthew composed the 'oracles' (λόγια) in the Hebrew language, and each one interpreted them (ἠρμήνευσε, aorist—the interpreting did not go on in Papias' own day) as he could. We need not here discuss the question of the original language of Mt., but the argument which we are now considering is that, whereas our present Gospels resemble one another in general plan, and to a great extent in detail, the Mt. of Papias was very different from his Mk., the former being a collection of discourses, the latter a narrative of the words and deeds of Christ. Renan (Vie de Jésus, p. xxii) supposes that Matthew wrote the discourses and Mark the anecdotes about Christ, and that by assimilation our present Mt. and Mk. took their shape, the former assimilating the anecdotes and adding them to the discourses, the latter adopting the reverse process. A further argument on the same side has been drawn from the evidence of Justin Martyr (see above, § ii.), who constantly quotes the Evangelic narrative, but in words that in many cases differ from our canonical Synoptics, so that if he had the latter before him, we cannot always be sure which he is quoting; we need not here consider whether he used the Fourth Gospel. The conclusion which at one time used to be drawn from Justin's quotations, and from his mentioning one or two things not found in the canonical texts, e.g. that Christ was born in a cave, and that the Magi came from Arabia, was that he used Gospels different from those which we now have. Perhaps also we should insert under this head the fact that a comparatively long section in Mk. (Mar_6:45 to Mar_8:26) is omitted by Luke, from which it is argued by some that Luke's Mk. was not the same as our own. It is also argued that the records of the Two Feedings show that our Mk. is a compilation from two separate originals, one of which narrated the feeding of the 5000, the other of the 4000, and that it cannot be the work, directly or indirectly, of an eye-witness.

When we consider these arguments, we are struck by the fact that they assume several disputable points. It is not at all clear that Papias meant that his Mk. was an unconnected collection of anecdotes; it is quite as probable that he meant that he did not approve of the chronological order of Mk.; and, as we have seen (§ ii.), St. Luke was perhaps of the same opinion. It is also assumed as obvious that Papias meant only 'discourses' by λόγια. Certainly that is the primary meaning of the word. But its use in the sense of 'oracles,' i.e. the inspired Scriptures, is quite common in early Christian times. In Rom_3:2 τὰ λόγια τοῦ Θεοῦ may, indeed, refer only to God's sayings (as Sanday-Headlam, in loc.; see also Sanday, Gosp. in Second Cent. p. 155), but it is more natural to refer it to the whole of OT. Sanday-Headlam remark that from the time of Philo onwards the word was used of any sacred writing, whether discourse or narrative. Thus, then, we cannot assume without argument that Papias meant only discourses by λόγια. Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica iii. 39) tells us that Papias' own work was called Λογιῶν κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις (v.l. ἐξηγήσεις), and Papias clearly did not deal only with our Lord's sayings. It is at least quite possible that Papias uses the word λόγια as equivalent to our 'Gospel' (so Westcott, Canon, p. 80 n. [Note: note.] ; Lightfoot, Ess. on Sup. Rel. pp. 155 n. [Note: note.] , 171 f.). If so, the argument from the dissimilarity of Papias' Mt. and Mk. breaks down. But even supposing (as living scholars are more willing to grant than were Lightfoot and Westcott) that λόγια in Papias means 'discourses,' his words do not necessarily mean that Matthew wrote sayings only; and we shall be led to the contrary opinion by a great difficulty that meets the hypothesis in question at the outset. There was no time for the process imagined by Renan to take place. Such a process would take a very much longer time in its development than can by any possibility be allowed. And a fatal objection to the hypothesis is that the result would not be that which as a matter of fact has taken place. We should have had a great number of variant Gospels, and the earlier the copies the greater would have been the variations. We should have had no certainty as to which Gospel could rightly claim any given incident, and there would have been in an aggravated form the textual conditions that we find in the case of the Pericope Adulteræ, which appears sometimes in one Gospel and sometimes in another. In reality the four Gospels are perfectly distinct, and have been so as far back as we have any copies of them, the earliest Manuscripts showing as distinct a division between them as the later ones (see Salmon, Introd. Lect. vii.; Lightfoot, op. cit. p. 172 ff.). Justin Martyr tells us that the 'memoirs of the Apostles' (i.e. the Gospels) were read at Christian worship in his time (Apol. i. 67). If the Gospels then read were our canonical Gospels, there is not sufficient time between Papias and Justin for such a revolution to have taken place as is supposed. If, on the other hand, Justin used the supposed 'original Matthew' and 'original Mark,' there is not time between him and Irenaeus for the same thing to have happened. As a matter of fact, it is now generally held that Justin knew at least our Synoptic Gospels. This does not mean that he had no other sources of information, such as oral tradition, or even that he did not borrow from an 'apocryphal' Gospel; the 'cave' at Bethlehem, for example, may well have come from some one or other of such sources. But a careful analysis of his quotations from OT shows that he varies from the true text in these quite as much as in his Gospel quotations; and most of the variations probably arise from his trusting to memory. The difficulty of turning to a manuscript without divisions, even for words, is so great, that the memory would be trusted in a far greater degree than with us who have printed Bibles. And, as we should have conjectured, Justin is much more accurate in his longer quotations, where he would be obliged to refer to his manuscript, than in his shorter ones, where it would be less necessary to do so (see, further, Sanday, Gospels in Second Cent. ch. ii; Salmon, Introd. Lect. vi.). Moreover, we may remark that an 'original Mark' could not have disappeared without leaving any trace; we should have found some quotations from it, or some reference to its being dispossessed by a more modern successor. And the autoptic argument (above, § iii. 2) comes in here with overwhelming force. Our Mk. could not have had its fresh, lifelike character, its evidence of first-hand knowledge, if Renan's idea were true.

The argument from the omission by Luke of a Markan section is inconclusive. He had a long section to introduce (§ iii. 4 (a) above), and it was natural for him to omit something, to make room for his new matter. The section of Mk. is found, in the same order, in Mt., and therefore, if this argument held good, it would be necessary to suppose that, while Luke used an 'original Mark,' the First Evangelist used our present one. Also, two incidents in this section are referred to shortly in Lk., the seeking of a sign and the leaven of the Pharisees (Luk 11:16; Luk 11:29; Luk 12:1). The conclusion from 'doublets' is very insecure. There is no reason why there should not have been two Feedings.

2. The hypothesis that our present Mk. is an 'edited' form of the Gospel which was used by Matthew and Luke, is in reality quite different from that which has just been considered. For it supposes that our Second Gospel is very like the original, differing from it only by the insertion of a few editorial touches, at the most by the addition of a few paragraphs; whereas the other hypothesis supposes our Mk. to be entirely different from the original Gospel. Dr. Salmon proposes one form of the hypothesis which we have now reached (Introd. Lect. ix. s.f.). He suggests that our Second Gospel is at once the oldest and the youngest of the three Synoptics; the oldest as giving most nearly the very words in which the Apostolic traditions were delivered, the youngest as respects the date when the independent traditions were set in their present framework. This opinion is largely influenced by his view that the Long Ending is really Markan (see above, § vi.). He supposes that Mark added, besides the first fifteen and the last twelve verses, some other slight portions; and that the remarks about unbelief Mar 3:5, Mar 6:6; Mar 6:52, which are not found in the other Synoptics, are by the writer of the Long Ending (cf. Mar 16:11; Mar 16:13 f.), i.e. by St. Mark, as the editor of the Petrine Tradition. From an opposite standpoint, Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1844, 1848, 1850 f.) thinks that the canonical Mk. is a later edition, and that several things in it are ‘secondary’ to Mt. and Luke. One leading consideration urged by him (also by Sanday, Gosp. in Second Cent. v. § 2, p. 149) is that Mt. and Lk. often agree against Mk.; therefore, unless the First Evangelist knew the Third Gospel, or the Third Evangelist the First (both of which suppositions are confessedly improbable), they must have had a form of Mk. which is not ours. But this assumes too much; it supposes that the First and Third Evangelists had no other source (besides Mk.) than a collection of discourses, i.e. that the ‘non-Markan document’ could not have been a history parallel to Mark. As Schmiedel himself rightly says, this assumption is not necessarily true. But if so, his argument, given above, has little weight. There is no reason why Mt. and Lk. should not have got their agreements as against Mk. from the non-Markan source. There is no reason to believe that the latter carefully avoided everything contained in the Petrine tradition; and if it included some things which were in that tradition, there is no reason why Matthew and Luke should not sometimes have followed it in preference.

As this question of agreement of Mt. and Lk. against Mk. is of great importance in forming a judgment about the Second Gospel, it is necessary to consider some details. As examples, it will suffice to give instances from the first few chapters: Mar 1:8 πνεύματι ἁγίῳ = Mt. Lk. πν. ἁγ. καὶ πυρί; Mar 1:31, Mt. inserts ἠγέρθη καὶ, Lk. ἀναστᾶσα; Mar 1:40 and Mar 2:3, Mt. Lk. insert (but in different ways) ἰδοῦ; Mar 2:3 φέροντες, Mt. Lk. insert (but in different ways) ἐπὶ κλίνης; Mar 2:12 ἐξῆλθεν ἔμπροσθεν πάντων = Mt. Lk. ἀπῆλθεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ; ib. ἐξίστασθαι = Mt. ἐφοβήθησαν = Lk. ἐπλήσθησαν φόβου; Mar 2:22 ὁ οἶνος ἀπόλλυται, κ.τ.λ., Mt. inserts ἐκχεῖται, Lk. ἐκχυθήσεται, and both transpose ἀπόλλ.; ib. ἀλλ’ οἶνον νέον, κ.τ.λ., Mt. inserts βάλλουσι, Lk. βλητέον, but both come from the βάλλει (Mt. βάλλουσι) which had just preceded; Mar 3:18 a, Mt. Lk. insert ‘his brother’ (Mt. nominative, Lk. accusative), and both transfer Andrew to a place just after Peter; Mar 3:23, Mt. inserts εἰδὼς δὲ τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις αὐτ ων, Lk. αὐτὸς δὲ εἰδὼς αὐτῶν τὰ διανοήματα; Mar 4:11, Mt. Lk. insert γνῶναι (see above, § iii. 4 (h)); Mar 4:31, Mt. Lk. insert δν λαβὼν ἄνθρωπος; Mar 5:27 ἤψατο τοῦ ἰματίου αὐτοῦ, Mt. Lk. insert τοῦ κρασπέδου. The other chapters give similar results; e.g. Mar 14:65, Mt. Lk. insert τίς ἐστὶν ὁ παῖσας σε; Mar 14:72, Mt. and (?) Lk. insert καὶ ἐξελθὼν ἔξω ἔκλαυσεν πικρῶς (but see § iii. 4 (h) above). These changes, or most of them, could not, as Sanday (loc. cit.) points out, have been accidental. The same cannot be said of the great majority of the instances often quoted of supposed agreement of Mt.-Lk. against Mk.; most of them are so minute and unimportant that they do not argue any common bond between the First and Third Evangelists except common sense.

Now, the argument which we are considering suggests that these inserted phrases were originally in Mk., but were omitted or altered by a later editor. Is this in the least probable? There is no reason that we can conceive why they should have been omitted or altered. In some cases it is most improbable that anything of the kind should have happened, for it would mean the introduction by a later editor of harsh or difficult phrases not found in Mt. or Lk. (see § iii. 4 (h) above). On the other hand, the theory that the non-Markan source or sources used by Matthew and Luke contained narrative as well as discourses has all the marks of probability, to put the matter at the lowest. See, for example, the non-Markan paragraphs collected in the second division of Wright's Synopsis, which contains the narratives of the Temptation and of the Baptist's preaching; and there are many others. If this be the case, the result is exactly what we should expect. Matthew and Luke sometimes follow Mark rather than the non-Markan source; sometimes one follows the one and the other the other; and sometimes both follow the non-Markan source. Probably no one would have thought otherwise but for presuppositions founded on the λόγια sentence of Papias.

But Schmiedel (loc. cit.) finds in certain passages indications of our Mk. being 'secondary to Mt. and Luke. Such are Mar 3:28 πάντα ἀφεθήσεται τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων, where || Mat 12:31 f. has ἀνθρώποις, but goes on to say: 'Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him.' The supposition is that the editor of our Mk. did not like this latter phrase, which had been common to Mt. and the original Mk., and omitted it, but kept the words 'Son of Man' by altering the ἀνθρώποις of Mt. to τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων. It seems much more probable that Matthew got the additional sentence from the non-Markan source; and Mark's 'sons of men' as equivalent to 'men,' a common Semitic idiom, is on a par with his other Aramaisms (see § vi. above). In Mar 7:27 occurs a phrase, 'Let the children first be filled,' which is not in Mt., and is thought by Schmiedel to be an insertion in our Mk., showing 'some aversion to Jewish particularism,' as toning down our Lord's answer. Yet Mat_8:11 shows much more 'aversion.' In Mar_9:1 the phrase 'the kingdom of God come (ἐληλυθυῖαν) in (with) power' is thought to be a correction of 'the Son of man coming (ἐρχόμενον) in his kingdom,' Mat_16:28, as postponing the Parousia, which the result showed to be not so near as was at first believed. Here Luke (Mar_9:27) has 'the kingdom of God' simply, which at least shows no priority to Mark. It is much more likely that 'the kingdom of God,' with or without the addition 'come in (with) power,' was our Lord's own phrase, and that Matthew, as is his wont, gives the explanation, no doubt prompted by the belief of the first age that Jesus would return in the lifetime of those 'standing here' (see Sanday in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible ii. 635). The awkward turn of the wording in Mar_9:12, used above (§ iii. 4 (h)) as an indication of Mk.'s priority, Matthew smoothing down an awkward phrase, is held by Schmiedel to show our Mk.'s 'secondary' character; he thinks that our Mk. has introduced a 'sense-destroying parenthesis'—surely a very strange thing for an editor to do, whatever an original author might have done. In Mar_11:25 we find ὁ πατήρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς (where || Mt. has ὁ π. ὑ. ὁ οὐράνιος), the only Markan instance (perhaps Mar_11:26 of Textus Receptus is an interpolation) of an express characteristic of Mt., and it is thought to be an editorial addition. This argument, however, would necessitate the supposition that the first clause of the Lord's Prayer, as given in Mt., was an invention of the First Evangelist, which is very unlikely. It is true that the shorter or Lukan form shows much of Luke's style, and some of the differences between it and the Matthaean form seem to be due to Luke himself (see Plummer on Luk_11:1), the Matthaean form being probably nearer the original; and Dr. Chase supposes that the first Christians adapted the prayer for liturgical use (TS [Note: 5 Texts and Studies.], Camb., i. 3). But it is quite unnecessary to suppose that the phrase 'Our Father which art in heaven' was first found in Matthew. From Mark's account of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mar_12:2 ff.), where one messenger is mentioned on each occasion, and then, 'in a quite unnecessary and even disturbing manner,' many others, Schmiedel argues the priority of Mt., where several servants are sent on each occasion. It is hard to see any force in this. Matthew is as likely to have corrected Mark (if it be a correction) as our Mk. to have introduced a gratuitous inconsistency (if it be an inconsistency) under the influence of Matthew. In the discourse on the Coming of the Son of Man, after the account of the afflictions, Mar_13:24 has: 'In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened,' while || Mt. has 'immediately after,' etc. This is said to show the posteriority of a supposed Markan editor who desires to postpone the Parousia, as in the case of Mar_9:1 (above); but as there, so here, it is more probable that Matthew's εὐθέως is an explanation, and Mark's ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις is our Lord's own phrase, or nearly so.

Thus, although there is nothing in the nature of things why our Second Gospel should not be an edited form of the original document that lay before Matthew and Luke, the reasons alleged by Schmiedel will hardly convince us that this is the case. Salmon's argument really depends on the view taken of the last twelve verses (see above, § vi.). If on other grounds we believe them to be by the writer who put our Second Gospel into its present shape, then we may accept his theory; but if otherwise, the theory falls.

If, however, we were to accept the hypothesis of a later editor, it would be of interest to trace the portions due to him. We may put aside Dr. Salmon's suggestion (see above) of Mar_1:1-15, Mar_3:5, Mar_6:6; Mar_6:52, Mar_16:9 ff. unless we accept the appendix as a real ending to the Gospel. But we might hold that several paragraphs peculiar to Mk. are due to this supposed editor; such as Mar_3:19 b, Mar_3:20-21 (accusation of madness by Jesus' friends: though here we might equally hold that the omission in Mt. and Lk. is due to the same feeling as in § iii. 3 above), Mar_4:26-29 (the seed growing secretly), Mar_7:3 f. (explanation about washings), Mar_7:32-37 (the healing of the deaf μογιλάλος), Mar_8:22-26 (the blind man of Bethsaida), Mar_14:51 f. (the young man who fled naked), Mar_15:21 (the names Alexander and Rufus). It might also be thought that the Aramaisms and Latinisms were due to such an editor (but see above, §§ iii. 4 (f), (g), v.). These are points which are peculiar to our Gospel.

But a consideration which militates against such a large amount of editing is that our Mk. retains at once the original roughness and the original freshness of style. If the canonical Mk. is later than and influenced by Mt. and Lk., why did not its editor correct the mistakes and prune the vulgarisms and roughnesses as did Matthew and Luke? While, however, this seems to forbid the idea of any large amount of editing, it is certainly possible that a later editor has introduced a few phrases. Sir J. Hawkins (Hor. Synopt. p. 110) suggests the following as additions: Mar_1:1 Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ [also υἱοῦ Θεοῦ?], Mar_5:13 ὡς δισχίλιοι, Mar_6:37 δηναρίων διακοσίων, Mar_8:35 καὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, Mar_9:41 ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἐστέ (but see above, § iii. 4 (h)), Mar_10:29 καὶ ἔνεκεν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, Mar_10:30 μετὰ διωγμῶν, Mar_14:5 ἐπάνω δηναρίων τριακοσίων, Mar_14:56 καὶ ἴσαι αἱ μαρτυρίαι οὐκ ἦσαν, and so in Mar_14:59. But even this hypothesis is not necessary; and on the whole the more probable solution seems to be that our Second Gospel is that which was used by the First and Third Evangelists; in fact, that Mark wrote first of all the Four, and that his work was known to the others.

☞ Market, Market-Place

MARKET, MARKET-PLACE (ἀγορά)

1. Locality and appearance.—The landscape of Palestine was characterized by the number of its villages and the absence of isolated dwelling-houses on the cultivated lands. This was due to the joint ownership and tillage of the village fields and to the importance of living together for common safety. The Oriental always lived in the midst of neighbours (Luk_15:6; Luk_15:9), and sought his home in 'a city of habitation' (Psa_107:36). The Palestine village had a path of communication leading through it to other villages, and this thoroughfare, or the widest and most central part of it, became the market-place. A few small shops opened upon the roadway representing the simple village traffic in food and clothing, and the manual skill of the carpenter and the blacksmith. In the larger towns the single shop of a kind became a street, row, or enclosed square devoted to the manufacture and sale of particular articles, each being thus known as the fruit-market, the shoe-makers' street, or the khan of the silver-smiths (Jer_37:21, Joh_5:2).

2. Uses and associations.—Beside the fountain or large tree of the market-place to which the village often owed its name and choice of locality, muleteers and other travellers rested their baggage animals, and told of what had happened by the way. There the elders of the village could be met with (Act_16:19-20), and the children naturally collected and played where there was most to be seen and heard (Luk 7:32). In the market-place, day-labourers gathered at dawn from different quarters and waited to be engaged (Mat 20:3). There men met and greetings were exchanged, a scale of distinction being carefully observed, from the recognition accorded to equals and neighbours up to the salutation offered to those whom it was prudent or becoming to hold in honour on account of seniority, family connexion, worldly prosperity, or religious position (Mat 23:7, Luk 11:43). On account of the coming and going of strangers and the importation of foreign wares, the Pharisee washed his hands on returning from the market, as he might have unavoidably or inadvertently touched something that was classified as defiling, or that had itself previously come into contact with what imparted such ceremonial defilement (Mar 7:4).

3. In Gentile towns.—Under the Graeco-Roman influences the market-place of an Oriental city became a broad paved way, with a colonnade on each side marking off two side-walks for foot-passengers. Such was the agora of Ephesus (Act 16:19; Act 17:17), leading in a direct line, with branching side streets of the ordinary kind, from the canal quay to the amphitheatre at the other end. The street called ‘Straight’ (Act 9:11) in Damascus was thus laid out. In Rome, the Forum was a similar localizing of trade and municipal business.

☩ Marriage (I.)

MARRIAGE (I.)

and there would be a feeling of irritation and injustice between the families concerned. An almost equal anxiety attended the arrival of the young wife to live with her husband's parents, and to perform her duties under the often exacting superintendence of her mother-in-law. In a decision thus affecting the whole circle of relatives, it was considered natural and inevitable that both the selection of the individual and the settlement of all financial matters should be decided by the parents and guardians of those about to be married. The impulsive self-will of Esau which showed itself in the contempt of his birthright, led him to set aside the above tradition by marrying two of the daughters of Heth (Gen 26:34; Gen 26:33; Gen 27:46). Woman was not thought of as having a personal existence at her own disposal, but as a unit in the family, and under the protection and authority of her male relatives. In marriage she was practically the purchased possession of her husband, becoming bèûlah to him as her ba'al, or owner and master.

2. Betrothal.—This was a binding transaction declaring the fact of prospective marriage, and specifying the terms agreed upon by the contracting parties, that is, by those acting on their behalf. Although in both families the intention of marriage might have been decided upon by the parents from the infancy of their children, yet the formality of betrothal was not proceeded with until marriage could be regarded as a possibility in the near future. On the one hand, it was undesirable to make gifts or pay an instalment in a compact that might never be implemented by marriage, and, on the other hand, it was equally undesirable to dedicate a daughter to one who might not live to undertake her support, and thus cause her to be regarded as a widow. During a prolonged interval the man might move to another part of the land or fail to carry out the betrothal stipulations, and then the intended bride would require to get a writing of divorce or separation before she could be betrothed or married to another. While the act of betrothal by the presence of witnesses and the assemblage of friends had the importance of a ceremonial function, yet the spirit of bargaining was generally so keenly aroused, and the process of compromise so protracted and complex, that the situation scarcely admitted of immediate marriage rejoicings. Besides, it frequently happened that an interval of time was needed in order that the bridegroom might render the stipulated service, or acquire the sum of money agreed upon as the present to be given to the father and brothers of the bride. Thus there was usually an interval of a year or two, or it might be of several years, between the betrothal and the celebration of marriage.

3. Ceremony of marriage.—As a welcome sequel following in due time upon the discussion and settlement of the marriage portion and similar matters, the wedding itself was always an occasion of joyful festivity and congratulation.

(a) Place.—While in ancient times the marriage doubtless took place occasionally in the home of the bride, yet the fact that the bridegroom came to claim one who had become his by the fulfilment of assigned conditions, and further, the widespread tradition of forcible opposition to her removal from her people, point to the greater frequency of marriage in the house of the bridegroom's parents. Thither the bride was conducted by a company of friends, carrying also her personal outfit and household belongings. If her people were of the peasant class, and she was merely passing to a neighbouring village, she would be already in her bridal dress and seated upon a led horse or mule, while in front of the procession young men and maidens individually engaged in sword-play and dancing. In the larger villages, such as Bethlehem and Nazareth, the robing of the bride was more elaborate, and was carried out by the help of women after her arrival at the new home. On that day, the bridegroom, instead of following the primitive custom of going to claim his bride or to meet her procession on the way, remained absent from the house with his relatives or friends until all preparations had been fully made.

(b) Time.—The marriage generally took place in the evening, so that those coming from a distance might not fail to arrive, and those who were occupied during the day might have liberty to attend. During the evening, as he sat among his friends, the bridegroom, in the exercise of his prerogative as the chief person concerned, signified his desire to move homewards. Upon this the wedding procession was formed. Lanterns and torches were lit to guide him and his companions through the dark, silent streets. Those who were waiting to see the procession pass raised the peculiar Oriental cry of marriage festivity, and thus, as the cry was taken up, the fact of his approach was known along the path in front of him up to the house in which the bride and her attendants were waiting. Owing to the stillness of the air and the slow pace of the illuminated procession, the cry might be heard half an hour before the arrival of the bridegroom. Then those who had merely come to do honour by joining in the procession returned to their houses, and the relatives and invited guests passed in to the wedding ceremony and festivity. These rejoicings were maintained for several days or even a week, according to the worldly circumstances of the family.

Many of these marriage customs are alluded to by Christ in His teaching, as the subject was familiar to His hearers, and any parabolic lessons deduced from it would be easily understood. Thus the bridegroom could excuse himself for not attending the wedding of another, seeing that his own invited guests were returning to pay visits of congratulation and good-will, and would feel offended if they found him absent (Luk 14:20). It was a privilege and honour to the guest to be invited to the wedding feast, and an affront to those who invited him if he failed to attend (Mat 22:3; Mat 22:9). It was late when the wedding guest returned to his own house (Luk 12:36). It was for the bridegroom to tarry until he was pleased to appoint the hour of his coming (Mat 24:42; Mat 25:6; Mat 25:13). The reference to marrying and giving in marriage, with the Flood at the door, exemplified that pre-occupation of the mind with worldly interests and ambitions by which men forget the transitoriness of life and the precariousness of its possessions. One of the marks of the new Kingdom was to be its power of carrying disruption into the closest and strongest family relationships at the call of loyalty to its larger and higher citizenship (Mat 10:35-37; Mat 12:46-49). With such a background of tradition and custom Christ gave to marriage the support of His own presence, and spoke of its Divine origin and temporary nature (Joh 2:2, Mat 19:4-6; Mat 22:30). In the Epistles it is evident that the higher conception of marriage prevalent among the Jews was gravely endangered by the inherited views still familiar to the mind, though condemned by the conscience, in the Gentile membership of the Church (1 Corinthians 7). The marriage relationship was used to typify the intimate vital affinity between Christ and the Church (Eph 5:22-33). In Rev 21:2 the comparison of the New Jerusalem to an Oriental bride adorned for her husband, appropriately sets forth the protracted development and perfected beauty of the Kingdom of God.

The bridegroom's friend (Joh 3:29) must be distinguished from 'the children of the bride-chamber' (Mat 9:15), who were simply the invited guests. In Judaea there were two such 'friends,' one acting for the bridegroom, the other for the bride. They conducted all the preliminary inquiries, made the bargains as to dowry, etc., arranged the betrothal, and finally led the betrothed couple to the bride-chamber. They were responsible for the legality of the whole proceedings, and were guarantors of the bride's virgin chastity. The bridegroom's voice, in converse with the bride, assured them pleasantly that their work had been successful. The discharge of the 'friend's' functions was liable to gross abuses (see Mishnic tractate Middoth). There was no corresponding functionary in Galilee, and so there is no allusion to him in the account of the marriage at Cana. Similar offices are discharged by the friends of would-be bridegrooms in Palestine to-day. An ardent suitor once sent to the present writer a sum of £40, with the request that it be given to a friend, on condition that he should secure the goodwill of a certain maiden, and the consent of her parents to his suit.

The bride-chamber is probably = Heb. heder, 'the nuptial chamber' (Jdg 15:1), in which stood the huppah, the bridal 'bed with a canopy' (Joe 2:16; Gesenius, s.v.). In all the lands of their dispersion the Jews still apply this name, huppah, to the richly embroidered canopy under which the contracting parties stand during the marriage ceremony.

MARRIAGE (II.).—Jesus does not treat of the family from the point of view of the sociologist, but from that of the teacher of religion and morals. The high estimate which He places upon it is to be seen, not alone in His regard for His mother, but more particularly from His use of the institution as His most characteristic analogy for the Kingdom of God. As far as the condition of its future members in the present evil age is concerned, He describes the Kingdom as a social order in which the relationship of men to God is analogous to that of sons to a father; and their relation to each other, therefore, is like that existing between brothers. Jesus also frequently uses figures drawn from marriage customs to illustrate His teaching concerning the coming of the Kingdom. It would be a mistake to see in this use of the paternal and filial relations a survival of that primitive religious concept which made members of a clan the sons of its gods. The usage of Jesus contains no reflexion of such a primitive thought, but rather springs from His high appreciation of marriage as it existed in the conventionalized civilization of the Jews of His day.

1. As an institution Jesus regards marriage as essentially physical, and intended only for the present age. Those who were to share in the blessings of the eschatological Kingdom would neither marry nor be given in marriage, but would be possessed of the non-physical body in the resurrection (Mat 22:23-30, Mar 12:18-25, Luk 20:27-36). His teaching at this point is not an endorsement of the view that immortality is to be without personal relations, but is rather a relegation of physical relations to physical conditions.

The Sadducees, in their query which gave rise to this teaching of Jesus, raised the question of the levirate marriage. Jesus' answer does not touch upon that peculiar institution, but deals rather with the nature of marriage itself. He was no social reformer. In all the records of His teaching there is nothing to indicate that He gave to marriage any new social content or custom. Like His Apostles after Him, Jesus accepted marriage as an existing institution which gave rise to practical moral questions. His use of the customs of the time (cf. Mat 22:2 ff., Joh 2:1 ff.) was for the purpose of illustration rather than in the way of either approval or disapproval. It follows that Jesus did not look upon marriage as psychical or spiritual. Such transcendental teaching is foreign to the practical temper of Christianity. In its place is the assumption that the family, like all other members of social life, comes within the region of the great commandment of love. Jesus assumes that the father loves the child, and that brothers love each other. Farther than this His discussions do not go, but the inference is imperative that the relations between husband and wife fall within the great teaching of Mat 5:44-48 quite as truly as other social relations of individuals. If quarrelsome brothers are to be reconciled, most assuredly should there be reconciliation between husband and wife.

2. Marriage as a social institution Jesus regards as of Divine origin. It is one of the primal facts of humanity, established by God before the giving of the Law (Mat 19:5-6, Mar 10:6-8). Jesus grants that because of the exigencies of social development Moses modified the institution to the extent of permitting and regulating divorce; but such modification Jesus evidently regarded as out of harmony with the institution. According to the original Divine purpose, man and wife were no longer two persons but one flesh. That is, marriage was to be monogamous. Any form of polygamy is thus excluded from His ideal.

It is noteworthy that Jesus in His quotation of Gen 2:24 does not follow the Heb. reading, in which οἱ δύο of the LXX Septuagint has no equivalent. Polygamy is not excluded by the Hebrew, but is obviously inconsistent with the LXX Septuagint statement, and even more so with the inference drawn from the passage by Jesus. It is from this point of view that one must approach the subject of divorce. (See Divorce).

3. Jesus, however, does not make marriage a supreme good. Rather is it one of those great goods of an imperfect age which are to be subordinated to the supreme good of sharing in the Kingdom of God, i.e. eternal life. Yet at no point is the sanity of His teaching more in evidence than here. He Himself was unmarried, but He never counsels celibacy. He does not even take the mediating position of St. Paul (1Co 7:7; 1Co 7:29; 1Co 7:32-40). In this particular, as in so many others, He is in such opposition to the Essenes of His day as quite to overbalance any of those superficial resemblances which have been discovered between His teaching and the ascetic doctrines of that sect. At the same time, just because marriage, though a good, is one which must pass with the present age, He teaches that in some cases it must be avoided. Mat 19:12 speaks of those who have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the Kingdom of heaven, i.e. who, because of exceptional circumstances, have become celibates. In certain other expressions He distinctly recognizes the necessity for some among His followers to leave their families in the interests of a devotion to His cause (Mat 18:25, Luk 14:26). These sayings, however, are not to be interpreted as in any way a prohibition of marriage, or as an elevation of the unmarried state to a plane superior to that of marriage. To draw such an inference is to misinterpret the entire tendency of His teaching, and to elevate into a controlling position His recognition of exceptional and particularly difficult situations in which one is compelled to practise a supreme self-sacrifice in order to remain loyal to a supreme ideal. The sayings are to be interpreted in accordance with those others in which Jesus concedes the fact that the family circle is not proof against evil influences—sayings which aroused hostility against His followers (Mat 10:34 ff., Luk 12:49-53).

The Early Church under the influence of extra-Christian ideals moved along the line suggested by St. Paul towards the approval of the highest state of celibacy. Rev_14:4 gives the highest honours to those men who have not been married. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 9. 63) refers to the unauthentic saying of Jesus preserved in the Gospel of the Egyptians, 'I came to destroy the works of the female.' Similarly Clement (ib. 16) reports Jesus as having said, 'Eat every herb, but that which hath bitterness (i.e. maternity) eat not.'

A consideration of this teaching of Jesus leads naturally, therefore, to the genuinely Christian conception of marriage as a relationship which, though in the very nature of the case limited to the physical mode of existence, is yet sacred. The ascetic ideal is thus utterly lacking here as in all the teaching of Jesus, and in its place is to be found all that is normal in the so-called Greek ideal of life, together with the ennobling Christian ideal of love. See, further, Adultery, Celibacy, Divorce.

☞ Martha

MARTHA (of Bethany, sister of Lazarus and Mary).—The name (מרת) 'mistress' or 'lady'), though unique in the Scriptures, is common in the Talmud.* [Note: See Lightfoot on Joh_11:1.] She appears in the Gospel-story on three occasions: (1) when she entertained Jesus on His way to Jerusalem at the season of the Feast of Tabernacles (Luk_10:38-42); (2) when Lazarus died and was revived by Jesus (Joh_11:1-46); and (3) when Jesus, on His way to the Passover from His retreat at Ephraim (Joh_11:54), was honoured with a public entertainment at Bethany in the house of a leading man named Simon the Leper (Joh_12:1-11 = Mat_26:6-13 = Mar_14:3-9). Being a notable housewife, Martha was entrusted with the management of the banquet. See Anointing, I. 2.

The idea that the scene of this entertainment was Martha's house has given rise to the unfortunate surmise that Martha was a widow, Simon the Leper being her deceased husband. On the supposition that Κυρία in 2Jn_1:1; 2Jn_1:5 is a proper name, the Greek equivalent of Martha, 'lady' (Volmar), it has been surmised that St.

John's 2nd Epistle is addressed to our Martha. This is ingenious but untenable, since (1) 'the elect Kyria' would be, not ἐκλεκτῆ Κυρία (v. 1), but Κυρία τῆ ἐκλεκτῆ (cf. 3Jn 1:1); (2) the Epistle is probably addressed metaphorically to a church and not to an individual.

Martha and Mary exhibit a peculiarity frequently observable in families. They were, like the brothers Jacob and Esau, utterly diverse in disposition and temperament. While Mary was impassioned and imaginative, Martha was unemotional and practical.† [Note: Zig. on Luk 10:42 δύο μερίδες πολιτείας ἐπαινεταί, ἡ μὲν προακτικὴ ἡ δὲ θεωρητικὴ.] When Jesus visited her house at the season of the Feast of Tabernacles, He found her busy preparing the festal cheer (see Mary, No. 3). His arrival redoubled her housewifely solicitude, and it angered her when she saw her sister seated at His feet and listening to His discourse, leaving to her unaided hands the offices of hospitality. And when Jesus came to Bethany in tardy response to the sisters' appeal, 'Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick,' Mary was in the darkened home overwhelmed with grief, but Martha had repressed her emotion, and, when word was brought her that Jesus had been sighted making His toilsome approach by the Ascent of Blood, the steep and robber-haunted road up the eastern slope of Olivet, she went out and met Him ere He entered the village. She greeted Him calmly, not without upbraiding for His delay; and when He assured her that her brother would rise again, she took His words in her matter-of-fact way as a reference to the current doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous at the last day, seeing in them merely a commonplace of pious consolation. Very different was her sister's behaviour. When Martha returned home and told her that the Master had arrived and was calling for her, she sprang up and ran to Him, and, in a passion of love and sorrow, flung herself at His feet.

It were, however, unjust to disparage Martha. She was of a practical turn, but she was very far from stupid. She was mistress of the house, and she was as a mother to her unworldly sister. There was evidently a close sympathy between them. During the dark days which succeeded their brother's death, they had been each other's comforters and had unbosomed their grief one to the other. Their constant plaint had been, 'Had the Lord been here, our brother had not died'; and this was the cry of each in turn when they met Jesus (Joh 11:21; Joh 11:32). Martha was calm and self-possessed, but a great tenderness was concealed beneath her unemotional exterior. She wept less than Mary, but she mourned as deeply. Nor was she lacking in love and reverence for Jesus. Her impatience of Mary's inactivity amid the bustle of preparing the meal was due less to resentment at being left alone to serve, than to anxiety that nothing should be wanting for the comfort of the dear Master. And she believed in His power to help even when Lazarus had been dead four days (Joh 11:22). She lacked some qualities which Mary possessed, but she had others of her own, and Jesus appreciated the excellence of her character. He loved Martha no less than her sister and Lazarus (Joh_11:5).

It is no slight attestation of the historicity of the Lukan and Johannine narratives of the family of Bethany that they faithfully accord in their delineations of the two sisters. On the pages of St. John each sustains the character which she exhibits in the little scene so exquisitely depicted by St. Luke. Here are no imaginary pictures, but portraiture of real personages.

St. John says that the village where Martha and her sister dwelt was Bethany; but St. Luke does not name it, and he has been charged with placing the incident of the meal in Martha's house in Galilee. This idea, however, arises from a misconception of his literary method. Like the other Synoptists, St. Luke was not an original author but an editor of the Evangelic Tradition, and his aim was not chronological accuracy but the exhibition of Jesus. He sifted the ample material at his disposal, and arranged his selections topically rather than historically. Thus at Luk_9:49-50, recounting what befell in Galilee, he records the Lord's rebuke of His disciples' mistaken zeal; then, finding another incident which teaches a like lesson (Luk_9:51-56), he inserts it in this connexion, though it belongs to the last journey to Jerusalem (cf. Luk_9:51). Having begun this section of the Tradition, he continues it, giving various other incidents of the journey, down to the close of ch. 12. Then he returns to what befell in Galilee, resuming the narrative of the journey to Jerusalem at Luk_17:11.

☩ Mary

1. Mary the mother of James the Little and Joses, one of the women who followed Jesus from Galilee, stood beside the cross, watched the burial, and visited the sepulchre on the Resurrection morning (Mat_27:55-56 = Mar_15:40-41, Mat_27:61 = Mar_15:47, Mar_16:1 = Mat_28:1 = Luk_24:10). From Joh_19:25 it appears that she was wife to Clopas. This name is distinct from Cleopas (Luk_24:18), and is perhaps identical with Alphaens, both representing תלפאי. Cf. J. B. Lightfoot, Gal. p. 256. WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] write Ἀλφαῖος (see NT, vol. ii. § 408). If this identification be allowed, then (1) James the Little was probably one of the Twelve (Mat_10:3 = Mar_3:18 = Luk_16:15); (2) he was perhaps brother to Levi (Matthew), the son of Alphaeus. The latter inference is favoured by (a) the v.l. Ἰάκωβον for Δευεῖν in Mar_2:14; (b) the tradition that James, like Matthew, had been a tax-gatherer (Chrysost. in Matth. xxxiii.: δύο τελῶναι, Ματθαῖος καὶ Ἰάκωβος; Euth. Zig.: Ματθαῖος δὲ καὶ Ἰάκωβος ὁ τοῦ Ἀλφραίου, τελῶναι). See artt. Alphaeus and Clopas.

Hegesippus (in Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica iii. 11. 32, iv. 22) mentions a Clopas who was brother to Joseph, our Lord's foster-father; but there is no evidence that he was identical with this Clopas. Jerome, in support of his theory of 'the Brethren of Jesus,' construes Μαριάμ ἡ τοῦ Κλωτᾶ in Joh_19:25 as in opposition to ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, thus reducing the number of the women by the Cross to three, and making 'Mary the [wife] of Clopas' the Virgin's sister. See J. B. Lightfoot, Gal. p. 255 ff. But (1) it is improbable that two sisters bore the same name, and (2) 'the sister of his mother' was apparently Salome, the mother of the sons of Zebedee (cf. Mar_15:40 = Mat_27:56).

2. Mary Magdalene.—She is first mentioned (Luk_8:2) as one of a company of women who attended Jesus on His second mission through Galilee in the course of the second year of His ministry. She is distinguished by two significant epithets: (1) 'the Magdalene,' i.e. the woman of Magdala (Mejdel), a town on the Lake of Galilee, some 3 miles from Capernaum, at the southern end of the Plain of Gennesaret. The modern Mejdel is a miserable village, but the ancient Magdala was a wealthy place, one of three cities, according to the Talmud, whose tribute had to be conveyed in waggons to Jerusalem (cf. Lightfoot on Joh_12:3). It had, however, an evil reputation, and was destroyed, according to the same authority, for harlotry, so that 'Mary the Magdalene' might be equivalent to 'Mary the harlot' (cf. 'Corinthian Lais'). It is only fair, however, to add that many regard this as very precarious.

(2) 'From whom seven demons had gone forth.' In Jewish parlance, immorality was a form of demonic possession,* [Note: Lightfoot on Luk_8:2. Cf. Jer. Vit. Hil. Erem.: a virgo Dei at Majumas possessed by amoris dæmon.] and, just as the grace of the Holy Spirit is called 'sevenfold,'† [Note: Od. Clun. Hymn. de S. Mar. Magdal.:

'Qui septem purgat vitia

Per septiformem gratiam.'] so sevenfold possession might signify complete abandonment to the dominion of unclean passion. Cf. Mat_12:45 = Luk_11:26. It is possible that Mary had been a harlot, that Jesus had rescued her from her life of shame, and that she followed Him out of gratitude. She was one of the devoted women who stood by the cross (Joh_19:25, Mat_27:56 = Mar_15:40), watched His burial (Mat_27:61 = Mar_15:47), and came on the Resurrection morning to the sepulchre (Joh_20:1 = Mat_28:1 = Mar_16:1 = Luk_24:10). Finding it empty, she waited beside it weeping, and was rewarded with the first vision of the risen Lord (Joh 20:11-18, cf. Mat 28:9-10).

3. Mary of Bethany.—She is first introduced by St. Luke (Luk 10:38-42), who tells how Jesus, probably on His way to the Feast of Tabernacles (Joh 7:2; Joh 7:10) in the third year of His ministry, reached ‘a certain village,’ and was hospitably received by ‘a certain woman by name Martha,’ who had a sister called Mary. The Feast of Tabernacles was a season of feasting and friendship. ‘They ate the fat and drank the sweet, and sent portions unto them for whom nothing was prepared, and made great mirth’ (Exo 23:16, Lev 23:33-44, Num 29:12-38, Neh 8:9-18). Martha, a good housewife, was busy making ready the festal cheer; but Mary, oblivious of all save the Lord’s presence, seated herself, in the posture of a disciple (cf. Act 22:3), at His feet and listened to His discourse. Martha, ‘distracted about much service,’ interposed: ‘Lord, dost thou not care that my sister left me alone to serve? Tell her then to lend me a helping hand.’ ‘Martha, Martha,’ He answered, gently protesting against the sumptuousness of His hostess’s preparations, ‘thou art anxious and troubled about many things, but a few are all we need; or rather,’ He added, ‘only one thing;‡ [Note: ⋈BL, WH ὀλίγων δὲ ἐστὶν χρεῖα ἢ ἑνός.] for it is the good “portion” that Mary chose, one which shall not be taken away from her.’ At that season, when they were all feasting and sending ‘portions,’ Mary was thinking not of the meat that perisheth, but of that which endureth unto eternal life.

St. Luke does not name the village where Martha and Mary dwelt. St. John tells us that it was Bethany, and that they had a brother named Lazarus (Joh 11:1-46). Some months later, when Jesus was at the other Bethany beyond Jordan, whither He had retired from Jerusalem to escape the fury of the rulers (Joh 10:40; cf. Joh 1:28 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), Lazarus fell sick, and his sisters sent Jesus word. For two days after He heard the news He remained where He was, and only when Lazarus died did He set out. His approach was reported to Martha, apparently the elder sister and mistress of the house; and she went to meet Him and sorrowfully upbraided Him: ‘Lord, hadst thou been here, my brother had not died.’ Assured of His sympathy and help, she returned home and, finding her sister among the mourners, whispered to her that the Teacher had come. Mary arose, and, hurrying to Him, fell at His feet, crying in the very words which Martha had used, the words which had been on their lips all those sorrowful days: ‘Lord, hadst thou been here, my brother had not died.’ Cf. art. Martha.

Mary appears a third time six days before the Passover, when Jesus was entertained in the house of Simon the Leper at Bethany, and she came in during the feast and anointed His feet (Joh 12:1-11; cf. Mat 26:6-13 = Mar 14:3-9). See Anointing, I. 2.

☩ Mary, The Virgin

MARY, THE VIRGIN.—Historical data for the life of the mother of our Lord are astonishingly meagre. Legendary matter there is in abundance, with regard to her life both before the Annunciation and after the Ascension, but this art. will not touch on this except incidentally.

1. The Virgin Mary was born, we may suppose, at Nazareth. Tradition names Jerusalem (Cuinet, Syrie, Liban, et Palestine, p. 523), but this is quite untrustworthy. Her parents, according to a not improbable tradition, were Joachim and Anna (Protev. Jacob.). There is no reason to doubt that the Virgin, as well as Joseph, belonged to the tribe of Judah and to the family of David (Luk 1:32; Luk 1:69, Rom 1:3, 2Ti 2:8, Heb 7:14), although it is almost certain, on the other hand, that both Mt. and Lk. give, not her genealogy, but Joseph's.

The statement of the Test. XII. Patr. (Simeon vii.), which makes Mary a woman of the tribe of Levi, is clearly an erroneous inference from the relationship between her and Elisabeth (cf. Plummer on Luk 1:27; Luk 1:36). Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} reads, Luk 2:5, 'because they were both of the house of David.'

Only one member of her immediate family is alluded to in the NT, viz. her sister (Joh 19:25). This sister of the Virgin was most probably Salome, wife of Zebedee, and mother of James and John. We know from the other Gospels (Mat 27:56, Mar 15:40) that Salome was present at the Crucifixion, and it is quite in accordance with St. John's manner to allude thus to his own mother without mentioning her name. The other opinion, that this sister was Mary 'of Clopas,' would (cf. Westcott, in loc., also Mayor, St. James, pp. xix-xx) 'involve the most unlikely supposition that two sisters bore the same name.' The family of the Virgin was connected in some way with Elisabeth (ἡ συγγενίς σου, Luk 1:36), but what the degree of relationship was cannot be known. According to a theory brought forward in connexion with the harmonizing of the two genealogies of our Lord, Mary was a cousin of Joseph her husband (art. 'Genealogy of Jesus Christ' in Smith's DB [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.]), but such a theory has little to recommend it. That her family was but a humble one may be inferred from her betrothal to Joseph 'the carpenter,' especially if there be any truth in the tradition as to the disparity of their ages.

2. Some time after their betrothal, which came generally among the Jews a year before the marriage, the angel Gabriel was sent from God to Nazareth to tell her of One who was to be born of her, and who should 'be called holy, the Son of God' (Luk_1:35). The simplicity of the narrative bears on it the stamp of truth. Mary was troubled (διεταράχθη), we are told, at the saying, yet she believed at once. Her words, 'How shall this be?' ought not to be taken as an expression of doubt, like the words of Zacharias, 'Whereby shall I know this?' They are rather to be regarded as an 'involuntary expression of amazement' (Grot. 'non dubitantis sed admirantis'). Equally impossible is it to suppose that she believed that the child promised would be the fruit of a future union with Joseph. The words of the angel forbid any such idea. Yet, on the other hand, we need not suppose that the full meaning of the angel's words was at once grasped. There are evident signs in the narrative that this was not so, but nothing that we read mars the exquisite simplicity of her words of humble submission, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word.' Soon after ('in these days,' Luk_1:39) the departure of the angel, Mary set out to pay the visit to her kinswoman, which his words would naturally suggest to her. The supposition that her journey was due to the intention of Joseph to put her away is a baseless one. Rather, as it has been said, 'the first but the ever-deepening desire in the heart of Mary, when the angel left her, must have been to be away from Nazareth, and for the relief of opening her heart to a woman, in all things like-minded, who perhaps might speak blessed words to her' (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. p. 152). She arose with haste and set out to seek that relief in the house of her kinswoman in the far-off hills of Judah.

What the city of her destination was we cannot know for certain. Whatever it was, it was distant from Nazareth by almost the whole length of the land. According to a tradition which may be correct (cf. ExpT [Note: xpT Expository Times.] xv. [1905] 245 f.), it was 'Ain Karim, a village an hour and a half west of Jerusalem.

The opinion held for so long that this city was Juttah is, according to Buhl (GAP [Note: AP Geographic des alten Palästina.] p. 163), quite worthless, having originated with Reland in the beginning of the 18th century.

When Mary reached her kinswoman's house, a fresh surprise awaited her in the greeting of Elisabeth: 'Blessed art thou among women.' No longer is Mary to Elisabeth simply 'kinswoman,' she is 'the mother of my Lord.' Doubtless what she had heard from Zacharias of the promises made in regard to their son would fill Elisabeth with hopes of a speedy appearance of the Messiah, and now, by inspiration (Luk_1:41), she knows that the mother of her Lord is before her. Her greeting is in reality a psalm, brief though it is and overshadowed by the still more wonderful hymn which it called forth in response. The 'Song of Mary' is 'modelled on the OT psalms, especially the Song of Hannah (1Sa 2:1-10), but its superiority to the latter in moral and spiritual elevation is very manifest.' That Mary should 'fall back on the familiar expressions of Jewish Scripture in this moment of intense exultation' is very natural (cf. Plummer, St. Luke, p. 30).

Niceta, bp. of Remesia, in his treatise de Psalmodiae Bono, names Elisabeth as the author of the Magnificat. This is supported by the Old Latin Manuscripts Vercellensis, Veronensis, Rhedigeranus, and by Irenaeus. Origen also knew of the reading, though he did not accept it. The evidence adduced, however, does not seem sufficient to override the verdict of all the rest of antiquity, that the Hymn is Mary's and not Elisabeth's. See, further, art. Magnificat.

3. Mary remained with her kinswoman in Judah 'about three months,' probably waiting (cf. Luk 1:56 with v. 36) till after the birth of John the Baptist, and then returned to Nazareth. It is probably at this point that we ought to put the commencement of the narrative in Mt., which records Joseph's intention to put Mary away privily when her condition became known to him, and speaks of his subsequent marriage with her in obedience to the angelic messages. The marriage would afford 'not only outward but moral protection' both to the mother and to the unborn Babe. That the Virgin is still spoken of as ἐμνηστευμένη in Luk 2:5 is not to be taken as necessarily indicating that the marriage had not yet taken place. Had she not been Joseph's wife, Jewish custom would have forbidden her making the journey along with him. When Joseph went up to Bethlehem to get himself enrolled, Mary went also, not because it was necessary, but because 'she would be anxious at all risks not to be separated from Joseph' (Plummer, in loc.). At Bethlehem, perhaps in the cave where now is the Church of the Nativity, she brought forth her firstborn Son, and there, too, she received the visit of the shepherds, whose words as to the sign given them from heaven she 'kept, pondering them in her heart.'

4. There is no need to linger on the next events,—the Circumcision, the Presentation and Purification in the Temple, the visit of the Magi, the Flight into and Return from Egypt,—for these all belong rather to the life of Christ than to that of Mary. Before leaving this part of her history, it may be well to emphasize how much of what we know of the Birth, Infancy, and Childhood of our Lord we owe to accounts given by His mother. That St. Luke's source in the first two chapters of his Gospel was one connected with the Virgin is generally admitted. Whether he received his information directly from her, as Ramsay supposes (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 85 ff.), or whether the information came to him indirectly through another (perhaps, as Sanday conjectures, Joanna), may not be determinable. At least we can say that St. Luke believed that he wrote what he wrote on her authority.

‘He does not,’ writes Ramsay (ib. p. 74), ‘leave it doubtful whose authority he believed himself to have. “His mother kept all these sayings hid in her heart”; “Mary kept all these sayings, pondering them in her heart”; those two sentences would be sufficient.’

5. The Return from Egypt was followed by a life in retirement at Nazareth. Very little do we know of those years. Two verses in Lk. (Luk 2:40-41), which tell us of the growth of the Child and the custom of His ‘parents’ to go every year to Jerusalem at the Feast of the Passover, are all we have in the way of direct statement. Here in Nazareth it was that those brothers and sisters of the Lord, of whom we read in the course of the Gospel narrative, were born to Mary and Joseph (for other views see art. Brethren of the Lord). Four brothers are named (Mat 13:55, Mar 6:3), but the sisters are mentioned only once (Mar 6:3), without any mention of their names.

The silence of the life at Nazareth is broken but once before the commencement of the Ministry. The scene in the Temple (Luk 2:42-50) would claim a fuller consideration in the Life of Jesus Christ. As regards its relation to His mother, we have to notice only two points which emerge from St. Luke’s narrative. Mary did not yet understand all the meaning of the angel’s words to her regarding the Child that was to be born. The Child’s own words would be a reminder to her of His true nature. He must be ‘about his Father’s business’ (or ‘in his Father’s house’). Then again we see from the passage the lasting impression which the scene left on Mary’s mind. ‘His mother kept (συνετήρει) all these sayings in her heart.’ The tense of the verb covers a long period, up to, and even during, the Ministry. Yet of the Virgin’s life during the interval between our Lord’s twelfth year and His Baptism we know nothing but what is contained in these words and those which immediately precede, as to her Son’s subjection to her and Joseph. It is, however, an easily drawn inference from the absence of any mention of Joseph in the later Gospel narrative, that he died during this interval. Beyond this it is useless to conjecture. ‘The Arabic Historia Josephi (cc. 14, 15) places his death in our Lord’s eighteenth year, when Joseph had reached the age of 111’ (Swete on Mar 6:3).

6. The remaining allusions to the Virgin in the Gospels may be briefly recorded. She was present at the marriage feast at Cana (Joh 2:1), after which she went down to Capernaum (Joh 2:12) with Jesus and His brethren and His disciples. She would seem to have been among ‘his friends’ (οἱ παρ’ αὐτοῦ) at Capernaum, who ‘went out to lay hold on him’ (Mar 3:21), for the next paragraph tells us of the coming of His mother and His brethren (Mar 3:31). She is mentioned by the unknown woman out of the multitude (Luk_11:27), 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the breasts that thou didst suck.' She was present at the Crucifixion, whence the loved disciple, into whose care she had been committed, took her to his own home (Joh_19:25 ff.). It is not a little remarkable, in view of later developments, that no fewer than three of these allusions seem to guard against an undue feeling of veneration for the mother of our Lord, In the story of the feast at Cana, His words, though not wanting in respect, 'show that the actions of the Son of God, now that He has entered on His Divine work, are no longer dependent in any way on the suggestion of a woman, even though that woman be His mother.... The time of silent discipline and obedience is over' (Westcott, in loc.). In the scene at Capernaum the lesson is much the same, though the interference of Mary and our Lord's brethren on this occasion seems to have arisen from a different motive. They are seeking to oppose His work. Before they reach Him He understands their purpose, and declares that the true kinship to the Son of God consists in obedience to the will of God, and not in mere earthly ties. It is, of course, as Swete observes (St. Mark, p. 70), 'a relative attitude only, and is perfectly consistent with tender care for kinsmen, as the saying on the cross shows.' These two scenes at Cana and Capernaum belong to the beginning of the Ministry, and similarly, almost at its close, we have Christ's words, during the last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, in answer to the saying of the woman above mentioned, 'Yea, rather ($\mu\epsilon\nu\omicron\upsilon$), blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it (Luk_11:28).' This adds to and corrects the woman's words. There is no denial of the Virgin's blessedness, only a declaration of that wherein her blessedness consists, a blessedness which may be shared by all who, like her, hear the word of God and keep it.

Why it was that the Virgin was committed by our Lord on the cross to John can be only a matter of conjecture. It may be, as Mayor suggests (St. James, p. xxvii), that her sons, as married men (1Co_9:5), were already dispersed in their several homes, while John her nephew was unmarried, and so could more readily accept such a charge. All we know is that 'from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home (Joh_19:27).

7. After this the only glimpse we get of Mary is in Act_1:14, where she is mentioned as continuing steadfastly in prayer with the other women and the brethren and Apostles of the Lord, after the Ascension. Whether she lived the rest of her life in Palestine, or accompanied St. John to Ephesus, cannot be known. Traditions there are, but they vary. According to one, found in Nicephorus Callistus (Historia Ecclesiastica ii. 3), she continued to live with St. John in Jerusalem, and died there in her fifty-ninth year. Another tradition, found in the Synodical Letter of the Council of Ephesus (a.d. 431), makes her accompany St. John to Ephesus, and speaks of her as having been buried in that city.

☞ Master

MASTER (Lat. magister from root of magnus = ‘great.’ Hence ‘master’ corresponds to rabbi, which is from רב ‘great’; and in Authorized Version ῥαββει is frequently translation ‘master,’ e.g. Mat 26:25, Mar 9:5, Joh 4:31, though in all such cases Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 retains ‘rabbi’).—The word most generally rendered ‘master’ is διδάσκαλος, which strictly means teacher; and this meaning is given in every case as an alternative reading in (Revised Version margin) , e.g. Mat 8:19; Mat 22:16, Mar 5:35; Mar 10:17, Luk 3:12; Luk 8:49, Joh 11:28; Joh 13:13-14. In Luk 8:24; Luk 9:33 the Gr. word for ‘master’ is ἐπιστάτης, a word generally used in the sense not of ‘teacher’ but of ‘chief’ or ‘overseer.’ In Mat 23:10 καθηγητής, rendered ‘master,’ is more correctly translation ‘leader’ or ‘guide.’ ‘Master’ was the ordinary title of courtesy and respect paid to a religious teacher. ⚡Matthew

MATTHEW (Ματθαῖος, Lachm., Tisch., WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] ; Ματθ αῖος, Textus Receptus) is to be identified with Levi, son of Alphaeus, since the Synoptists agree in their description of the feast associated with the publican who is named Levi in Mk. (Mar_2:14) and Lk. (Luk_5:29), and Matthew in Mt. (Mat_9:9).^{*} [Note: Levi's father was not the father of James the Little (cf. Zahn, Einleitung, ii. 263).] Levi, according to the analogy of Simon and Peter, may have been the original name and Matthew the acquired; though, according to Edersheim (Life and Times, i. 514), it was common in Galilee for a man to have two names, one strictly Jewish and the other Galilaeen. Matthew was chosen one of the Twelve, and is placed seventh in the lists in Mk. and Lk., and eighth in those in Mt. and Acts. When called to be a disciple, he was sitting at a toll-house, his place of business. Along the north end of the Sea of Galilee there was a road leading from Damascus to Acre on the Mediterranean, and on that road a customs-office marked the boundary between the territories of Philip the tetrarch and Herod Antipas. Matthew's occupation was the examination of goods which passed along the road, and the levying of the toll (cf. Hausrath, NT Times, ii. 179). The work of a publican excited the scorn so often shown beyond the limits of Israel to fiscal officers; and when he was a Jew, as was Matthew, he was condemned for impurity by the Pharisees. A Jew serving on a great highway was prevented from fulfilling requirements of the Law, and was compelled to violate the Sabbath law, which the Gentiles, who conveyed their goods, did not observe. Schürer makes the statement that the customs raised in Capernaum in the time of Christ went into the treasury of Herod Antipas, while in Judaea they were taken for the Imperial fiscus (HJP [Note: JP History of the Jewish People.] i. ii. 68). Matthew was thus not a collector under one of the companies that farmed the taxes in the Empire, but was in the service of Herod. Yet the fact that he belonged to the publican class, among whom were Jews who outraged patriotism by gathering tribute for Caesar, subjected him to the scorn of the Pharisees and their party (cf. Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 515); and his occupation itself associated him with men who, everywhere in the Empire, were despised for extortion and fraud, and were execrated (cf. Cic. de Offic. i. 42; Lucian, Menipp. 11). Even Jesus Himself named the publicans with harlots (Mat_21:31). See Publican, and Sea of Galilee, § vi.

Before the call of Matthew, Jesus had resided at Capernaum, had left it, and had gone back to it (Mar 1:21; Mar 1:38; Mar 2:1); and it is safe to conclude that Matthew, a dweller in or near the city, had heard the fame of Jesus, and perhaps he may have been among those who sought Him (Mar 1:37). Jesus, too, may have noticed the publican, and the fact may have led to the call. According to the narrative of that call, which is almost identical in the Synoptics, Jesus said to him, 'Follow me,' and he arose and followed Him (Mat 9:9). After the call and the answer there was a feast, probably to celebrate the new departure in the life of the publican, at which Jesus met him and his friends.

Certain critics (cf. Keim, Jesus of Nazara, iii. 268 n. [Note: note.]) take the words καὶ ἐγένετο αὐτοῦ ἀνακειμένου ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ (Mat 9:10) as indicating that the house was that of Jesus; but they can bear this interpretation only if taken in connexion with the preceding words, καὶ ἀναστὰς ἠκολούθησεν αὐτῷ. It is, however, not necessary to establish this connexion, as the writer may simply have made a sudden transition to a paragraph beginning καὶ ἐγένετο. If, on the other hand, the connexion must be made, then it is possible to take the narrative as recording that Matthew rose and followed Jesus to the house which belonged to Jesus. Mk. does not indicate the ownership of the house, while Lk. says distinctly that it was Levi's. If we accept the description of Mk. or Lk., we need not conclude that the feast followed immediately after the call, since it may have taken place just before the assembling of the Twelve (Mar 3:14, Luk 6:13), in the period between that event and the calling of the individual disciples.

At the feast were Jesus and His disciples, and at the table with them were many publicans and sinners. These disciples were also many in number (Mar 2:15), and they must therefore have included others beyond the individuals who had been specially called. The sinners mentioned along with the publicans at the feast were those who violated the Law, or did not try to keep its innumerable commands as set forth by the scribes or interpreted by the Pharisees. Certain scribes and Pharisees had been spectators of the feast, and they asked the disciples concerning Jesus' eating and drinking with sinners; and Jesus Himself, answering them, declared that He had not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. The call of Matthew and the feast with publicans and sinners were the comment of Jesus on Pharisaic separatism; but the action itself did not prevent the separatism which showed itself in the primitive Church, and which involved the rebuke of Peter by Paul.

Beyond the call and the inclusion of the name in the list of the Twelve, there is no mention of Matthew in the NT. On the question of the authorship of the First Gospel, see following article.

Matthew, Gospel According To

MATTHEW, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—'The power of God unto salvation—to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.'—The Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke may be characterized respectively as the Gospel of the Jew and the Gospel of the Greek. St. Luke gives us the conception of the Christ as His Person presented itself to the Greek Churches of the West. To them Christ was the Saviour of the world, the Divine Redeemer, whose Good News was equally available for all the children of men, regardless of distinctions of race, or class, or sex. St. Matthew, on the other hand, presents to us the Christ as He was conceived by the Jewish Christians of Palestine. To them Christ was the King of Israel; and the glad tidings of His coming Kingdom were intended first for the Chosen People. It was true that He had foretold the coming of many from the east and the west to sit down in the Kingdom of God (Mat 8:11), and had bidden His Apostles baptize all nations (Mat 28:19); but then it had always been a part of the Divine plan to suffer aliens to enter as proselytes into the fold of Israel, and to partake of the blessings promised to the Chosen People. So it was to be with the new Israel. In the period of preparation for the Kingdom, the gospel was to be preached to all nations for a testimony (Mat 24:14), and those who entered by baptism into the Christian Church would become members of that new Israel, which in the days of the Kingdom should be judged and governed by the twelve Apostles as viceroys of the King Messiah (Mat 19:28).

Of course the distinction here drawn makes itself felt in two respects. First, in the selection of material by the two writers. Each Evangelist has a certain amount of matter peculiar to himself; and it will be found that whilst in the First Gospel this is very largely matter which lends itself to the Christianity of one who was glad to emphasize the prior claim of the Jew to the blessings of the Kingdom, that in St. Luke is predominantly material capable of a more universalistic interpretation. Secondly, in the treatment of the large amount of material which is common to the two Gospels. A good example is to be found in the discourse on the Last Things. Whilst St. Matthew emphasizes the close connexion between the fall of Jerusalem and the Coming of the Son of Man (Mat 24:29), thus limiting the period during which the gospel could be preached to the Gentiles, St. Luke expands this period to an indefinite length, during which Jerusalem was to be trodden under foot (Luk 21:24), thus making space for a long and protracted preaching to the Gentiles.

In the present article we propose to discuss the chief features in the picture of the Person of Christ drawn for us by the First Evangelist, and to consider the bearing of this upon the questions of the author, the sources, the date, and the historical value of the Gospel.

1. Theology of the Gospel.

(1) The Messiah.—Jesus the Messiah was legally descended from David, and through him from Abraham, the father of the Israelite people (Mat 1:1). He was the culminating point in the history of His family. In David it had risen to monarchical power (Mat 1:6), but at the period of the Captivity it had lost this dignity. But now again in Jesus the anointed King it had regained it (Mat 1:16). He was therefore born 'king of the Jews' (Mat 2:2). As King He entered Jerusalem (Mat 21:5). As King He suffered the death of crucifixion (Mat 27:38; Mat 27:42), and as King He would sit to judge all nations at the Last Day (Mat 25:31 ff.). But He was no mere scion of the Davidic stock. Though legally descended from David through Joseph ben-Jacob, He was also in a unique sense Son of God. As such He was born of the Holy Spirit from a virgin (Mat 1:18-25). Hence He was 'God with us' (Mat 1:23), and this Divine Sonship placed Him in a unique relationship to God. He could speak of God and of Himself as 'the Father' and 'the Son,' as though these terms could only be applied to this relationship (Mat 11:27); and David himself had recognized by the Divine inspiration this Divine Sonship of his promised descendant, when he applied to Him the Divine name 'Lord' (Mat 22:44). The history of the supernatural birth was, of course, an easy mark for Jewish calumny, but nevertheless it was a fact which had been Divinely foreordained (Mat 1:22); and in the history of the Davidic family there had been women of old time (Rahab, Bathsheba, Tamar, Ruth) whose lives should have taught the calumniators of the Virgin that God overrules and uses circumstances for His own Divine ends. Moreover, if in Jesus the prophecies of a Coming Davidic king, supernaturally born, had found at last their fulfilment, so also in Him were summed up all the many strands in the web of Jewish anticipation. He was 'the Beloved' (Mat 3:17, Mat 17:5) whom God had eternally chosen (Mat 3:16, Mat 12:18), and to whom God had eternally given all things (Mat 11:27) and all power (Mat 28:18). He was the supernatural Son of Man, who was to come upon the clouds of heaven (Mat 16:28, Mat 26:64, Mat 24:30), and to sit upon the throne of His glory to judge all men (Mat 16:28, Mat 19:28, Mat 25:31). And the events of His life down to the minutest details had been foretold in the OT. Thus Isaiah had foretold the circumstances (Mat 1:22), and Micah the place, of His birth (Mat 2:5). Hosea had foreseen the flight into Egypt, Jeremiah the massacre of the infants at Bethlehem (Mat 2:17); and the settlement of His parents at the ill-famed village of Nazareth had been the subject of prophecy (Mat 2:23). His herald John had been fore-announced by Isaiah (Mat 3:3), and the same prophet had foreseen the Christ's ministry in Galilee, with Capernaum as His headquarters (Mat 4:14). That He healed the sick was in accordance with a prophecy of Isaiah, and the contrast between His gracious and gentle work and the noisy clamour of His opponents, found anticipation in another passage of the same prophet (Mat 12:17-21). Zechariah had foreseen His entry as King into Jerusalem (Mat 21:5), His betrayal (Mat 26:24), and the desertion of His disciples (Mat 26:31); and the whole course of His tragic end had been Divinely fore-ordained, and foretold in Scripture (Mat 16:23 [τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ] Mat 26:54; Mat 26:56).

Such was the Person of Jesus. He was the Divinely foreordained Messiah, the supernaturally-born King of Israel, the unique Son of God. What then had been His work? It is clear that the editor of the Gospel is much more concerned with Christ's doctrine than with His work, with what He had said than with what He had done. He is interested in the events of the life chiefly in so far as they proved Jesus to be the Messiah of the OT, and with His actions either as proofs of His supernatural power over all the known forces of life, or as illustrative of His attitude towards the orthodox Pharisaism of the day. He could, e.g., heal disease, even leprosy, without use of drugs or medical appliances, by the simple exercise of His will (Mat 8:8 'Speak the word only,' Mat 8:16 'with a word'), the cure being immediate and complete (Mat 8:13, Mat 9:22, Mat 15:28, Mat 17:18). He could control the forces of nature (Mat 8:26-27), and could drive out demons from the unhappy beings of whom they had taken possession (Mat 8:28-34). He exercised upon earth the Divine prerogative of forgiving sin (Mat 9:1-8), and raised the dead to life (Mat 9:25). He could feed multitudes with a few loaves and fishes (Mat 14:13-21, Mat 15:32-39). On the other hand, He associated with people who were regarded by the leaders of religion as ill friends for a devout man (Mat 9:11), and seemed negligent of the rules which the Pharisees had framed as the guides of a pious life. His disciples did not fast (Mat 9:14), and broke Sabbath regulations (Mat 12:2). He Himself performed acts of healing on the Sabbath day (Mat 12:10), and His disciples neglected the regulations about purification of the hands before meals (Mat 15:2). After a ministry marked by acts like these, He had been put to death by the Romans at the instigation of the Pharisees and Sadducees. He had expected this fate, and had foretold it to His disciples as being ordained of God and prophesied in Scripture (Mat 16:21 δεῖ, Mat 16:23 τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, Mat 17:12; Mat 17:22-23, Mat 20:18-19). He had promised that on the third day He should be raised again, and this was fulfilled; and He had ascended into heaven.

Now it is clear that the details thus sketched furnish a very small part of the significance of the Gospel to the editor. The miracles proved Christ's power, or illustrated His attitude towards Pharisaism, or showed Him to be the Messiah of the OT. But to what end was He powerful, and, if the Messiah, where was His Kingdom? We might have expected to find a good deal more emphasis laid on the significance of Christ's death, but such emphasis is strikingly absent. The death is rather regarded as without significance in itself, but as a necessary stage in the revelation of the Messiah. He had come to found a Kingdom, but in accordance with the Divine plan had been put to death. Clearly then the Kingdom remained yet to come, and the death was a necessary prelude to glorification. The insistence on the fact that the death had to take place, because it had been foretold in the Scriptures, suggests the inference that to the editor it was a fact which required explanation, a difficult phase in the history of the Messiah rather than the central fact which itself explained everything else in His life. In two passages only is the death referred to as having any purpose or effect, rather than as being simply a thing which had happened as a necessary transition stage from the earthly life to the heavenly monarchy of the Messiah. In one of these Christ is represented as saying that He came to give His life as a ransom for many (λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, Mat_20:28); in the other He speaks of His blood as shed for many for the remission of sins (Mat_26:28). It is easy to see how sayings like these could be made the foundation of a theology which would explain the whole of Christ's life from the significance of His death. But it is equally clear that the editor of the First Gospel has recorded them because they formed part of the tradition which had come to him, without seeing in them an explanation of the entire earthly life of the Messiah. They are incidental rather than fundamental to his Gospel.

Thus the facts of Christ's life as here recorded would have been meaningless to the editor without the teaching which he records. It is in that that he finds the explanation of Christ's life. The facts alone were obscure and difficult. Jesus was the Davidic Messiah and also the Son of God. He had entered into human history through the Virgin's womb. He had evinced His supernatural power in all that He did. But then He had allowed Himself to be put to death, because, as He said, the Scriptures had foretold it; and rising from the dead, He had gone into heaven again. But how then was He the Messiah, and where was the Kingdom? The main object of the Gospel is to explain this, and the explanation is given in the great discourses which the editor has formed by massing sayings or groups of sayings.

(2) The Kingdom.—The central subject of Christ's doctrine had been the near approach of the 'kingdom of the heavens.' With this He began His ministry (Mat_4:17), and wherever He went He taught this as a good news (Mat_4:23). The Kingdom, He taught, was coming, but not in His lifetime. After His ascension He would come as Son of Man upon the clouds of heaven (Mat_16:27-28, Mat_19:28, Mat_24:30), would send His angels to gather together the elect (Mat_24:31, Mat_13:41), and would sit on the throne of His glory (Mat_16:28, Mat_19:28, Mat 25:31). This would happen in the lifetime of the generation to whom He spoke (Mat 16:28, Mat 24:34, Mat 10:23), immediately after the great tribulation accompanying the destruction of Jerusalem (Mat 24:29); but God alone knew the exact day and hour (Mat 24:30). Then the twelve Apostles should sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Mat 19:28). In the meantime He Himself must suffer and die, and be raised from the dead. How else could He come upon the clouds of heaven? And His disciples were to preach the good news of the coming Kingdom (Mat 10:7, Mat 24:14) among all nations, making disciples by baptism (Mat 28:19). The body of disciples thus gained would naturally form a society bound by common aims (Mat 16:18, Mat 18:17). They would be distinct from the existing Jewish polity, because the Jews as a people, the 'sons of the kingdom,' i.e. those who should have inherited it (Mat 8:12), would definitely reject the good news (Mat 21:32; Mat 21:42-43, Mat 22:7). Hence the disciples of the Kingdom would form a new spiritual Israel (Mat 21:43 'a nation') which would include many who came from east and west (Mat 8:12).

In view of the needs of this new Israel of Christ's disciples, i.e. of the true sons of the Kingdom (Mat 13:38), who were to await His coming on the clouds of heaven, it is natural that a large part of the teaching recorded in the Gospel should concern the qualifications required in those who hoped to enter the Kingdom when it came. They were still to live in allegiance to the revelation of God made in the OT, which was permanently valid. Not a letter was to pass away from it (Mat 5:18). Its permission of divorce still held good (Mat 5:32, Mat 19:3 ff.). Christ had not abolished the Mosaic distinctions between clean and unclean meats (see notes on Mat 15:20). His disciples were still to take two or three witnesses (Mat 18:16); and the Sabbath was still to be held sacred (Mat 24:20). But they were to search beneath the letter of the OT for its spiritual meaning. Their 'righteousness' was to exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, because they were to interpret the Law of Moses in a sense which would make it more far-reaching in its effect upon conduct than ever before (Mat 5:21-48). In particular, their 'righteousness' was to be less a matter of something done that men might see it, and more a right relation to God, taking effect in action known only to God Himself (Mat 6:1-34). In relation to their fellow-men they were to cultivate humility, and to suppress self-assertiveness (Mat 18:1-14); to exercise forgiveness (Mat 18:15; Mat 18:21-35); to be slow to judge their fellows (Mat 7:1-5); to do to others what they would have done to themselves (Mat 7:12). In relation to wealth, they were not to hoard up treasure upon earth, but to trust in God's care for them (Mat 6:19-34, Mat 19:28), seeking first His righteousness and Kingdom. In relation to sexual morality, they were to be chaste in thought (Mat 5:28); marriage was an indissoluble bond, broken only by adultery (Mat 19:9). But some were called to live single lives for the Kingdom of the heavens (Mat 19:12). In relation to God, they were to pray to Him for their daily needs, for His forgiveness, and for deliverance from the evil that is in the world (Mat 6:9-13, Mat 7:7-11).

In the above sketch of the picture drawn for us in the First Gospel of the Person and teaching of the Messiah, we have purposely omitted the parables. Most of the parables in this Gospel are parables of the Kingdom. With the exception of Mat 18:21-35, they do not, as in the case of many of St. Luke's parables, inculcate some Christian virtue or practice, such as love of one's neighbour, or earnestness in prayer, but convey some lesson about the nature of the Kingdom and the period of preparation for it. Their interpretation will often depend largely upon the conception of the Kingdom with which the reader approaches them. We are not now concerned with the meaning which they were intended to convey when they were originally spoken. But it should be sufficiently obvious that if we ask what meaning they had for the editor of the First Gospel, and why he selected them for insertion in his Gospel, the answer must be that he chose them because he believed that they taught lessons about the Kingdom of the heavens in the sense in which that phrase is used everywhere else in his Gospel, of the Kingdom which was to come when the Son of Man came upon the clouds of heaven. Thus the parable of the Sower illustrates the varying reception met with by the good news of the Kingdom as it is preached amongst men. That of the Tares also deals not with the Kingdom itself, but with the period of preparation for it. At the end of the age the Son of Man will come to inaugurate His Kingdom. A phrase here, 'shall gather out of his kingdom,' has been pressed to support the interpretation that the Kingdom is thought of as present now. But it need convey no such meaning. The 'good seed' is interpreted as equivalent to the 'sons of the kingdom,' i.e. according to Jewish usage, not they who already live in or possess the Kingdom, but those who are destined to inherit it when it comes. It is not inaugurated until the 'end of the age.' Then when the 'Son of Man' comes, the 'Kingdom' comes; and the method of its foundation is not a gathering of the elect out of the mass of mankind, but a gathering of the wicked from amongst the elect, a gathering of them out of the Kingdom that the righteous may inherit it and shine forth in it. There is nothing here or elsewhere in this Gospel to suggest that the scene of the Kingdom is other than the present world renewed, restored, and purified (cf. παλιγγενεσία, Mat 19:28).

The parables of the Mustard Seed and of the Leaven describe the way in which the good news of the Kingdom spreads rapidly and penetrates deeply into human society. Those of the Hid Treasure and of the Goodly Pearl emphasize its value, and teach the lesson that a man must give up all else to enter into it. That of the Drag-Net has much the same application as the parable of the Tares. The doctrine of the Kingdom attracts good and bad alike. But at the end of the age, when the Kingdom is inaugurated, there will be a separation.

In Mat 20:1-16 occurs the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard. In its present context this seems to be intended to teach the lesson that in discipleship of the Kingdom priority, whether in date of entrance upon discipleship or of position now, will not carry with it special privilege within the Kingdom when it comes. All shall receive the same reward—eternal life.

Of the other parables in the Gospel, Mat 18:21-35 does not bear directly upon the doctrine of the Kingdom, but emphasizes forgiveness as a qualification in all who wish to enter it. Mat 21:28-32 illustrates the perverse attitude of the Pharisees towards the Baptist's preaching. Mat 21:33-46 and Mat 22:1-10 are historical forecasts of the fate of the Jewish nation. Mat 22:11-14 emphasizes the necessity for all who hope to enter the Kingdom of possessing the necessary qualifications. Mat 25:1-13 and Mat 25:14-30 teach the suddenness of its appearance and the necessity of watching for its coming. Mat 25:31-46 describes the test by which the King when He comes will admit the righteous into His Kingdom.

Of several of these parables it will rightly be felt that, as originally spoken, they had a wider meaning and scope than that here given, and one which is inconsistent with the narrow limits of the Kingdom to be inaugurated immediately after the fall of Jerusalem. That is quite true. But the question is not, What did these parables mean when they were originally spoken? but, What interpretation did the editor put upon them when he incorporated them into his Gospel? He everywhere seems to use the phrase 'kingdom of the heavens' in its eschatological sense. In four or five passages he has, instead, the 'kingdom of God.' In Mat 6:33 τοῦ θεοῦ is probably not genuine (omit $\aleph B g^1$ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] k). As regards Mat 19:24, a passage borrowed from Mk., the fact that Mt. in 13 other places where 'kingdom of God' occurs in Mk., substitutes 'kingdom of the heavens,' or omits or paraphrases the passage, makes it very probable that 'kingdom of the heavens' should be read here also. In Mat 12:28, Mat 21:31; Mat 21:43 the editor has retained 'kingdom of God,' not because he regarded it as equivalent to 'kingdom of the heavens,' but because he felt that in these passages the idea conveyed was different from that which his phrase 'kingdom of the heavens' everywhere carries with it; and he therefore retained 'kingdom of God' to mark the difference.

Thus the conception of Christianity as expressed in this Gospel may be summarized as follows. Jesus was the King-Messiah of the OT. He was also the Son of Man of apocalyptic anticipation. But how could the functions ascribed to these two ideals be combined? Only if the King passed through death that He might come again on the clouds to inaugurate His Kingdom. And to those who could read the OT aright, all this had been foretold. Hence the Crucifixion. When Jerusalem fell, the end of the age would come, and the Son of Man would appear. In the meantime the good news was to be preached, and men were to be gathered into the society of disciples of the Messiah.

2. Date and place of composition.—If the dominant conception of the book has been rightly sketched, very important conclusions can be drawn as to its provenance and date. It must have been written by a Jewish-Christian, probably by a Jewish-Christian of Palestine, and it cannot date from long after the fall of Jerusalem. For it is inconceivable that any one should so arrange the words of Christ as to convey the impression that He had taught that He would return as Son of Man immediately after the fall of Jerusalem, if many years had elapsed since that event. And this conclusion as to the early date and Palestinian origin of the Gospel is supported by other features of the book. It is markedly anti-Pharisaic, and strongly Jewish-Christian in outlook.

(1) Its anti-Pharisaism.—This already underlies the stories of the first two chapters, which are most easily explained as a narrative of facts written to rebut Pharisaic calumnies. Christ was born of a virgin, but He was legally of Davidic descent, and the Virgin Mary's marvellous history already found prototypes by contrast in the history of women connected with the ancestors of the Christ. If He went into Egypt, it was in the days of His infancy, and He brought no magical arts thence. If His parents settled at Nazareth, it was that the tenor of prophecy might be fulfilled.

So far the anti-Pharisaic polemic of the writer has been defensive and implicit. In the third chapter it becomes manifest and open. The sayings of the Baptist are so arranged as to form a sermon of denunciation of the Pharisees and Sadducees. They are a 'brood of vipers,' who pride themselves on their descent from Abraham. But right action based on repentance is the only ground for hope of God's favour. The Messiah is at hand, and will sweep away all such false claims with the fire of judgment. In the Sermon on the Mount the same anti-Pharisaic polemic is found. Their 'righteousness' will not admit them into the Kingdom (Mat 5:20). They are 'hypocrites' whose religious observances are based on desire for personal credit (Mat 6:1-17). In Mat 8:12 they are 'the sons of the kingdom,' but nevertheless they will be cast into the outer darkness. It was the Pharisees who complained that Christ ate with tax-gatherers and sinners (Mat 9:11), and it was they who ascribed His power to cast out demons to Beelzebul (Mat 9:34, Mat 12:24). They accused His disciples (Mat 12:2), and Christ Himself (Mat 12:10), of doing illegal actions on the Sabbath. They plotted to destroy Him (Mat 12:14), and asked a sign from Him (Mat 12:38). They condemned His disciples for eating with unwashed hands (Mat 15:2), and were shocked at His teaching about things clean and unclean (Mat 15:12), being themselves blind guides (Mat 15:14). The disciples were to beware of their teaching (Mat 16:12). In the last days of the Messiah's life the Pharisees took a prominent part in the events that led to His death. They plotted with the chief priests to arrest Him (Mat 21:45). They planned to entrap Him in His speech (Mat 22:15). They tried to entangle Him in argument (Mat 22:34; Mat 22:41). All this leads up to the tremendous indictment of the scribes and Pharisees in ch. 23. In the narrative dealing with the Crucifixion we read naturally rather of the chief priests and elders than of the Pharisees; but it is the latter, with the chief priests, who effect the sealing of the tomb (Mat 27:62 ff.).

(2) The Jewish-Christian element.—Of course the whole conception of the Kingdom of the heavens as sketched above is Jewish-Christian in character. But there are other Jewish-Christian features in the Gospel. (a) One is the interest shown in St. Peter. He was one of the earliest of Christ's disciples (Mat 4:18), and Christ had healed his wife's mother (Mat 8:14). He was in some sense 'first' of the Twelve (Mat 10:2.), and it was he who walked on the waters at Christ's command (Mat 14:28 ff.). It was he who first confessed Christ's Messiahship (Mat 16:16), and received the promise of high rank in the Kingdom (Mat 16:19). By inserting this passage the editor blunts the severity of the rebuke (Mat 16:23), which St. Luke altogether omits. It was Peter who was prominent amongst the three who were privileged to be on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mat 17:4), and it was he to whom the tax-gatherers came as to one who was the representative of the other disciples. It was Peter who acted as the spokesman of the rest (Mat 15:15, Mat 18:21, Mat 26:33; Mat 26:35), or who was addressed as representing the others (Mat 26:40). It was he who penetrated into the palace, and there denied that he knew Christ (Mat 26:58-75). If all the Apostles were to sit on thrones in the new age (Mat 19:28), Peter was to have administrative and legislative power in the Kingdom (Mat 16:19).

(b) Another Jewish-Christian feature in the Gospel is the presence in it of sayings which seem to limit Christ's mission and doctrine to the Jewish nation. In His own lifetime He had expressly asserted this of His own activity. 'I was not sent save to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mat 15:24). On two occasions He had extended His mercy to pagans (Mat 8:5-13, Mat 15:21-28), but on the latter occasion He made it plain that the grace thus extended to a Gentile woman was only as it were a crumb which had dropped from the table of the Jews, to whom He was sent, and had been devoured by a Gentile dog. He bade His disciples 'go not to the way of the Gentiles, nor to the cities of the Samaritans, but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mat 10:6); and said they should not have exhausted the cities of Israel before His coming (Mat 10:23). In the new age the Apostles were to rule over a new Israel (Mat 19:28). Of course, side by side with these sayings from his Palestinian sources, the editor has incorporated others from other sources, which prove that he himself was well aware that Christ had on other occasions foreseen and commanded the admission of Gentiles to the discipleship of the Kingdom. 'Many were to come from east and west' (Mat 8:11), and the three parables in Mat 21:28 to Mat 22:14 seem to convey the same truth. Further, the good news was to be preached among all nations for a testimony (Mat 24:14), and the Apostles were to make disciples of all nations (Mat 28:19). But there is nothing in any of these passages to suggest that the editor anticipated the admission of Gentiles to discipleship save on terms similar to those on which proselytes had been admitted to the old Israel;* [Note: At least the Mosaic Law was to be binding upon them.] and it is clear that he saw no difficulty in the preaching to all nations being accomplished within a generation, for the 'end' (Mat 24:14) which was to close this preaching was the period of great tribulation accompanying the siege of the city, followed immediately by the coming of the Son of Man (Mat 24:30).

(c) A third Jewish-Christian feature is the insistence on the permanent obligations of the Mosaic Law; see above, p. 144^b.

Now all these characteristics of the Gospel point irresistibly to Palestine, and to Palestine in the period before or very soon after the fall of Jerusalem, as the place and date of the composition of the Gospel. The most obvious feature in this connexion is the belief that the coming of the Son of Man would immediately follow the period of tribulation accompanying the siege of the city. But the other features above mentioned point in the same direction. The prominence given to St. Peter is natural enough in traditions which had been collected and preserved in Palestine in the early days of the Church at Jerusalem. The limitation of Christianity to Jews or proselytes, and the insistence on the permanent validity of the Law, reflect the same primitive Christian atmosphere as we breathe in the first few chapters of the Acts, before the pressure of circumstances had compelled the Apostles to recognize that St. Paul must be right, and that under Christianity Jew and Gentile stood on the same plane in the sight of God.

Lastly, the anti-Pharisaic attitude of the editor would be natural in one who knew something of the difficulties of the Jewish-Christian Church in the early days when Pharisaic hatred pursued its members from city to city.

The date thus arrived at affects the whole Gospel and not only portions of it. It is a literary unity, and apart from a few possible later interpolations, e.g. Mat 6:14 (the doxology) Mat 22:43, Mat 23:35 ('son of Barachiah'), belongs to one editor, and to one period of final composition. The attempts made to argue for a late date for the composition of the whole book from isolated phrases, or to mark large sections as late additions, fail to account for the unity of idea and conception that runs through the whole work, and neglect the cumulative evidence of the conceptions that characterize it for an early date.

Mat 1:18-25 has been claimed as late because the idea of virgin-birth is 'quite foreign to Judaism.' As a matter of fact this idea is thoroughly Eastern (as well as Western), and must have been familiar to every Palestinian Jew who had read the Septuagint. And in other respects the narrative is Jewish throughout. The occurrence of the word ἐκκλησία (Mat 16:19, Mat 18:17) and the Baptismal Formula (Mat 28:19) have been said to betray late date. But there is no possible reason why a Jewish Christian writing about the year a.d. 70 should not have used ἐκκλησία to represent whatever Aramaic word was originally uttered; and if the Triune name in Mat 28:19 is not a later gloss, it may well have been used by a Palestinian Christian who was contemporary with St. Paul (cf. 1Co 12:3, 2Co 13:14, and 1Pe 1:2, 1Jn 3:23-24).

3. The Sources.—If, then, we take the year a.d. 70 as an approximate date for the composition of the Gospel, there remain the questions of its sources, its author, and its historical value. The facts about the sources are these:—

(1) The editor has borrowed the greater part of the Second Gospel, and has made it the framework of his narrative. He has altered the order of Mar 1:1 to Mar 7:24 in order to group the material under subject-heads. He has greatly expanded the discourses. He makes omissions and alterations in phrases relating to the Person of Christ, omitting especially expressions which attribute to Him inability, or desire for information, and terms of human emotion; and makes a series of somewhat similar changes in clauses relating to the Apostles. For the details of his editorial revision of the Second Gospel, see art. Mark (Gospel), and the Com. on 'Matthew' in ICC [Note: CC International Critical Commentary.], pp. xiii-xl.

(2) The Gospel contains, besides this Markan material, a good deal of matter, almost entirely sayings, which is found also in substance in the Third Gospel. It is generally supposed that this was borrowed by the two Evangelists from a common source, viz. a collection of Gospel material compiled by the Apostle Matthew, and referred to by Papias (Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica iii. xxxix.).

The present writer has elsewhere attempted to prove that, so far as St. Luke goes, this is not a very probable theory. Besides these sayings which he has in common with St. Luke, the editor of the First Gospel has also a number of sayings found only in his Gospel. The probability is that he borrowed these peculiar sayings, and most of those common to him and to St. Luke, from the Apostolic collection of sayings mentioned by Papias. If so, it is not very likely that St. Luke had also seen this collection. Rather material from it had passed into some of the many sources which he had used (Luk 1:1), and were borrowed by him from them. See 'Matthew,' l.c. pp. xli-lxii. Thus Mt.'s second source was the Matthaean Logia or collection of discourses.

(3) What remains of the Gospel, when we have put aside the matter borrowed from Mk. and the sayings drawn from the Logia, consists of a number of narrative traditions. These deal with Christ's Birth and Infancy (chs. 1, 2), with a few incidents connected with St. Peter (Mat 14:28-31; Mat 17:24-27), and with some details connected with Christ's trial and Resurrection (Mat 27:3-10; Mat 27:19; Mat 27:24-25; Mat 27:51-53; Mat 27:62-66, Mat 28:11-15). They were all drawn, it may be supposed, from current Palestinian Christian tradition.

(4) Lastly, a number of quotations of a peculiar type, which are introduced by a special formula (Mat 1:22-23, Mat 2:5-6; Mat 2:15; Mat 2:17-18; Mat 2:23, Mat 4:14-16, Mat 8:17, Mat 12:17-21, Mat 13:35, Mat 21:4-5, Mat 27:9), were drawn from a catena or list of OT Messianic passages, which had already been translated into Greek when the editor borrowed them.

4. The Author.—Now, who was the writer who thus welded together the Second Gospel, the Matthaean Logia, a number of Palestinian traditions, and a series of OT quotations, into our present Gospel? From the end of the 2nd cent. the work has been ascribed to St. Matthew. But there are the following difficulties in this ascription:

(1) The same writers who attribute our Gospel to St. Matthew state that he wrote it in Hebrew or Aramaic. Now it is clear that our Gospel was composed in Greek, and is based upon Greek sources. This is certain so far as the material drawn from the Second Gospel is concerned, and probable for the sayings drawn from the Matthaean Logia.

(2) It does not seem very probable that the Apostle Matthew should have written a Gospel from second-hand materials. The work lacks that freshness of presentation which we should expect from an eye-witness of many of the events.

How then explain the ascription of the Gospel to him? Because the book, in a sense in which the statement is not true of St. Luke's Gospel, is based directly upon the collection of sayings compiled by the Apostle. We must, therefore, suppose that the author was an otherwise unknown Jewish Christian of Palestine, who about the year a.d. 70 compiled his Gospel, using as his framework the Second Gospel, but borrowing largely from the Matthaean Logia, and inserting also some Palestinian traditions with which he was familiar. The Gospel, as it left his hand, represents the conception of Christ's Person and work which was dominant in the Palestinian Church in the middle of the 1st cent. a.d. To Christians there Jesus was the Jewish King-Messiah. His life on earth was only the prelude to His sovereignty. For He was to come again as Son of Man at the end of the age, and that was imminent, and would follow immediately upon the final downfall of the Jewish polity.

5. Historical value.—So far as the question of the historical value of the detail given in the Gospel is concerned, we may set aside for our present purpose all that is drawn from St. Mark's Gospel. The value of that is a consideration for a writer on the Second Gospel (see above, p. 133 ff., and cf. the Dean of Westminster's Study of the Gospels, and Burkitt's The Gospel History and its Transmission). The sayings drawn from the Matthaean Logia have behind them Apostolic authority, and, allowing for some change of emphasis and possible accretion in the process of transmission, may safely be taken as representing actual utterances of Christ.

The Palestinian traditions peculiar to the Gospel are probably not all of equal weight. The narrative of the supernatural birth is best attested, because the main fact of the story is supported by the tradition known to St. Luke. Of the rest it is difficult to say more than that they are early Palestinian traditions, and we must abstain from condemning them upon purely fanciful grounds as legendary.

But the question of historical value can be raised in a different form, and one of much greater importance. Allowing the substantial accuracy of the bulk of the detail in the Gospel, and without discussing the precise value and importance to be attached to each separate tradition, how far do the main conceptions of Christ and of His doctrine which run through the Gospel correspond to the historical Christ? Did He teach what is here ascribed to Him?

Something may be learned in this connexion if we consider the method of the Evangelist. He presents to us selections from Christ's sayings, arranged in what is clearly often an artificial and literary manner. A good example of this is the Charge to the Twelve. The nucleus of this consists of a few sayings, recorded by St. Mark, addressed to the Twelve when Christ sent them forth on a journey of preaching in Palestine. But the editor of the First Gospel is so little concerned with the actual historical facts that he omits altogether the statements descriptive of their going forth and of their return. The local and temporary mission in Palestine merges itself in his mind in the wider and universal mission to all nations. He draws from his sources many other sayings which had reference to this wider mission work, and adds them to St. Mark's short discourse, regardless of the fact that some of them were not spoken on that particular occasion. Now, selection and artificial grouping of this kind, useful as it is, inevitably involves over-emphasis. Teaching, which would have explained and counter-balanced that which is recorded, is left out, and impressions are given which would be qualified, if the selection given had been larger, or the grouping less artificial. And combined with this feature of arbitrary selection and artificial grouping may be linked the local character of the Gospel, and the early date of its material. For it is clear that the Jewish-Christian disciples in the early Church stood too near to the life of the Christ to be able to form any adequate conception of the true meaning of His person or His work. Jesus had, we may be sure, said many things that were obscure at the moment of utterance, had spoken sometimes in parable, sometimes in symbol, sometimes in paradox. And the first Christians of Jerusalem did, it is clear, what, after all, others since them have often done, i.e. they interpreted the life of Christ in the light of their own historical surroundings, and selected from His teaching those elements which enabled them to adapt their ideas of His meaning to their own lives, without making an absolute breach with all that life had hitherto meant for them. The development of history is, as we now see, the truest interpreter of much that Christ said, and not until Jerusalem fell could His teaching about the future of Christianity become clear.

We shall expect, then, to find in the Gospel an over-emphasis upon certain points arising from artificial grouping of sayings, and from omission of other aspects of Christ's teaching. We shall also not be surprised to find interpretations of His sayings which the later developments of history have proved to be mistaken. Let us apply this to the chief conceptions of the Gospel.

(1) The permanence of the Law.—If we may judge from the general tenor of the NT evidence, Christ laid down no hard and fast rules for dealing with the difficult problem of the obligations of the Mosaic Law. But on special occasions He seems to have given expression to the idea that particular precepts or sanctions belonged to a bygone age, and had lost their validity. St. Mark (who is here supported by St. Luke and St. Paul) represents Him as teaching that the tacit sanction of divorce by Deu 24:1-4 should be set aside as a concession to weakness, and should, from a Christian point of view, be superseded by an ideal view of marriage as a tie which could not be broken. St. Mark again represents Him as implicitly annulling the Mosaic distinctions between clean and unclean meats, on the ground that defilement was moral and internal, not external and ceremonial. And the fact that He taught views of the Law which were not those of orthodox Judaism, is suggested by the statements that the Pharisees attempted to entrap Him into some statement about the Law, or upon subjects with which the Law dealt, which could be used as an accusation against Him (Mar 10:2 [πειράζοντες], Mat 22:35 [πειράζων]). But the history of the early Church proves that it was difficult for the first Jewish disciples to suppose that the Messiah had ever countenanced the view that any part of the OT Scriptures had lost its original hold upon the consciences of men. This is the stand point of the editor of the First Gospel. Christ had taught that not a letter should pass from the Law until all had been fulfilled, and that anyone who relaxed the authority of the least commandment of the Law should be least in the Kingdom of heaven (Mat 5:17-20). And not only was there this general statement of the permanent validity of the Law in general, but special laws had been sanctioned and reaffirmed by Christ as still valid and obligatory. Divorce must be sanctioned when there had been fornication (πορνεία) (Mat 15:32, Mat 19:9). The saying about clean and unclean had reference not to the Mosaic Law, but to the Pharisaic traditions about eating with unwashed hands (Mat 15:20). The Christian disciple who had a case against his brother was to take two or three witnesses, that the Mosaic Law might be satisfied (Mat 18:16). And in the great tribulation Christians were to pray that their flight might not fall on the Sabbath, lest the Law should be broken (Mat 24:20). It is clear that the editor regarded the Mosaic Law as still binding in all its details on Christian men. Now it is probable that we must make allowance here for some over-emphasis due to local and national prejudice which interpreted Christ's sayings in the direction which the history of the Jewish people seemed to warrant, and which took effect in the selection, and arrangement, and interpretation of such of His sayings as lent themselves to the impression which it was desired to produce.

The most obvious instance of this process may be found in Mt.'s treatment of Mar 10:1-12. That narrative is perfectly clear, coherent, and decisive. The Pharisees, who knew well that Christ taught a doctrine about the sanctity of marriage which seemed to set aside the sanction of divorce by the Law (Deu 24:1-4), came to test Him, i.e. to get from Him a direct statement which would enable them to say that He was attacking the Mosaic ordinance. He met their challenge with the expected answer. The permission of divorce by the Law was a concession to human weakness. From an ideal standpoint, the marriage tie was indissoluble. The man or woman* [Note: For divorce by a woman amongst the Jews, cf. Aramaic Papyri discovered at Assuan, p. 12 (London, G. Moring, 1906).] who put away their partner committed adultery. Nothing can be clearer than this, and it is in accordance with the tradition of Christ's teaching, preserved by St. Luke (Luk 16:18) and by St. Paul (1Co 7:10-11). But the editor of the First Gospel has introduced hopeless confusion into the narrative. He represents the Pharisees as asking for an interpretation of Deu 24:1-4. The Jewish theologians were divided upon the point. Some—the school of Shammai—argued that by דבר ערוה some act of unchastity was intended. Cf. Gittin, 90a: 'No one shall divorce his wife unless there be found in her something unchaste' (ערוה דבר). They thus placed the emphasis upon the word ערוה. But others—the school of Hillel—allowed divorce for any idle pretext, emphasizing the word דבר. Accordingly, the Pharisees in Mt. ask, 'Is it lawful to put away a wife for every cause?' Christ answers, as in Mk., that from an ideal standpoint marriage is indissoluble. The Pharisees appeal to Deuteronomy 24. Now clearly Christ should be represented as reaffirming and supporting what He has said by declaring (as in Mk.) that the permission of Deuteronomy 24 was a concession to human weakness, and that a higher principle was to be found in the purpose of God as declared in Gen 1:27. But, instead, He is represented as saying that σοφεια constituted an exception to the ideal principle. Thus He is made to reaffirm the Law of Deuteronomy 24, interpreted in the sense of the school of Shammai, and to acknowledge the permanent obligation of a sanction which He had just criticised.

It seems clear that the editor of Mt. has confused Mk.'s consistent narrative by introducing into it a clause which entirely confuses the point at issue. Now, if we ask why he has done this, we remember that earlier in his Gospel (Mat 5:32) he has inserted a saying (probably from the Matthaean Logia) in which this same exception to the general rule occurs. The words are not identical. In Mat 5:32 they are παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, but in Mat 19:9 (εἰ) μὴ ἐπὶ πορνεία (but BDS² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] 33 latt have παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας here also). The two clauses look like alternative renderings of the phrase ערוה דבר, which the school of Shammai declared to be the ground of divorce. That is to say, in Mat 19:9 the editor has blended with Mk.'s narrative another tradition of the Lord's words, which was furnished to him by his Palestinian source; and we have a clear case of a saying of Christ altered in process of transmission to bring it into accordance with the Mosaic Law. Of course the saying of Mat 5:32 may be as genuine and original as Mar 10:11-12. It is quite possible that Christ should have on one occasion taught as Mk. represents Him, and on another have sanctioned the necessity of divorce for πορνεία. But there is a good deal of probability in the supposition that, as a matter of fact, He appealed to the ideal view of marriage as a principle which should guide men, leaving it to the common sense of His disciples to realize that when the sin of men makes a breach in the ideal law, such sin drags with it the necessity of divorce. In this case the clause which allows an exception will be an accretion to His words, added in the early Palestinian Church to His simple statement that no man must divorce his wife and no woman her husband, in order to harmonize it with the supposed teaching of the OT, and then transferred by Mt. into Mk.'s narrative.

Another somewhat similar case may be found in Mar 7:14-23 = Mat 15:10-20. The reading and interpretation of Mar 7:19 are obscure. According to one reading, καθαρίζων πάντα τὰ βρώματα may be a comment of the Evangelist, to the effect that Christ's teaching on this occasion 'purged all meats,' i.e. cancelled the Mosaic distinctions between clean and unclean meats. But however this may be, the narrative leaves on the mind of the reader the impression that the inevitable effect of such teaching as is here recorded would be to make null these distinctions of the Mosaic Law. Now the editor of Mt. clearly wished to avoid this inference. He omits the clause καθαρίζων πάντα τὰ βρώματα, and at the end of the discourse turns the mind of the reader from the inevitable inference by adding the clause, 'But to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man,' as though the whole discourse had been dealing with the Pharisaic regulations about ceremonial hand-washing. Thus he carries the reader back at once to the previous question, and, so far as possible, prevents him from drawing the natural and inevitable conclusion from the discourse as recorded by Mk.

A somewhat similar desire to avoid words which might seem out of harmony with OT regulations has probably caused the omission in Mat 12:8 of the clause, 'The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath,' found in Mar 2:27.

Lastly, an example of over-emphasis due to arrangement of sayings may be found in Mat 5:17-20. It is quite probable that Mat 5:18-19 are genuine sayings of Christ spoken on some occasion when their meaning could not be mistaken, as a paradoxical expression of the permanent value of the moral elements in the OT. But as they now stand they hopelessly confuse the plain tenor of the Sermon. The illustrations given in Mat 5:21-43 make it clear that the 'fulfilling' of Mat 5:17 meant to make clear the true spiritual meaning of the Law. But Mat 5:18-19 interpret πληρῶσαι in another sense; namely, to reaffirm and carry out in detail, which is indeed in harmony with the teaching of Rabbinical Judaism, but is inconsistent with the plain meaning of the rest of the chapter. If Mat 5:18-19 be omitted as extraneous to this context, and due to the practice of the editor of bringing together sayings which in any way bear upon the same subject, the meaning of Mat 5:17; Mat 5:20-43 is quite clear. Christ did not, as His adversaries argued, subvert the Law. He reaffirmed its spiritual principles, and gave to it a deeper meaning than that arrived at by Rabbinical exegesis. The 'righteousness' of His disciples was to exceed that of the Pharisees, because it would be based upon a more spiritual understanding of the principles underlying the OT revelation.

(2) The near approach of the Kingdom.—A still more difficult problem is raised by the question, Did Jesus Christ promise that He would come again on the clouds of heaven within the lifetime of the generation to which He spoke? The Palestinian Church, as represented by the First Gospel, certainly believed that this was the case. But did they misunderstand Him? And the question may be raised in an earlier form. Nearly all the terms used in sayings of this nature were familiar technical theological terms in use in the apocalyptic writings, which expressed one side of contemporary Messianic expectation. e.g. 'the Son of Man,' 'the clouds of heaven,' the 'coming' of the Son of Man, 'the throne of glory,' 'the coming age,' 'the day of judgment,' the division between righteous and wicked, the condemnation to Gehenna, the inheritance of the Kingdom by the righteous, the feast in the Kingdom, and 'eternal life'—all these formed part of the ordinary mental equipment of every writer who tried to express the hopes of Israel under apocalyptic imagery. Did the Lord use them of Himself, or did the Palestinian Church try to express her faith and belief in Him as the Divine Messiah by transferring to Him the phrases and the imagery of current Messianic belief? Attempts have been made to show that the second supposition is the more probable,* [Note: E.g. it has been argued on linguistic grounds that Christ could not have spoken of Himself as the 'Son of Man,' and that much of the apocalyptic imagery in Mark 13, Matthew 24, is due to the blending of a Jewish Apocalypse with genuine sayings of Christ. But the former theory is still unproven, and the second is an unsuccessful exegetical device to solve a difficulty.] but, so far as the present writer can judge, they have failed in their aim. For it is impossible to disentangle all apocalyptic imagery from Christ's teaching, without entirely destroying the credit of the Gospels as historical records. This kind of imagery and metaphor is, of course, more accumulated in the First Gospel than in the others, and one or two phrases, as, e.g., the 'end' or 'consummation of the age,' and 'the throne of glory,' occur only in it, but still all the Gospels contain a good deal. If Christ did not speak of Himself as the 'Son of Man' and of His 'coming' at the Last Day, and of other similar things, then we have no solid ground for believing that any saying recorded of Him is genuine.

But if we assume that Christ did use of Himself this apocalyptic language, what shall we say of the more important question, Are, then, the conceptions which His sayings, as they are arranged in the First Gospel, seem to convey, to be taken as a part of the real teaching? And here we shall necessarily have to take into consideration the following facts amongst others.

(a) It seems clear that Christ must have given utterance to words which left upon the minds of the early disciples the impression that He had promised to come again shortly. For this conception not only pervades the Synoptic Gospels, but is found in almost every part of the NT literature.

(b) It was, however, inevitable that any expressions of time to which He gave utterance should have been interpreted by His Jewish adherents to imply a short time literally. For if we grant for a moment, for the sake of argument, that He had foreknowledge of the future development of history, it is clear to us now that it would have been inconsistent with His methods of teaching to have unveiled to His disciples the historical details of future ages. On the other hand, He may well have wished that His return should be, as it has been, the soul's pole-star of His lovers in every successive age, and have left the period of His Coming veiled in ambiguous language. In that case the early Jewish Church has been influenced by the contemporary Messianic belief which always placed the coming of the Messiah in the near future, and has selected from Christ's sayings those which were most easily interpreted to convey the impression of the nearness of the Kingdom.

This will partly explain the large part which sayings referring to the near approach of the Kingdom play in the First Gospel. Some of these occur only in this Gospel, as, e.g., Mat 10:23; Mat 13:24-30; Mat 13:36-43; Mat 13:47-50; Mat 19:28 a, Mat 25:1-13; Mat 25:31-46. In other cases a saying, the original form of which was found in the Second Gospel, has been modified so as to make it express clearly this idea. For example, in Mar 9:1 occur the words 'until they see the kingdom of God come with power.' Although a reference to the immediately preceding verse would naturally suggest that this coming of the 'kingdom of God' was identical with the coming of the Son of Man with His angels, the words taken by themselves might be interpreted by the reader to refer to the Transfiguration which follows, or to some later event, such as the Day of Pentecost, or the Fall of Jerusalem. The editor of the First Gospel has been unwilling to leave them in this ambiguity, and by changing them into 'the Son of Man coming in His kingdom,' interprets them unmistakably of the coming in glory with the angels (Mat_16:27), which he then believed to be about to take place during the lifetime of some to whom the words were originally spoken. Again, in Mar_14:62 occur the words 'you shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the power, and coming with the clouds of heaven.' The editor of the First Gospel (Mat_26:64) inserts before 'you shall see' the words ἀπ' ἄρτι. This phrase is difficult, because the words should mean 'from this present moment' (cf. 'Matthew,' l.c.). But since the period between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection must on any interpretation be excluded, it is probable that the words mean 'you shall soon, shortly, see,' etc. That is again an expression of the belief of the editor that the Second Coming was near at hand. A similar case is found in Mat_24:29, where the editor inserts into Mk.'s discourse the word 'immediately,' thus again linking the Second Coming closely with the Fall of Jerusalem.

These facts suggest irresistibly the conclusion that the editor or the tradition which he follows has, by accumulating sayings of one kind, and by modifying others to some slight extent in order to give them the required meaning, given the impression that the Lord taught a nearness of His coming to inaugurate the Kingdom, which goes beyond what He Himself originally intended. He spoke, no doubt, of the coming of the Son of Man in glory, using apocalyptic language, which He may or may not have intended to be taken literally. The early Jewish Church has interpreted it quite literally, and read into it that element of immediacy which is presupposed in all apocalyptic writings. He forecast, no doubt, the catastrophe to which the shortsighted policy of the Jewish authorities was hurrying that ill-starred people. The early Church linked together these two classes of utterance, and believed that both would receive their fulfilment at the same period.

If, then, we must allow for some over-emphasis, some foreshortening in the presentation of this conception in the First Gospel, we shall naturally ask if there is not evidence that Christ's teaching anticipated, in fact, a longer development of history than that here presupposed. Even within the First Gospel itself many of His sayings suggest a different interpretation from that put upon them by the editor (e.g. the parables of the Mustard Seed, the Drag-net, and see below). And when we pass to the writers who have emancipated themselves from Jewish theological conceptions, we see that Christ's words were regarded as presupposing a longer development of historical events than that suggested by the First Gospel. This, of course, is true of the later Epistles of St. Paul, of the Fourth Gospel, and of St. Luke. And the verdict of the historian must be that the Jewish-Christian interpretation of Christ's words upon this point is not likely to be most accurate, because it is Jewish and because it is early. Rather these two factors would, in the nature of things, concur to impel the first Jewish Christians to an interpretation of His sayings which is one-sided, and in part overemphasized, just because it is local and early. The best interpreter of much that Christ taught has been the later development of history.

(3) The scope of the Gospel.—It is known that the later Jewish theologians had no strictly formulated views of the relation of the Gentiles to the future Messianic salvation. In some few passages of their writings, especially in the Sibylline Oracles, it would seem as though they looked forward to the admittance of Gentiles into the Kingdom on equal terms with the Jews, simply on the ground of obedience to God (cf. Sib. Or iii. 740). But the prevailing tendency was very different. When the Kingdom came, the Gentiles would be annihilated; or they would be condemned to everlasting punishment in Gehenna; or they would, if they were righteous, participate in the Messianic salvation, but only as proselytes, or as subjects of the Jewish people.

To the early Jewish Christians, who had been trained in such conceptions as these, it was inevitable that Christ's teaching, if it were universal in ultimate scope and intention, implicitly rather than explicitly should seem to point to a national rather than a universal Kingdom. That this was the belief of the first disciples at Jerusalem, the first half of the Acts bears witness. Only the pressure of circumstances could force the Apostles to go back to Christ's words, and to see that they bore within them the seeds of a belief in a universal, spiritual monarchy, which was quite unlimited in scope. It needed a vision to convince St. Peter of this, and Galatians 3 shows how difficult the lesson was for him. In this respect the First Gospel has a twofold outlook. Underlying the surface there may clearly be seen, in the words of Christ which are recorded, expressions which would naturally convey the implication that Christianity was intended to influence all mankind. The gospel was to be preached to all nations (Mat 24:14). The disciples were to make disciples of all nations (Mat 28:19). Many were to come from east and west, and sit down within the Kingdom (Mat 8:11). The Kingdom was to be given to another nation, and to be taken from the Jews (Mat 21:43). But these sayings have all the appearance of words which were interpreted in a limited sense by the editor of the Gospel. If the Kingdom was to come immediately after the fall of Jerusalem, then the preaching to the Gentiles could be but a superficial process. It was to be 'for a testimony.' Moreover, there is nothing in the Gospel to suggest an unconditioned equality of Jew and Gentile. The supposition is rather probable that the editor assumed that such Gentiles as became Christians would do so as proselytes of the Jewish-Christian Church. They were to be 'made disciples,' that is to say, to be merged in the Jewish-Christian Church. If they had not the fitting wedding garment, they would be excluded from the Kingdom; and the garment probably symbolizes, in the editor's mind, the 'righteousness' which was to be greater than that of the Pharisees, only as being based upon a deeper insight into the spiritual intention of the Mosaic Law, which by no means permitted any relaxation of its obligations.

Here again we must, as it would seem, make some allowance for over-emphasis, due partly to artificial arrangement of Christ's sayings, partly to a limited insight into their true scope and meaning, which was due to past religious training. Some lapse of time, some clearing of spiritual vision by the actual facts of life when Christianity came into contact with pagan peoples, was needed before it could be realized that if Christianity was intended for the Jew first and also for the Greek, it nevertheless was to include them both in a position of absolute equality, and to appeal to men without respect to differences of race or creed. ☞ Meals

MEALS.—The prevalent custom amongst the Jews in the time of Jesus was to have two formal meals in the day. Both these are referred to more than once in the Gospels by the terms ἄριστον and δεῖπνον (cf. Luk 14:12, where both words occur in the same context), and we know from these writings that it was to either of these meals that guests were invited to partake of the festive hospitality of their friends (cf. Luk 14:12, Luk 11:37, Luk 14:16 f.). Besides these, it was customary to have an informal meal at an early hour of the day (ἀκράτισμα or ἄριστον πρωϊνόν), which was a very light repast, consisting of a piece of bread, or bread with some accompanying relish, such as oil or melted butter (Robinson, BRP [Note: RP Biblical Researches in Palestine.] 2 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] ii. 18). This meal is only once referred to in the NT (Joh 21:12; Joh 21:15), and there the word used is the same as that which occurs in the Lukan narrative of Jesus ‘dining’ (ἄριστᾶν) in the Pharisee’s house (Luk 11:37 f.).

It is probably this meal which ‘the virtuous woman’ of Proverbs rises so early to provide (Pro 29:23 [LXX Septuagint] = 31:15 [Heb.]), and which at the present time constitutes the breakfast of the populace in Palestine. It is, moreover, probable that it is this meal which is called in the Talmud the ‘early snack’ (שְׁתֵּי פֶתַח), though Edersheim refers this descriptive title to the ἄριστον of the NT (see his Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 205 n. [Note: note.] 3; cf. also Plummer, ‘St. Luke,’ in Internat. Crit. Com. on Luk 11:37).

The mid-day meal, corresponding somewhat to the modern luncheon, was partaken of at hours varying, according to rank and occupation, from 10 a.m. till noon (Shabbath, 10a). It was partaken of immediately after the business of the forenoon was concluded, whether in the market-place (Mar 7:4), in the synagogue (Edersheim, vol. ii. p. 205; cf. 1Ki 13:7), or during the heat of the middle of the day, when the labourers were compelled to desist from their field work (cf. Rth 2:14). Josephus informs us that the Jews were required by their Law to make their breakfast (ἀριστοποιεῖσθαι) at noon on Sabbath days (Vita, 54, cf. also Gen 43:16; Gen 43:25 and 2Sa 24:15, where the LXX Septuagint has ἕως ὥρας ἀριστου, which is rendered by Pesh. ‘till the sixth hour’). This, too, was generally a meal of a simple character, consisting of bread with parched corn, the former being moistened with a little vinegar (Rth 2:14), or of bread broken down into a bowl of pottage, together with some weak or diluted wine (στάμνον οίνου κεκερασμένου, Bel 33 [LXX Septuagint , Swete's ed.]). Fish grilled by laying it upon the hot charcoal (άνθρακιά) was also a common article of food accompanying the bread (see Joh 21:9).

The principal meal of the whole day was the δεῖπνον, which was eaten after the day's work was finished (see Luk 17:7). This would naturally be about the time of the going down of the sun, which will explain the Lukan narrative of Jesus and the two disciples at Emmaus (πρὸς ἑσπέραν, Luk 24:29 f.). This was the time of the day when Jesus is recorded by the three Synoptists to have miraculously fed the multitudes (ὥρα πολλή, Mar 6:35; ὀψίας δὲ γενομένης ... καὶ ἡ ὥρα ἤδη παρηλθεν, Mat 14:15; ἡ δὲ ἡμέρα ἤρξατο κλίνειν, Luk 9:12). The Passover was also eaten during the evening, and it was at the conclusion of that festal meal (μετὰ τὸ δειπνήσαι) that Jesus instituted the Feast memorial of His death.

We find numerous references to the δεῖπνον in the writings of Josephus, from whom we learn incidentally that this was usually an elaborate meal and closely connected with sacrificial feasting; that sometimes it was prolonged to a late hour, which may explain the Preacher's reference to the dangerous habit of over-eating before retiring to sleep (Ecc 5:11, cf. Tob 8:1; Josephus Vita, 44, 63, Ant. vi. iv. 1, xiv. xv. 11, etc.; 3Ma 5:14).

The principal constituent of every meal was bread, which was regarded, indeed, as the meal itself. So much so was this the case, that the word 'bread' (ἄρτος) was used by the ancient Hebrews either for bread in particular or for food in general (see Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Bread,' vol. i. col. 604). It was over the bread that the blessing was pronounced which was thus supposed to have been spoken over all the rest of the solid food eaten during the first part of the meal. So strongly was this held by all Jews, that for them bread assumed a quasi-sacred character, and elaborate rules were devised for its treatment at table (see Edersheim, op. cit. vol. ii. pp. 205-210).

The Hebraistic φαγεῖν ἄρτον occurs again and again as a synonym for an ordinary meal (Mat 15:2, Mar 7:2, Luk 14:1; Luk 14:15, cf. Joh 21:13, Gen 43:16 [LXX Septuagint], Exo 3:20 [LXX Septuagint], etc., see art. Bread above and in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible , vol. i. p. 315^b). Keeping this fact in mind, we are enabled to feel the force of Jesus' words in His great sacramental discourse (Joh 6:26-59), and also to understand the true reason for the rejection by the Jews of His reiterated claims. It was not that their interpretation of His words was carnal (cf. Joh 6:52-58).

‘There was no gross misunderstanding on their part, but a clear perception of the claim involved in the Lord’s words’ (Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.). The phrases in which He couched these claims were such as would present no real difficulty to a thinking Jew, as they might easily be paralleled out of his sacred literature (ὁ ἄρτος τῆς ζωῆς, ὁ ἄρτος τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ ἄρτον ὁ ζῶν, ὁ ἄρτος ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ καταβάς). Bread, which is the representative and symbol of all earthly food, is the type of Him who is the Representative Man, imparting life to all who will partake of His Spirit.

On three different occasions we are told that Jesus was the invited guest of a Pharisee; and, so far as the circumstances in each instance testify, it was at one of their ordinary meals that He was present. It is remarkable that it is St. Luke who records all these occurrences, and at the same time it is noteworthy that he uses three different expressions in his wording of the formal invitations (ἵνα φάγη μετ’ αὐτοῦ, Luk 7:36; ὅπως ἀριστήσῃ παρ’ αὐτῶ, Luk 11:37; σαββάτῳ φαγεῖν ἄρτον, Luk 14:1). Not only are the invitations couched in varying phrases, but St. Luke uses different words when referring to the attitude of the guests at the meals (κατεκλιθη, Luk 7:36; ἀνέπεσεν, Luk 11:37; συνανακειμένων, Luk 14:15). There is every probability that in each case it was the mid-day meal to which Jesus was invited. It became customary amongst the Jews to make three elaborate meals on the Sabbath day (‘Observa diem Sabbati; non Judaicis deliciis,’ quoted by Plummer, op. cit. p. 354). So much so, indeed, was this the case, that specially devised rules were made for carrying out the observance of the Sabbath feasts, and special spiritual benefits were supposed to be conferred on those who, overcoming the difficulties interposed by poverty, supplied themselves with the choicest procurable food for that day (see Peah, viii. 7, and the examples quoted from Shabbath by Lightfoot in his Hor. Heb. et Talm. [Note: Talmud.] on Luk 14:1; cf. Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 52, 437; Farrar, Life of Christ, ii. 119 n. [Note: note.] 2). It was on the occasion of one of these Sabbath meals that a fellow-guest of Jesus, on hearing Him speak, answered with the exclamation, ‘Blessed is he that shall eat bread (φάγεται ἄρτον) in the kingdom of God’ (Luk 14:15), referring, of course, to the popular Jewish idea that the Messianic Kingdom was to be ushered in by a banquet, and that feasting was to be the chief occupation of those who shared its glories (cf. Isa 25:6),—an idea which finds a place in the illustrative teaching of Jesus on the universal character of the future Kingdom of God (cf. ἀνακληθήσονται ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ, Luk 13:29; see Wendt, Lehre Jesu, English translation vol. i. pp. 217, 221).

At first sight it may seem strange that Jesus should countenance the Jewish custom of Sabbath banqueting, which was carried to such excess that its character for luxury became proverbial. At the same time we must remember that the principle which lay at the root of this method of feasting was the honour of the Sabbath day (cf. three quotations from Shabbath illustrative of this in Lightfoot, op. cit. iii. 149). Nor was this practice out of harmony with Jesus' views and teaching on the Sabbath rest, so long as it was conducted in a spirit of humility, mutual toleration, and charity (cf. Luk 14:7-14). It is of interest, and in this respect not without significance, to notice that, on the last Sabbath spent by Jesus before His Passion, He was the chief guest at a festive meal (ἐποίησαν οὖν αὐτῷ δεῖπνον ἐκεῖ, Joh 12:2). This was probably on the evening of the Sabbath day as it was drawing to a close and passing away, when festivities were of the most liberal and elaborate character (epulæ lautiores); and it is evident from the three narratives (St. Luke's story of the anointing of Jesus by the 'woman who was a sinner' [7:37] can scarcely be a record of the same event [see, however, Hengstenberg, Com. on St. John, English translation pp. 1-33, etc.]) that it made a deep impression on the minds of Jesus' followers (cf. Mar 14:3, Mat 26:6 f., Joh 12:2). From the way in which St. John dispenses with the use of the nominative before the verb, it would seem that this meal was of a semi-public character, designed to do honour to Jesus, and that the house of 'Simon the leper' was made the meeting-place for all who wished to meet Him (cf. Westcott, ad loc., and Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 357 f.). It is impossible not to be struck with the way in which Jesus makes use of the opportunity afforded by His presence at these meals on the Sabbath, to inculcate lessons of large-hearted charity even when His host is inclined to be the discourteous critic (Luk 7:39; Luk 11:38; Luk 11:45 ff., Luk 14:1 ff. cf. Joh 12:7 f.). There is no appearance of disapproval in His attitude to wards what was tending to, if it had not already become, an abuse, because there were latent possibilities for good in the joyous and festive Sabbath. It was to these possibilities that He directed His attention.

Acting on these principles, we can understand His words and deeds on the evening when He instituted 'the Lord's Supper' (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, 1Co 11:20). As we have seen, the Jewish custom was to constitute the bread the representative food at their meals. In the same way wine was considered the representative drink. Many and elaborate rules were formulated as to the manner in which blessings were to be said over these, and the discussions arising out of the etiquette to be observed degenerated into meaningless verbalism (see Berakhoth, 35a, 36a, 41b, referred to by Edersheim, ii. 206). In spite of this spiritual decadence and barren ritualism, Jesus did what was characteristic of His general teaching. He rescued the primitive act from its debased surroundings, and the wine blessed (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας) became the means of a participating of 'the blood of Christ' (κοινωνία τοῦ αἵματος), and the loaf blessed and broken (τὸν ἄρτον ὃν κλῶμεν, ἄρτον εὐλογήσας) became the joyful (εὐχαιροιστήσας) communion of ‘the body of Christ’ (cf. 1Co 10:16 f., 1Co 11:23-27, Luk 22:19 f., Mar 14:22 f., Mat 26:26 f.). In a spirit somewhat similar He dealt with the elaborate ceremonial washings which His Jewish contemporaries sought to elevate to the rank of a compulsory religious rite (Mat 15:2 = Mar 7:2 ff., Luk 11:38; for a description of this Jewish practice during meals, see Edersheim, ii. 207). Not the least remarkable of the lessons, objective and spiritual, inculcated by Jesus was that in which He transformed what had become a tedious and worse than meaningless series of forms into a beautiful example of social service and personal humility (see Joh 13:4 ff., cf. Luk 22:27). By this single act He gathered up into one the various customs of His day, including the hospitable one of the guests’ feet being washed by their host’s servants before they sat down to eat, and taught His disciples the dignity of labour in the service of humanity (cf. Mat 18:1-14, see Westcott on Mat 13:4, and Plummer, ‘St. John’ in Camb. Gr. Test. ad loc.). Nor must we omit to note here that the Church’s Eucharistic meal constitutes the most emphatic object-lesson of the essential oneness of all Christian people in a brotherhood as extensive as her own borders, as intensive and real as any of the claims of Jesus to rule within the sphere of human thought (cf. πάντες δὲ ὑμεῖς ἀδελφοί ἐστε Mat 23:8; and Phm 1:16).

Several different words are employed by the Evangelists to denote the bodily attitude of the Jews at their meals, all of which, however, imply that the custom was to recline with the body stretched out (cf. Edersheim, ii. 207). In this respect it is interesting to note the differences in usage, and the preferences for one or more of these words which characterize each of the writers. St. Luke, for example, uses a word no fewer than 5 times which occurs nowhere else in the NT (κατακλιθῆναι, Luk 7:36; Luk 14:8; Luk 24:30; κατακλίνειν, Luk 9:14-15). Hobart states that in his use of the active voice St. Luke is employing ‘the medical term for laying patients, or causing them to lie in bed, placing them in certain positions during operations—making them recline in a bath, etc.’ (The Medical Language of St. Luke, p. 69; cf. however, Luk 2:7; Luk 12:37). As might be expected, this Evangelist exhibits a richer and more flexible vocabulary than the others. On the only occasion of his using the verb κατακεῖσθαι (Luk 5:29 [D [Note: Deuteronomist.] ἄνακ εἰμένων]) for sitting at meals, he seems to employ it because he has already, in the immediately preceding context, made use of the same word to express a different idea (cf. Luk 5:25). The same might, of course, be said of St. Mark, who has this word in the same two senses in the parallel narrative. It is not probable, however, that St. Luke sacrificed his customary literary independence by a verbal copying of St. Mark, who, moreover, uses the same word for Jesus’ reclining at Supper in Bethany (Mar 14:3).

Of the 5 different words employed by the four Evangelists when speaking of sitting down to meals, St. Luke uses all (ἀνακλινειν twice, ἀναπιπτειν 4 times, ἀνακεισθαι with its compound συν- 5 times, κατακεισθαι once, κατακλινειν 5 times); St. Matthew uses three (ἀνακλινειν twice, ἀναπιπτειν once, ἀνακεισθαι and its compound συν- 7 times); St. Mark uses four (ἀνακλινειν once, ἀναπιπτειν twice, ἀνακεισθαι and its compound συν- 5 times, κατακεισθαι twice); St. John is characteristically limited in his use, and employs only two of these words (ἀναπιπτειν 5 times, ἀνακεισθαι 4 times without any employment of its compound).

In the narrative of the conversion and call of Levi (Matthew), which is common to the three Synoptists, St. Luke is the only one who expressly states that Jesus was the guest of the new disciple (Luk_5:29), the latter having made a feast in honour of his recently discovered Master. St. Matthew uses the vague expression ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ (Mat_9:10), which may mean 'inside' as contrasted with 'outside' (ἐπὶ τὸ τελώνιον, Mat_9:9), where lay the scene of Levi's call (cf. Plummer, ad loc.). St. Mark, on the other hand, seems to have understood that Jesus was the host and not the guest (cf. κατακεισθαι αὐτὸν ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ αὐτοῦ, Mar_2:15, where his use of the same pronoun in the same sentence would point to this interpretation; see also συνανέκειντο τῷ Ἰησοῦ, Mar_2:15; τῶν συνανακειμένων σοι, Luk_14:10; τοῖς συνανακειμένοις [sc. τῷ Ἡρώδῃ], Mar_6:22). On the other hand, it does not seem at all certain that either of these two writers connected the conversion of Levi with the entertainment (cf. καὶ ἐγένετο, Mat_9:10; καὶ γίνεται, Mar_2:15, which marks the commencement of a fresh narrative). It is improbable that St. Luke acted merely the part of interpreter by introducing his categorical assertion as a gloss (καὶ ἐποίησεν δοχὴν μεγάλην Λευεὶς αὐτῷ κ.τ.λ., Luk_5:29), thus doing away with a previous ambiguity. It is more likely that he had sufficient oral, if not documentary, authority to justify his statement (the word δοχὴ is peculiar to St. Luke, and is used by him only once afterwards as a general equivalent for ἄριστον ἢ δεῖπνον, Luk_14:12 f.); and we have St. Mark's authority for connecting the conversion of Simon and Andrew with hospitality to their newly-found Master and His other disciples (Mar_1:16 ff., Mar_1:29 ff.). Whether, however, this partaking by Jesus of a Sabbath-meal in the house of Simon Peter was secondary to the purpose of healing the fever-stricken πενθερὰ τοῦ Σίμωνος, would be difficult to determine. Nor must we forget the possibility that St. Luke's authority for the statement that Jesus was the guest of His latest convert Levi may have been influenced by the parallel case we are here noticing—the conversion of the brothers Simon and Andrew and the subsequent entertainment in their own house of the newly discovered Messiah (cf. Joh_1:41).

⚡ Mediator

MEDIATOR

Introductory.—The title ‘Mediator’ is applied to our Lord in the NT only by St. Paul (1Ti_2:5) and the author of Hebrews (Heb_8:6; Heb_9:15; Heb_12:24). In Gal_3:19-20 St. Paul’s argument implies that there is an important sense in which Christ cannot be fitly called a mediator. Here Moses is described by this title, and the mediator (generic) is sharply distinguished from God. Moses was a person coming between two contracting parties, God and Israel, with the consequence that the law administered by Moses is apparently in opposition to the promises of God which depend upon God only. Obviously Christ is not such a mediator as Moses. He does not come between two contracting parties, for He Himself is the representative human receiver of God’s promise, and the Divine Son through whom we receive that promise. He includes both parties in His own Person, instead of coming between them. He is not the instrument of a contract, but the embodiment of a Divine gift. This passage implies that Christ united God and man, two parties previously at variance, in a wholly unique manner. And the same truth is asserted in the verse which calls Him ‘the one mediator between God and men' (1Ti 2:5). In what sense St. Paul calls Christ a mediator will be shown more fully in § 3.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.—Although these do not employ the title 'mediator,' they throughout imply that the teaching, life, and death of Jesus were mediatorial. The familiar old division of His mediatorial functions into those of Prophet, Priest, and King is roughly correct, though it may be better to designate them as those of Prophet, King, and Redeemer. By such a division we are able to find a more natural place for those passages in the Synoptic Gospels which speak of His atoning work, than if we use the word 'Priest.' We are also able to do more justice to the truth that He revealed Himself as already the Messiah during 'the days of his flesh,' and did not teach that His Messianic Kingdom was only an affair of the future.

(a) The 'wisdom' of our Lord impressed His hearers at Nazareth, and when they were offended at the difference which they noted between Him and His humble family, Jesus said, 'A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house' (Mat 13:54-58). Here He seems in some way to claim the office of a prophet. And there are several passages which show that the ordinary people inclined to regard Him as a Prophet. See, fully, under art. Prophet.

(b) He is also King. He claimed to fulfil the Jewish expectation of an ideal King, the Messiah. This cannot be reasonably disputed, in spite of the fact that this claim did not represent all that He was and all that He demanded. The confession of His Messiahship by St. Peter, the dispute between His disciples for places of honour, and especially the desire of the sons of Zebedee to sit on His right hand and His left, cannot be thrown aside as legendary inventions. Nor can we fail to see the Messianic meaning of His triumphal entry into Jerusalem, His trial and answer to the high priest (Mar 14:62), and the inscription 'The King of the Jews' upon the cross. Apart from His Messianic claim, His life and His death become unintelligible, although He used the actual title very seldom, and rather avoided it on account of the political associations which clung to it. See, further, artt. King and Kingdom of God.

(c) Jesus, who is Mediator in revealing God, is also Mediator in redeeming man. He offered to the Father a sacrifice of perfect human obedience which effected a new relation between God and mankind. It was a reparation to God for the disobedience of man.

In dealing with the redemptive work of Christ, we have to consider as of primary importance the place occupied by His death in the theology as well as in the history of the Synoptics. It is frequently asserted or hinted that He did not foresee His death until an advanced period in His ministry, and that, when He found that it was inevitable, He did not attribute to it any power of obtaining the remission of sins.

These two theories do not elucidate the Gospels, but simply contradict them. All the accounts of our Lord's baptism represent Him as hearing the words which declare that He is the Son in whom the Father is well pleased (Mat_3:17, Mar_1:11, Luk_3:22). He was, therefore, from the first conscious that He fulfilled the Isaianic picture of the Servant of the Lord, who dies as a guilt-offering for the people. In submitting to baptism, He identified Himself with a race that has sinned; in submitting to the subsequent temptation, He identified Himself with a race which suffers when Satan lures it to sin. He also predicted His death early in His ministry. He is the bridegroom who will be taken away in the midst of joy, and His disciples will fast at that day (Mar_2:19-20). Later, He tells how He has to submit to the baptism of His Passion, and feels anguish until it is accomplished. He dreads it; but He desires it, because it is the necessary preliminary of His kindling a sacred fire on earth (Luk_12:49). With these words we must compare the question addressed to the ambitious sons of Zebedee, whether they can drink of His cup and be baptized with His baptism (Mar_10:38). The baptism and the cup represent the will of the Father with all the suffering which the doing of that will entailed. What that suffering was the story of Gethsemane tells us. It was there that He, with a final effort of His human will, identified Himself wholly with the Servant 'wounded for our transgressions.' But this identification had been outlined long before in the words, 'Whosoever would be first among you shall be servant of all. For verily the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mar_10:45). This acceptance of death was not a mere example of perfect resignation. He had taught His disciples not to fear those who kill the body (Mat_10:28), He had assured them that 'he that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' (Mat_10:39). But the disciple who loses his life for Christ's sake does not necessarily win any life except his own, whereas Christ's death avails 'for many.' With this prediction we must connect the words used at the institution of the Lord's Supper. Assuming that Christ did institute this sacrament, we may also assume that He who taught His own not to fear those who kill the body, did not mean that when His blood was shed 'for many' it was shed to save them from being killed by the Jews or Romans. Whether He did or did not add the words 'for the remission of sins,' He must have meant that a new covenant was being made between God and man. His death had some special value in itself, or else the Church would not have continued to show forth the Lord's death (1Co_11:26). The special value which He attached to His own death is made plain by the account of the Lord's Supper contained in the Petrine Gospel of St. Mark no less than in the Pauline Gospel of St. Luke. The shedding of Christ's blood seals a covenant similar to the initial covenant made by Moses between God and the people (Exo_24:3-8); it consecrates a new people to God. It also fulfils Jeremiah's prophecy of a new covenant, of which the very foundation was the forgiveness of sins (Jer_31:31). And, like the blood of the Paschal lamb, the blood of Jesus saves His people from a destruction that comes from God. With this sacrifice of Jesus His disciples are to hold communion. They appropriate the atonement, and as they appropriate it, it becomes for them a propitiation.

2. Acts of the Apostles and Epp. of St. Peter, St. Jude, and St. James.—The simple teaching about our Lord conveyed in Acts, more especially in chs. 1-12, and in the First Epistle of St. Peter and that of St. Jude and of St. James, justifies us in placing these books in a class by themselves. They represent a theology which in character, if not in date, is primitive, and in close touch with Judaism.

(a) In Acts Jesus is set forth as Prophet, Messiah, Son of God, and Redeemer. From the first He is the Lord Jesus (Act 1:6; Act 1:21). And at Pentecost St. Peter proclaims that ‘God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified’ (Act 2:36). He is the Prophet whom Moses had foretold, and those who will not hearken to Him will be utterly destroyed (Act 3:22-23). His Messianic lordship is repeatedly preached; He is the Holy and Righteous One, the Prince of life, the Saviour, the Stone or foundation of the true temple, the Stone now exalted to be the Head of the corner (Act 3:14-15, Act 5:31, Act 4:11). He is Lord of all (Act 10:36), and there is salvation in none other (Act 4:12). Miracles are regarded as His work, though He is no longer visibly present. He is preparing for the ‘Day of the Lord,’ when the Divine Kingdom will be vindicated, and He has Himself poured out the Holy Ghost to fit the disciples for that day (Act 2:33). Moreover, His unique Sonship is implied in the expression ‘the Father’ as used in the beginning of the book (Act 1:4; Act 1:7, Act 2:3). Fitly does St. Stephen direct to Him his dying prayer, and Saul declare that He is the Son of God (Act 9:20). The whole mission and work of Jesus is therefore mediatorial. His death has also an atoning mediatorial worth. Of great importance in Acts is the identification of our Lord with the suffering Servant of the Lord in Isaiah 53. Our Lord had so identified Himself, as is shown not only by the quotation in Luk 22:37 but by the whole tenor of His life from the time of His baptism. In Acts a keynote is struck by St. Peter’s words, ‘the God of our fathers hath glorified his Servant Jesus’ (Act 3:13). When Philip meets the Ethiopian eunuch he finds that he is reading Isaiah 53, and resolves his doubts by explaining that the vicarious sufferer is Jesus. Acts shows plainly that the Christian Church of the most primitive period applied to Jesus this prophecy. ‘Of a truth in this city against thy holy Servant Jesus, whom thou didst anoint, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel, were gathered together, to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel foreordained to come to pass’ (Act 4:27-28).

These Apostolic words show precisely how the Church regarded the death of Christ. He died, not as any ordinary martyr, but as the Messiah and the atoning Servant. The death was a necessity, not because it was simply inevitable from the surroundings in which Jesus lived and against which He struggled, but because God Himself required it as an indispensable means for the realization of His will for man. It took place by His foreknowledge (Act 2:23), it was foretold by His prophets (Act 3:18). Further, it would have been impossible for the Apostles to attribute this meaning to the death of Christ, unless they had been able to point to the empty grave, to assert that the Messiah lives, and that a direct relation can be established between Him and His sinful people. The Servant in Isaiah, though he died, lived again to 'prolong his days.' And because they were able to assert positively that Christ had risen, the first Christians were able to make the death of Christ a fundamental thing in their gospel. Repentance, faith, baptism, the gift of the Holy Spirit, are the distinctive gifts which flow from the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. St. Peter exerts himself to deepen a sense of sin in his hearers by pointing to the cross. They tried to destroy the Saviour, but God thwarted their effort by raising Him from the dead. Their act, so far from accomplishing what they desired, fulfilled God's counsel. Let them repent while there is time, before Christ returns to judgment (Act 2:14-21, Act 3:19-20, Act 4:10-11, Act 5:30-31, Act 10:36-43). God offers forgiveness to those who are baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, and He offers the bestowal of the Holy Spirit to make a new life possible (Act 2:38).

If we compare this very early doctrine with that of St. Paul, we see that, simple though it is, it is radically the same. And against all modern attempts to represent St. Paul as the first man who inseparably joined together the thought of Christ's death, of sin, and of atonement, St. Paul's own words protest: 'I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures' (1Co 15:3). He affirms that he received it, and his testimony is true.

(b) In First Peter the mediatorial character of Christ's death is always present to the writer's mind. The doctrine of this Epistle may possibly have been influenced by that of St. Paul, but it is considerably less developed, and is such as we might well expect from St. Peter. The doctrine with regard to our Lord's Person is simple. It is taught that He existed before He was born on earth, for He was not only 'foreknown indeed before the foundation of the world' (1Pe 1:20), which might not necessarily imply a personal pre-existence, but His Spirit was in the prophets before the Incarnation (1Pe 1:11). To Him, as to a Divine Being, glory and dominion are ascribed (1Pe 5:11). In consequence of His resurrection, baptism 'saves' us (1Pe 3:21). It has an inward power to cleanse the soul in response to the interrogation of a good conscience, because Christ rose and lives.

But it is the Passion of Christ, the 'precious blood,' that fills this letter with its peculiar glow. By that blood, 'as of a lamb without blemish and without spot,' we were 'redeemed' (1Pe 1:18-19). It is a moral redemption, changing a former 'manner of life' into a better type of conduct. His action involved a patient endurance which it is the Christian's duty to imitate (1Pe 2:21, 1Pe 4:1, 1Pe 3:17-18). But it is, nevertheless, an objective external fact before it becomes subjective and inward.

Christians are 'elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, in sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ' (1Pe 1:2). The life of obedience involves sprinkling with the blood. As the Israelites were received into a unique relation with God at Sinai by being sprinkled with sacrificial blood, so by the blood shed on Calvary, a new elect race is dedicated to God. It is this blood that has an abiding power to cancel sin. What Christ did in His Passion is clearly stated, 'His own self bore our sins in his own body upon the tree' (1Pe 2:24). The word 'bear' means both 'endure,' and 'carry' a sacrifice to the altar. So Christ both endured the consequences of our sins, and carried them to the cross as if they were His own. He suffered for sins which were not His own, and He did it that we might be 'healed.' Again, St. Peter says that Christ 'suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God' (1Pe 3:18). He is urging his readers to be prepared to suffer for righteousness' sake; he hopes that their conduct may silence opposition, perhaps that it may bring others to God. But all the power to suffer rightly rests on an event now past. It is the solitary death of Christ 'for sins' that enables us to go to God and sets us right with God. Like St. Paul and like the author of Hebrews, St. Peter regards the death of Christ as the supreme event which established for mankind a free communion with the Father.

(c) The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second of St. Peter do not add to the doctrine of Christ's mediation. The lascivious sect against which the former is directed seems to have denied the reality of the Incarnation and of the Lordship of Christ (Jud 1:4), which the writer regards as essential. He mentions the Holy Spirit, God, and our Lord Jesus Christ together (Jud 1:21), and ascribes glory to 'God our Saviour' through Jesus Christ. 2 Peter also simply assumes the Divinity and mediatorial work of Christ. The writer describes himself as 'the bond-servant and apostle of Jesus Christ' (2Pe 1:1), describes Jesus as 'Lord and Saviour' (2Pe 2:20), speaks of growing 'in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' (2Pe 3:18), and of entrance into His 'eternal kingdom' (2Pe 1:11).

(d) In the Epistle of St. James little is said, yet much is implied, respecting the Person of Christ. He is 'Lord' and 'the Lord of glory' (Jam 2:1). His is the 'honourable name' (Jam 2:7) which was named over Christians in baptism. He is unquestionably regarded as the Mediator of salvation. For the 'word of truth,' 'the implanted word' (Jam 1:18; Jam 1:21), which the Christians have received, has come to them through Christ, and He is called 'the judge' who 'standeth before the doors' (Jam 5:8-9). Moreover, the opposition manifested by St. James towards a misuse of Christian freedom is of a kind which implies that he, like the people whom he desired to refute, believed that faith gains blessings from God through Christ. He illustrates the necessity of good works by instances in which 'works' can hardly be distinguished from faith, but are its necessary expression. He insists that God requires a good life; but, no less truly than St. Paul, he insists that a living faith is requisite for salvation.

There is no developed Christology, but the writer who calls himself a 'bond-servant of God and of Jesus Christ,' and is so faithful both to the letter and to the spirit of Christ's moral teaching, must necessarily have believed that He is the Mediator between God and man.

3. The Pauline Epistles.—(a) St. Paul's doctrine of the Person of Christ is fundamentally the same in all his Epistles. And his whole teaching concerning the work of Christ is inseparable from the doctrine of His Person. Jesus is the Son of God, who, as such, possesses a superhuman and Divine nature. God is 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2Co_1:3), and the Son shares in the spiritual immaterial nature of the Father. In his earliest Epistles, those to the Thessalonians, Jesus is called 'the Lord Jesus,' and each letter closes with the prayer that His 'grace' or unmerited kindness may be with His people. It is assumed that Jesus is exalted to heaven, is the Lord ruling the Church, and that He will return to judge the world. In the second group of Epistles—1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Rom. [Note: Roman.]—there is much teaching about our Lord's Person. He is God's 'own Son' (Rom_8:3), and to Him alone belongs the privilege of being 'the image of God' (2Co_4:4). St. Paul applies to Christ passages which in the OT refer to Jehovah (Rom_10:13, 1Co_2:16; 1Co_10:22), and in Rom_9:5 says that He is 'over all, God blessed for ever.' The Son of God is more ancient than all creation, and 'through him all things were made' (1Co_8:6). He existed in heaven before He was 'sent forth' on earth, and this coming to earth was for Him the humiliation of exchanging riches for poverty (2Co_8:9). The last two facts are fundamental in the next group of Epistles (Col_1:15-17, Php_2:5-11).

The third group of Epistles—Phil. [Note: Philistine.] , Col., Eph.—illustrates these doctrines more fully. Php_2:5-11 lays special stress upon the self-sacrifice involved in the Son of God taking 'the form of a servant.' In heaven He had 'the form of God,' but He 'emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men.' This likeness is elsewhere called 'the likeness of sinful flesh' (Rom_8:3). In Colossians, St. Paul attacks a superstitious theosophy which taught that worship ought to be paid to some intermediate beings who come between God and the world—a theory which implied that God could not come into direct contact with matter. Against this St. Paul insists upon the mediatorial work of the Son of God in both creation and redemption. He declares that the Son is the 'image' or adequate counterpart of the Father, and the 'firstborn of all creation,' i.e., not the first being created, but, as the context shows, 'born before all creation' (Col_1:15-16). All things were created in Him, since their existence was conditioned by His thought; by Him, since it was through His power that they came into being; unto Him, since all creation finds in Him the summit of its evolution. All things cohere in Him (Col_1:17), and it was God's purpose that all things should be summed up in Him (Eph_1:10). The sum total of God's attributes dwells in Him bodily (Col_2:9). And the Church is an organism without which Christ deigns to regard Himself as incomplete, because without the Church His incarnate life would not continue to be manifested. It is an extension of the Incarnation. It is a body in which Christ Himself lives and works (Eph 1:23), the suffering of its members completes His own (Col 1:24) by making possible a further application to mankind of His saving power.

The Church therefore exists to promote a certain relation between God and man. That relation is one of union and communion. The new confession which is taught to us by the Spirit of God's Son is expressed in the words 'Abba, Father.' The very Aramaic word used by Jesus in His communion with the Father in Gethsemane (Mar 14:36) is used by St. Paul to describe the Christian's attitude towards God. The prominence given by St. Paul to the love of God for man, for all men, for sinners, is unceasing. His certainty of God's love rests on all that Jesus did and does, but the most fundamental proof of it was that Jesus died. By this God commends His love toward us (Rom 5:8). This makes it obvious that God will give us all things (Rom 8:32). And this equally proves the love of Christ (2Co 5:14, Eph 5:2; Eph 5:25). The death of Christ is, therefore, the highest proof of the love of the Father and the love of Jesus for mankind. The mediatorial work of the Son of God is a process involved in the whole relation of His Divine Person to the world. But it was focused in one great event—His death.

(b) St. Paul's teaching about the death of Christ is entirely consistent. He teaches that there are two great elements in the process of the individual man's reconciliation with God. The first is his faith in Christ, who died as a sacrifice on our behalf. The second is that inward, vital, and ethical union with Christ, the 'life-giving Spirit' (1Co 15:45), involved in our baptism 'into Christ.'

To suppose that his language about dying as our 'ransom' or 'price' (1Co 6:20; 1Co 7:23, 1Ti 2:6, Tit 2:14) is inconsistent with our need of identification with Christ, or that the moral identification excludes the need of a sacramental identification, is to create an imaginary false antithesis. Sacrifice, rightly understood, implies communion with the object sacrificed. And sacraments convey the power which is taken and used by that moral choice which is called 'faith.' Baptism begins our new supernatural life (Rom 6:4 f.), the Lord's Supper imparts to us sustenance for that life (1Co 10:3 f.). In both we enter into union with a Christ who died, and died 'for us' and 'for sins' (e.g. 2Co 5:14, Gal 1:4, Rom 8:32, Eph 5:25). That death had a special meaning for mankind as a whole, for God the Father, and for Christ Himself.

(i.) The death of Christ effected a reconciliation.—By it we were reconciled to God (Rom 5:9-10, Eph 1:7). This is because God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself (2Co 5:19), and those who were 'alienated and enemies' Christ has reconciled in the body of His flesh through death (Col 1:22). The action of Christ is identical with the action of God. In Christ living and Christ dying God was present, ‘not reckoning trespasses.’ He came to pardon when He might have punished. The cross, therefore, manifests the love and pity of God. And the reason why the love of Christ specially ‘constraineth us’ is ‘because we thus judge that one died for all (therefore all died); and he died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died, and rose again’ (2Co_5:14 f.). We feel the constraint of love when we see that Christ died a death which was a substitute for our death. If the Son had not died, we should have been left to experience the death of a sinner who is alienated from God. The work of reconciliation was done by the Father through the Son,—done outside us before it was done in us.

(ii.) The death of Christ removes the wrath of God.—Sinners are exposed to God’s wrath (Rom_1:18; Rom_1:32; Rom_2:3; Rom_5:10; Rom_11:28). This wrath is not vindictiveness, but the attitude of a loving Father towards that which destroys the very life of His children. The wrath of God is removed when, ‘through faith,’ the sinner accepts Jesus as a ‘means of propitiation’ (Rom_3:25). God justifies, acquits as righteous, those who avail themselves of that force which wipes away their sins. In providing this means of propitiation, God did something to counterbalance all His previous forbearance towards sin. He manifested His righteousness, His disposition to treat men according to a perfect moral law. When sin is passed over, righteousness is not manifested. But it was demonstrated when God showed that He could not forgive except at the tremendous cost of sending His Son to be a means of propitiation by His blood. The death of the Son was an oblation and a sacrifice to the Father (Eph_5:2), wholly acceptable to the Father on account of the sinlessness and love of the Sufferer; and it is wholly adequate to the needs of the human soul, because it simultaneously removes the sinner’s sin and his fear of the judgment of God.

(iii.) Christ is not regarded by St. Paul as literally punished for the sins of all mankind.—These sins are not transferred to Jesus, for men who do not accept Him as their Saviour have still to answer for their sins. They are still under the wrath of God (Rom_1:18). Nor were the sins of those who God foresaw would repent literally transferred to Jesus. In the Hebrew conception of the sin-offering, the offering was ‘most holy,’ which would have been impossible if sin had been transferred to it in any literal manner. At the same time, Christ is said to have been made ‘sin’ (2Co_5:21) and to have been made ‘curse’ for us (Gal_3:13).

The first passage may mean that Christ was made a sin-offering; the second may mean that Christ in some way fulfilled the type of the scape-goat (Lev_16:21), which symbolized the disappearance of the iniquities of the children of Israel. Both these interpretations are somewhat uncertain. What is certain is that in 2Co_5:21, Gal_3:13 St. Paul means that Christ was treated as a sinner in order that sinners might become righteous; that He chose to die by crucifixion, a death which in Jewish eyes was symbolical of God's curse; and that in dying He realized God's curse or condemnation on the sins of the race of which He had chosen to be a member. There is no question of a literal personal punishment of Christ. It was a voluntary entrance on His part into a state in which, by a profound sympathy, He felt our calamity as though it were His.

Our Lord Himself had shown the connexion between His death and the forgiveness of our sins. The primitive Church had believed and experienced the reality of this connexion. And St. Paul, in preaching what he calls 'the word of the cross' so fully and vividly, was 'faithful' to 'the much' which was committed to Him by the risen Christ. He preached, as no other man has done, the Name which means that Christ saves His people from their sins.

4. The Epistle to the Hebrews.—(a) The subject of the Epistle to the Hebrews is 'the world to come' (Heb 2:5). This world to come already exists and has existed from the Creation. But it is regarded as still to come, because it has not yet been fully realized in time. It is a heavenly spiritual counterpart of this temporal material world in which we live. The material world, and the Jewish system of worship which belongs to this world, are not, in the strictest sense of the word, real. Christianity is the perfect religion, and is superior to Judaism, because its origin, worship, and priesthood belong to the heavenly world of which Judaism is only a shadow. The Revealer of Christianity belongs to the heavenly world. It is on His mediation that the existence both of the material and of the spiritual world depends. He is the 'effulgence' or 'radiance' of God's glory, i.e. of God's nature as shown to things created, and the impress of His essence; 'upholding all things by the word of his power' (Heb 1:3). The Son, through whom the Father made the worlds, was appointed heir of all things prior to creation. By His almighty word (cf. 'God said' in Genesis 1)—a word which is itself an act—He carries the world to its goal. This Son, as essentially Divine, is above the angels, and is the object of their worship (Gen 1:7). He is above Moses, as the son of a house is superior to a servant, and as the founder of a house is superior to one who is only a part of the edifice itself (Gen 3:2-3).

(b) But Jesus is especially our sympathetic High Priest 'who hath passed through the heavens' (Gen 4:14). Great stress is laid upon the fact that He endured all that we endure, sin apart. Having taken flesh and blood, and become in all things like His 'brethren,' He passed through temptations, shed tears, suffered death. His human prayer to God, offered during His agony, was heard on account of His 'godly fear.' He was strengthened to bear His burden, and was made perfect for His saving work by the discipline of His sufferings. He manifests the highest degree both of sympathy and of probation, and is therefore the Representative of man to God. He is able to enter with full sympathy into the lot of ignorant and erring man. He also possesses the other essential qualification of a High Priest, for He was Divinely appointed. He who proclaimed Him to be His Son, declared Him to be a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek (Heb 5:5-6). In the reality of His human experience and sympathy, and in the fact of His Divine calling, He resembled the Levitical priests. But He differed from them profoundly. They were sinful: He was sinless. They must offer sacrifices for themselves: His offering was solely for others. They served a temporary sanctuary: He ministers perpetually in heaven. He further differs from them because He is a priest after the order of Melchizedek. The priesthood of Melchizedek had these two great characteristics: it was especially royal, and it was independent of any genealogy; whereas the priesthood of the Levitical priests was not more royal than that of all the Israelites, and their title to it rested on their descent from Levi. Christ is King as well as Priest; and as His Being had no beginning, the silence of Scripture about the ancestry of Melchizedek assimilates him to Christ. And since Abraham the father of Levi paid tithes to Melchizedek, he acknowledged his inferiority, and compromised the Levitical priests by so doing. Their priesthood is lower than that of Melchizedek, which was an archetype of that of the Son of God (Heb 7:1-10).

(c) The sacrifice of Christ had these notes. (i.) It was the expression of the perfect obedience of His will to the will of the Father. No animal sacrifices can take away sins. They rather bring sins to remembrance than purge them away. Bulls and goats cannot give to God a conscious, voluntary, moral sacrifice. This the Son gave; He satisfied the will of God by so doing: 'When he cometh into the world he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body didst thou prepare for me.... Lo, I am come to do thy will, O God' (Heb 10:5-7). By the offering of Christ's body, which was prepared by God to make this great sacrifice possible, the will of God was satisfied, and by that will we are 'sanctified.'—(ii.) It is one, and need not be repeated yearly. Every day the Levitical priests offer sacrifices which cannot cancel sin. In contrast with the ineffectiveness of those sacrifices, offered by priests still standing day by day, Christ offered one sacrifice on the cross, and then the adequacy of His offering was proved by His sitting down on the right hand of God (Heb 10:12). His offering is valid for both past and future, and delivers men from 'the transgressions that were under the first covenant' (Heb 9:15), in addition to giving a new power to those who live after the Incarnation has taken place.—(iii.) It is the basis of a 'new covenant' between God and man.

The best commentators differ somewhat with regard to the meaning of Heb 9:15-16. But the natural explanation is that since the word διαθήκη meant both covenant or alliance and testament or will, the word is used in both senses, and the author was conscious of no logical difficulty in so using it. He means that God's people, their sins having been taken away by Christ, are able to enter upon that inheritance, that rest of God, bequeathed to them by Christ, who Himself removed the encumbrance of past sins which barred access to it. But the idea of covenant is more fundamental. The only sacrifice of the Old Covenant which the Jews never repeated was that which established the original relation between God and the Hebrew people (Exo 24:3-8). This was dedicated with blood. So was the New Covenant, the blood of the Son being 'the blood of the covenant' (Heb 10:29). And by it the whole region of man's approach to God, the system of 'the heavenly things' themselves, was cleansed from the taint of sin. In Heb 10:29 the writer has in mind the words spoken by our Lord in instituting His Supper.

(d) The effect of Christ's death on man is specially described by the ritual words 'purify' (καθαρίζειν), 'sanctify' (ἀγιάζειν), and 'make perfect' (τελειοῦν). These words do not exactly correspond with the terms of later theology. They are primarily ritual words, though they involve a truly ethical conception as used in this Epistle. They mean to remove the sense of guilt (Heb 9:14) or 'evil conscience,' to dedicate to God (Heb 10:10; Heb 10:29, Heb 13:12), to bring to that full enjoyment of spiritual privileges which the Levitical priesthood could not effect (Heb 7:11). The result of this work done by Christ is our sense of forgiveness and free access to God through Christ (Heb 4:16).

(e) The Ascension is the culminating point of the Atonement as offered by Christ to God. As a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek, i.e. with an eternal priesthood which belongs to the world to come, Christ offered Himself upon the cross (Heb 7:27, Heb 9:24-28). But as the Aaronic high priest carried the sacrificial blood on the day of Atonement into the Holy of Holies, so Christ entered heaven 'through his blood' having obtained 'eternal redemption' (Heb 9:12). He now exercises a priesthood which is after the order of Melchizedek, but at the same time fulfils the type of the Aaronic high priest's action within the veil. He still remains High Priest and acts as such (Heb 6:20). Because He abideth for ever He hath His priesthood unchangeable (Heb 7:24). He manifests Himself to God for us (Heb 9:24), continuously interceding on our behalf (Heb 7:25). Into all His intercession the value of His offering is put, so that He is 'the minister of the sanctuary' above. His work is still of a sacerdotal nature, 'it is necessary that this high priest also have somewhat to offer' (Heb 8:1-3). The 'somewhat' is His blood or life. His blood retains its sacrificial efficacy, pleads to God for pardon, and speaks peace to man.

'We have an altar' (Heb 13:10). Unlike the Jews, even the Jewish priests, who were unable to partake of the sin-offering offered on the Day of Atonement, Christians may partake of Christ.

The 'altar' of which they eat has been variously interpreted as the cross, the altar in heaven, and the Lord's table. The first seems to be excluded by the fact that according to the writer's argument the cross corresponds with the place outside the camp where the sin-offering was burnt, not with the altar in the tabernacle. Whether the altar here is the heavenly altar or the Lord's table (cf. Mal 1:7; Mal 1:12, Eze 44:16; Eze 41:22), a reference to the Eucharist is included. And in that rite the pleading of Christ's death by the Church is joined with the present intercession which He makes in heaven.

The special value of the Epistle to the Hebrews is that it presents to us the mediatorial work of Christ as a work of Divine worship. Without worship, Christianity would be merely a philosophy. And the author satisfies one of the deepest needs of the human soul when he teaches us the relation between Christ and His people in the life of intercession, a life which is for the Christian one of faith and confidence by virtue of all that Jesus did and does. The author also teaches us something of the philosophy of religion. St. Paul's view of Judaism is wholly true, but it is not the whole truth. And this Epistle, with its peculiar dignity and calm, and a devotion to Christ not less real than that of the Apostle of the Gentiles, gives us a fresh insight into the Divine wisdom which made Judaism 'a sacred school of the knowledge of God for the world.'

5. The Johannine writings

(a) The Apocalypse.—Whether the Apocalypse be the work of John the Presbyter, or, as the present writer believes, the work of John the Apostle, its doctrine of the mediatorial work of Christ is of high importance. The book is full of the exaltation of Jesus. He is the Messiah, the unique Son of God (Rev 1:6; Rev 3:5; Rev 14:1), the Divine Word (Rev 19:13). He is the lion of the tribe of Judah, the root and offspring of David (Rev 5:5, Rev 22:16). He is the Lord's Messiah (Rev 11:15). By His resurrection He has become Ruler of the kings of the earth, many royal diadems are on His head, and He is King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev 1:5, Rev 19:12, Rev 17:14, Rev 19:16). He has all authority, an authority given Him by God (Rev 3:21). His terrible might is suggested by the description of His feet, His voice, His eyes, and the sound from His mouth (Rev 1:14 ff.). With God He shares the throne of heaven (Rev 22:1; Rev 22:3), with Him He receives ascriptions of praise from the angels and the redeemed (Rev 5:13, Rev 7:10). He comes seated on a white cloud, like the figure in Daniel's vision (Rev 14:14). He is the Morning Star who brings in the day of grace (Rev 22:16). The coming of Christ is the coming of God, and when the coming is accomplished God is called He 'who is and who was,' and no longer 'the coming one' (Rev 1:4; Rev 1:8, Rev 4:8, cf. Rev 11:17, Rev 16:5). He holds the keys of death and Hades (Rev 1:18), He is 'the first and the last, and the living One,' 'the Alpha and the Omega' (Rev 1:17-18, Rev 22:13).

From the beginning to the end the book contains deep appreciations of the mediatorial work effected by Christ's death. (i.) It is a great demonstration of the love of Jesus (Rev 1:5). (ii.) It is a death which implies that a redeeming work was then accomplished, and that the Christian enjoys a liberty which was won by that death; 'He loosed us from our sins by his blood; and he made us to be a kingdom, to be priests unto his God and Father' (Rev_1:5-6). And in Rev_5:6-14 the Lamb is praised in the words, 'Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe and tongue.' The Lamb is 'standing, as though it had been slain'; it is not dead, but has the virtue of its death in it. (iii.) The abiding power of the death of Christ is shown in this, that it is the source of moral purity and of moral victory under persecution. Even the virgins who follow the Lamb reach heaven only because Christ 'purchased' them (Rev_14:3-4), And the martyrs slain by persecuting pagan Rome overcame the dragon 'because of the blood of the Lamb, and because of the word of their testimony' (Rev_12:11). The blood of the Lamb therefore did something in the past, for it released mankind from sin by the ransom paid to God. And it does something now, for it enables us to live and witness as Christ lived and witnessed. The mediatorial power of the blood of Christ is therefore a power without which the Christian life can be neither begun nor continued.

(b) The Prologue of St. John's Gospel contains an assertion which is of essential importance for all subsequent Christian theology. The Divine Λόγος, the Word who 'was God,' became flesh, and was incarnate as Jesus. This Word is both the expression of God and God expressed. The origin of the title is to be sought mainly in the OT and in Palestinian tradition. But St. John's use of it was probably partly determined by its common occurrence in Greek philosophy, and more especially in the writings of the Alexandrian Jewish philosopher Philo. His doctrine of the Λόγος is more moral and less metaphysical than that of Philo, more Jewish and less Greek. Philo's dominant idea is that of the Divine Reason, St. John's is that of the Divine Word, the manifestation of the Divine will. The Jewish Targums use the phrase Memra or Word for God as manifested in His action on the world, and in Wis_18:15 the almighty Word of God is described as leaping down from heaven to smite the Egyptians. The term as used by St. John denotes inherence in God, as a thought or conception inheres in the mind—mediatorship between God and the universe of a kind which implies that God Himself comes into touch with the universe—and it requires as its complement the other title 'only-begotten Son.' In Philo the Λόγος remains a vague cosmic force, in St. John it is a definite Divine Person who becomes Man. See, further, art. Logos.

(c) Although in the Fourth Gospel the word Λόγος is applied to the Son of God in the Prologue only, the same doctrine pervades the whole book. 'We beheld his glory' (Joh_1:14) is shown to be true by the record which follows. In the Synoptics, Jesus seems to speak most of His own ministry and of men; here He rather speaks of Himself and His relations to the Father. There He frequently distinguishes Himself from His disciples in His relations to the Father; here He takes the same attitude more decisively. He declares Himself the Son of God (Joh 5:25, Joh 9:35-37 etc.), the Son in a unique sense (Joh 3:16; Joh 3:35, Joh 5:19-22 etc.). Distinct from all others there exist the Father and the Son (Joh 3:35-36, Joh 5:19-22). The Father is the Source of the Son's being and action (Joh 5:19; Joh 5:26). He does works in the Son; the Father and the Son know one another (Joh 10:15, Joh 8:55). They love one another (Joh 5:20, Joh 14:31, Joh 15:9); they abide in one another (Joh 8:29, Joh 14:10-11). They are one, ἐν (Joh 10:30, Joh 17:11; Joh 17:21-22). As the Father has life in Himself, He has given to the Son life in Himself (Joh 5:26). So to see or to reject the Son is to see or reject the Father (Joh 8:19, Joh 14:9, Joh 15:21-24). Men must render similar honour to the Father and to the Son (Joh 5:23). The Son existed before He came into the world: He was before Abraham (Joh 8:58), He was glorified with the Father before the world existed (Joh 17:5): He came from heaven and returns to heaven (Joh 6:62). The Father sent Him into the world (Joh 3:16) to fulfil a certain mission (Joh 5:36, Joh 14:31 etc.), to speak, judge, and act in His Name (Joh 8:36, Joh 10:32; Joh 10:37).

But the chief object for which the Son came was to save the world (Joh 3:17) and to give it eternal life (Joh 3:16; Joh 3:36, Joh 4:14 etc.). And Jesus is Himself the life (Joh 14:6), and came that men might have it more abundantly (Joh 10:10). He is also the light of the world (Joh 3:19, Joh 8:12, Joh 12:46), because He teaches men to know God and His Son, and this knowledge is eternal life (Joh 17:2-3). Jesus is therefore the Mediator of the life and the light of God for men. How are they to receive it?

We receive eternal life by attaching ourselves to the Person of Jesus Christ. We must believe on Him (Joh 3:16). We must obey the Son if we are to escape from the wrath of the Father (Joh 3:36). We must believe His claim or die in our sins (Joh 8:24). We must abide in Him, as the branches in the vine, and abide in His love as He abides in His Father's love (Joh 15:1-10). Other conditions of salvation remind us of our Lord's teaching in the Synoptics. It is necessary to be born again of water and the Spirit (Joh 3:3-7), and to eat His flesh and drink His blood (Joh 6:52-59).

The last injunction reminds us that the Divine life which is in Jesus becomes available for the Christian by virtue only of His death. It is sometimes held that Jesus is represented in this Gospel as saving men by revealing to them the truth about God, a revelation made in His own Person. But it cannot be said with justice that the mediatorial work of Jesus in this Gospel is only of this prophetic nature. St. John records a great deal about the death of Jesus which implies that the death has a propitiatory character in the Gospel as well as in the First Epistle. In Joh 1:29 the Baptist describes our Lord as the Lamb that taketh away the sin of the world. This must have a sacrificial meaning, for only by sacrifice could a lamb be conceived as taking away sin. In three passages (Joh 3:14, Joh 8:28, Joh 12:32) our Lord speaks of Himself being 'lifted up.' Men will look to Him for life as the Israelites looked to the brazen serpent which Moses uplifted in the wilderness. Again, after He has been lifted up by the Jews, they will know that He is the Messiah. Lastly, He says, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself'; the Cross, followed by the Ascension, will be the means of attracting Gentile as well as Jew. So He is the Good Shepherd, whose very vocation it is to lay down His life for the sheep (Joh 10:11). His laying it down is wholly voluntary, but it is God's purpose and His own for His earthly life (Joh 10:17 f.). St. John regards Caiaphas as unconsciously prophesying that Christ would die for the well-being and the union of all God's children (Joh 11:52). In Joh 12:27 He dreads the appointed 'hour' or crisis, which He nevertheless knows to be the hour when He will be glorified (Joh 12:23), this glory being the manifestation of His character in the great passage from His trial and death to His Ascension (cf. Joh 17:5). He ascends to heaven by the way of the cross; and this ascent shows, as nothing else can, what He is. He also compares Himself in Joh 12:24 to a grain of wheat which bears fruit only if it dies, otherwise 'it abideth by itself alone.' Here our Lord makes His whole influence depend upon His death; because He is to perish, He will be the source of life to others. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends' (Joh 15:13) His death is therefore the fullest revelation of His love. And in Joh 17:19 He sanctified Himself, deliberately dedicated Himself to the Father in death, that so He might establish for men a dedicated relationship with God.

Ch. 6 throws further light on our Lord's teaching about His Atonement. The great discourse therein contains three sections, the first Christological (Joh 6:26-40), the second more definitely Soteriological (Joh 6:41-51), the third Eucharistic (Joh 6:52-59). In the first, Jesus requires belief in Himself as the living Lord, and bread of God. In the second, He asserts that He is the living bread, and that He will give His flesh for the life of the world. In the third, He speaks of the necessity of eating His flesh and drinking His blood. The flesh and blood must mean not Himself merely, but Himself as affected by a violent death, and a death endured, as He has declared, for the life of the world. The act of communion is represented as an exalted act of faith by which man appropriates Christ's atoning self. All this implies that the death of Christ is propitiatory; the sacrifice is dedicated to God, and it cleanses man's sin when man appropriates it. If we consult Joh 8:24 and Joh 3:36, we see quite certainly that the result of this sacrifice is that God's wrath is removed. The sin of the world is exposed to His wrath, and this wrath on His part means death on man's part. It is such wrath as can be felt only by perfect love. And the saving effect of Christ's death is this, that it established between God and man that relationship which enables individual men to escape from sin, wrath, and death, and attain a vital union with God.

(d) In St. John's First Epistle the doctrine of Christ's mediation is clear. The Apostle insists upon the historical truth of the atoning work of Christ, and upon the existing witness of that work. In Joh 5:6; Joh 5:8 he opposes the Docetic theory concerning Jesus and His work, and declares that the crucifixion was as true an experience of Christ as His baptism. He who by baptism associated Himself with repentant sinners, by crucifixion endured what that baptism foreshadowed. The Holy Spirit makes these two saving events penetrate our hearts, and the water of Christian baptism and the blood of the Eucharistic cup bear testimony to His witness. In Joh 2:1-2, Joh 4:9-10, Joh 1:7 it is shown that the death of Jesus has a direct relation to the sins of the world, for it is their propitiation; to His own righteousness, for only the perfectly Righteous could establish God's law of righteousness; to His present intercession for man, for He is the Advocate of man by virtue of what He has already done for us. The Apostle further implies in Joh 1:7; Joh 1:9 that the Christian needs a continuous purification. He is unforgiven and uncleansed unless he continues to 'walk.' His salvation is ethical. It is made possible by something which he did not do, and could not do, for himself. But it is not something which he can secure eternally by a momentary choice.

Conclusion.—The writers of the NT unite in various ways in teaching that Jesus is the Mediator between God and man in the whole work of reconciliation which the human conscience requires. In the whole of His teaching and His contest with evil He satisfied the Divine law of Righteousness. Further, by His perfect sympathy He entered into the situation and the misery of sinful man; a truth which is unintelligible when regarded as an external legal transference of guilt, but intelligible and moral when regarded as the voluntary act of love. In giving Himself for man, He gave Himself to God, offering in His own Person to God all that devotion which God, who is holiness and love, could desire from His children. In so surrendering Himself to death, He acquiesced in the justice of God's condemnation of the sins of the human race, of which He had chosen to become a member. All sin inevitably tends to death, not by any arbitrary appointment but by its very nature, and Christ accepted death as the symbol of God's judgment on man's sin. Lastly, Christ is our propitiation, because He gives us inwardly that power, that communication of His own life, which cleanses us from sin. He enables us to die to sin, and thus within us, as outside us, does not suspend but establishes the law of Righteousness. All this is possible if Jesus is truly God and perfectly man; having an actual original solidarity with our race previous to the choice of any individual member of it, and that new solidarity which He establishes between Himself and all who consciously come into a moral and sacramental union with Him.

☒ Meekness

MEEKNESS

1. The quality defined.—The Christian virtue of meekness has suffered the misfortune of being seriously misunderstood. In the popular mind it has been so conceived as to forfeit the right to be considered a virtue at all, being regarded as the equivalent of weak compliance—the temper of one devoid of manly vigour, who tamely allows himself to be slighted and injured without protest or resistance. That this conception is a caricature of meekness, is apparent in view of Christ's Beatitude (Mat 5:5); for not only is it incredible that our Lord should have pronounced a blessing on those of feeble character, but the nature of the promise attached to the Beatitude implies that in some sense meekness is a strong and victorious quality. Whatever it be, we must presume it to be a virtue replete with energy, robust and manly, the very opposite of everything that is weak. Otherwise Christ's words are reduced to an absurdity.

In the NT use of the word, meekness (πραύτης, πραότης) is commonly interpreted as meaning gentleness of disposition, peaceableness of temper in the face of provocation and wrong. It is the spirit of one who is not easily provoked, but keeps under control the natural instinct to assert oneself and to retaliate. It is the opposite of irascibility and the spirit of revenge. That is to say, it is conceived as a disposition restricted in its exercise to a man's relation with his fellow-men. But in reality meekness has a deeper and wider significance. It is, to begin with, a disposition towards God, the humble submission to the Divine will, the quiet acceptance of the discipline of life as coming from One who in infinite wisdom and love directs the destinies of men. This is made clear by the Biblical history of πραῦς. In the LXX Septuagint, πραῦς is most frequently employed as the translation of יָבֹן—one who bows himself down in lowliness beneath the hand of God. The πραεῖς are the class of afflicted ones who accept their sorrows without murmuring, and yield themselves in trust and in hope to the will of God. When Jesus pronounced His blessing on 'the meek,' it was this class of humble, uncomplaining, God-fearing sufferers that He had in view. His appropriation of the words in Psa 37:11 is conclusive proof of that. That 'the meek' of the Beatitude have so often been exclusively conceived as those who are peaceable and unvindictive in their dealings with their fellow-men, is due to the fact that the Greek conception of *πραύτης [Note: See, for the Greek conception of πρ αὔτης, Aristotle, Nic Eth. iv. 7.] has governed the interpretation, instead of the conception represented by the underlying Hebrew word. At the same time, this common interpretation of πραύτης is not to be rejected as alien to the NT meaning.

The attitude of humble submission to the will of God carries with it of necessity a disposition of gentleness and forbearance towards men who are harsh and provocative in their dealings, not only because they are to be regarded as the instruments of the Divine discipline, but because only through the loving restraint of angry and vindictive feelings can the gracious will of God be done in human relationships. The primary significance of meekness is the calm and trustful acceptance of God's will, when it is adverse, as meaning our good; but this involves in regard to our fellow-men the quiet and patient endurance of scorn, annoyance, and opposition.

2. Meekness in relation to God.—Regarded as the submissive attitude of the soul towards God, meekness has its root in a humble, childlike faith. To use the words of Gregory of Nyssa, humility is 'the mother of meekness.' Humility and meekness are kindred virtues; hence they are often mentioned together (Eph 4:2, Col 3:12, cf. Mat 11:29). Humility is the soul's attitude induced by a proper sense of one's creaturely weakness, ignorance, and unworthiness in presence of the Most High; meekness is the attendant disposition, born of humility, which constrains the soul to bow without complaining before the will of God in the hard and perplexing experiences of life. The soul that thus bows meekly beneath the Divine discipline is not open to the reproach of feebleness or insensibility; it is meek, not because it is too callous to feel the pain of sorrow and misfortune or too spiritless to protest against it, but because it bends in lowly and childlike trust before the unsearchable wisdom and love of God. Where there is faith in the universal operation of the all-wise love of God, meekness shows itself in the uncomplaining surrender to the Divine will and in the patient endurance of that will. And from this attitude towards God there flows the blessing of peace. Meekness is the channel by which the gracious love of God is communicated to the soul as waters of refreshment and rest. This is the truth taught under a different figure in Mat 11:29. Meekness is the easy yoke of Jesus which enables the weary and heavy-laden to bear the discipline laid upon them without chafing and complaining. Amid outward conditions which are hard and oppressive, they who like Jesus are 'meek and lowly of heart,' who bow before God with a profound sense of His infinitely wise and perfect will, find 'rest unto their souls'; they are freed from that inward restiveness and discontent which aggravate the outward burden and wear away the strength. Not only is meekness a strong and heroic quality which curbs the natural impulse to fume and rebel against God's will, but it is the means whereby the soul is reinforced by a Divine power to endure life's discipline with courage.

Meekness before God is, then, the natural ethical outcome of humble faith in the Divine Father who in unerring wisdom and holy love orders the life of men. It is seen in its crowning manifestation in Jesus Christ (cf. 2Co_10:1), for whom alike in the tasks which He undertook and in the sorrows which He bore the Father's will was supreme. When faithfulness to His mission brought upon Him unmerited suffering, He endured it in meekness, assured that it was God's holy will for Him. That His meekness was not merely a passive virtue, but one that was pervaded by a moral vigour and strength of purpose, is made clear by the conflict in Gethsemane. In the prayer of lowly submission, 'Not my will but thine be done,' we see the meekness of Jesus, in respect of God's dealings with Him, in its Divinest light. The agony and the bloody sweat, the prayer, 'If it be possible, let this cup pass away from me,' not only set in vivid relief the moral grandeur of Christ's willing acceptance of His Father's will, but they show with convincing power that true meekness is not the easy outcome of insensibility or tameness of spirit, but the victory of a strong nature over personal desires which conflict with the will of God.

3. Meekness in relation to men.—When we think of meekness in regard to the wrongs and opposition of men, we find that it is characterized by the same heroic qualities and is attended by similar blessed results. It is a virile and noble thing. The outward garb of meekness may, indeed, be worn by men in whom there are none of the robust and gracious qualities which make true meekness so worthy of admiration and honour. There are those who, by natural disposition, are timid and compliant, who have not manliness enough to resent injustice, who do not retaliate when they are wronged simply because they dare not. Similarly, there are those who, when slighted, show no sign of resentment, because they are too dull to feel an affront, or because they are controlled by feelings of scorn or by considerations of self-interest and policy. Of none of these can it be said that he is meek, nor does his conduct deserve our admiration. True meekness, which is worthy of all honour, is seen only in those who, with an acute sense of wrong, control the natural impulse to show anger and to retaliate, not from fear, or pride, or policy, or scorn of others, but because in obedience to the will of God they accept the provocation or wrong as discipline, and as an opportunity for showing the Divine spirit of patience and love. The meek man is not quick-tempered or vindictive, because, swayed by feelings of benevolence and love, he remains master of himself. Where there is no love, there is no meekness. 'Meekness is the power of love to quell the ebullition of anger, to restrain the violent and hasty temper' (Martensen). The irritation may be keenly felt; the temptation to retaliate may be very strong; but love keeps the upper hand and imposes calmness and self-restraint. It follows from all this that true meekness is not open to the contemptuous charge, so often brought against it, of softness and mean-spiritedness. It is a strong quality, for it means victory over the hot desire to retaliate; it is a gracious quality, for it means love triumphing over the selfish and self-assertive impulses of one's nature, in its anxiety to avoid the embittering of friendly relations and to subdue ill-feeling by gentleness and kindness.

Meekness, then, is an expression of the love which 'is not easily provoked' (1Co 13:5). It is the self-restraint imposed by love when one is irritated or suffers a personal wrong. But this gentle and peaceable disposition is not inconsistent with a burning indignation at the injustice and evil conduct of men, when wider interests are concerned. The meek man is not bound over to keep the peace at any price. Meekness does not mean incapacity for indignation. When the interests of the Divine Kingdom are at stake, in the face of flagrant and defiant wrongdoing, the duty of the meek is not silence and self-repression, but indignant and active opposition to evil. Indignation has a vastly greater moral value and influence when it proceeds from one who in personal matters endures provocation with calmness and self-restraint. It is the meekness of Jesus that makes His anger so terrible. When He was subjected in His own person to insult or wrong, He bore it with patience and with compassion on those who wronged Him (1Pe 2:23). When He was wounded to the heart by the treachery of Judas, and the betrayal was sealed by a hypocritical kiss, His answer to the traitor showed how superior He was to the natural resentment of men: 'Comrade, is it for this that thou art come?' (Mat 26:50). When He hung upon the cross in agony, He was so far master of Himself and so deeply moved by compassion for His enemies, that He found some ground for extenuating their conduct and prayed for their forgiveness. But when the interests of the weak and helpless were involved (Mat 18:6), when the sacred name of religion was profaned (Mat 21:12), and the Kingdom of God was thwarted by those who were so blind as to imagine they were defending it (Mat 23:13 ff.), 'the wrath of the Lamb' flamed on the heads of the wrong-doers. So far from anger being inconsistent with meekness, it is only when meekness is associated with it that anger has a pure moral worth. The wrath of an irascible and violent man is deservedly discounted; that of a meek man scorches where it falls. Even when it is most vehement, the indignation that is associated with meekness is kept within bounds. It is not allowed to degenerate into uncontrollable and self-willed passion. Behind its severity there is the moderating power of love, which even in the act of showing indignation regrets its necessity (cf. Mar 3:5).

In the matter of personal wrongs, meekness is shown in the refusal to retaliate in the spirit of the aggressor. It will not requite evil with evil. Much rather will it endure the wrong and yield no room in the heart to the spirit of revenge. The motive for this meek endurance of wrong is love, which does not suffer us to forget that the wrong doer is a brother-man, whom we should strive to win to penitence and friendly relations by patience and forbearance (Gal 6:1, 2Ti 2:25, Tit 3:2).

Whether there should be any bounds to this acceptance of personal wrong is a question which has been brought into great prominence in our day by the teaching of Tolstoi. According to the Russian moralist, who has preached with great power the Quaker doctrine of non-resistance to evil, the old right of requital was abolished by Christ; not only should there be no private retaliation against wrong, but there should be no recourse to any legal tribunal when one has suffered injury or injustice. The law of non-resistance in Tolstoi's view is absolute; when we are wronged, we should suffer meekly in the hope that through our meekness evil will be overcome of good. Against this interpretation of the law of Christ in an absolute sense we have to set not only Christ's own example, when in the sacred name of justice He challenged the man who smote Him at the bar of judgment (Joh 18:23), but also the whole tenor of the Christian law. When Jesus, in inculcating meekness and love to our enemies, said, 'Resist not evil' (Mat 5:39), the context shows that He was not laying down a law which should be rigidly interpreted according to the letter, but that He was requiring a new spirit—the spirit of forbearance and love in dealing with those who wrong us. Christ's aim in requiring meekness of His followers was a moral aim—the furtherance of the Divine Kingdom, the lessening of the amount of evil in the world—a result which the meek endurance of wrong often brings with it in the disarming of enmity and in the quenching of the fires of ill-will, whereas retaliation adds to the evil and inflames the bitterness that already exists; but when it has become clear that forbearance and patience with a wrong-doer only confirm him in his evil courses, Christian love not only does not forbid but actually requires, in the interest both of public righteousness and of the wrongdoer himself, recourse to a civil tribunal that requital may be given. So long as there is any reasonable hope that meek endurance of wrong will turn the wrongdoer to a better frame of mind, we should be willing to suffer injustice; but when that hope has proved itself vain, there is nothing inconsistent with the spirit of meekness and Christian love in securing that justice shall be done and evil defeated by the procedure of civil law.

4. The dominion of meekness.—Meekness, though feeble to all outward seeming, is 'a world-conquering principle' (Tholuck). 'Blessed are the meek,' Christ said, 'for they shall inherit the earth.' 'To inherit the earth' (or, rather, 'the land') was originally the formula for the Israelitish possession of the Promised Land (Gen 15:7, Deu 4:38). In OT times, however, it had already, as in Psa 37:9; Psa 37:11, become 'a symbolic expression for the totality of Divine blessing and Messianic happiness' (Holtzmann). On the lips of Jesus the phrase has a spiritual significance; it expresses the highest good along with the collateral idea of world-wide influence. The inheritance of the earth by the meek does not come through outward possession, but by spiritual sovereignty. The meek, in accepting God's will in His disciplinary dealing with them, are not in bondage to earthly things, but are their true masters. They derive from life the highest good that it can bestow. They who rebel against the appointments of Providence miss the real gains of life. Only when the conditions of life are seen to be instinct with spiritual significance and intention as the expression of God's will, do they yield up the purest blessings that are hidden in them, and become the means of inward enrichment (cf. 1Ti 6:6). Further, they who are meek under provocation and wrong have a large spiritual dominion. They are the true rulers of men. Human hearts are won only by gentleness and love. God's Kingdom on earth grows not by requiting evil with evil, but by overcoming evil with good. That is the sovereignty of the Cross. And the future is with the meek. They are destined to have a world-wide dominion. Because God reigns and they accept and do the will of God, they are on the winning side. Meekness will one day claim the whole earth for its own, when men, conquered by the meek endurance of the Cross, bow humbly before God and live together in peace and brotherhood.

☒ Mental Characteristics

MENTAL CHARACTERISTICS.—There can be no full appreciation without some analysis: the friend who is understood is loved the better. That ‘love is blind’ is singularly false, save when the word is restricted to an unworthy meaning. True love gives insight always; and the power it gives of divining what to others is invisible is a species of analysis. There is no question, however, of analyzing Divinity. Divinity realized in humanity is what we know in Jesus Christ. In God Incarnate there can be nothing which is not human, though nothing which is human only. An attempt to analyze the mental characteristics of the Lord Jesus is therefore an attempt to appreciate the human manifestation which God has made of Himself. The first condition must be reverence, and the study is best undertaken with St. Paul’s teaching (1Co_2:6-16) in mind, for success is to be reached only if ‘we have the mind of Christ.’

1. Perhaps the first characteristic to notice is the way in which the mind of the Lord Jesus was always so thoroughly alive to everything around Him. In the single glimpse afforded of His boyhood this appears strikingly; for no one can read Luk_2:41-51 without feeling the eagerness with which He looked on Jerusalem for the first time consciously, and threw Himself into the best life of the festival. He was instantly at home in the Temple, and ready to listen and to inquire of the Rabbis there with a keen grasp which amazed them. Later on, the same ready observancy, which not merely noticed but entered into every phase of life, is again and again to be remarked. Now it was the flowers of the country side that won His attention (Luk_12:27), now the games of the children in the market-place (Luk_7:32), now the habits of the wild creatures (Luk_9:58), or their unconsidered treatment in captivity (Luk_12:6), now the details of the yeoman’s employment (Mat_13:3-8; Mat_12:11, Luk_13:11), now the unnoticed self-denial of a poor woman in a crowd (Mar_12:43). Just as readily He gave keen attention to the life of long ago told in the Scriptures of His race. For Him the characters appearing in the stories of the past were all real and vivid; e.g. Naaman (Luk_4:27), David (Mat_12:3), Zachariah (Mat_23:35). With no less alacrity He noted the current events which made a popular impression (Luk_13:4), and the far more momentous movements of national life which others too often overlooked (Luk_21:20, Mat_16:1-3).

2. In close connexion with the foregoing characteristic stands the fulness of vital force in the Lord Jesus. Of most persons it is true that the emotional, or the intellectual, or the volitional faculties dominate and give the general colour to the temperament, but in Him all were supremely strong. The vehemence of His feelings was such as would have overbalanced the will or unsteadied the intellect of another; but He never lost balance or clarity. The lucid understanding which never failed in things great or small would have subordinated feeling, or even sapped its strength, in most; but the calm sweep of His discernment never made Him less warm-hearted towards 'one of the least of these my brethren,' and He condemned at once any use of reason which restrained responsiveness, as when His disciples were inclined to check the children brought to Him and He was 'moved with indignation' (Mar 10:14), or when He promptly defended the woman's 'waste' of the costly ointment which her uncalculating love so gladly spent on Him (Mar 14:6). Yet neither warmth of feeling nor reach of understanding ever warped His will to excuse or palliate in any wise, or made His resolution waver. Nothing could be sterner or more unsparing than the way in which He turned on almost the best-loved and aptest of His disciples, and this, too, directly after His whole heart had gone out to him in welcome and in grateful sympathy for the trust and insight he had just shown (Mat 16:17; Mat 16:23). The narrative of the Temptation in the wilderness, which must have been derived from the Lord Himself, can hardly be paralleled in its dauntless determination, except indeed by the narrative of how He followed out in His work the ideal here resolutely formed, and never faltered in following it still when it led Him through the valley of the shadow of death.

3. What has been said of the poise of these three mental factors, which are found in every living action of every living soul, though hardly ever balanced evenly, must be extended in Jesus' case to a wider range. There is nothing more remarkable than the perfect proportion of His nature. Those characteristics which are found singly in others, and which are commonly antithetic and even incompatible, are found alike, and at one in Him. He was passionate: 'He looked round with anger' (Mar 3:5); 'Jesus wept' (Joh 11:35, cf. Luk 19:41); 'Jesus looking on him loved him' (Mar 10:21); 'Ye serpents, ye offspring of vipers!' (Mat 23:33). But who was ever so patient? cf. Mar 4:40, Joh 16:12, and the whole scene of His trial and crucifixion. He was full of reverence for the past; scrupulous in His respect for authority (Mat 23:2), and very sensitive to the sacred associations of ancient institutions (Mar 11:15-17, Luk 19:41-42; Luk 22:15). But He held Himself entirely untrammelled by either precedent or outward enactment (Mat 5:17-18 ff.), and appealed without hesitation to the conscience and instinct of every man, as to a sufficient and trustworthy test (Luk 13:15-16). His was an imaginative and contemplative mind; He loved to withdraw to the desert country by Himself, or with a handful of intimate friends, and to spend long hours in personal devotions. Even when work pressed upon Him, and He 'had no leisure so much as to eat' (Mar 6:31), feeling the harvest waiting to be reaped was far too great for His little band of fellow-labourers to cope with, He still spent what seems to have been an astonishingly large proportion of His time in seclusion. But never was a dreamer of dreams so intensely practical. Hard and prolonged work He undertook with zest, then slept at once and soundly, and woke ready for any effort or emergency at the instant (Mar 4:1-2; Mar 4:33-39). And His practical ability is strikingly apparent in other ways; e.g. He was so sure in the handling of men (Luk 9:57-62, Joh 3:1-15; Joh 11:6-16), so capable of picking out and dealing with the precise thing needing to be done at any given stage or moment (Mat 17:24-27, Joh 7:3-8; Joh 11:6-16). He was remarkably tolerant, and again and again gave offence to narrower minds by the width of His sympathies and the leniency of His judgments. Particularly is this illustrated by His relations with ‘publicans and sinners,’ which exposed Him to disgraceful calumny (Mat 11:19), of which He recked nothing; but His tolerance was also too great for His own followers to understand it (Mar 9:38-41), and great enough sometimes to shame the bitterest opponents into silence (Joh 8:7-11). Yet no one could be more rigid on occasion, as in His treatment of the Phœnician mother (Mat 15:23-28), or more inexorable in condemnation (Mat 23:13-36, Mar 3:28-29). His humility was profound, and has changed the estimation of this quality in the eyes of mankind. ‘I am in the midst of you as he that serveth’ (Luk 22:27), He would say, or show them even more vividly in deed (Joh 13:15). ‘I am meek and lowly in heart’ (Mat 11:29) was what He felt as He welcomed the weary, and gave thanks that the highest wisdom was ‘revealed unto babes.’ Yet never were such tremendous assertions made by any one about himself, or such unfaltering emphasis laid upon the place he must hold in the eyes of others, and the claims he made upon them: ‘He that loveth father or mother ... son or daughter, more than me, is not worthy of me. And he that doth not take his cross and follow after me is not worthy of me’ (Mat 10:37-38); ‘The Spirit of the truth shall glorify me, for he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you. All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine’ (Joh 16:13-15). Again, the stern independence which would not bend to make a ‘hard saying’ more easily acceptable, but would let all who would not receive it go their way, even if His closest intimates were to be included (Joh 6:66-68), and which justly called forth F. W. Robertson’s rejoinder, ‘Don’t care was crucified on Calvary,’ was no less characteristic of Him than that craving for sympathy which went with His sensitive and affectionate nature, and led Him to beseech the companionship of those whom He could best trust in such hours of agonized prayer as are recorded on the Mount of Transfiguration and in the Garden of Gethsemane. On the one hand, He always saw things just as they are, undistorted by His own feelings, unconcealed by custom or convention, neither excused nor glorified, if faulty, by their associations, nor hackneyed or degraded by their common abuse. This holds equally of the smallest details of the natural world (Mat 11:7) or of human life (Luk 14:7; Luk 15:8-9), and of the greatest forces at work in the world (Mar 13:2). All this marks Him out as a genuine realist. But, on the other hand, beyond all others He was an idealist. For Him the most real world was that Kingdom of heaven which He always felt to be ‘at hand’—within direct and instant reach. It was His own most positive experience not to ‘live by bread alone,’ but to satisfy the needs of His nature with food and drink that were spiritual (Joh 4:13-14; Joh 4:34). The story of the Temptation is perhaps the purest idealism ever written: but glimpses into His thoughts which are subsequently afforded show how the habitual working of

His mind was on no lower level of idealism (Luk 10:17-24). Again, He was intensely individualistic in His point of view (Mat 6:3; Mat 6:6; Mat 6:17), and, even in the widest sweep of forecast on the fate of the world, did not fail to regard each several individual in and for himself; in fact, His influence has given the world a different and a deeper conception of the worth and meaning of individual lives, and has gone far towards the making of the best modern thoughts of personality. But none the less He was quite free from the segregative and disintegrating individualism which has been the bane of Puritanism and Benthamism and other phases of thought in which the individualist standpoint has been prominent. And the aims He set forward were always communal. e.g. His followers were described as 'a flock,' 'a church,' 'a vine,' in which the severance of a member involved its utter futility. The 'Kingdom of God' was the one great end for which all were to live and work (Mat 6:33), careless of personal needs; and no condition for association with Himself was more imperative than that every one should 'disown himself' completely (Mar 8:34-37). But what is most remarkable of all is not that these and other antithetic characteristics, which are in other cases met with singly, were found in concurrence and in full development in the mind of the Lord Jesus, but that in Him they were in such perfect proportion and such intimate relation that they were not opposing tendencies at all. To say that it is impossible to indicate which way the balance of contrasted impulses inclined, so stable was the equipoise, is not enough. These things, which in other natures are conflicting, were in Him mutually supporting and at one. In nearly all minds one can detect more or less cleavage and internal strain, but that of the Lord Jesus was wholly annealed, showing only the finest temper without any tension.

The fulness, balance, and unity of the Master's nature make it impracticable to use in His case what is the commonest and readiest way of portraying a person. This is to throw into the foreground of the picture those features in which the character is exceptionally strong, or those deficiencies which mark it off from others, and to leave as an unelaborated background the common stuff of human nature. Thus by sketching the idiosyncrasies, and casting a few high-lights, the man is set forth sufficiently. But what traits are there in the Lord Jesus which stand out because more highly developed than other features? Where are His foibles or defects? Nothing truly human was wanting in Him, nothing was exaggerated. The fact which distinguished Him from all others was His completeness at all points, so that in the first and in every succeeding generation of His followers the greatest have declared, 'Of his fulness we all receive' (Joh 1:16). And this surely is what we must expect to be its mode if we try to conceive of a Divine incarnation. Even as Christ's power and presence give to such as trust Him 'perfect wholeness' (τὴν δλοκκριαν ταύτην, Act 3:16), so the power and presence of the Infinite realized in humanity is disclosed in a 'perfect wholeness' which raises every human feature and faculty above itself, and compels the confession, 'In him dwelleth all the plenitude of the Godhead bodily-wise'

(Col 2:9). It is difficult to mention more than four features which can fairly be called personal traits of the Lord Jesus. These are: His keen appreciation of the beauty of the natural world: His fondness for little children, whom again and again He held up for the reverence of His disciples, and whom He Himself looked upon with a feeling akin to awe (Mat 18:10); His love of being on a height (many of the cardinal points in His career were on the hill-tops, just as the crises of temptation were on 'an exceeding high mountain,' and when He was 'set on the pinnacle of the temple,' cf. Mat 5:1; Mat 14:23; Mat 15:29; Mat 17:1; Mat 28:16 || Mar 3:13); and His love of being often alone. On the other hand, if one seeks for personal characteristics due to the marked absence of anything that most men share, there is nothing that can be named, except that, unlike others, He was without 'the defects of His qualities.' Thus exaltation never passed into ecstasy; zeal never into rashness or one-sidedness; sympathy never into sentimentality; determination never into obstinacy; conscience never into scrupulosity; the habit of moral discrimination never into casuistry; standing indignation against the hypocrisies of the day never made Him censorious; a wonderful tenderness of heart left Him stern and uncompromising; and an energy which rejoiced in work, and shrank from nothing, never led Him to become exacting towards others or inconsiderate of their weakness.

In this connexion a word must be said on His relation to the stock of Israel. All His personal habits and customs, all His information, His religious premises, found their starting-points in the national life and customs of Israel, and in the Scriptures and other current ideas of its noblest minds belonging to previous days. And He never hesitated to adopt and use freely the practices and religious language which He found in the Israel of His age. But it is impossible, for all that, to regard Jesus as a typical, or as a perfect Jew. He had indeed all the best characteristics of the greatest sons of Israel, and notably of the prophets of the past; their zeal for righteousness, their fear of God, their tenacity of purpose, their noble scorn of the littleness of the earth and all that is in it in comparison with 'the high and lofty One that inhabiteth Eternity, whose name is Holy' (Isa 57:15). But He was likest them just where they were least representative of the race from which they sprang, just where they towered above their fellow-countrymen and were least appreciated by the latter. He rose above them all; and while nothing truly Jewish was discarded or denied, the Jew was left below. He was fully conscious of this Himself, and so the term by which He continually named Himself was at once the simplest and the greatest that a human being can bear—He was the 'Son of Man.' It is a title all can use, but He alone exhausts. And to this day it continually receives corroboration from many quarters, for His disciples, drawn from many races, never find Him alien to their own needs. To the Oriental believer Jesus is an Oriental, to the Western He has all the Western nature. The ancient Greek philosopher, the modern Hindu, and the Negro slave, no less than the British subject, see indeed different aspects of Him salient, but none feels in Him a national character which makes Him a foreigner from their several points of view.

4. A few negative observations are required, as they serve to define more clearly some of the characteristics of the Lord Jesus. (a) He was sinless. Amidst men whose eyes were sharpened by envy to detect the least fault, and who tried many times to ensnare Him in His words because they despaired of tripping Him in wrong conduct, He threw down the challenge without misgiving: 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' And none dared take it up, either then or later (Mar_14:55): nor in the sixty generations that have passed since then have any such ethical advances been made that, looking back from our present vantage ground, we can point to anything as sin in Him. But His sinlessness did not consist merely in the fact that no act of full-grown sin could be discovered. There was no taint anywhere in Jesus' mind. Everything bore the bloom of perfect spiritual health and maturity. Spiritual disease could find no foothold whence to spread its poison, not even in the hours of spiritual conflict and internal agony. 'One that hath been tempted in all points like as we are, apart from sin' (Heb_4:15), is the only possible description of Him. (b) He made no use of limiting qualifications in His sayings, or similar reservations in His action. He did not use 'ifs' and 'buts,' but spoke with simple decisiveness on the most complex questions. At times He would carry this to the length of paradox, and bid a man struck on one cheek turn the other to invite a blow. At other times He would restate a problem to strip it of those adventitious difficulties with which it is enveloped in common minds; as when He met the unuttered question whether He would break the Law by healing on the Sabbath, by putting the inquiry, 'Is it lawful on the Sabbath day to do good, or to do harm? to save a life, or to kill?' (Mar_3:4). But more often He went straight to the centre of the matter in hand with a simple directness which made all qualifications needless: His dealing with the Sadducees' puzzle (Mar_12:18-27) is a striking instance. This can be done only by one whose 'eye is single.' (c) Jesus was never critical. More nearly than anywhere else one seems here to discover a deficiency in Him; for the critical faculties are of great value, and in some minds are in admirable vigour. In Him they were in abeyance. And yet it is plain this resulted from no want of faculty. He could on occasion prove Himself matchless in dialectic; and in more than one controversy with skilled opponents He used this dialectic power with crushing effect. What could be finer than His appeal to the image and superscription of the tribute-money when plied with the insidious question, 'Shall we give, or shall we not give?' (Mar_12:14); or than His rejoinder to the challenge of His own authority, 'The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or from men? answer me' (Mar_11:30),—a rejoinder which not only silenced objectors, but went to the root of the question they raised as to the criterion of 'authority'? His dialectic skill sometimes passed into biting sarcasm, as when He pointed out how the scribes and Pharisees witnessed to themselves that they were the sons of them that slew the prophets, by the way they garnished their tombs (Mat_23:29-31). Here are all the faculties for critical efficiency, but the Lord Jesus was never critical. The fact seems to be that His mind was too creative. In minds of lesser stature, criticism may hold an honourable place, and often serves a very useful purpose; but it is always a second-hand way of winning truth. The truly creative mind does not need it, and does not use it, but reaches truth by direct intuition, or makes it spontaneously. He did so.

5. The last observation leads on to the mention of three mental characteristics which can hardly be separated, and which are all inwoven in the very fabric of Jesus' mind. His thoughts were always concrete, not abstract; His intellectual processes were intuitive, not argumentative; His views were ever positive, not negative. It has been very truly pointed out that 'only the widest generalizations and concrete facts are definite' (Hort); whatever lies between these extremes is more or less indefinite. Most minds are occupied mainly with this intermediate region, adding some degree of generalization to each fact of experience, and qualifying the largest generalizations by some accommodation to groups of facts observed. And to this is due not a little of the indefiniteness of most men's thoughts. But it was otherwise with the Lord Jesus. If He dealt with generalizations at all, He generalized out and out, dropping all half-way descriptions and limitations. He did not, therefore, shrink from inculcating principles which have often since been questioned on the ground that they are not of universal application. e.g. 'Give to him that asketh of thee' (Mat_5:42),—though experience shows too surely how much moral mischief may be done by indiscriminate charity; 'Ask, and it shall be given you' (Mat_7:7),—though prayers by no means always win what has been prayed for; 'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God' (Mar_10:25),—though wealth used worthily is no such bar to entry, and must itself be regarded as a 'loan from the Lord.' There is a definiteness in these unrestricted duties which could not have been attained by any carefully qualified rules of conduct. But more often the Lord Jesus adhered to concrete facts, and did not generalize at all. So, when any case came before Him, He dealt with that, and did not treat it as a precedent to govern others generally similar. Thus He told the rich young ruler to 'sell all he had and give to the poor, and follow him' (Mar_10:21). He certainly meant this to be done literally and at once; but it would be ruinous to turn this counsel into a command binding upon all rich men. It was never so intended, but was the particular remedy for the 'one thing lacking' in that one young man. No rule is to be directly drawn from the Lord's treatment of the woman in the Temple, or of Zacchaeus, or of Judas Iscariot, which would apply to all adulteresses, or renegades, or traitors: each was dealt with as the particular need required.

This was one leading reason why the use of parables was such a very characteristic feature in Jesus' teaching; they have been said, in fact, and not without reason, to be the most characteristic of the Lord's recorded sayings. They enabled Him to put the lesson He desired in the concrete instead of the abstract. So, when asked, 'Who is my neighbour?' He gave no general answer, but an actual instance occurring on the road (Luk 10:30 ff.). Probably the scribe to whom this was first spoken never found himself in circumstances that were similar; but if he gained the higher standpoint which this story gave him, and saw into the very heart of truth in that one case, he would be able, like thousands of others who have heard the story since, the better to answer his own question in his own circumstances.

It was a consequence of this love of the concrete, and avoidance of that vagueness which belongs to all that lies short of the widest generalization, that Jesus never gave definitions. Instead, He fixed the type in some particular fact or instance. In His teaching there was no theorizing, no abstract discussion, no systematic theology. Nor was there any care to lay down principles for the organization or policy of His Church in times to come. The nearest approach to this last is in such passages as Mat 18:15-17, or the directions given before the first mission (Mat 10:5-23); but in these nothing is more noticeable than the utter absence of all abstractions, and all provisions for distant contingencies, every idea being expressed in concrete form, and in immediate connexion with the conditions of the work in hand. And yet in all this there is no mere particularism. Each single fact on which He looked was seen by Him in its real relations to all else, and in the light of the highest and widest principles. There is true insight into human needs in the saying that 'little thoughts do not suit with little duties. It is in the fulfilment of simple routine that we need more than anywhere the quickening of the highest thoughts' (Westcott). With Jesus that was instinctive. Any fact in His sight was serious, was sacred; for it was not merely an illustration of a wider truth, rather it was an actual embodiment of eternal reality. He looked on the 'flower in the crannied wall'—no more—and saw it with such penetrating insight that to Him it was eloquent of 'what God and man is.' He showed just the same intuitive recognition of truth in His estimate of a man, or His grasp of a religious principle. Whether it were the purpose and use of the Temple, or the religious customs and conventions of the day, or practical problems involving conflicting considerations, like that set to Peter by the question, 'Doth not your Master pay the half-shekel?' (Mat 17:24), or inquiries on the outer confines of human thought, such as those concerning eschatology and the life beyond death, the Lord Jesus always looked into the very heart of the facts before Him, so that all accessories and accidents seemed to drop away and leave the truth in its naked simplicity under His eyes. He completely disregarded the things which for most minds overlies and confuse the essential issues, and fixed His gaze on those positive points round which all the rest was accretion. His mind therefore concerned itself but little with negatives in any case. One most important consequence of this was that He always saw whatever good there was in any man, and paid comparatively little heed to the evil which might be there also. He did not stay to combat or correct the latter, but freed and reinforced the former so that it grew till no place was left for the evil, and it was expelled. In His hands all the old negative commandments were transformed into positive ideals; and all were summed up in the one great ideal of loving God and one's neighbour (Mar 12:29-31), which was itself set forth in no lower form than the very highest, 'Ye shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mat 5:48). And in full accordance with this habit of mind, the judgments which from time to time He passed on men about Him were determined rather by what moral worth they had or lacked, than by what faults were in them. The most unsparing condemnation fell upon the Pharisees, whose lives were strict and reputable, and free from the gross and careless vices of the multitude. He denounced their whole moral and religious activity as an 'hypocrisy,' because it was one great negation. They were not 'sinners'; but with all the opportunities for good which more than others they possessed, their hearts and lives were empty. He portrayed them, and showed the futility of their whole religious method, by describing a man out of whom the unclean spirit has been driven, and whose house is then cleaned and left vacant. The cleaning out is not disputed, but all the more surely does the vacancy invite new tenants; and if no good spirit occupies the house forthwith, 'the last state of that man becometh worse than the first' (Luk 11:36). So in His pictures of God's final judgment the condemnation falls not usually on those against whom crimes may be alleged (though these find mention, e.g. Mar 12:9, Mat 22:7), but on the thoughtless maids found without oil; on the servant who took good care of his talent but never used it; on the guest without a wedding garment; on those to whom it is said, 'I was an hungered, and ye gave me no food; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not' (Mat 25:42 f.). The whole point of view of Jesus in this is in strong contrast with that of the Judaism of His age, which aimed at attaining holiness by an earnest and elaborate endeavour to eliminate unholiness and defend the shrine of the soul from trespass.

One aspect of these last-mentioned characteristics may be summed up in a word, by saying that the make of Jesus' mind was that which is found in the greatest poets. They all combine, as lesser men cannot, the realist and the idealist. Their ideas are concrete, not abstract. Their minds work by intuition, not by argument. Their interests and thoughts are positive; and they are all more or less insistent that—

'The evil is null, is nought, a silence implying sound.'

And much of the Lord's teaching shows that the sense of form and the feeling for language which belong to them were His in a remarkable degree. Perhaps it was not entirely the power of His own personality, nor yet the substance of what He said, but also in part the music of its expression, that enabled Him so often to throw a spell over His hearers: e.g. 'All bare him witness, and wondered at the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth' (Luk 4:22); 'The people all hung upon him, listening' (Luk 19:48); 'The officers answered, Never man so spake' (Joh 7:46). There is, of course, the truest poetry in many of His sayings and in His parables; and His teaching teems with flashes of imagery such as only the highest poetry presents. Even in form of language some of His sayings lack little of the rhythm and music of poetical expression. But we have to remember that He wrote nothing that remains, and that nothing has been reported in His original words. The best we can expect to find in the NT is a good and faithful translation; and who can translate poetry? But a doubt must remain whether any literary vehicle could carry the full poetic inspiration of the Lord Jesus. Poems, however truly living, are the reflexions of life. The Life itself was inherent in Him (Joh 5:26), and He came to impart it, not to reflect it (Joh 10:10). So His 'poems' (ποίηματα) are the souls which, generation after generation, He has created anew, the ideals which have transformed, and are transforming, the world: even as St. Paul said of his disciples, 'Ye are an epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God' (2Co 3:3). See, further, art. Poet.

6. There are some things more properly described, perhaps, as features of character than as mental characteristics, but the distinction is such a narrow one, being a difference in the point of view and not in the facts, that they must be mentioned, though as briefly as possible. The profound reverence of Jesus' mind is one. Not only does this appear in every relation to His Father in heaven, and in the way He taught His disciples to look up to Him, but also in His delicate respect for all those who sought His help, and the sensitive regard He showed for the spiritual responsibility of each person, on which He never trenched. Another is His simplicity. He loved a simple life in outward things, rebuking Martha for her too ample provision when so little was needful (Luk 10:41), and teaching His followers to spend little care on the wealth and comfort which He held so lightly, and to pray only for 'daily bread.' But simplicity is still more strikingly characteristic of the nature and process of His mind. Though more than any other that has ever lived He was 'many-sided,' He never gave the impression of a complicated nature. With the directness of a child He always turned to the point in hand; and no one was ever more free from that hesitancy which is so often found in those who are the best able to see both sides of a question. With sympathy unending and unlimited, He still was simple, and could put the loftiest thoughts into simple terms. That is always a characteristic of a really great—though not of every great—mind: never was an instance of it comparable with this one. Closely akin to this is the fact that Jesus was never disconcerted or bewildered, nor did He ever lose presence of mind in the most difficult or dangerous situations. Rather, in times of trial, there was a heightening of His serenity of mind; for trial and sorrow made stronger appeal to His faith, which was always responsive. μή μετεωρίζεσθε was a counsel most characteristic of Him (Luk 12:29); and it was this habitual trust in the Father that enabled Him in the very hour of impending agony to make His followers the bequest of peace—His peace (Joh 14:27; Joh 16:33).

7. Two matters of importance remain to be mentioned, distinct but by no means unconnected—(a) Jesus' characteristic outlook upon life, and (b) His method as the Saviour of the world.

(a) One cannot escape the feeling that while others look only at the surface of life, the Master looked through its surface and saw its depth: we see life usually in two dimensions, He looked at it in three, and so saw reality. Of course, from His standpoint all its proportions were very different from those which appear to us. The most striking expression of what is meant is to be found in Browning's description of Lazarus as given in the Epistle of Karshish. But while Browning had learnt the nature of this larger view, converting all proportions, from Him who called back Lazarus to earth, he represents it as a double prospect in Lazarus, with none of that translucent unity which is its essential feature in the Lord Jesus. The Beatitudes are an instance. Their chief effect, and it cannot be doubted their chief purpose, is to set the hearer on a new standpoint, and so enable him to gain a new view of life. It is no paradox that the poor are blest, while all men congratulate the rich; and this is not said to give emphasis to the aspect which is too much over looked. It is simply the truth of life, seen as the eyes of the Lord Jesus saw it when He looked round on His disciples gathered there, all destitute of earth's possessions, but with a light in their eager faces as they 'hung upon him listening' which told of the 'righteousness and peace and joy in holy inspiration' which showed that theirs was the Kingdom of God (Rom 14:17). All whose reading of experience goes deep can see, or partly see, why He counted sorrow blest, and gentleness, mercy, purity, and love the treasures of man's real enrichment. Another instance is the prayer He gave to His disciples when they felt the need of being taught how to pray. There is an unearthliness in it, and a grasp on the real depths of life, such as no other prayers disclose. God's glory, and His Kingdom, and the joy of fulfilling His will, fill up all the foreground; and the remainder of the view includes brief mention of bare needs here, and then fuller appeal for the deeper needs of forgiveness, and of the shelter of Him who is our 'shield and our exceeding great reward.' Hardly less striking is the way in which He enforced the duty of simple truthfulness, His words calling up vividly the awful picture of the Evil One leaning over the soul that talks loosely, to ply it with 'suggestions' which then find unsuspecting utterance as readily as those which the hypnotist gives to his unconscious 'subject' (Mat 5:37, with which cf. Luk 22:31). There were times when the Lord expressed strongly this contrast between the view which men took of life and that which He took (Luk 16:15), but more often His reference is a mere allusion. The difference culminated in that most characteristic and central idea on which He so often dwelt, that a man must 'lose his life to find it' (Mar 8:34-37 ||, cf. Mat 10:39, Luk 17:33, Joh 12:25). Death itself was accordingly transfigured in Jesus' eyes: it neither put a limit to life nor made a breach which destroyed its continuity. Death was for Him 'sleep'; a sleep from which He awaked more than one, and from which 'in the last day' He would awake and raise up 'every one that beholdeth the Son and believeth on him' (Joh_6:40). For Himself, He looked through death to His own resurrection, which He again and again told His disciples to expect as the day of His departure drew nearer; and for the rest, He recognized death with all its miserable and misleading associations as little as might be, and refused even to speak of it if this could be avoided (Joh_11:11-14). With His strong sense of the continuity of life there went, however, a very remarkable reserve about the future. Concerning it He disclosed nothing of detail; nothing that trust in the love of God and the assurance of life's continuity do not themselves imply. He plainly said He did not know the course of the future, and His disciples must not expect to do so (Mar_13:32, Act_1:7). But He never showed Himself averse to adopting the current religions language which rested on the prophecy and apocalypics of the past, to clothe those ideas which He wished to impress about the life to come; though it may well be that the eschatological passages in the Gospels are considerably coloured and confused by the fact that they have come through the medium of disciples who were not equal to following their Master's higher thoughts.

It is in connexion with this far profounder view of life which we find in Him that we are best able to understand the 'powers that worked in' the Lord Jesus (ἐνεργουῦσιν αἱ δυνάμεις ἐν αὐτῷ, Mar_6:14), and His consciousness in regard to them. The term 'miracles' can hardly fail to prove misleading, as it is so closely associated with the 18th cent. point of view, which considered them as exceptions to natural law, and as owing their evidential value to the fact that they were exceptions. That view is quite obsolete and impossible now to a really scientific mind: it was always singularly unappreciative of 'the mind of Christ.' There can be no doubt that Jesus Himself felt complete certainty that He did wield powers of an extraordinary and practically limitless kind (cf. Mat_26:51-53), and that His contemporaries never dreamt of disputing the fact. But to Him they were certainly neither 'unnatural' nor 'supernatural.' The distinction drawn by the latter term is quite alien to His mind, and inconsistent with His point of view; for Him the continuous character and flow of life was a fundamental idea, and the one unbroken reality included equally what we describe as 'natural' and 'supernatural.' The 'powers' of which He was conscious had their proper place and scope in life as He saw it; and if it is not possible for us to assign this, or to explain them, that is due probably to the single fact that, as already said, we try to see the reality of life from the standpoint of two dimensions, and can succeed so little in seeing it from that of three as He did (cf. Mat_16:19; Mat_18:18, Joh_20:23).

(b) The method which the Lord Jesus followed in carrying out His purpose as the world's Saviour was no less unique than His outlook on life, and it was the direct result of the latter. In the ordinary sense of the term He was no reformer; He did not try to make the institutions which He found serve their end better, nor did He seek to substitute one expedient for another, to attain more successfully the aims before Him. He felt that His Kingdom was 'not of this world,' and all He sought was to open its portal to believers. He did not pit His Kingdom against those of the world to overthrow the latter; rather He refused to let His followers do this or to do it Himself (Mat 26:52-54). Nor did He attempt to withdraw His followers from the world, as other religious leaders often have done, that they might serve God with less distraction. Even His prayers were not for change of the world itself, or the delivery of His disciples from it (Joh 17:9-21). Though His whole life was sacrificed to save the world, He just left the world alone. As in His teaching there was little that was negative, so in His work He tried to undo nothing. It is very surprising how content He always seemed to be to accommodate Himself to the use of any means or circumstance that lay ready at hand, while so unbending in aim throughout. Thus He spoke the religious language of Judaism, practised the customs in Israel, and respected its institutions, however much they were degraded and abused. He paid His half-shekel to the Sanhedrin and His tribute-money to the Caesar without protest. Browning again brings out with striking effect this feature of the Master's in his portrait of Lazarus, whose 'especial marking ... is prone submission to the heavenly will,' so that he tries to change nothing; but here again this characteristic, being isolated, lapses into quietism as it never did in Lazarus' Master. For, however willing Jesus was to use and leave unreformed the things around Him, none of these ever bound Him. If there was fault or falsehood mingled with what He borrowed for the moment, He left that on one side and moved on towards His goal unaffected. He saw the truth too clearly to be diverted by aught else, and the truth made Him free. And He led His followers into the freedom that was His own. So, while He abstained from all political intervention, and declined to be mixed up with the ordinary business of life (Luk 12:14), and left religious institutions and traditions where He found them, He nevertheless revolutionized all life. There is no department of human activity in the world to-day—except in some of its backwaters which have not yet felt His influence—which is not profoundly altered in consequence of His life and work and words. His confidence that it would be so never faltered; He saw here the supreme scope of the law of 'life through loss.' So He declared beforehand the result which is yet in progress under our eyes—'I, if I be lifted up out of the earth, will draw all men unto myself' (Joh 12:32). Of what import are the foam flakes which float upon its surface to him who plunges into the mighty stream of life? Jesus' view of life, and His method of saving men, both so original, both so characteristic, are both vindicated in full by the results. They are alike summed up in the joyous conviction which many and many a soul has uttered when lifted to His higher plane, and which even the world itself has been forced to suspect, though not to share: 'If any man be in Christ, there is a new creation!' (2Co 5:17, Gal 6:15).

☞ Mercy

MERCY

1. Mercy of God.—Mercy is ‘that essential perfection in God whereby He pities and relieves the miseries of His creatures’ (Cruden). In the OT the mercy of God (רַחֵם, רַחֲמִים; רַחֵן ‘to show mercy’) is sought and celebrated in (Psa 51:1, Lam 3:22), or more frequently where no connexion with sin is expressed (Psa 89:1; Psa 118:1). Sin and the distress which is the consequence of it are not always separated in thought (Psa 41:4; Psa 79:8-9).

In the NT a clearer division can be made of places where the mercy spoken of is temporal or spiritual. Those who came to Christ for help asked for mercy, that is, for pity and relief (Mat 9:27; Mat 15:22; Mat 17:15; Mat 20:30; cf. Mar 5:19). The word used is ἐλεεῖν, while Christ’s twofold response is expressed by σπλαγχνισθεῖς, ‘moved with compassion,’ and by His act of healing (Mat 20:34). Along with these may be placed Luk 1:58, Php 2:27, 1Co 7:25, where particular instances of mercy are mentioned. On the other hand, the words ἔλεος, ἐλεεῖν are used of the whole of God’s saving work in Christ (Luk 1:72; Luk 1:78, Rom 11:30, 2Co 4:1, Eph 2:4, 1Ti 1:13; 1Ti 1:16, Tit 3:3-7, Jud 1:21). In the publican’s prayer, ‘God, be merciful to me the sinner’ (Luk 18:13), the more exact translation is ‘be propitiated’ (ἰλάσθητι), as also in Heb 8:12 (ἰλεως). In these places the obstacle of sin is recognized, and the mercy described is such as overcomes sin.

Generally in the NT sin is described not only as the source of human misery, but as itself the greatest evil from which men need to be delivered; and accordingly the work of God's mercy is to save from sin (see Eph 2:4-10, Tit 3:3-7). In Rom 11:30-32 something is said of the Divine purpose in permitting sin, so that we may believe that the severities of God's judgments are not inconsistent with 'that essential perfection of mercy whereby He pities and relieves the miseries of His creatures.' But of this as creatures we have not the final right to judge (Rom 9:15; Rom 9:23). A deepened sense of the hopelessness of separation from God brings it about that no other deliverance is to be for a moment compared with salvation from sin (Eph 2:1-4; cf. Gal 1:4, Jud 1:21).

This is also seen to be the meaning of mercy when the method of God's mercy in the Gospel is considered, and the aim of it.

(1) Its method.—Christ's work teaches us that God's mercy seeks a higher good for men than the relief of temporal distress. We must think of Christ as abiding in the constant sense of the mercy of His Father, and communicating the same to men in word and deed. 'Be ye therefore merciful (οἰκτιρομενες), as your Father also is merciful' (Luk 6:36). 'Love one another, as I have loved you. Greater love hath no man than this' (Joh 15:12-13). That is to say, the mercy of God beginning with compassion went on to action, in the Incarnation and Atonement. 'This is he that came by water and blood' (1Jn 5:6). 'I lay down my life that I may take it again.... This commandment have I received of my Father' (Joh 10:17-18, cf. 1Pe 1:3).

Following upon the work of Christ, it is said of believers that they have obtained mercy (2Co 4:1, 1Ti 1:13; 1Ti 1:16, 1Pe 2:10); and that they look for the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life (Jud 1:21). And mercy is still continuously needed, asked for, and received by believers (Heb 4:16, Php 2:27, 2Ti 1:16; 2Ti 1:18). Also the prayers in 1Ti 1:2, 2Ti 1:2, Gal 6:16, 2Jn 1:3, Jud 1:2, indicate that it becomes us to go in prayer to seek the mercy which it remains always with God to bestow. It is noteworthy that mercy is added to the usual 'grace' and 'peace' of the salutations just in those places where some more intimate affection and tender sympathy is naturally to be expected (e.g. Gal 6:16, the Letters to Timothy, and Jude's Epistle). Whatever there is painful in the experience of believers constitutes for them a new need of the Divine mercy, and is to be explained as a part of God's purpose of greater good by saving them more and more completely from sin.

(2) Its aim.—The aim of God's mercy is expressed in Christ's words, 'That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven' (Mat 5:45). The parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mat 18:23) sets forth the purpose of God negatively, and in 1Jn 2:5; 1Jn 4:12; 1Jn 4:17 the positive side is given. God's mercy or love to us comes to perfect realization when we have learned to be like Him. Because He loves us He will have us to be merciful, that we may be at our best. In this way also the progress of the Kingdom of God among men is assured, as we see in a concrete instance in 2 Corinthians 4-7 (cf. Act 20:18-35).

2. Mercy of man to man.—We have seen that it is the aim of the Divine mercy to reproduce itself in the spirits of men. As mercy has two parts, pity and active beneficence, we are commanded to love not in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth (1Jn 3:16). This is Christ's teaching in Mat 9:13; Mat 12:7; Mat 23:23, and in the parables of the Good Samaritan (Luk 10:30) and of the Sheep and the Goats (Mat 25:31), as well as in that of the Unmerciful Servant (Mat 18:28). From these we learn that if gratitude to God does not avail to make men merciful to one another, they will be dealt with by penalties (see also Jam 2:13; Jam 3:17, 1Jn 2:9-11; 1Jn 3:15). This right disposition of heart is a product not so much of enlightenment of the mind as of such experiences as touch the springs of affection. The passage in 2 Corinthians 4-9, beginning 'as we have obtained mercy' (and, indeed, the whole Epistle), is a treasury of evangelical motives to philanthropic conduct. 'Our mouth is opened unto you, our heart is enlarged' (2Co 6:11). Similarly, in the case of St. Peter, 'Thou knowest that I love thee.... Feed my sheep' (Joh 21:17; cf. Rom 12:1 'I beseech you ... by the mercies (οἰκτιρμοί) of God that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice').

Selflessness, and the constraint that Christ's love lays upon a believer, are the important features of his behaviour in this matter of mercifulness. 'Though I be nothing'; 'I will very gladly spend and be spent for you' (2Co 12:12; 2Co 12:15). 'I am debtor ... as much as in me is, I am ready' (Rom 1:14-15). 'The love of Christ constraineth us' (2Co 5:14). 'We ought to lay down our lives for the brethren' (1Jn 3:16). When we look at Christ's own life for an example, we do not find in His case the indebtedness of one who has been forgiven, but we do find the readiness of unreserved surrender to His Father's will. 'I came not to do mine own will' (Joh 6:38). 'My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me' (Joh 7:16). 'I have not spoken of myself' (Joh 12:49). Thus the mercy of God does not work in vacuo, but in the concrete example of Christ and of men possessed by His spirit, and made vehicles of His mercy (Rom 11:31, 1Jn 4:12).

In the OT the word חֶסֶד 'mercy' is used of the duties of piety between kinsmen (Gen 20:13), or persons who are in covenant with each other (Gen 21:23). And it might seem in conflict with this that one of the most striking instances in which an appeal for mercy is disallowed in the NT is that of the rich man to his father Abraham (Luk 16:24). Similarly, Christ subordinated the ties of kindred (Luk 14:26) even with Himself (Mar 3:33, Luk 11:28) to the higher bonds of the Kingdom of God. Nevertheless the effect of Christian faith is to strengthen, and not to weaken, all the ties of human affection, raising them into the region of religion. The early motto of Christ's ministry was, 'I desire mercy and not sacrifice' (Mat_9:13; Mat_12:7); the same thought pervades the later chapters of the Gospel of John (13-17) and his First Epistle, passim, while both in Acts (Act_20:38; Act_21:13) and in his Epistles there is evidence of the overflowing, self-forgetting affection of St. Paul for the Christian Churches. The rule of pity and of active helpfulness is the teaching and the practice of Christ and His disciples. Mercy is the note of the Christian temper. See, further, artt. Grace, Kindness.

☞ Merit

MERIT.—The idea of merit in general is one which attaches to human conduct on the presupposition of the existence, in the first place, of a moral law; in the second place, of free-will in man, enabling him to obey it; and, in the third place, of some system of rewards and punishments, by which the worth of obedience to the Law is recognized, and equally the unworth of disobedience is demonstrated. That conduct is meritorious, or possesses merit, which corresponds with the moral law, and at the same time is voluntary; and, as meritorious, it claims honour or reward. This is the general ethical conception of merit (cf. Martineau, *Types of Ethical Theory*³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , ii. 80 ff.). The theological use, however, of the conception, and still more of the term ('merit,' meritum), involves further specifications, which follow, on the one hand, from the connexion of the idea with other theological ideas, e.g. those of God, of His grace, and so on; and, on the other hand, from the different analogies under which, from time to time, the relation of God to men has been conceived. Here we have two special cases of the use of the conception to consider: (1) its use in the Gospels; (2) the use not only of the idea, but also of the theological term 'merit' in reference to the work of Christ.

1. The idea of merit in the Gospels.—We note, first, that the use of the conception is frequent in the Gospels in connexion with a general view of God as the Judge and Rewarder of good and evil deeds. This conception of God was in fact that dominant at the time of the ministry of our Lord, God's relation to men being commonly viewed under legal analogies. Compare the statement of Schultz (op. cit. infr.):—

'When Christianity entered into the world and found its first expression in the dominant Jewish circles, as well as among the spokesmen of the idealistic Hellenic popular culture, the thought of a Divine repayment deciding according to legal standards, and therefore of a merit or demerit of men according to which their fate was to be settled, was a self-evident axiom.... With faith in God as the representative of the moral order of the world, there appeared to be self-evidently given the faith that He rewards and punishes according to the rule of human law.'

This statement of Schultz may be supplemented, with regard, in particular, to the doctrine of the Pharisees, which forms at once the background and the contrast of the teaching of Jesus, by the accounts of H. J. Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. p. 62 ff., and of Weber, *Jud. Theol.*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] p. 277 ff. In the Pharisaic theology the legal conception of God takes the sharpest possible form. The Law is thought of as the sum of so many precepts, the performance of each one of which establishes a separate and definite merit or claim to reward (Weber, p. 380 ff.).

'Just like a heavenly book-keeper, God reckons and calculates according to a standard quantitative as well as qualitative—here the sum of performances of the law and meritorious works, there the sum of transgressions and misdeeds' (Holtzmann, p. 63).

The idea of merit, however, does not end with the performance of the Law: it also attaches to 'good works,' i.e. voluntary acts beyond the strict requirement of the Law, but which are taken account of in the same way before God's judgment seat, and avail to make up the shortcomings of a man's account. The principal of these good works are almsgiving and works of charity (Weber, p. 284). Finally, the idea of merit is brought specially into connexion with the question of ultimate salvation.

'The judgment on men before the heavenly court of justice takes place with reference to the question whether the man shall live or die—whether he shall be found worthy of the future Kingdom of God or not' (Weber, p. 278).

The teaching of Jesus now proceeds in agreement with the theology of the Pharisees, in so far as He not only continually speaks of the rewarding of our works by God, but also represents the Kingdom of God itself under the point of view of a reward, which is awarded to the performance of 'righteousness.' We have the general idea of work and reward in Mat 6:1-4; Mat 6:6; Mat 6:16; Mat 6:18; Mat 10:41-42; Mat 20:1-7; Mat 24:45-51; Mat 25:14-28, Mar 9:41, Luk 6:35; Luk 10:7, Joh 4:36. For the Kingdom of God (life, or eternal life) as reward, cf. Mat 6:20; Mat 19:17; Mat 25:31-46, Mar 10:29-30.

The limitations set to the idea of merit in the teaching of Jesus, as compared with its use in the theology of the Pharisees, are, however, very striking. (a) First of all, we have to notice the change involved by the difference in the conception of God. While with the Pharisees the idea of God as Lawgiver and Judge is dominant, with Jesus this idea is subordinated to the conception of God as Father. The idea of reward itself, in fact, is connected with that of God's Fatherhood (Mat 6:1; Mat 6:4; Mat 6:6; Mat 6:18). What this implied is thus stated by Schultz:—

‘Since Jesus has taught His disciples to see the true understanding of their relation to God in the figure of child and father, then the thought of merit in the sense of the law is in general completely irreconcilable with the figure’ (p. 15).

Only an ethical, not a legal, conception of merit is therefore possible along the lines of the teaching of Jesus.

(b) Jesus criticised the Pharisaic doctrine of reward according to strict legal merit, by teaching that the reward which God gives is not according to debt, but according to grace. We have here to remember that when Jesus illustrates, as He frequently does, the relation of God to men by that of a master and his household servants (cf. Mat 24:45-51; Mat 25:14-30, Luk 17:9), this excludes the idea of legal merit.

‘A servant in the sense of antiquity cannot win merit. He is δούλος ἀχρεῖτος, even when he has done all he should (Luk 17:9). The Lord can reward him, but that remains at bottom an act of good-pleasure’ (Schultz, p. 15).

The point is made still clearer by the one parable where Jesus introduces a relation in which merit and reward are possible, speaking not of household servants, but of hired labourers (Mat 20:1-16). Here

‘He emphasizes in intentional paradox that the lord in his goodness will not bind himself to this rule—that he indeed redeems his promise, but reserves to himself the right to transcend the measure of the law in free sovereignty’ (ib.).

Cf., on the same point, Holtzmann (i. p. 196):—

‘This remarkable parable annuls the idea of reward in applying it, completely destroys the relation of merit and right, of performance and reward in general.’

We note, finally, to the same effect, the gracious abundance of the reward in Mar 10:30, Mat 24:46-47; Mat 25:21-23, Luk 6:38.

(c) Another criticism which Jesus passes on the legal idea of merit is that it is too external. God, the Father, looks at the heart. The better righteousness, which admits to the Kingdom, is an inward righteousness (cf. Mat 5:20 to Mat 6:18). But this affects the whole conception of merit and reward.

‘The reward belongs to the personality which reveals itself in the work, not to the performance as such.... Thus, what appears as reward is at bottom the recognition of the worth of the personality.... It is the conduct of life, the $\pi\omicron\tilde{\alpha}\xi\iota\varsigma$, which appears in the single acts, and is rewarded (Mat 16:27) ... as it is the love shown to the brothers of Christ which is recognized in the judgment (Mat 25:34 ff.)’ (Schultz, p. 14).

To sum up, then, we do not in the teaching of Jesus get a completely unified doctrine of merit, but we get clear indications of the lines which such a doctrine must follow. It must be ethical rather than legal; must connect itself with the conception of God’s Fatherhood, and with the idea of His free grace, rather than with that of His strict retribution according to law; and must have regard not to external actions only, but to the inward motive. The conditions are fulfilled if we recognize human merit as the worth to the Heavenly Father of the conduct of His sons when judged by the inward motive of filial obedience, and its reward as the recognition of this worth by His Fatherly love, which gives to His children who seek His Kingdom both this chief good and all things else that they need (Luk 6:31-32). As regards the individual actions of God’s children, the idea of merit is not to be connected with them apart from the general context of filial conduct in which they stand; nor is the idea of reward to be connected with particular Divine gifts apart from the gift of the Kingdom. Only on the background of the general conception of the reward of filial conduct by the gift of the Kingdom can particular gifts appear as the reward of particular actions.

2. The merit of Christ.—The definite theological doctrine, in which the term ‘merit’ is employed as a terminus technicus of the subject, lies beyond the NT. But it is anticipated in the latter, in so far as we there have a doctrine of Christ’s work as man, in which ethical standards are applied to the subject. (a) In this doctrine it is above all upon His death that attention is concentrated, as the point in which the character of His saving work specially appears. We have first the idea of Christ’s death as an act of obedience to God (Rom 5:19, Php 2:8, Heb 10:5-10). Further approximation to the idea of a merit of Christ is contained in the references to the worth of His death in procuring the salvation of men. It is a ransom (Mar 10:45), a price (1Co 6:20). In the idea of sacrifice once more we have both the idea of the worth to God of Christ’s death as self-surrender, and of its worth for men in procuring salvation (Eph 5:2, Heb 10:5-10). [The important series of passages further defining the sacrifice of Christ as an expiatory sacrifice is not brought in here; since these passages, so far as they contain this additional idea, belong properly to the Scripture proof of the doctrine of Christ's work, not as directly meriting salvation, but as making satisfaction for sin, and so making salvation possible. In virtue of the general idea of sacrifice contained in them, apart from the specification of it as expiatory, they may, however, be added to the proof of the doctrine of merit]. We have, further, references in the NT to the recognition of Christ's death by God. On account of it the Father loves Him (Joh 10:17); because of His obedience in it God exalts Him to universal lordship (Php 2:9-11). [Compare the Divine recognition of the worth of the work of the Suffering Servant in Isa 53:10-12]. (b) The conception of the work of Christ is not, however, confined to His death. His life is a ministry to men (Mar 10:45). His work (Joh 17:4) includes the manifestation of the Divine name to the disciples (Joh 17:6), the giving to them of the words received from the Father (Joh 17:8), the keeping of them from the evil in the world (Joh 17:12), as well as His final sacrifice (Joh 17:19). Moreover, it is not only the death of Christ, but His work throughout His life, that God recognizes in glorifying in turn the Son who has glorified Him (Joh 17:1-4). And, finally, both Mar 10:45 and John 17 imply that the work of Christ in His life and death is all of a piece; since in both passages, but especially in John 17, there is no break in the way in which the culminating work of the death is added on to the work of the life.

Summing up our results, we have in the NT the basis of a doctrine of Christ's merit as the worth to God (and men) of His human work carried on throughout His life, and culminating in His death. This worth of Christ's work is estimated by God along the lines of Christ's obedience to His will (the work of Christ being that which the Father has given Him to do (Joh 4:24; Joh 17:4)). It is recognized by God in the special love with which He regards Christ in the accomplishment of His work, and outwardly by His exaltation or glorification. It is to be noted, however, that while the position of lordship is viewed as the reward of the work of Christ, the salvation of men is not viewed in the NT as its direct reward, but rather as its fruit or effect (Joh 12:24). Christ saves, according to NT conceptions, by His earthly work, but not by means of it as a quantum which can be detached from His Personality, and rewarded by the salvation of men [as in the conception of the ecclesiastical doctrine of Christ's merit, presently to be discussed]. Instead of this, we have the conception that through His work He becomes a saving Personality, or, as Rothe puts it, that through it He 'qualifies Himself to become a Redeemer' (Theol. Ethik,² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] iii. p. 104). Our salvation follows from His work; since the Christ, who lived to minister to men, to make known to them the words which the Father had given Him, and to keep them from the evil, and persevered in His work to the death in perfect obedience to the will of His Father, thus offering up His life as a sacrifice to God, by this very work and the Personality achieved through it, exercises a saving authority and influence over men (Joh 12:32; cf. the similar idea in Isa 53:11, where the righteous Servant justifies many through his knowledge, and thus sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied). But the open recognition of Christ's work by God in the exaltation of Christ, which begins with the Resurrection, also contributes to His saving power over men (cf. Rom 4:25 'raised for our justification'); inasmuch as a human personality influences us not only by its inner worth, but also through the outward manifestation and revelation of that worth. Thus in the NT the Saviourhood of Christ is connected specially with His Lordship (Act 5:31, 2Pe 1:11). The name which is above every name (Php 2:11) is the name of salvation (Act 5:12). Cf. also the use of the name Christ, which implies both Saviourhood and Lordship, in special reference to the state of exaltation (Act 2:36; St. Paul also always thinks of the risen Lord as the Saviour). It is at this point that the way in which human salvation can be regarded as the 'reward' of the work of Christ becomes clearest, inasmuch as the exaltation which is His direct reward puts Him in the position to reap the full fruit of His travail in the salvation of souls.

Two more points are necessary to complete our outline of the suggestions of the NT towards a doctrine of Christ's merit. In the first place, there is required (c) a closer definition of Christ's saving power. What is the work by which He saves? It is, above all, the revelation of the holy love of God in Christ's life and death, which moves men at once to faith in God as revealed in Him, and to repentance (μετάνοια, change of mind from love of sin to love of God), and thus brings them into that communion with the Father which is the essential ground of all the blessings of salvation. Christ's love towards men and His holiness, in the absolute unity of His Person, are a manifestation of the love and the holiness of God, as existing in a similar absolute personal unity; and the trust and repentance which Christ inspires are directed through Him to God. For proof of these statements, the following passages, amongst others, may be referred to. According to Joh 1:14-18 the grace and truth of Christ declare the invisible God. In Rom 5:15 the grace of Christ is equivalent to the grace of God. In Rom 8:35-39 the love of Christ reveals the love of God. Further, in Joh 17:11; Joh 17:25 the Father whom Christ reveals is the holy, the righteous Father. Jesus awakes not only trust in the love of God (Rom 5:8; Rom 8:35-39), but also repentance towards God (Act 5:31; cf. the Pauline idea of baptism into Christ's death and resurrection as involving a death to sin and new life unto God, Rom 6:1-11). Finally, to know God as revealed in Christ is eternal life, or the sum of all blessings (Joh 17:3).

(d) In the second place, the above definition of the work of Christ as the revelation of the holy love of God, throws further light upon the 'reward' of Christ. We saw that while this meant primarily the recognition of Christ's work by God in His exaltation, it involved indirectly the fruit or effect of the work of Christ, as realized through this. But now it appears that the whole conception of the reward of Christ by God is subordinate to the idea of the immanence of God in His work. The work of Christ is not only the work which God has given Him to do (Joh 4:34; Joh 17:4), but God works through Him; so that the value to God of the work of Christ consists ultimately in His voluntary self-surrender to be the personal instrument in the world of the saving revelation of God, and the recognition of this work by God in the exaltation of Christ, which yields Him the fruit of His work in the salvation of men, is, at the same time, included in the execution of God's own purpose of salvation. Thus the ethical doctrine of the work of Christ culminates ultimately in the wholly religious view of it (2Co 3:1-9; cf. the subordination of the work of Christ to the grace of God in Rom 3:24-28).

Such is the outline of a doctrine of Christ's merit, as sketched in the NT. The agreement of it with the ethical lines of Christ's own general teaching on merit, as previously stated, is apparent. There is the same stress on the inner motive of obedience, the same domination of the whole subject by the idea of God's Fatherhood; while the exaltation of Christ is the analogue of the gift to His people of the Kingdom, in which they share His Lordship (Luk 22:29, 2Ti 2:12).

Very different is the ecclesiastical doctrine of Christ's merit, which, beginning with Anselm's Cur Deus Homo, extends throughout both the Catholic and the Protestant scholasticism. Here an idea of merit is applied to the work of Christ, which is essentially the same as that of the Pharisaic theology, rejected by Jesus. This idea exists as a general conception illustrating the relation of man to God from the time of Tertullian onwards, who introduced from the vocabulary of Roman law the term meritum, and its cognates mereri, promereri, demereri, to define it (cf. Harnack, *Dogmengeschichte*³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , iii. p. 16, n. [Note: note.] 1). As employed by Anselm to elucidate the work of Christ, it includes the following points. (1) The work of Christ is regarded as a voluntary work or performance, lying outside of the sphere of Christ's proper obligation to God. Anselm thinks of Christ as bound as man to obedience to God in His life, but as sinless man, free from obligation to die: hence His voluntary death is a work, which He can and does offer to God to procure the salvation of men. (2) The value of this work to God is estimated, not qualitatively by its motive, but quantitatively by the dignity of the Person who performs it. (3) The reward of Christ's work follows from God's justice, and the conception of this is equally external with that of the work itself, the reward being transferable from Christ to His people just like a sum of money. 'Whom could He more justly make the heirs of His debt (i.e. the reward which God owes Him), which He does not Himself need, than His relatives and brethren?' (Cur Deus Homo, lib. ii. cap. 9).

The Catholic schoolmen after Anselm, and the Protestant schoolmen after them, continue the Anselmic doctrine of merit, not, however, without many changes. Of these the most important are as follows. Peter Lombard, following Php 2:9-11, adds that Christ merited not only salvation for us, but exaltation and glory for Himself (Sent. lib. iii. dist. 18). Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus no longer deduce the reward of Christ's merit from God's justice, as does Anselm, but either from a relative justice or equity, such as that implied in Roman law by the relation of father and son, or lord and slave (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, ii. i. 104. 1), or from God's mere good pleasure (Scotus in Sent. lib. iii. dist. 20, qu. 1). By the Protestant schoolmen the material content of Christ's merit is enlarged by the addition of the general obedience of Christ's life, as voluntary, to the special voluntary obedience of His death (which latter they view not as a gift to God, but as an endurance of the penalties of sin). None of these changes, however, essentially alters the Anselmic conception of merit. Two points in particular stand fast throughout, viz. the idea of Christ's work as something voluntary and unowed, and the entirely external conception of it as a quantum, whose value can be assessed and rewarded by another quantum of corresponding value. Only in the idea, first fully developed, after Bernard and Lombard, by Aquinas, and continued especially in the Reformed theology, that the 'transfer' of Christ's merit to His people is mediated through His mystic unity as Head with them as His members, is the hard, juristic outline of the Anselmic doctrine transcended (cf. Summa Theol. iii. 46. 1). By the end of the Protestant scholasticism, however, the disparateness of the traditional idea of merit from anything in the NT had become clear to the theologians within Protestantism of a critical tendency. The Arminian Limborch says of this idea, along with that of satisfaction: 'Since they do not stand in Scripture, but have been invented by men, no one is bound to the meaning of them any further than it can be construed from the phrases of Scripture, to elucidate the sense of which they have been applied' (Theologia Christiana, lib. iii. cap. 21. 1). In the period of theological reconstruction since Schleiermacher, the general tendency of theologians, so far as they have not simply repeated older ideas, or dissolved theology into philosophy, has been either to reject the term 'merit' altogether, as being too much associated with the scholastic conception of it, or, if it has been retained, to reinterpret it along more Scriptural lines. Ritschl, above all, has succeeded in transforming into firm dogmatic conceptions the outlines of the NT doctrine, as above stated. See his exhaustive treatment of the whole subject in Justification and Reconciliation, vol. iii. [English translation p. 434 ff.].

⚡ Messenger

MESSENGER.—The word is formed from ‘message’ with intrusive nasal. It is used as the equivalent of ἄγγελος in its primary meaning of one sent on a message or to make an announcement. So it occurs frequently in the OT (representing מַלְאָכִי of Heb. and ἄγγελος of LXX Septuagint), and in the Gospels in Luk_7:24; Luk_9:52. It is to be observed, however, that in ‘messenger’ the emphasis is on the sending or mission, while in ἄγγελος it is on the message or proclamation. Philologically a truer equivalent is ἀπόστολος; and accordingly in two instances (2Co_8:23, Php_2:25), where missionary preachers are so described and where some special mission is in view, the latter is the Greek term used.

1. Towards the close of the OT the term seems to have acquired the meaning of a special or inspired teacher. Thus in Hag_1:13 the prophet styles himself ‘messenger’ as the bearer of Jehovah’s message. A similar meaning is at least probable in Job_33:23. And this usage is in some degree paralleled in the modern tendency to seek a definite ‘message’ in the literary works of distinguished poets and thinkers. The most important use of the term is in Malachi, a prophet whose name [if מַלְאָכִי be, indeed, his name; cf. Mal_1:1 and the Comm. ad loc.] means ‘my messenger.’ He uses the term three times and in three applications. First, it is a designation of the true priest, whose work is to conserve spiritual knowledge and teach the law of God (Mal_2:7). Secondly and thirdly, in Mal_3:1 it is applied to a forerunner, and to the ‘messenger of the covenant,’ who seems to be identical with the Person styled ‘the Lord whom you seek.’ These two applications are in the NT interpreted of the Baptist and the Messiah respectively. The words of the prophet with reference to the forerunner are with a change of pronoun (‘thee’ for ‘me’) repeated in identical form in each of the Synoptics (Mar_1:2, Mat_11:10, Luk_7:27). In these quotations, as in Luk_9:52, the messenger is one sent before to proclaim or to prepare. The direct application of the term to Jesus is not made in the NT, though a kindred idea is frequently expressed: in the saying which occurs in all the Gospels, ‘He that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me' (Mat 10:40, Mar 9:37, Luk 9:48; Luk 10:15, Joh 13:20; Joh 12:44); in the frequent Johannine phrase 'whom God hath sent,' and in the commission (Joh 20:21); and even in the term 'gospel' (εὐαγγέλιον), which is expressive of what Jesus described Himself as anointed of God and sent to preach (Luk 4:18). The conceptions of Christ as the Revealer of the Father and the incarnate Word are also kindred; and it might be argued that the language of Malachi was in the mind of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews in Heb 1:2; Heb 3:1; Heb 7:22 and throughout.

R. Scott.

2. In Heb 6:20 our Lord is spoken of as our Forerunner (πρόδρομος) 'within the veil.'

This is the only place in the NT where the title is used. A πρόδρομος (in the literal sense) was a messenger sent in front of the main army to examine the ground, clear the front of obstacles, or notify the presence of an enemy to the main body advancing behind (i.e. a scout, light-armed soldier, or spy). Here it is connected with the priestly work of our Lord. He has entered within the veil 'for us,' as our 'high priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek, i.e. in our interest, namely, to obtain pardon for us (Heb 9:12), to represent us in the presence of God (Heb 9:24), and to open up for us an entrance into heaven itself (Heb 10:19)' (Lünemann in Meyer's Com.). Probably, however, the military connotation is not to be entirely ignored. Just as an army advances securely under cover of its scouts far in front, so the army of believers moves on through the valley of the shadow of death without fear, knowing that our great Forerunner is in front. He has encountered and conquered death for us, so that we have no need to fear anything. This thought is beautifully elaborated from another point of view in Joh 14:2-3. When Jesus came back for a moment from the silent land, it was not with an air of terror or defeat, but as a conqueror, crying 'All hail!' (Mat 28:9). There is nothing to fear in the Beyond whither Jesus has gone before us 'to prepare a place for us.'

☞Messiah

MESSIAH is the English word based on the Greek representation of the original Hebrew or Aramaic. The Gr. reproduction assumes the varied forms ?es?a?, ?ess?a?, and ?ese?a?, corresponding to the Hebrew ??????? and the Aramaic ????????. The Heb. is the normal kat?l form, meaning ?anointed, which is translation into Greek in the term which has become so familiar, ?st?, the agnomen of our Lord. The Heb. ??????? was a term applied pre-eminently to the king, who was designated to office by the ceremony of anointing (1Sa_9:16; 1Sa_10:1, 2Ki_9:2-3; 2Ki_9:6). Priests were consecrated to office in like manner (Lev_8:12; cf. Lev_4:3; cf. Lev_4:16).

i. Anointing of Kings.—The custom of anointing the king, from which his designation as ‘messiah’ arose, is connected with magical usages of hoary antiquity, based on the conception that the smearing or pouring of the unguent on the body endows the human subject with certain qualities. Thus the Arabs of Eastern Africa believe that an unguent of lion’s fat inspires a man with boldness, and makes the wild beasts flee in terror from him. Other illustrations may be found in Frazer’s *Golden Bough*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , ii. 364 ff. The Tell el-Amarna inscriptions show that this custom of anointing the king with oil prevailed in Western Asia at least as far back as b.c. 1450. The passage to which we refer occurs in a letter from a certain Rammân-nirâri of Nuhašši in Northern Syria addressed to the king of Egypt, in which it is stated that a former king of Egypt [Thothmes iii.] had ‘poured oil on the head’ of Rammân-nirâri’s grandfather and established him as king of Nuhašši.* [Note: Winckler, Thontafeln von Tell el-Amarna (vol. v. in Schrader’s KIB), Letter 37 (p. 98).] Frazer’s great work has rendered us familiar with the supernatural endowments of a king who was regarded as a quasi-deity.† [Note: *Golden Bough*², i. 137-156; cf. also his Lectures on the Early History of the Kingship (1905).] That ancient Israel also believed that the royal dignity involved supernatural Divine powers, and that the oil poured upon the king conveyed these powers (like the ‘laying on of hands’), can hardly admit of doubt. The oil, like the sprinkled blood in a covenant-rite‡ [Note: According to Westermarck, the blood shed possesses a magical power of conveying a curse (‘Magic and Social Relations’ in Sociological Papers, vol. ii. p. 160). In the case of a covenant the curse falls if the covenant be not fulfilled.] (Exo_24:6 ff.), possessed a magical virtue.§ [Note: Thus shields were smeared with oil to render them or their owners immune (2Sa_1:21, cf. Isa_21:5. Saul’s shield was un-anointed, and so its owner perished).]

Like the priest, the king was regarded as a Divine intermediary, and assumed the supreme ritual functions of a priest in his own person. Among the ancient Semites, especially the Babylonians and Assyrians, the earthly ruler or king was considered to be the supreme God’s representative or viceroy. Sometimes he declares himself the ‘son of the deity’ (e.g. in the opening line of Ashurbanipal’s cylinder-inscription he calls himself binutu Ashûr u Bêlit, ‘offspring of Ashur and Beltis’; cf. the language of Psa_2:7), or ‘favourite of the deity’ (cf. the name of the Bab. [Note: Babylonian.] monarch Naram-Sin, ‘beloved of SIN. [Note: Sinaitic.]’ Sargon calls himself in the opening of his Nimrûd insc. ‘the favourite of Anu and Bel’). Further parallels in the case of Nebuchadrezzar may be found in Schrader, COT [Note: OT Cuneiform Inscriptions and the OT.] ii. 105 ff. See also Tiele, Bab. [Note: Babylonian.] —Assyr. [Note: Assyrian.] Gesch. 491 ff. Tiglath-pileser i. (b.c. 1100) calls himself iššakku (PA-TE-SI) of the God Ashur (Prism-Insc. col. vii. 62. 63), i.e. Ashur’s plenipotentiary.

That in this sacred function priestly office was involved may be readily inferred. Thus Ashurbanipal (like Sargon) calls himself not only the šaknu or vicegerent of Bêl, but also the šangu or priest of Ashur. Similarly the Homeric kings offer sacrifice on behalf of the people. As Robertson Smith remarks ('Priest' in *EBr [Note: Br Encyclopaedia Britannica.]*⁹ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred]), the king in both Greece and Rome was the acting head of the State-religion. So also in ancient pre-exilic Israel, David and Solomon offered sacrifices (2Sa_6:17 ff., 1Ki_8:63) in accordance with the tradition of the age.

ii. Unique position of David in Hebrew thought.—Among the Hebrew anointed kings or messiahs, David came in course of time to have a special significance. His importance was enhanced by the history of the three centuries that followed his reign. No Israelite or Jew living in the year b.c. 730 could have failed to note the striking contrast between the unbroken continuity of monarchs of the seed of David sitting on the throne of Jerusalem and the succession of brief dynasties and usurping kings who followed one another on the throne of Samaria. The swiftly passing series of short reigns terminated by violence which filled the space of 15 years in Northern Israel from the close of the dynasty of Jehu (which lasted nearly a century) to the accession of Hoshea, Assyria's nominee, to the dismembered kingdom, deeply impressed the prophet of Ephraim, who exclaims:—

'They have appointed kings, but not from me (i.e. Jahweh);

Have made princes, but I knew them not' (Hos_8:4).

It is not surprising, amid the rapid changes of rulers and the disasters wrought by foreign invasion, that Hosea should have prophesied the discipline of exile for his faithless countrymen, and as its final issue that they should return and seek Jahweh their God and 'David their king.'* [Note: There is not a shred of evidence to show that this clause is not genuine in Hos_3:5. It is difficult to see why, if the idea 'had its roots in Isaiah's time' and not in that out of which Eze_34:23; Eze_37:24 f. Eze_45:8-9 and Jer_30:9 arose (Harper, ad loc.), we should follow Wellhausen in rejecting the clause. Nowack rejects the entire verse.] For amid all the vicissitudes of the last three centuries the seed of David had survived every peril. The 'sure mercies of David' to which the Jews still clung, though with feeble hope, in the dark days of exile (Isa_55:3), began in the age of Isaiah to take root in the national imagination. Though Judah was destined to suffer terrible chastisements, yet as a result of the disciplinary trial 'a remnant would return' (i.e. be converted) to Jahweh, and Jerusalem would be preserved from the onslaughts of the Assyrian foe. The Immanuel prophecy, which contained the assurance of God's presence among His people, delivered to the doubting Ahaz and his unbelieving court during the dark days of b.c. 735, became the germ of a great series of Messianic passages which are found in Isa 9:1-6 [English 2-7], which was probably composed soon after b.c. 701, in Isa 11:1-9, and, lastly, in Isa 32:1-3. In the first the Messiah is portrayed as a military conquering hero, 'breaking in pieces the oppressor's mace'; in the second, the sounds of discord cease, and He, sprung from Jesse's stock, is the ruler of justice and peace in God's 'holy mountain' of Zion, where even the powers of violence and injustice are turned into submission to a Divine authority. In the last He is again the King who shall reign in righteousness, 'a hiding-place from the wind, a covert from the tempest.'

All these passages, as well as Is 2:2-4, are regarded by Duhm as Isaianic. On the other hand, Cheyne, Hackmann, and Marti hold that they are post-exilic,* [Note: Recently Prof. R. 11. Kennett has discussed Is 9:1-7 in JThSt (April 1906), and would assign it to the Maccabaeen period. The epithets are referred to Simon the Maccabee.] but on what the present writer considers to be insufficient grounds. The subject is discussed by Cheyne in his Introd. to Isaiah, pp. 44 ff., 57 ff., and 173-176; also by Hackmann, Die Zukunftserwartung des Jesaja, pp. 126-156, and by Marti in his Commentary on the above passages: cf. also his *Gesch. der Isr. [Note: Israelite.] Religion*⁴ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , p. 191 footn., 255 ff. On the other side, see the Commentaries of Duhm and Dillmann-Kittel (1898) on these passages, and the Century Bible, Com. on 'Isaiah' by the present writer. Kautzsch, in his elaborate art. 'Religion of Israel' in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible (Extra Vol. p. 696^a), admits the reasonableness of the view here advocated.

After the gleams of hope awakened by Hezekiah and the deliverance of Jerusalem, and after the glowing anticipations of an ideal Messianic King clothed with Divine powers, to which Isaiah in the early years of the 7th cent. gave expression, there followed a time of reaction when these high hopes suffered temporary eclipse. Men's hearts became sick of waiting. The long reign of Manasseh, followed by the brief reign of Amon, was a period of religious as well as political decline. On the other hand, the reign of Josiah reawakened the hopes of the faithful adherents of Jahweh, and it is significant that Messianic expectation revives in the oracles of Jeremiah. In Jer 23:5-8 (cf. Jer 30:9) he foretells the coming days when a righteous branch or shoot shall be raised unto David, who shall reign prudently and execute judgment and justice. In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel dwell secure, and the name by which he shall be called is 'Jahweh is our righteousness' This fragment probably belongs to the earlier utterances of Jeremiah, and upon it Zechariah in the opening years of the post-exilic period bases his well-known prophecies (Zec 3:8; Zec 6:12), in which Joshua and his comrades are addressed as tokens of the coming of Jahweh's servant 'the branch' (Zec 3:8). In Zec 6:12 it is made clear that Zerubbabel of the seed of David is meant, who is destined to complete the building of the Temple.† [Note: Duhm deals very arbitrarily with these passages. Jer 23:5-8 was not the genuine utterance of Jeremiah, but a post-exilic addition. Zec 3:8; Zec 6:12 are badly corrupted, and later editors have sought to eliminate the name of Zerubbabel from the original oracle, because Zechariah's prophecies with respect to him were not fulfilled.

Probably Mic 5:1-8, like Jer 23:5-8, may be assigned to the earlier years of the reign of Josiah, when the religious and political outlook of Judah appeared more hopeful, and the overthrow of Assyria seemed as probable as it did to Isaiah after b.c. 701 (Isa 9:3-4 [Heb.]). We may assign Nah 2:2 to Nah 3:19 to the same period.] With the passage in Jer 23:5-8 cf. also Jer 30:9, Jer 33:15 as well as Eze 21:32; Eze 34:23-31; Eze 37:24. In Jeremiah less stress is laid on the personal and material features, more emphasis placed on the ethical. Also it appears from several passages that Jeremiah thought rather of a succession of rulers of Davidic descent than of a single ruler. But in determining this question the utmost critical caution is required. Thus Jer 33:14-24 is regarded by most critics as a later addition to the oracles of Jeremiah (see, e.g., Giesebrecht's Com., and Cornill in SBOT [Note: BOT Sacred Books of Old Test.]). Certainly after the time of Jeremiah the personal features in Messianic prophecy became fainter. 'There shall not be cut off from David one that sits upon the throne of the house of Israel' (Jer 33:17), points to a succession of rulers at a time when the hopes of Israel still clung to the 'sure mercies of David.' But this utterance, as we have already seen, belongs to a later time than that of Jeremiah. Zephaniah and Obadiah make no reference to the Messianic King. When we consider their historic environment, this is not surprising. For royalty in Judah was rapidly declining in power and prestige. The last kings of Judah became mere puppets in the hands of foreign princes, who pulled the strings from the banks of the Nile or of the Euphrates. Under these circumstances the ideal of a Davidic ruler ceased to appeal as powerfully as it did a century earlier, and ultimately gave place to another. It is marvellous that it continued to survive after the rude shocks of a hundred years.

Its survival is probably due to Ezekiel, the priest-prophet, herald of restoration, of hope and of reconstructive effort. This prophet was an earnest student of Israel's past, and read its records and its oracles. The influence not only of his great elder contemporary Jeremiah, but also of the earlier prophets Hosea and Isaiah, is unmistakable. The influence of the first and the last is clear in Eze 34:23-31 'And I will set over them a shepherd, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; ... and I the Lord will be a God unto them, and my servant David a prince in their midst.' Here, as in the case of Jer 23:5-8, David represents a succession of Davidic descendants sitting on his throne. When we turn to Ezekiel's ideal scheme of the restored Jewish theocracy (chs. 40-48), we find that the secular prince of Davidic lineage falls into the background, and his functions are subordinated to the ecclesiastical routine. The same fate in the early post-exilic period befalls the somewhat shadowy, if stately, figure of Zerubbabel in Zechariah 4, 6 (cf. Hag 2:22), who was soon destined to subside into the background in the presence of Joshua the high priest, the natural and legitimate head of the newly constituted Church-nation. In truth, the Messianic King rapidly becomes a vanished ideal of prophecy. In the closing verses (14-20) of Zephaniah (obviously an addition belonging to the late-exilic or early post-exilic period) it is Jahweh who is Israel's King in the midst of His people, their mighty Hero who wards off the nation's foes (Hag_2:15-19).

When we turn to the Deutero-Isaiah (40-55), we find that an entirely new ideal, to which reference has already been made, had displaced the earlier and older one created by Isaiah. In place of the national-Messianic King we have the national-prophetic ideal of the Suffering Servant of Jahweh, through whose humiliation and sorrow the sinning nation shall find peace. God's anointed king, who is not of Davidic descent at all, but the Persian Cyrus, is the chosen instrument for accomplishing the Divine purposes with respect to His servant Jacob (Isa_44:28; Isa_45:1-4). We shall have to note how profoundly the Deutero-Isaianic portraiture of the Suffering Servant came in later times to modify the Hebrew ideal of the Messiah, and to constitute an entirely new conception which the Hebrew race only partially and very slowly assimilated, and whose leaven worked powerfully in the Messianic ideal of the 'Son of Man' in the consciousness of Christ and His immediate followers.

When we pass to the Trito-Isaiah (56-66), which probably arose in the years that immediately preceded the advent of Nehemiah, we find that the old ideal of the Davidic Messiah, which Ezekiel and Haggai attempted with poor success to revive, has altogether disappeared. Not even in the lyrical collection (60-62) is the faintest note to be heard of a Messianic Jewish King. The prophecies of Malachi are equally silent. We have to wait for centuries—perhaps as late as the declining days of the Hasmonaeans—before the Davidic Messianic King definitely and clearly reappears.

Before we pass to the Greek period (b.c. 300 and later), it is necessary to refer briefly to a series of OT passages of a Messianic or reputed Messianic character. (1) Gen_3:15 (belonging to the earlier Jahwistic document, J 1) can only by a strained interpretation be regarded as Messianic at all. The seed of the woman and the serpent (representing the power of evil) are to be engaged in prolonged conflict, in which both suffer injury. In this struggle it is not expressly stated which side will triumph (so Dillmann). (2) Gen_49:10 is exceedingly obscure. The rendering, 'as long as one comes to Shiloh' (Hitzig, Tuch), is doubtful in point of Hebrew usage, and difficult to sustain historically. The Greek versions attribute to the phrase an obscure Messianic reference, but interpret לְשֵׁבֶט as a late Hebrew compound form with a relative, which can be accepted only after making violent assumptions.* [Note: LXX τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ, 'that which is reserved for him.' The LXX in some variants has ἕως ἃν ἔλθῃ ὃ ἀπόκειται, 'till there comes he to whom it (? the sceptre) belongs,' which is the rendering of the Targ. of Onkelos and also of Jerusalem. This most clumsy and almost impossible construction is apparently due to the influence of Eze 21:32, where, however, we have a subject for the relative clause, viz. הַמֶּלֶךְ.] Giesebrecht ingeniously proposed to read in place of שֶׁלֶה the form מִשְׁלֶה 'his ruler.' He rightly argues that to read שֶׁלֶה as the LXX Septuagint presupposes, immediately followed by וְלִי, constitutes a very awkward and intolerable combination.† [Note: Beiträge zur Jesaiakritik, p. 29, footnote. It is difficult to understand the acquiescence of Gunkel in the construction pre-supposed in the alternative rendering of the LXX variant (cited in the previous footnote).] If we accept this emendation, the passage may be regarded as Messianic. But it is most probably an insertion moulded on Eze 21:32, for it stands in no immediate relation to the verses that precede or follow.‡ [Note: See Driver in Expositor, July 1885; EBi, art. 'Shiloh'; and Bennett's 'Genesis' (Century Bible), ad loc.] (3) 2Sa 7:4-17. Here 2Sa 7:15-16 are the expression, placed in the mouth of the prophet Nathan, of the sentiment of reverence to the House of David, which took its rise in the latter part of the 8th century. Budde refers this speech of Nathan and the following prayer of David to a later period than the other more primitive sections of the historical narrative, and we may reasonably follow him in ascribing this passage to the 7th cent.—not improbably the same period as that in which Jer 23:5-8; Jer 30:9 arose.§ [Note: Budde's Com. on the Books of Samuel (J. C. B. Mohr), p. 233; cf. also his Richter u. Samuel, pp. 244, 247.] (4) Num 24:17 'A star hath marched (? gleamed) out of Jacob, and a sceptre hath arisen out of Israel, and hath broken in pieces the sides (temples) of Moab, and hath destroyed all the sons of Seth' (?). The text is here difficult, and many points are uncertain. The entire series of Balaam's oracles are brought together by the redactor of the J [Note: Jahwist.] and E [Note: Elohist.] documents, and the reference of the lyric passage just cited may be either to David (2Sa 8:2) or to Omri (cf. insc. of Mesha, lines 4-8, and art. 'Omri' in Hastings' DB. [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] || [Note: | The Com. of Dr. Buchanan Gray (ICC) should be consulted.] Its Messianic interpretation by early Christian writers (Justin Martyr, Irenaeus), as well as by Rabbi Akiba, who referred it to Bar Cochba in the days of Hadrian (cf. also the Targums of Onkelos and Jon.), need not detain us. (5) Deu 18:15 'A prophet shall Jahweh thy God raise up unto thee from thy midst from thy brethren, like unto me. To him shall ye hearken.' This passage is quoted in Act 3:22; Act 7:37 as having an individual Messianic reference. But the context (cf. the verses that immediately precede) clearly proves that the reference is general, and not individual. The Israelites are not to pay heed to the magician or soothsayer, but to God's true prophet, like Moses, whom He will raise up in Israel from time to time (see Driver's Com. in ICC [Note: CC International Critical Commentary.]). (6) Lastly, we have a series of Psalm passages. Psalms 2 (esp. Psa 2:5 ff.). 72, 89, 110 may be taken as the most conspicuous examples of the revived Messianic expectation. They all belong to the Greek period. Psalms 2, like

Psalms 1 (both without superscription), was evidently placed by the redactors at the head of the Psalm collection, and belongs to a late period. Psalms 2, like Psalms 110, originates from the Maccabean days, when the old conception of the national deliverer from foreign enemies, which was created by Isaiah after Judah's emergence from a desperate crisis, once more revived.

Before we come to deal with the later phases of Messianic expectation, we would here note the historic evolution of three distinct lines of anticipation respecting the human agency whereby Israel's salvation and the establishment of a Divine and righteous rule would be effected. (1) The righteous Messianic warrior-king of Davidic descent. (2) The prophetic sufferer portrayed in Isaiah 40-55, and esp. in Isa 52:13 to Isa 53:12—a conception which may also underlie the obscure passage Zec 12:10-11. (3) The prophetic ideal, based mainly on Deu 18:15, which came to be identified with the heraldic prophet of 'the great and terrible day of the Lord,' the Elijah of Mal 4:4 f. [Heb. 3:22 f.], or was identified with the Messiah Himself (Act 3:22 f.). Cf. Mar 6:15; Mar 8:28, Joh 1:21; Joh 6:14; Joh 7:40, and Wendt's Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 67 f.

iii. Transformation of the Messianic ideal through Apocalyptic.—The kingdom of righteousness and the fear of the Lord, or what is expressed in the Biblical phrase the Kingdom of God, was not to be attained without a struggle against opposing forces political and moral, or without the instrumentality of a personal leader, sometimes an anointed king of Davidic descent, through whom the victory was to be won for Israel. For throughout we find that Israel, or a purified remnant, stands at the centre of the whole movement towards righteousness, and becomes more or less identified with it. Accordingly, the closest connexion subsisted between the national Messiah and that future state of blessedness, a restored theocracy, which became the steadfast expectation of the Jewish race since the destruction of Solomon's temple in b.c. 587. At first it was believed that the desired consummation would not long be delayed. The existing generation and the earthly scene in which the prophet lived would behold the great day of the Lord and the advent of the salvation foretold. But ever since the days of Amos, and still more after the discipline of the Exile, the horizons of time and space expanded.

1. After the Exile and the return of the Gôlah (exiled Jews), the advent of the fulfilled hopes of a Divine kingdom of righteousness was still delayed, and the Messianic age seemed as far off as ever, even after Nehemiah and Ezra had worked at their task of reform. As time went on, the disappointed expectations of post-exilic Judaism bred among the spiritual leaders a spirit of hopelessness as to the political outlook, and this is echoed in their religious hymns: 'Does Jahweh cast off in abhorrence for ever; will he no more be gracious? Is there an end to his kindness for evermore' (Psa 77:8-9 [Heb.]); cf. Psalms 22, 37, etc. Trust in Jahweh still survived, and His faithful followers clung to the Tôrah (Psa 19:8-12 [Heb.] and 119 passim), but Messianic expectation languished. The outlook of the present time was hopeless. But amid the enlarged horizons of time as well as space to which we have referred, the thoughts of some of the most spiritual minds in Judaism were directed to the transcendental and ultimate. In that world God would finally vindicate Himself and His ways to the expectant faith of Israel. A distinction began to be established between the present and the future age or aeon. The former is corrupt, and hopelessly delivered over to Satan and the powers of darkness. Victory will come in the latter. As we approach the time of Christ, the distinction between the present age (הַיָּמִים הַזֵּהוּ or αἰὼν οὗτος) and the age to come (הַיָּמִים הַבָּאִים or αἰὼν μέλλων) becomes sharply contrasted, and the transcendental features and colouring which invest the latter, and the final conflict with the heathen or demonic powers (Gog and Magog in Ezekiel 38, 39, attributed by some recent critics to a later hand than Ezekiel) characterize the new and later phase of Messianic expectation. This final agony or conflict, called in later times the 'Messianic sufferings or pangs' (הַמְשִׁיחִית הַבְּלִי), which was to usher in the new age, was no longer confined to earth. It was universal and cosmic. These apocalyptic features (which first meet us clearly in that latest addendum to the Isaianic oracles, Isaiah 24-27) now impress themselves on Messianic expectation, though by no means always; cf. Mar 13:6-37, Joh 16:11; Joh 16:20-22.

2. Another feature of equal importance, which begins to emerge in apocalyptic literature, left its impress on Messianic expectation, viz. the belief in the resurrection of the dead. The first clear intimations of this faith are to be found in Isa 26:19, Dan 12:2. In the older apocrypha (Sirach, Judith, Tobit, 1 Mac.) it is absent. In the later (2Ma 7:9; 2Ma 7:14; 2Ma 7:23; 2Ma 7:29; 2Ma 7:36; 2Ma 12:43-44) it is obviously present. In the Wisdom of Solomon it takes the form of a happy life after death for the just (Wis 3:1-9; Wis 4:7; Wis 5:16; Wis 6:20).* [Note: Schürer, GJV3 ii. 508.] It is hardly necessary to emphasize how profoundly this belief in the resurrection of the righteous (the most primitive form of the doctrine limited the resurrection to them) moulded the Christology of St. Paul. For to St. Paul, Christ is the Second Adam, endowed with the πνεῦμα ζωοποιού (1Co 15:45), in whom all His faithful followers are made alive (v. 22); cf. Rom 6:3-11. See Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, pp. 237-248.

3. The pre-mundane existence of the Messiah was another mode of the larger transcendental mould of thought which apocalyptic reveals. Belief in the ante-natal existence of the Messiah was only part of a general tendency of Jewish speculation. The new Jerusalem, the Temple, and Paradise existed before the creation of the world (Apocalypse, Apocalyptic Bar 4:3, 59:4, Assumpt. Mosis 1:14, 17). The Midrash on Pro 8:9 even goes beyond this, and expressly mentions the Messiah among the seven things created before the creation of the world, viz. the Throne of Glory, Messiah the King, the Tôrah, ideal Israel, Repentance, and Gehenna.* [Note: Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 175.] The pre-mundane existence of the Messiah is also certified in the Targ. [Note: Targum.] on Isa 9:6 and Mic 5:2. In these metaphysical conceptions, stimulated, as we may with considerable probability believe, through the Platonic doctrine of archetypal ideas which passed in the great stream of Hellenic influence over the Jewish Diaspora, we clearly discern what Charles aptly calls a Semitic philosophy of religion.† [Note: Book of Enoch, Introd. 1 p. 23, in his description of Apocalyptic generally. It is quite possible that we have a trace of it in that profoundly speculative Psalms, 139 (note vv. 15, 16). With reference to the pre-existence of the Messiah (not His name only, as Volz seems to assume in Jüd. Eschatologie, p. 217), see Enoch 48:2-6, and cf. Charles' notes (and 62:7). 'Name' here connotes existence as in the Babyl. Creation tablet (lines 1, 2). On the other side, as against the Jewish belief in Messianic pre-existence, see Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 245.] By this doctrine of pre-mundane existence the things of God were lifted above the universal lot of change and decay, and brought into the realm of adamantine permanence. As Baldensperger acutely remarks, it became, in the minds of reflective and pious Jews, a guarantee against loss.‡ [Note: Selbstbewusstsein Jesu 2, p. 89; Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, p. 218.] We need not labour to set forth how profoundly it affects NT thought, especially Pauline and Johannine (2Co 8:9, Php 2:7; cf. 2Co 4:4, Col 1:5, Heb 1:2; Heb 2:10, Joh 1:1-3).

4. Messianic titles.

(a) Among the most significant for students of the NT is that of 'Restorer,' which is probably involved in the epithet Ta'eb, which occurs in the apocalypse of the Samaritan liturgy for the Day of Atonement. In the day of Ta'eb it was believed that the sacred vessels of the Temple would reappear which had been concealed on Mount Gerizim,§ [Note: Bousset, Religion des Judentums 2, pp. 258, 267, 274.] and it has been conjectured that this same idea of Restorer underlies the epithet Taxo (Greek τὰ ξων) in Assumpt. Mosis 9:1. In the literature of the time of Christ we frequently meet with this conception of the Messiah. Thus in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Test. Levi, 18), which may have originated about a century before Christ's birth, the Messiah is regarded as the coming restorer of the Paradise lost by Adam's transgression. In Act 3:21 the καὶροὶ ἀποκαταστάσεως clearly reflect this tradition. This function of 'restorer' was evidently ascribed to the Messiah and not to God's messenger Elias, referred to in Mal 3:1-18 f. [Heb.]

(b) Other significant epithets, as 'Son of a woman,' prob. in allusion to Isa 7:14, appear, if the text be sound, in the Book of Enoch (Similitudes) 62:5, 69:29. || [Note: | Here, however, it should be noted, in both passages Charles adopts the reading 'Son of Man.'] This is of interest when we compare the Pauline 'son of a woman'

(Gal 4:4). On the other hand, the designation ‘horned,’ or ‘two-horned’ (B^erçshîth Rabbâ, 99), based apparently on Deu 33:17, belongs to Jewish literature subsequent to the 1st cent. and need not detain us here. Far more significant is the title which plays so large a part in the Synoptic Gospels, viz.:

(c) ‘Son of Man.’—The employment of this phrase as a Messianic title dates from the Maccabaeian period, and in this specific sense meets us for the first time in Dan 7:13. Its earlier occurrence in the OT requires no exposition here. At the time when the Book of Daniel was written, Jewish apocalyptic was directed to the conception of a great final Divine judgment at the close of the present age, whereby the coming age was to be ushered in. We no longer see the figure of a Messianic King of Davidic descent. His place is taken by a mysterious symbolic portraiture which, as Volz correctly argues,* [Note: Eschatologie, p. 10 f.] is not angelic. It stands contrasted with the four animal symbolical shapes previously described, and especially with the last beast with the ten horns, ‘dreadful and exceedingly strong,’ which had ‘great iron teeth that devoured and brake in pieces.’ In sharp distinction from these monstrous and bestial world-powers which are finally to be destroyed, we have a mysterious figure in human shape.† [Note: On the element of mystery attaching to the use of the preposition כּ (in אֱנוֹשׁ כְּבָר), see Volz, ib.] In v. 27 its significance is explained. It represents ‘the people of the saints of the Most High.’ As H. J. Holtzmann correctly observes, it is intended to express ‘a world-empire which is human and not brutal, which is ethical and noble and not immoral, which is like man, stamped with the likeness of God’ (Gen 1:26). That this human and humane world-empire was to be Jewish and not Gentile, is obvious to the reader of Daniel’s apocalypse.

The ‘Son of Man’ has a yet more definite and distinguished rôle in the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch (chs. 37-71), written probably after b.c. 100. Here He is obviously a supernatural personality and not a symbolic figure, or indefinitely expressed as ‘like a son of man.’ The Son of Man is not mere man. This is clearly shown in ch. 39, where a cloud and whirlwind carry Enoch away and set him down at the end of the heavens. There he sees the mansions of the holy, and among these latter ‘the Elect One of righteousness and faith,’ which is another name for the ‘Son of Man’ (v. 6). Moreover, He sits on God’s throne (51:3), which is also His own throne (69:27, 29), possesses universal dominion (62:6), and all judgment is committed to Him (69:27). Various alternative titles are given to Him, viz. ‘the Righteous One’ (38:2, 3, 53:6), and ‘the Elect One’ (39:6, 40:5, 45:3f). We note meanwhile that the Son of Man is also Judge.

Accordingly, we conclude that while the term in Daniel is symbolical of the human rule of God’s people Israel, in Enoch it is the designation of a supernatural personality, who holds universal empire and wields the office of Judge.

When we pass from this apocalyptic use of the title 'Son of Man' to its employment in the Synoptic Gospels, we observe a great change. It was without question Christ's favourite designation of Himself. It is noteworthy that in the Synoptics the term relatively occurs twice as often as it does in the Fourth Gospel. It occurs 30 times in Matthew, 14 times in Mark, and 25 times in Luke. In John it is found only 12 times.

Christ's employment of the term is by no means uniform. Consequently we are in danger, as Bousset points out, of giving a one-sided interpretation to the expression, either by taking it predominantly in the eschatological sense of Daniel or the Book of Enoch, or as signifying ideal typical man (as Schleiermacher assumes).* [Note: Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judenthum, p. 112 f.] Probably Charles is on the right path when he interprets the Synoptic use of the phrase as involving a combination of two contrasted ideas—the transcendent conception of apocalyptic and the Deutero-Isaianic ideal of Jahweh's Suffering Servant.† [Note: Book of Enoch, Appendix B, p. 315 ff.; cf. also Bartlet, Expositor, Dec. 1892.] It is certainly possible that the latter was the prevailing conception in Christ's personal consciousness rather than the former or eschatological use of the phrase; while the former was the interpretation of the title which dominated the thought of the Synoptic writers, and came to be impressed on the utterances of Jesus. This view seems to be sustained by the fact that in Aramaic the term 'Son of Man' (ܐܢܫܐ ܒܢ ܐܢܫܐ) means simply 'man.' On the other hand, it is difficult to believe that Jesus could have employed so colourless and vague a designation of Himself; and Bousset is probably right in his contention, as against Wellhausen, that such a term, employed in Aramaic, could easily come to acquire a special eschatological significance.‡ [Note: Religion des Judentums², p. 305, footnote.] In all probability, Jesus on certain momentous occasions so used it. How far it was weighted with the significance that the phrase conveys in the Book of Enoch, when the expression was actually employed by Jesus, it is difficult to say. It is hardly necessary to believe that in the personal consciousness of Jesus the superadded notion of pre-mundane existence was attached to the term, though Joh 8:58 ('Before Abraham was, I am') would fairly point in this direction. We certainly have no clear right to infer it from Mar 12:6. Moreover, there is some weight in the suggestion which a few scholars, including Bousset, have put forth, that the term 'Son of Man' has been placed in the mouth of Jesus in many cases when He simply used the first personal pronoun.§ [Note: Bousset's Jesus (Eng. ed.), p. 188. Bousset thinks that it was not till the closing months of His ministry that this title was assumed; 'in face of the threatening doom of final failure ... only briefly and sparingly did He adopt the name' (p. 192f.). Some colour is given to this view, that the Synoptic writers have frequently supplied the phrase in Christ's discourses, by comparing ἐνεκεν ἐμοῦ in Mat 5:10 with the parallel ἐνεκα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου in Luk 6:22. But in the extremely severe limitation imposed by Bousset on Christ's employment of the term we are unable to concur.] That He did, however, employ the phrase in an eschatological sense of Himself, and with a full consciousness of the sublime dignity which it conferred, cannot be denied. Thus, in answer to Pilate's question (Mar 14:62; cf. Mat 26:64, Luk 22:69), He quotes the well-known Daniel passage (Dan 7:13), declaring that men would see Him, the Son of Man, sitting at the right hand of power (i.e. of God), and coming in the clouds of heaven. This utterance is certified by the three Synoptic Gospels; and all three agree in giving it a decisive influence in the trial of Jesus before the Sanhedrin. This testimony, however, carries us one step further. It is hardly possible to dissociate in the consciousness of Jesus the assumption of this high eschatological dignity without including in it the judicial function. The Oriental king was also judge. As King or Messiah, Jesus had, with full consent from Himself, been already acclaimed (Mar 11:7-11), and, with the title of 'King of the Jews' placed on the cross by the Roman governor, He was crucified (Mar 15:26; cf. Mar 15:12; cf. Mar 15:18; cf. Mar 15:32). Moreover, His preaching of the Kingdom of God was closely bound up with the conception of impending judgment. 'Just as He could not dispense with the ideas of the kingdom and the judgment, if He wished to make Himself intelligible to His countrymen, so He could not dispense with the Messianic idea if He wished to be intelligible to Himself' (Bousset).* [Note: Jesus, p. 178. Bousset, however, refuses to include in Christ's conception of the title 'Son of Man' the idea of His own judgeship (p. 194).] It is easy to draw the necessary corollary. In the designation 'Son of Man' applied by Jesus to Himself in an eschatological sense, there was involved the other conception which meets us in the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch, that of universal judge.† [Note: Mar 13:26-27, Mat 25:31-32, 2Co 5:10. See also Friedländer. Die religiösen Bewegungen innerhalb des Judentums im Zeitalter Jesu, p. 325.]

But the eschatological side is not the only, nor is it the most important, aspect of the conception of 'Son of Man' in the mind of Jesus and the Synoptic writers. Far greater, viewed from the ethical standpoint, was the human aspect of the lowly Suffering Servant suggested by the Deutero-Isaiah. This certainly could never have been invented by the Synoptic writers. It is of the very essence of Christ's thought respecting Himself. It is nevertheless remarkable that the locus classicus of the NT writers who reflected on the mystery of the Messiah's crucifixion, viz. Isaiah 53, was never, so far as we can gather from the Synoptic writers, quoted by Jesus Himself, with the doubtful exception of Luk 22:37. That this prophecy, however, must have been in His mind, seems fairly clear from Mar 10:45; Mar 12:6-10; cf. Joh 13:12-17 and Luk 24:25-26. Accordingly, the title 'Son of Man' had a twofold significance. It is employed when Christ's claims to power and authority are asserted, both now and in His future Kingdom and glory. The 'Son of Man' has power to forgive sins (Mar 2:10). He is Lord over the Sabbath (Mat 12:8). He will appear clothed in power at the last day (Mar 14:62). But the title is also used in immediate connexion with His human nature, lowliness, poverty, suffering, and death. 'The Son of Man came eating and drinking' (Mat 11:19, Luk 7:34); 'the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head'

(Mat 8:20, Luk 9:58); 'is betrayed' (Mar 14:21); 'came not to be ministered unto but to minister' (Mar 10:45); suffers and is condemned (Mar 8:31). The paradox of this twofold antithetic significance is solved by the positive truth which underlies it. The peculiar and special function of dignity and privilege which belongs to the 'Son of Man' rests on an ethical basis. He that has come to serve, suffer, and give His life a ransom for many, will pass through agony and death to His place of exaltation in the clouds of heaven (cf. Act 3:18; Act 8:32; Act 17:3; Act 26:23). Upon this basis St. Paul and his successors have built. We also are to suffer with Him, that we may share in His glory (Rom 8:17). The Kenotic doctrine of Php 2:6-7 is reared on this foundation of the teachings of Jesus respecting Himself as 'Son of Man,' whereby we learn that He was 'made perfect through sufferings,' and became 'the leader of our salvation' (Heb 2:9-10).

(d) 'Son of God' is a designation frequently applied to Jesus in the Gospels, and is applied by Jesus to Himself as the expression of His vivid consciousness of God's presence in His life, and the intimate bond that united Him to the Father (Mat 11:27). In His native Aramaic, Abbâ was the mode of address in prayer that came most naturally to His lips, and became a tradition in the worship of the early Christian Church (Rom 8:15). That the relation claimed by Jesus was a special one, is indicated by His use of the expression 'my Father in Mat 11:27; Mat 18:35; Mat 20:23, whereas in Mat 6:32; Mat 10:29 God is spoken of to the audience before Jesus as 'your Father.' More significant still is the designation of Himself as 'beloved Son' in the parable of the Vineyard let out to Husbandmen (Mar 12:6), and also by the voice which spoke to Him from heaven at His baptism (Mat 3:16-17, Mar 1:10-11, Luk 3:21-22). Upon this unquestionable basis of language employed by Jesus respecting Himself, the frequent application of this designation 'Son of God' to Christ in the Pauline Epistles, and of the same phrase with the epithet μονογενῆς in the Johannine writings, was obviously founded. In the memorable scene at Caesarea Philippi, when Jesus questioned His disciples as to their belief respecting Himself, Peter, according to the Matthew tradition, replied, 'Thou art the Messiah, the Son of the living God' (Mat 16:16). This would seem to imply that the expression 'Son of God' was a Messianic title. But in this connexion two things should be noted: (1) Mar 8:29 gives Peter's reply in the briefer form 'Thou art the Messiah.' (2) There is scarcely any evidence in later Jewish literature to indicate that the phrase 'Son of God' was used as a Messianic title.* [Note: The passages where the term 'Son' occurs in 2 Esdras (7:28, 13:32, 37, 52, 14:9) as well as in Enoch (105:2) are all extremely doubtful. The Aramaic original is lost; and it is held by many scholars, including Drummond, Spitta (Zur Gesch. und Lit. des Urchristentums, ii. 9), as well as Charles, that Christian hands have worked over these texts and have inserted the expression 'Son.' See Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, p. 213, who regards Drummond's conjecture as probable, that the phrase 'Son' of God may sometimes have arisen from the Gr.

rendering ταῖς for 'servant' (עַבְדֵּי). See also N. Schmidt's art. 'Son of God' in EBi, col. 4694.] This is the more remarkable when we remember Psa 2:7 'Jahweh hath said unto me, Thou art my son, this day I have begotten thee,' and the old Semitic conceptions of divinity which attached to kingship, reflected in Assyrian inscriptions (see above, p. 171). Probably the stern monotheism of later post-exilic Judaism tended to suppress language which seemed to attribute Divinity to an earthly human personality.

(e) 'Son of David' is the most characteristic, as it is the most traditional and historic, designation of the Jewish Messiah. It expresses the most representative type of Messianic expectation, if we understand by that term an anointed Jewish king who was to be the national deliverer. This conception, as we have already seen, had its roots in the days of Isaiah of Jerusalem, and revived in the age of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and even survived in attenuated form to the early days of post-exilic Judaism. But in later Jewish literature belonging to the Greek period we notice a remarkable absence of any allusion to a Messianic king of Davidic descent who at the end of the ages will erect his throne. That the expectation still survived, and at times found expression, especially as we approach the period of the Maccabaeen struggle, seems fairly clear from such Psalms as 2, 72, 110. On the other hand, we find no reference to a Messianic deliverer of the seed of David in Joel, Isaiah 24-27, Sirach, Daniel, Enoch (chs. 1-36, the Vision of Weeks and the hortatory discourses), Book of Jubilees, Assumpt. Mosis, Sib. Or. 3:36-91. The figure of the Messiah is absent also from Tobit, Judith, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Wisdom, Baruch. It is true that we do find mention of the Messiah, or allusion to Him, in the visions of animals in Enoch (chs. 85-90), in Sib. Or. 3, in Philo (de Præm. et Pæn. 16), and also in Apocalypse, Apocalyptic Bar 29:3, 30:1 and 2Es 7:28 f.; but the figure holds a secondary position, and is far more shadow than substance.

Bousset, in reviewing this literature (both pre-Christian and extending to a.d. 100), endeavours to solve the problem of this absence of Messianic expectation,† [Note: Religion des Judentums² im neust. Zeitalter, p. 255 f.] The causes are twofold. First comes the patent fact to which reference has already been made in a previous page. The Jew had entered into a larger world, and his eschatology was therefore framed on these larger dimensions of time and space in which the final catastrophe was to be vast and world-wide. The world of the Jew was no longer Palestinian or even Western-Asiatic. It was the world ruled by the successors of Alexander, and the yet greater world ruled by the Caesars. Moreover, Greek culture had begun to enter deeply into the mind of Judaism. To the cultured Jew the figure of a Davidic-Messianic king seemed incongruous and provincial amid these larger political and intellectual horizons. Secondly, the establishment of the line of Maccabaeen rulers left large circles of pious Jews well content. In the latter part of the rule of Jonathan, and during the days of Simon and Hyrcanus, the Jew might well have believed in the advent of a Messianic age. Now, the Maccabees were of priestly descent, and came, therefore, from the tribe of Levi. It is therefore not surprising that the seed of David of the tribe of Judah faded for awhile into comparative insignificance; cf. Charles' note on Enoch 90:37.

But the old hopes bound up with the Messiah king of David's line were by no means extinct, though they appeared sometimes to be dormant. There were Palestinian Jews as well as Jews of the Diaspora, and there were uncultured Jews both in the countryside and in the towns, influenced by old traditions and the expectations still kept alive by the Law and the Prophets read in the synagogue, as well as the literary Jews who pored over the Book of Wisdom or consoled themselves with the Visions of the Book of Enoch amid their blighted political hopes. Moreover, the spell of the Hasmonaean line of princes did not last for ever. The 1st century b.c. witnessed a great change as compared with the second. Life was no longer under Aristobulus I. and Alexander Jannaeus what it was in the great days of Judas, Simon, and John Hyrcanus. The Hasmonaean princes were regarded as usurpers, and the political aspirations of the race began to turn once more to the seed of David. The ordinary uncultured Jew did not trouble himself with apocalyptic dreams of new heavens and a new earth, and probably there were many cultivated Jews who had little taste for the Book of Enoch. These would read with far greater satisfaction the Psalter of Solomon, especially Psa 17:5 ff., with its references to the familiar words of Prophecy and Psalm:—

'Thou, Lord, didst choose David to be king over Israel, and didst swear unto him concerning his seed for ever, that his kingdom should not fail before thee [2Sa 7:13-16, Psa 89:4-5]. Then, through our sins, sinners* [Note: A reference to the Hasmonaean princes who usurped the high priesthood (so Ryle and James).] arose against us, attacked us, and thrust us out. Those to whom thou didst make no promise took away with violence (our honour† [Note: The Greek ἀφείλοντο has no object, and these words may probably be supplied.]).... They laid waste the throne of David with insolent shouting. But thou, O God, wilt cast them down and remove their seed from the earth, when one that is a foreigner‡ [Note: Pompey is undoubtedly meant. See the interesting and full discussion in Ryle and James' Com. on the Psalms of Solomon, Introd. p. xlii ff.] to our race arises against them. According to their sins wilt thou recompense them, O God ... (v. 23). Behold, O Lord, and raise up for them their king, the son of David, at the time which thou, O God, knowest, that he may reign over Israel thy servant; and gird him with strength that he may break in pieces unjust rulers. Purge Jerusalem with wisdom and righteousness from the heathen that trample her down with destruction. May he thrust out the sinners from the inheritance, utterly destroy the pride of the sinners, and as potters' vessels with an iron rod break in pieces all their substance' [Psa_2:9].

The Psalter of Solomon, not inaptly called by Ryle and James 'the Psalms of the Pharisees,' clearly reveals by its contents that it belongs to the period b.c. 70-40. Its chief interest for us consists in the strong indications which it gives of the reviving Messianic hopes of Israel at this time under the Roman yoke. Palestine was ready to respond to any bold or able adventurer like Judas, Theudas, or Bar Cochba, the last of whom was supported even by the distinguished Rabbi Akiba. The Synoptic Gospels furnish clear evidence that the national expectations which were directed to a Davidic Messiah in the middle of the last cent. b.c. still prevailed in the days of Jesus. The very form of the Matthew and Luke traditions respecting our Lord's birth exhibits an endeavour to conform to the prevalent expectation that the Messiah would be of Davidic descent. (1) The divergent pedigrees in the two Gospels trace the genealogy of Joseph, the reputed father of Jesus, from David. (2) Both lay stress on Bethlehem as Christ's birthplace, in conformity with the oracle in Mic_5:2.

Quite apart from the form of the Gospel narratives and the predisposition of the writers, the facts of the life of Jesus furnish conclusive evidence of this strong current of Messianic expectation.* [Note: Keim, Jesu von Nazara, i. 244, iii. 103.] We know that on repeated occasions, especially towards the close of His career, He was acclaimed as Son of David: Mat_9:27 (cf. Mar_10:47-48) Mar_12:23; Mar_15:22, Mar_11:10 (Mat_21:9; Mat_21:15). A survey of the facts, however, leads to the conclusion that Jerusalem in South Palestine was the centre of this national movement of Messianic anticipation, and that its pulses become weaker as we pass to the Jewish populations farther removed from this centre.

(f) We also find the title 'comforter' (מְנַחֵם měnahçm) bestowed on the Messiah of Davidic lineage. In Joh_14:16; Joh_14:26; Joh_15:26; Joh_16:7 παράκλητος is forensic in origin = 'advocate,' hence comes to mean 'helper' (see Weiss, ad loc.). It has therefore nothing to do with the above Messianic title. See Wünsche, Leiden des Messias, p. 112; Bousset, Relig. des Jud_1:2 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] p. 261. We find a Menahem, son of Judas the Galilaeen, appearing in Jerusalem as a messiah, and after a brief interval overthrown (Volz, Eschat. p. 210).

iv. Attitude of Jesus towards the Messiahship.—This subject involves some delicate problems which do not admit of easy or immediate solution. Several questions present themselves, and the answers to these enable us to define approximately the attitude of Jesus towards the Messiahship. (1) What was the popular impression created by the Personality and ministry of Jesus? (2) In what form did Jesus regard Himself as Messiah, and how was this related to the popular impression or the current Messianic expectation? (3) At what time did the Messianic consciousness possess Jesus, and when was it proclaimed?

1. In reference to the first question, the following facts may be noted: (a) During the Galilaeen period of His ministry Jesus was designated a prophet; and of this He was plainly conscious (Mar_6:4). Yet in popular estimation He was considered to be endowed with powers so remarkable that some supposed Him to be Elijah (Mar_6:15), the precursor of the Messiah (Mal_3:1; Mal_4:5), or one of the great prophets returned to life (Mar_8:28; perhaps Jeremiah or Isaiah, cf. 2Ma_2:5; 2Ma_15:14 f., 2Es_2:18). This seems to have been the general opinion respecting Jesus down to the close of His life (Luk_24:19 'a prophet mighty in deed and word'). (b) On the other hand, when Jesus passes into Judaea, He is confronted by the powerful current of Messianic expectation which looked for a king of David's line (Mar_10:48; Mar_11:9-10). Probably an attempt to draw Him into this path of Messianic claim and revolt against Roman imperial authority underlies the question as to tribute-money (Mar_12:14).

2. As to the form of Christ's own Messianic consciousness and its relation to the popular impression and the South Palestinian expectation, we note: (a) That the narrative of the Temptation (Mat_4:5 ff., Luk_4:5 ff.) points to the conclusion that early in His public ministry the path of a material or worldly Messiah-king was deliberately renounced (cf. Joh_6:15; Joh_18:36). (b) At an early period Jesus promulgated the fundamental principles of the Kingdom of God, and was fully conscious of His plenary authority to declare them even in opposition to the sacred Mosaic Tôrah which He announced Himself prepared to fulfil ('Ye have heard how it hath been said ... but I say unto you'). Yet though the expression 'kingdom of God (or heaven)' is often on His lips, He does not name Himself as 'king.' (c) He was evidently conscious of a higher vocation and dignity than the designation 'prophet' involved. For (i.) He never called Himself 'prophet,' though popularly acclaimed as such; (ii.) the prevailing designation of Himself which He adopted was, according to the Synoptics, 'Son of Man,' which, we have already shown, implied a high eschatological function and dignity; (iii.) He also regarded Himself as 'Son of God' (cf. Mar_1:10-11), though He restrained the announcement of the title (Mar_3:11-12). (d) He was wholly out of sympathy with the popular national and materialistic conceptions of Messiah-ship with which Southern Palestine at this time was rife. This we can clearly discern in His warning against false prophets and messiahs (Mar_13:22, Mat_24:11-24), who attempted by violent revolutionary means to force on the advent of the 'kingdom of God' (Mat_11:12). From these data the conclusion may be derived, that Jesus from very early times—even as early as the date of His baptism, according to the triple tradition of the Synoptics—was conscious of His unique relation to God as His Father, and of His Messianic dignity and mission, but that He filled it with an ethical as well as apocalyptic content. It was for this reason that He hesitated to declare Himself as Messiah at the opening of His public ministry, knowing the perils of the material and unspiritual conceptions with which the national expectations of the Jews invested the name. The true representation of His Person and of His mission was to be found in the apocalyptic title 'Son of Man.' He was thinking of the exalted cosmic spiritual dignity which attached to this title when, in answer to Pilate's question, He acquiesced* [Note: The present writer, though with considerable hesitation, differs from Swete's comment upon the words $\sigma\upsilon\ \lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\mu\varsigma$ in Mar 15:2 (Mat 27:11). For Pilate appears to have understood these words as an affirmation of his own suggestion (Mar 15:9); so also the Roman soldiers (Mar 15:18, cf. Mar 15:26). Cf. Luk 22:70 f. with Luk 23:3.] in the ambiguous honour 'King of the Jews' (Mar 15:2). The name connoted to Him the same personal authority as He claimed in the previous reply to the high priest (Mar 14:62). So the Fourth Gospel interprets the enigmatic answer of Jesus to Pilate (Joh 18:36, cf. also Joh 19:21).

3. With reference to the time when the Messianic consciousness possessed Jesus, and when His Messiahship was proclaimed, few will dissent from Bousset's dictum, that it is highly probable that the tradition is right in dating Jesus' awakening to the Messianic consciousness from the moment of His baptism, that is, before the opening of His ministry.† [Note: Jesus (Eng. ed.), p. 174.] As we have already indicated, there were, nevertheless, powerful motives which dictated the withholding of His claims from immediate public announcement. It is evident that the significant declaration which He drew from Simon near to Caesarea Philippi, that He was the Messiah, and more than prophet, marks the decisive point after which His Messianic title was generally proclaimed. Though He still imposed upon His followers great reserve (Mar 8:30), we find that shortly after this He is hailed by the blind Bartimaeus (Mar 10:48) and by His enthusiastic followers (Mar 11:9-10) as 'son of David,'—a title which He probably regarded with mixed feelings.

v. Varied Features in the Messianic Expectation current in the Time of Christ.

1. That the Messiah of Jewish traditional expectation would be endowed with the virtues of justice and understanding through the Spirit of God, was an obviously fundamental conception derived from the old Isaianic prophecy, Isa 9:7 [Hebrews 6] Isa 11:2 f., cf. Psalms 72. These ethical qualities are reproduced in varied forms in, e.g., Ps-Sol 17, Test. of the XII. Patr., Levi 18. In this last passage the Hasmonaean priest-princes seem to hover before the writer's imagination. In this portraiture the Messiah is king and priest of the whole earth; the nations of the earth and the angels in heaven rejoice over him. All iniquity disappears under his sway. He again opens Paradise, and the devil (Beliar) is bound by him. It is not easy to be quite sure whether Christian elements have been interpolated here as elsewhere in the Test. of the XII. Patriarchs. Moreover, in the Sibyll. Oracles (3:36-92) the Messiah is called a 'holy king' of universal sway. In the Psalms of Solomon (17:36, 41, 42) the sinlessness of the Messiah is emphasized, and expressly referred to his endowment with the Holy Spirit (cf. Mat 3:16-17, Rom 1:4).

2. The element of mystery and marvel shrouds the appearance of the Messiah, cf. Apocalypse, Apocalyptic Bar 29:3 (text, however, somewhat doubtful; see Charles) 32:1, 2Es 7:28, Test. of the XII. Patr., Levi 18, Sib. Or. 3:652. According to Targ. [Note: Targum.] Jon. on Mic 4:8, the Messiah is already in the world, but is concealed owing to the sins of the people; see Schürer, GJV [Note: JV Geschichte des Jüdischen Volkes.] ³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] ii. 531 ff. With this tradition cf. Joh 7:27.

3. The Messiah is to be preceded by a messenger of God who is to purify Israel (Mal 3:1; Mal 3:3).—This angel of the Covenant is identified by Malachi (or perhaps by an interpolator) with the returning Elijah (Mal 4:5 f. [Heb. 3:23 f.]). This passage, we know, exerted a far-reaching influence over later times; cf. Sir 48:10-11 and Mat 17:10-13 (Mar 9:11 f.).

4. The scattered tribes of Israel are to be gathered together to Jerusalem, and Jerusalem and its Temple rebuilt.—Often we find that the apocalyptic features of a heavenly Jerusalem usurp the place of the terrestrial lineaments of the older forms of Messianic anticipation; cf. Rev 7:4 ff; Rev 21:10 ff. Here, again, the sources of these traits are found in the OT, i.e. in exilic and post-exilic literature: Eze 39:27 ff., Isa 11:11; Isa 11:16 (which tell of the gathering of the Diaspora from Assyria, Babylon, Egypt): cf. Isa 27:12-13; Isa 35:8 ff., Mic 7:12, Isa 60:4; Isa 60:9; Isa 66:20. In many cases these expectations may be called by the general term 'Messianic,' but are without the presence of a Messiah. God brings about the blessed change, not by a gradual evolution of the earthly order, but by a mighty destruction of world-empires, in which Israel's foes (pre-eminently Edom) are overthrown without the instrumentality of any human or superhuman intermediary. Perhaps the most characteristic passage is Isa 27:13 'In that day the great trumpet shall be blown, and all who are being lost in Assyria, and are driven into Egypt, shall come and bow to Jahweh in the holy mount in Jerusalem.' Similarly in the earlier Enoch 90:33 f., Ps-Sol 11, and Bar 4:36 to Bar 5:9, and even in Philo (de Exsecrationibus, § 8-9, de Præm. et Pæn.; see Schürer³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , ii. p. 515), where the ethical traits are not forgotten.

Moreover, the rebuilding of Jerusalem is the reflex of the Deutero-Isaianic utterances, and also of Ezekiel 40-44, 47, Sir 35:13 ff., Tob 13:15-17; Tob 14:5, Enoch 90:28. According to Ps-Sol 17:33, this restoration of Jerusalem is to be the work of the Messiah.

5. The Messiah as a martial personality is based on the portraiture of Isa_9:3-4; Isa_11:4, Psa_2:7-9, and this trait frequently recurs in the literature of the 1st cent. b.c. and later; cf. Sib. Or. 3:652, 2Es_12:31; 2Es_12:33 (where the Messiah is the lion which is to destroy the Roman empire), also Apocalypse, Apocalyptic Bar 70:9,* [Note: Bracketed, however, by Charles as an interpolation; it comes in abruptly and forestalls the reference to the Messiah in ch. 72.] and esp. Ps-Sol 17:22-25. It is significant that this trait is absent from the NT except in Rev_19:11-21, in which the atmosphere is Judaic rather than Christian.

6. The conception of Messiah ben-Joseph or ben-Ephraim belongs to much later Jewish literature, and need not detain us. See Bousset, *Rel. des Judentums*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , p. 264 f.

7. The ethical and universal traits of the Jewish Messiah and of Messianic expectation are, however, meagre and even conspicuous by their absence. The blight of materialism or national exclusiveness rests upon most of the later Jewish literature of Messianic hopes. We scarcely have a hint of the Messiah as the bearer of a new and higher revelation of God's nature or will to mankind, or of His function as a redeemer from sin. The horizons are the horizons of the Jew. With the exception of Philo and the writer of Sib. Or. 3, who were evidently Hellenic in sympathy and culture, we have but little to remind us that the Jew felt any interest in other nationalities and their future. Jewish apocalyptic presents a singularly contracted world, though it be an entire universe. For that universe, when it is not limited to Palestine, is to be governed by Israel only. The visions of the Book of Enoch suffer from these painful limitations. The Similitudes in the description of the last struggle with the heathen restrict the scene to the Holy Land (Enoch 56). Similarly in the Psalms of Solomon the eschatology is limited in its scope to Palestine. Seldom do we meet with any hint or suggestion of the conversion of the Gentiles. Isa_49:6, with its glorious ideal of Israel's mission as a light to the Gentiles, is almost wholly forgotten. The might of the Gentiles is to be broken, and world-empires are to be destroyed. The heathen nations are to be tributary vassals to the new Israelite power which Jahweh will erect, and of which the restored Jerusalem will be the centre. The Gentiles may make pilgrimages to the Holy Land, but only Israel may dwell there. See Bousset, op. cit. pp. 268-270.

The features of the 'Suffering Servant' portrayed in Isaiah 53 are almost totally absent in the version of the Targum of Jonathan, composed in the first two centuries of the Christian era, when the influence of the Maccabaeian age still affected the Messianic conceptions of Judaism. The traits of Isaiah 53 and Isa_49:6 are quite foreign to the Messianic ideals of Judaism in the 1st cent. a.d. The cross of Jesus was to the Jews a stumbling-block (1Co_1:23); cf. Volz, op. cit. p. 237; Dalman, Der leidende und sterbenile Messias, p. 6 f.; Schürer³ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , ii. 554 f.

vi. Jesus the true spiritual fulfilment of prophecy and Israel's real Messiah.—The volcanic uprising of the Jewish race under Judas Maccabaeus and his brothers against the efforts of Antiochus Epiphanes to suppress the national worship, exercised a profound influence upon the Hebrew nation and its ideals. For the future spiritual progress of Israel the results were permanently injurious. Religious ideas became warped by particularism, and the thoughts of the race diverted from the noble universalist conceptions of prophecy, especially of the Deutero-Isaiah, to the study of the Tôrah, as Israel's national heritage, with its ever growing mass of legal requirements and ceremonial punctilios. Piety then became a rule of thumb, and an elaborated endeavour to secure merit took the place of the old prophetic ideals of righteousness. All this is summed up in the single word Pharisaism. Pharisaism was born of the strong national movement of which the heroic episodes of the Maccabean struggle were the outward embodiment. Out of this movement emerged, on the one hand, a vehement reaction against Hellenic ideas and usages, and the exaltation of the Tôrah as Israel's palladium; while, on the other, there emerged the Napoleonic legend of the Jewish race, which became the prolific source of messiahs whose abortive careers were quenched in blood, until the final heroic effort of Bar Cochba, hailed as the fulfilment of Balaam's prophecy by Rabbi Akiba, was extinguished in the reign of Hadrian. But the noble spiritual ideals of Hebrew prophecy—of Jeremiah and the Deutero-Isaiah—could not be entirely suppressed by Pharisaism. As Friedländer in his recent stimulating work has pointed out,* [Note: Die religiösen Bewegungen innerhalb des Judentums im Zeitalter Jesu, pp. 237-264.] the liberal movements which prevailed in the Jewish Diaspora which was surrounded and penetrated by Hellenic influence, prepared the way, especially through the writings of Philo, for the advent of Christ; and the same writer enables us to discern more clearly how the highest ethical ideals of the Hebrew Messiah were realized in Jesus. The husk of nationalism, which clung to Jewish apocalyptic and left no place in its Messianic conceptions for the redemption of the Gentile world, was remorselessly cast aside by Jesus: 'I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness' (Mat 8:11-12). What the Messiah-prophet of Nazareth declared in His oracles, St. Paul, His greatest disciple, fulfilled. For Judaism had been diverted by Pharisaism from its true prophetic mission marked out for it in the dark days of its exile, but was enabled at last, by its greatest latter-day Prophet, the Divine 'Son of Man,' and by His great Jewish disciple and Apostle to the Gentiles, to accomplish its real vocation in spite of itself; cf. Isa 42:19, 2Co 3:14.

☞ Metaphors

METAPHORS.—A metaphor is a blossom of one tree on the branch of another; it is a figure of speech by which a word or phrase is lifted to a meaning to which it is not literally entitled. A simple trope is a metaphor condensed. Similes are metaphors explained. Parables and allegories are similes or metaphors elaborately extended, and do not come into the scope of this discussion (see Parable). In this article we shall not attempt to catalogue or classify the metaphors used in the Gospels, or to distinguish in any technical way between the metaphors and other closely-related figures of speech, but shall use the word in its broadest sense.

Macbeth (Might and Mirth of Literature) restricts the term ‘metaphor’ unduly (cf. Gardiner, Kittredge and Arnold, Mother Tongue, 1962). Wendt (Lehre Jesu), notwithstanding the classic character of his general treatment of the figurative language of the NT, does not give specific attention to the metaphors in the speech of Jesus and their relation to the more extended symbolic and parabolic teaching of the Gospels. Votaw, in his valuable art. 'Sermon on the Mount' in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible, Ext. Vol., classifies NT figures of speech as metaphorical, symbolical, hyperbolic, and figurative. But evidently the last term includes all the classes previously mentioned, while many of the hyperbolic expressions, even in the instances cited by Votaw, contain veiled metaphors. Every one who listened to Jesus mentally supplied the resemblance between the 'gnat' and the ritual peccadilloes which these men, so scrupulous of their meat and drink, 'strained out,' and between the 'camel' and the gross sins against the moral law which they swallowed so complacently. So the 'eye' which was to be plucked out (Mat 5:29) and the 'beam' which was not plucked out (Mat 7:3) evidently were the man's pet sins.

A simple metaphor expresses the resemblance (or identity) between two dissimilar objects or ideas by applying to one a term which can literally designate only the other, as 'This is my body (Mat 26:26). An abbreviated or veiled metaphor is one in which the assertion of resemblance is not expressed but implied. Sometimes a veiled metaphor sparkles in a phrase, as: 'water of life,' 'sons of thunder'; or even in a single word used in a non-literal, ideal, or peculiar sense, to be determined by the context or by current usage, as: 'cross,' 'yoke,' 'grace,' 'flesh,' 'the Day,' 'the Wrath,' 'darkness,' 'to wash,' 'to sleep' (cf. use in Synoptt., John, and Paul, of ποτήριον), 'to drink,' 'to walk' (περιπατέω), and scores of other words constantly used in the NT with an ethical meaning, the force of which is grasped only after the mind has made the connexion between their literal and non-literal meanings. All the Gospels refer to 'death' as a 'sleep.' This was not uncommon among the Jews of that era. But John's Gospel uses a different and more tender word (κοιμάομαι), and adds to the usual metaphorical conception the idea of sleep being an invigorator which brings health to the sick and makes the tired man ready for the work of a new day (Joh 11:12-13). Other expressions, such as 'Get thee behind me, Satan' (Mat 16:23), 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up' (Joh 2:19), may be taken at random as examples of veiled metaphors, the connexion between the literal and spiritual meanings being mentally supplied. Many of the deepest teachings of the NT are embodied in words or phrases which cannot be fully understood until their metaphorical meaning is grasped.

All Oriental language is pictorial. This is especially true of the words of Jesus, not only as reported in the NT, but in other sayings reported by the early Fathers and in the recently-discovered Logia. To insist upon taking the Sermon on the Mount 'just as it reads,' would often mean to insist upon taking it as no one listening to Jesus would have understood it. This metaphorical method of speech was habitual with Jesus (Mat 13:34, Mar 4:11, where παραβολή does not mean ‘parable’ in the modern sense, but metaphorical comparison), and was used, so His disciples thought, to hide the meaning of His words from all except the inner circle of believers. It certainly, however, as Wendt has suggested, quickened the attention of His hearers, and enabled His teaching to be carried more easily in the memory.

Notwithstanding the marked difference in vocabulary, style, and thought found in the various Gospels, they all agree, when reporting the speeches of Jesus, in putting a metaphorical spiritual meaning into even the simplest words, such as ‘sheep-fold,’ ‘door,’ ‘key,’ ‘lamp,’ ‘bread,’ ‘water,’ ‘fish,’ ‘life,’ ‘birth,’ ‘travail,’ ‘death,’ ‘love,’ ‘hell’ (γέεννα), ‘paradise,’ etc. This is true even in the case of reporters who themselves lacked poetic and spiritual insight, and who not infrequently misunderstood the inner meaning of Jesus’ words.* [Note: Such misunderstanding does not seem so strange after one examines the contemporaneous literature. In the Talmud (Pesachim) an entire section is given to the discussion whether a man may eat the leaven of a Gentile, and with what kind of water dough must be kneaded.] Sometimes, as in the references to ‘meat’ and ‘leaven’ (Joh 4:32; Joh 4:34; Joh 6:27; Joh 6:55, Mat 16:12, Mar 8:17, Luk 12:1), the deeper meaning of our Lord’s words was understood before the Gospels came into existence. In other cases it is plain that even the Gospel writer did not catch the meaning of the words which he reports.

In all parts of the NT, social, civil, and regal terms are applied, often with a new depth of meaning, to our Lord and His Kingdom. Not only such terms as ‘king,’ ‘Lord,’ ‘Master,’ etc., but υἱὸς θεοῦ and σωτήρ are titles given to the Roman emperors of the 1st and 2nd cents., while ἀδελφός was the common term used for members of various heathen esoteric associations of that period, and ‘birth’ the technical term for the rite of initiation. So the papyri have shown that ‘presbyter,’ ‘scribe,’ ‘prophet,’ etc., were technical terms used for officials in the heathen temples. This means only that the members of the early Christian community were accustomed to use the ordinary language of their times. It is difficult to tell what new ecclesiastical colouring was originally given to the titles of the early Christian officials, or what new ideas were from the very beginning expressed by the old terms ‘faith,’ ‘salvation,’ etc., That the latter terms, though identical in form, expressed ideas radically different from what they did when used in the LXX Septuagint, is acknowledged by all critics—how much more, then, did these ideas differ from those conveyed by the same terms when used in the heathen Mysteries?* [Note: See, e.g., Deissmann, Bible Studies, 1901, pp. 73, 233; Percy Gardner, Exploratio Evangelica (1899); cf. Ramsay, ‘Greek of Early Church and Pagan Ritual’ (Expos. Times [1898], p. 9).]

The command to baptize or believe on, in, or into the name of Jesus,—found in all parts of NT,—receives a new force from the papyri, where, in heathen temples, the property bought ‘into the name of God’ emphasizes the Divine ownership.† [Note: See Deissmann, pp. 142, 147, 197; Moulton, Gram. NT Greek, (1906), has shown that the prepositions are practically identical in meaning as used in the papyri.]

The different NT writers are marked by certain striking peculiarities in their use of metaphors. St. Mark, in his peasant’s Gospel, rustic but picturesque, uses many metaphors which all writers following him could but repeat. So his simple metaphors grow into extended metaphors or illustrations in the later Gospels. Yet certain strong expressions, evidently metaphorical, are, either because of their uncouthness or implications, ignored by the later and more reflective writers. That the disciples are to be ‘salted with fire’ (Mar 9:49), and that even in this life they are to be rewarded with a hundred ‘mothers,’ etc. (Mar 10:30) are peculiar to Mark.‡ [Note: Mat 19:29 is doubtful, and at any rate v̄v is omitted.] But when the force of these metaphors is caught, each statement strengthens our Lord’s argument.

So the statement that Jesus spat on the blind man’s eyes and on the dumb man’s tongue (Mar 8:23; Mar 7:33), though omitted for obvious reasons from the other Gospels, becomes peculiarly impressive when we remember that spittle, according to all ancient thought, represented the essence of a man’s inner spirit, the quintessence of himself, and therefore played, from the earliest ages, a leading part in magic and witchcraft. By this acted metaphor Jesus proclaimed symbolically that it was His very essence that healed. Cf. also Joh 9:6, where the action of Jesus possibly receives a new meaning when we remember that in the Talmud the dust of certain districts in Jerusalem was clean and of other districts unclean—not because of the district being insanitary, as is suggested in the Talmudic text. If, instead of spitting on the tongue, He ‘spat out,’ this would receive explanation from the custom of the Jews to spit in contempt when idols were mentioned; as also in the early Church, where converts coming to baptism spat out as a sign that they renounced the kingdom of Satan. Cf. J [Note: Jahwist.] E [Note: Elohist.], art. ‘Alenu.’

In Mk., believers who have ‘salt’ within them (Mar 9:50) have brotherly love; in Mt., those who love their enemies are salt (Mat 5:10-13).§ [Note: Compare the proverb yet to be heard in Jerusalem, ‘What salt is it that keeps money good?’ Answer: ‘Charity.’] In Mk., the word is a lamp (λύχνος) which must not be hid (Mar 4:21, cf. Luk 8:16; Luk 8:18); in Mt., it is the believer (Mat 5:15), or his ‘eye’ (spiritual vision or intent), if clear and healthy (ἀπλοῦς, Mat 6:22), which is the lamp shining forth from the inward centre of life (φῶς, Mat 5:14)—which Jn. sees to be the eternal Word, Christ Jesus (Joh 1:4). In Mk., disciples are compared to sheep (Mar 6:34; Mar 14:27); in

Mt. they are sheep (Mat 10:6; Mat 15:24; Mat 26:31, cf. Mat 18:12), while in Jn. (Joh 10:2-27) a long, elaborate discourse is based upon this well understood metaphor. || [Note: | Jülicher (Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, p. 120) looks upon the narrative as contradictory and suspicious, because at one time Jesus is represented as the Door and at another as the Shepherd who enters it; but no Oriental would have criticised the use of these varying metaphors.] Both Mk. and Mt. teach that he who 'findeth his life shall lose it,' but Lk. enlarges the meaning of ψυχή until it includes the whole man (Luk 9:25). Mt. alone says, Have no anxiety for your life, 'for each to-morrow will be anxious for itself (Mat 6:25-34), though both Mt. and Lk. remark that even the birds, which have neither farming implements nor granaries, are eared for (Luk 6:26; Luk 8:20, cf. Luk 12:22-24). The metaphorical allusion to new wine in fresh wine-skins, Mar 2:22, is explained in Mat 9:17 and enlarged in Luk 5:37. The patch which in Mk. and Mt. tears out a larger hole from the old garment, is in Lk. condemned for two altogether different reasons (Luk 5:36)—the necessity of tearing a new piece of cloth in order to get the patch, and because it would be a different kind of cloth. Every one who heard this remark in either form would be caught by the unspoken metaphor: Judaism cannot be patched by this new doctrine of Jesus; it must be replaced by it. The gospel is no patch; it must replace the old and worn-out garment. In Mk. there is only a brief allusion to the coming of the Son of Man (Mar 13:24-27), in Mt. an extended description.

'Let the dead bury their dead' (Mat 8:22); 'Cast not your pearls before swine' (Mat 7:6); 'Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?' (Mat 7:16), are some of the striking expressions found in Mt. alone, as also the declaration that no man should be called 'father' (Mat 23:9); cf. the acted metaphor (Mat 17:26), nowhere else recorded, by which Jesus metaphorically claims that the God of the Temple is His Father, when He declares His legal exemption from the Temple tax. There are a number of peculiarly picturesque and humorous metaphors for which we are indebted to Matthew. The Pharisees are 'white-washed tombs' full of putridity (Mat 23:27); 'blind guides of the blind' (Mat 15:14, Mat 23:16; Mat 23:24); 'wolves in sheep's clothing' (Mat 7:15). One who truly exhibits the law of righteousness (which is unselfishness and love) does not let his left hand know what his right hand doeth (Mat 6:3); but these men blow a trumpet before them, not only when they give alms, but when they pray (cf. the remark in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles [xii. 1], that a teacher of the true doctrine is known to one who 'has understanding of the right hand and the left'). They make long prayers and 'devour windows' houses (Mat 23:14 or 13?). These hair-splitting theologians, so particular in their eating, strain out the gnat but swallow the camel (Mat 23:24).* [Note: All the Synoptists report the saying of Christ that it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than, etc. (Mar 10:25, Mat 19:24, Luk 18:25). The Talmud has the same expression, excepting that an elephant takes the place of the camel (quoted by Arthur Wright, Some NT Problems, p. 127).] Christ's yoke does not gall (Mat 11:30), but these men lay upon the shoulders of others burdens which they will not move even with the finger (Mat 23:4). For such is the 'weeping and the gnashing of teeth' (Mat 8:12, Mat 13:42; Mat 13:50, Mat 22:13, Mat 24:51, Mat 25:30, elsewhere only Luk 13:28). These satiric pictures of the theologians of the day are peculiar to Matthew. Both Mt. and Lk. refer to the same individuals as hyper-critics, who are greatly disturbed by the mote in their brother's eye, although they have a beam in their own. Forgetting their own infirmity and need of immediate surgical assistance, they use the other eye, which must also have been sympathetically afflicted, in spying out and ridiculing the speck of dust in the eye of their neighbour (Mat 7:3-5 = Luk 6:41 f.). Nothing in Hogarth is better than that.

In Lk., several of the Beatitudes concerning the poor and hungry take on a distinctly different meaning from what they had in Mt. (Mat 5:3; Mat 5:6); the words 'poor' and 'hungry' (Mat 6:20; Mat 6:23) having perhaps obtained a settled ecclesiastical, non-literal meaning. The storming of the Kingdom of heaven by those who upset the Law in their anxiety to hurry into the Kingdom of the gospel, while obscured in Mt. (Mat 11:12), is explained in Lk. (Luk 16:16-17). The mixed figures used by Mk. (Mar 4:14-16) and Mt. (Mat 13:19),—sometimes similes and sometimes metaphors,—representing men in one breath as both soil and seed, disappear in Lk.'s beautiful symmetrical narrative (Luk 8:5 ff.). He, too, is responsible for the injunction 'Make for yourselves purses which wax not old' (Luk 12:33), and for the attractive Orientalism 'son of peace' (Luk 10:6) added to Mat 10:13, and for the less commendable addition that the descent of the Spirit at the baptism of Jesus, which Mk. and Mt. had said to be 'like a dove,'—and which Jn. explains to have been 'as a dove,' i.e. in a softly, floating manner (Moulton),—was 'in bodily form' (Joh 3:22). Instead of Mt.'s metaphorical reference to the Pharisees as painted sepulchres (Mat 23:27), beautiful to look at but foul within, Lk. makes Jesus speak of them as unsuspected graves (μνημεία) which defile every one who comes near them (Luk 11:44). The 'mountain' of Mt. (Mat 17:20), which can be east into the sea by any disciple who has faith as fully alive as a mustard seed, becomes a 'tree' in Lk. (Luk 17:6). The 'seventy-seven' acts of forgiveness required of Jesus' disciples, according to Mt. (Mat 18:22), are expressed with equal truth and vigour by Lk. when he reduces that number to 'seven' (Luk 17:4). The satirical remark that wealth can build a man an 'eternal tent' (Luk 16:9), and the hyperbole that one must 'hate' (μισῶ) his father and mother in order to be a true disciple of Jesus (Luk 14:26), are original with Lk.; as also the statement that the disciples must 'win their souls' (Luk 21:19), and that the Pharisees take away the 'key of knowledge' (Luk 11:52, cf. Mat 16:19).

Lk., which shows more attention to literary style than any other NT writing except the Hebrews (Moulton), uses far fewer original metaphors. This is because it was not a first-hand work, but a compilation (Luk_1:3). Even the beautiful reference to Jesus as the Sun-rise (Luk_1:78) looks back to the OT; and the terms 'torment' and 'fixed gulf' in the Dives parable, which are peculiar to Lk., are found in the medical works of that period; while the word used for the life immediately after death—Paradise—is the word for the garden of delight in which our first parents dwelt (Gen_2:8 LXX Septuagint). In Lk., as truly as in Jn., the Baptist not only preaches the whole gospel, social, ethical, and sacrificial, but uses the favourite metaphors of Jesus; while Elisabeth and Mary, Zacharias and Simeon, all speak in blank verse, every line being filled with OT imagery. The nautical metaphors of Lk. are few and doubtful (cf. Expos. vi. viii. [1903] 130). It does not even use the striking phrase 'fishers of men' common to both Mk. and Mt.

In the Fourth Gospel we have not many new figures of speech, but all the old ones are filled with new contents. Even the old title 'Son of Man' becomes exalted (Joh_1:51; Joh_5:27). In the Synoptt. Jesus points out the way; in Jn. He is 'the Way' (Joh_14:6). In the Synoptt. He gives life; in Jn. He is 'Life,' and 'the Life' (Joh_1:4), and large inferences are drawn from this. He is also called 'the Resurrection' (Joh_11:25). In the Synoptt. Jesus is like a shepherd, but in Jn. He has become both Shepherd and Gate of the fold (Joh_10:7; Joh_10:11). In the Synoptt. Jesus speaks the word; in Jn. He is 'the Word,' and the term has taken into itself a new and mystic meaning: ὁ λόγος has come to mean the eternal thought of Jehovah given visible utterance, the sacred Tetragrammaton manifested in flesh (Joh_1:14), whose word (ὁ λόγος) or words (τὰ ῥήματα) are a part of His own Divine essence, to abide in which is to abide in Him (Joh_5:38, Joh_8:31). Either term expresses the creative, cleansing, protecting power of the Divine Name. The unity of the spoken word with the speaker is metaphorically regarded as an identity equivalent to that between Christ and the Father (Joh_14:10, cf. Joh_10:30). But the unity of the word with the speaker, or of Christ with His Father, is no closer than that between the Christ and His true disciples. He abides in them and they abide in Him (Joh_6:56, Joh_15:4, Joh_17:26; cf. Joh_6:70, where Judas, because of his relationship with Satan, becomes diabolos). So all believers may become one 'as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee' (Joh_17:21). The Christ, the 'only begotten' (Joh_1:14; Joh_1:18, Joh_3:16; Joh_3:18), is the Vine (Joh_15:1), His body a sanctuary (Joh_2:19); even while on the earth He is 'in heaven' (Joh_3:13), and holds His disciples and all things in His hand (Joh_10:28, Joh_3:35). Those in whom the Word abides (Joh_15:7) and who abide in the Word (Joh_8:31)—these metaphors being interchangeable—cannot 'taste death' (Joh_8:52), nor even 'look on death' (Joh_8:51).* [Note: For Oriental parallels to the Logos in other Oriental religions, see JRAS, April 1906.]

In Jn., more than in any other Gospel, metaphors become an important factor in doctrinal development. These mystic figures of speech indicate the growth of the Church in theological development, and have also played no little part in shaping the later doctrines of Christendom. A freely translated expression in the Psalms concerning the manna which came from heaven is made the occasion, metaphorically interpreted, of deep and beautiful teachings concerning the heavenly origin of the Christ and His power to give life (Joh_6:33; Joh_6:35; Joh_6:51). To eat Him is the only way to gain life (Joh_6:51; Joh_6:53; Joh_6:58). So Jesus is the well of salvation out of which men may draw water with great joy (cf. Is Joh_12:3); not only satisfying their own thirst thereby, but becoming living fountains which send forth floods of life-giving water such as came from Jesus Himself (Joh_4:10-14, Joh_7:38). In the Acts (Joh_8:32), Jesus goes as a lamb to the slaughter; in Jn. He is the Lamb (Joh_1:29; Joh_1:36) ‘exalted’ upon the cross-altar (Joh_3:14, Joh_12:32; Joh_12:34 [ὑψόω is peculiar to Jn.]).

MILL-STONE (μύλος, λίθος μυλικός).—The hand-mill used in Palestine consists of two stone discs, from a foot to a foot and a half in diameter, the upper being about 2 in., the lower 3 in. thick. A porous stone of black basalt is preferred, as being sufficiently hard and not so liable as ordinary limestone to become glazed by the friction of the two surfaces against each other (Job_41:24). The stones are usually flat, but not infrequently the concave face of the upper stone rests upon the corresponding convex of the lower one, so as to facilitate the passing out of the flour in the act of rotation. The lower stone is always the heavier of the two, because it is thicker and because it is often a little wider, with a rebate or raised rim; and the upper stone fits into the recess thus formed. The flour then escapes from an opening several inches long where the rim of the lower stone has been cut away. The upper stone has an opening through the centre for the reception of the upright wooden pin projecting from the centre of the lower stone. Into this hole the wheat is poured in the process of grinding. The upper stone has near the circumference a wooden peg a little over two handbreadths in height, and when the stone is being turned by two women (Mat_24:41), sitting on opposite sides of it, each grasps the peg continuously with one hand and alternately draws it to herself and pushes it away. Partly on account of their position in sitting, and partly to keep the edge of the skirt away from the cloth spread for the flour, they usually draw up the dress to the knee (Isa_47:1-2). The sound of the hand-mill grinding the flour for the daily bread was suggestive of home life under conditions of peace and prosperity, and its cessation betokened turmoil and distress (Ecc_12:3-4, Jer_25:10-11). The μύλος ὄνικος, or donkey stone of Luk_17:2, may simply mean the revolving upper stone of the common hand-mill, as having the more active share in the work of grinding. If the reference be to the larger kind of stone driven by animal or water power, the allusion would be a case of emphatic hyperbole, like the passage of a camel through the slit of a needle (Mat_19:24). In Rev_18:21 it is a strong angel that is described as casting such a stone. See, further, art. 'Mill,' with illustration, in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible .

MINISTER, MINISTRATION

1. ὑπηρέτης: Luk_1:2 ὑπηρετάει τοῦ λόγου, Luk_4:20 ἀποδοὺς τῷ ὑπηρέτῃ.

ὑπηρέτης is originally ‘a rower’ (from ἐρέσσω,—the ὑπό pointing to his being under the direction of the κυβερνήτης or steersman, who was the navigating officer: *Encyc. Brit.*⁹ [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] xxi. 808). It is commonly used in class. Gr. in the sense of ‘a doer of hard work,’ ‘an assistant’ or ‘apparitor’ or ‘inferior officer,’ but still retains the meaning of ‘one who is under the direction or control of another’ (e.g. ὑπηρετάει is the term employed by Xenophon for the adjutants or orderlies of a general).

In Bibl. Greek ‘the word covers a wide range of offices,’ but still retains this meaning: e.g. Mat_5:25 (the officer of a court of justice = πράκτωρ, Luk_12:58), Mat_26:58, Mar_14:54; Mar_14:65, Joh_7:32; Joh_7:45-46; Joh_18:3; Joh_18:12; Joh_18:18; Joh_18:22; Joh_19:6, Act_5:22; Act_5:26 (the Temple police, or apparitors of the Sanhedrin; cf. Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iv. 715b; Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4650; Swete, St. Mark, xii. 329, 335). In Joh_18:36 our Lord says, ‘If my kingdom were of this world, then would my ὑπηρετάει (‘officers,’ (Revised Version margin)) fight’; with which cf. (for a similar connexion of ὑπηρετάει) LXX Septuagint Pro_14:35 δεκτὸς βασιλεῖ ὑπηρέτης νοήμων, Wis_6:5 (kings) ὑπηρετάει ὄντες τῆς αὐτοῦ (i.e. God's) βασιλείας. In Act_26:16 ὑπηρετήν points to the service of complete subjection into which St. Paul was called to enter, when Jesus appeared to him as the Risen Lord. He and Apollos and Cephas are ὑπηρετάει Χριστοῦ (1Co_4:1). Lk.'s ὑπηρετάει τοῦ λόγου may be due to his having heard St. Paul use this and similar expressions, and describes the αὐτόπαι τῶν πεπληροφορημένων πραγμάτων in their service of entire subjection to the gospel (here τοῦ λόγου = ‘the gospel’ as in other Lukan passages, Act_6:2; Act_6:4; Act_8:4; Act_10:44; Act_11:19; Act_14:25; Act_16:6; Act_17:11.) ‘ὑπηρέτης and διάκονος are often used interchangeably’ (Hort, Ecclesia, 210; cf. Trench, Synon. ix, (near end); Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 378a).

In Luk 4:20 the ὑπηρέτης is the synagogue official called the hazzân, who during public worship ‘hands the copy of the Scriptures to the reader, and receives it back from the hands of the man who has read the final lesson.... The hazzân rolls up the Torah roll after the reading, and, after holding it up to view, deposits it in the press’ (Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible iv. 640b; cf. Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, i. 438). Chase conjectures that John Mark was originally a hazzân or synagogue attendant (Act 13:5; Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible iii. 245^b).

2. λειτουργία: Luk 1:23 αἱ ἡμέραι τῆς λειτουργίας αὐτοῦ, ‘the days of his ministration,’ i.e. the week during which he was on priestly duty in the Temple.

λειτουργία is of common occurrence in LXX Septuagint in the sense of ritual service (= לִיטוּרְיָא Num 8:22; Num 16:9; Num 18:4, 2Ch 31:2; cf. Diod. Sic. i. 21 (of the Egyptian priesthood), τὰς τῶν θεῶν θερατείας τε καὶ λειτουργίας). At Athens the λειτουργία (from obsol. ἔργω = ἐργάζομαι, and λείτος, λήϊτος [fr. λαός]) were State burdens of a peculiar kind laid on the citizens, e.g. defraying the cost of public choruses, or of the training of athletes, or of feasting one’s fellow-tribesmen (Xen. de Rep. Ath. i. 13; Becker, Charicles, sc. iv. n. [Note: note.] 23; Dict. Antiq. ii. 27). The use of λειτουργία in a ritual sense is not peculiar to LXX Septuagint, the Papyri having shown that it was common in Egypt, and in particular that the services in the Serapeum were designated by this title (Deissmann, Bible Studies, 138; cf. Moulton, Expositor, vi. vii. [1903] 116).

Lk. speaks of the prophets and teachers at Antioch λειτουργούντων τῷ Κυρίῳ, by which prayers to Christ are probably meant (Act 13:2). λειτουργεῖν and the group of words connected with it are used, as in LXX Septuagint, by the writer of Hebrews of the ministry of the tabernacle (Heb 9:21; Heb 10:11); metaphorically, of the more excellent ministry of Christ as High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb 8:2; Heb 8:6); they are also applied to the ministry of angels (Heb 1:7; Heb 1:14). St. Paul speaks of civil rulers as λειτουργοὶ θεοῦ, thus ascribing to them a sacred function (Rom 13:6). Evidently the ritual sense of this group of words is always present to the mind of the Apostle when he has occasion to use them (Rom 15:16 ‘Paul the ministering priest, the preaching of the gospel his priestly function, the believing Gentiles his offering’ [Gifford], Rom 15:27, 2Co 9:12, Php 2:17 ‘the Philippians the priests, their faith the sacrifice, the apostle’s life-blood the accompanying libation’ [Lightfoot], Php 2:25; Php 2:30; cf. Westcott on Hebrews 1 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , p. 231). Those passages also show that Christ's ministers are sacrificing priests only in the same sense as the rest of the members of the Christian brotherhood, who render λειτουργία to God and to men by 'the work of faith, and the labour of love' (cf. Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 377^a; Lightfoot, Philip.² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] p. 182).—The application of λειτουργία to the prayers offered at the dispensation of the Lord's Supper is a comparatively late ecclesiastical usage (Cheetham, Dict. Chris. Antiq. ii. 1018; Lightfoot, l.c. 261; Trench, Synon. xxxv).

3. διάκονος, διακονεῖν, -εἶσθαι (διηκόνουν, διηκόνησα, later impf. and aor. for ἐδιακόνουν, ἐδιακόνησα).—

The derivation of διάκονος is uncertain. If Buttman's conjecture is right (Lexil. i. 218), that the root of the word is an obsolete verb διακω = διώκω, it may have originally meant 'a messenger.' Prellwitz (Etymol. Wörterbuch, 74) connects it with = ἐγκονέω, 'to be active,' the long α being explained as arising from δια + α = a weak form of the ἐν in ἐγκονεω. The original meaning would then be 'one who is quick and active in service.' The Greek usage of the word is fully dealt with by Hort (Ecclesia, 202 ff.), who quotes, amongst other passages which bring out its menial associations, Plato, Gorg. i. 518 A, where it is said that, except gymnastics and medicine, 'all other arts which have to do with the body are servile and menial (διακονικάς) and illiberal.' Hort also shows that by later Greek writers it was sometimes used in a lofty figurative sense, e.g. by Epictetus, Dissertationes, iv. 7. 20, 'For I think that what God chooses is better than what I choose. I will attach myself as a minister and follower (διάκονος καὶ ἀκόλουθος) to Him; I have the same movements as He has, I have the same desires; in a word, I have the same will (συνθελω).' Long's translation, 348.—'The true proper Greek sense' is 'an attendant whose duty it is to wait on his master at table.'

In the Gospels, διάκονος and its derivatives are used in the sense of preparing or serving a meal, Mar 1:13 (|| Mat 4:11), Mar 1:31 (|| Mat 8:15, Luk 4:39), Luk 10:40; Luk 12:37; Luk 17:8, Mat 22:13, Joh 2:5; Joh 2:9; Joh 12:2; in the same sense, figuratively, Mar 9:35 (not exactly || Mat 23:11, Luk 22:26-27), Mar 10:43; Mar 10:45 (|| Mat 20:26; Mat 20:28), Joh 12:26; of ministering service generally, Luk 8:3, Mar 15:41, Mat 27:55; Mat 25:44. διάκονος does not occur in St. Luke, who uses ὁ διακονῶν (Luk 22:26-27).

The passages in which ‘minister,’ ‘to minister,’ are the renderings adopted in Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885, are the following: (i.) Of the ministry of angels, Mar 1:13 (|| Mat 4:11) οἱ ἄγγελοι διηκόνουν αὐτῷ, cf. Gen 28:12, 1Ki 19:5, Dan 10:21, Joh 1:51, Luk 22:43, Heb 1:14, 1Pe 1:12. Christ’s nativity. His temptation, His agony, His resurrection, His ascension, were all accompanied by their sympathetic ministrations.—(ii.) Of Peter’s wife’s mother, Mar 1:31 (|| Mat 8:15, Luk 4:39) διηκόνει αὐτοῖς at the Sabbath meal immediately after the fever left her. ‘Et nos ministremus Jesu’ (Jerome, quoted by Swete, in loc.).—(iii.) Of the ministering women, Luk 8:3 (Mar 15:41, Mat 27:55) αἵτινες διηκόνουν αὐτῷ [αὐτοῖς] ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων αὐταῖς, and continued doing so till the close of Christ’s life on earth. αἵτινες (= tales quæ) may imply that they had the heart as well as the means to minister to Him. Lk. has much to tell us about the women friends of Jesus (e.g. Luk 10:38-42; Luk 11:27; Luk 23:27; Luk 24:22).—(iv.) The great sayings about service being the path to true greatness, Mar 9:35 πάντων διάκονος, ‘minister of all,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 (not exactly || Mat 23:11, Luk 22:26-27), Mar 10:43; Mar 10:45 (Mat 20:26; Mat 20:28, which is followed by an extensive interpolation of a similar tenor in DΦ, Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible, Ext. Vol. 345^a) ἔσται ὑμῶν διάκονος ... καὶ γὰρ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἦλθε διακονηθῆναι ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι.—Promotion to true greatness is not effected by such methods as are adopted by ‘the princes of the Gentiles’ to gain or to retain supreme power; nor does it depend on an act of partiality, such as the sons of Zebedee imagined might be exercised in their favour if they applied for it in time. It is regulated by fixed spiritual laws, or by the general principle that honour comes in the Kingdom of God by disinterested love. As ‘to get pleasure you must forget it’ (Seth, Ethiopic Principles, 66; W. L. Davidson, Theism, 372), so to be great you must cease to think of greatness and humble yourself to serve others, which includes the being quick to discern and open-hearted to minister to their needs, even to the sacrificing of yourself for their good. They who shall have the highest place in God’s household are they who take the duties of its humblest member, the δοῦλος, upon themselves; and they who shall be qualified to sit down at the feast of salvation are they who fulfil the work of the διάκονος at table, who wait upon those whom God regards as His guests, and minister to their wants (cf. Menzies, Mark, 200). Jesus sets forth this principle in the most touching manner as that of His own life (cf. Act 10:38). He is Himself the living embodiment of the truth which He teaches. In saying that He ‘came not to be ministered unto, but to minister,’ He does not mean that the ministrations He is receiving are not welcome, but He defines the main object of His sojourning in this world, and speaks of Himself not as the Guest whom the whole world will delight to honour, but as the humble attendant upon those who are in want; not as the Benefactor who is to be raised by men to the highest earthly glory, but as One who is come to serve them (seeing that on account of the state they are in there is no other way in which He can effectually and completely serve them) by the surrender of life itself (cf. Mar 15:31). This was Jesus' path to the most exalted greatness. It led to there being given Him by God 'the name which is above every name' (Php 2:9, cf. Heb 2:9), and also to His receiving from man the undying homage of his heart, together with the confession of the tongue that his highest ideal of human goodness and service is now realized in Jesus. So, when we follow His example and are lifted out of ourselves by His Spirit of ministering love, everything that came to Him will come to us, according to the measure in which we, who are infinitely inferior to Him, will be found meet for it,—God's approval of our life, increasing influence for good, that true greatness which consists in our becoming better able to elevate and bless our fellow-men (cf. Caird, Univ. Sermon, 260), and to minister to them in the highest way by leading them to righteousness (Dan 12:3), and which may also comprehend the power to minister to them in a higher state of being (cf. Mat 25:21, Luk 19:17).* [Note: 'My idea of heaven is the perpetual ministry of one soul to another' (Tennyson, Memoir by his Son, ii. 421).] —(v.) Mat 25:44 πότε ... οὐ διακονήσαμέν σοι; those words supplement in a solemn way the sayings just commented upon. Ministering love is not only the path to true greatness, it is also the indispensable condition of future exaltation with Christ. He who 'for our sakes became poor,' who turned the light of His infinite pity upon the world of hunger, poverty, and misery, still calls the hungry and poor and miserable 'His brethren,' and accounts their cause His own. Not to have ministered to their needs is not to have ministered to His (cf. Lowell, 'The Vision of Sir Launfal'; and 'The Legend of St. Martin's Cloak,' Farrar, Lives of the Fathers, i. 630). At His coming in glory, Christ will declare His love to those who have loved, and will admit them as 'joint-heirs with Himself'; but He will reject as unmeet for companionship with Him those who have not taken the position among their fellow-men which He showed them how to take when He said, Ἐγὼ δὲ εἰμι ἐν μέσῳ ὑμῶν ὡς ὁ διακονῶν (Luk 22:27, cf. Joh 13:5).—These sayings of Jesus virtually create a new standard of social ethics. They give to the prophetic teaching of the OT on considerate and brotherly conduct (תָּוֵב, see W. R. Smith, Proph. 1 [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] 160, 407; Driver, Sermons on OT, 221, 232) the breadth and completeness which it yet lacked. 'If we wish to feel the contrast of the Pagan and the Christian ideals of greatness, we have only to compare the Aristotelian picture of the μεγαλόψυχος, the proud aristocrat who lives to prove his independence and superiority, with that other picture of a Life that poured itself out in the service of others' (Seth, Ethiopic Principles, 264).

Later Stoicism ‘sometimes expressed with much warmth the recognition of the universal fellowship and natural mutual claims of human beings as such’ (Sidgwick, Hist. of Ethics, 120), but this was really inconsistent with the hard isolation of the individual that was the fundamental basis of Stoicism (Lightfoot on Philippians 2, ‘St. Paul and Seneca,’ 296), and the practical results of such teaching were small (Lecky, *Europ. Morals*¹² [Note: 2 designates the particular edition of the work referred] , ii. 78-79). Numerous coincidences are found between the teaching of Jesus and the humane sayings of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius. But, as Lightfoot observes (l.c. 291), ‘an expression or a maxim, which detached from its context offers a striking resemblance to the ethics of the Gospel, is found to have a wholly different bearing when considered in its proper relations.’ Stoicism was wholly wanting in humility, which is the very foundation of ministering love as taught by Jesus (cf. Westcott in Smith’s DB [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] ii. 857^b, iii. 1380). With Him, such love is not an occasional precept of benevolence, but, as Harnack says (What is Christianity? 98), it is ‘the religious-maxim.’

The following passages will show some of the results produced by our Lord’s teaching in Christian thought and life. There are differences of διακονία (1Co 12:5), but the manifold faculties for ‘the work of ministering’ are gifts from the Exalted Lord (Eph 4:12), and each disciple has received a gift of some kind to be laid out in Christian service (1Pe 4:10-11). Some are called to the ministry of the word (Act 6:4, 2Co 3:6; 2Co 6:4, Col 4:17, 1Th 3:2, 2Ti 4:5), to testify the gospel of the grace of God (Act 20:24) and win men to faith (1Co 3:5); God has committed to such ‘the ministry of reconciliation’ (2Co 5:18). Some as attendants and comrades can strengthen the hands of those engaged in this work: St. Paul was thus helped by Timothy and Erastus (Act 19:22), by Tychicus (Eph 6:21, Col 4:7), by Onesiphorus (2Ti 1:18), by Mark (2Ti 4:11), by Onesimus (Phm 1:13). Some can render invaluable help in the local churches, as Stephanas and his household at Corinth (1Co 16:15), and Phœbe at Cenchræe (Rom 16:1). Ministering to the wants of the poor, the sick, the stranger, the prisoner, was constantly called for (Act 6:1-2, Rom 12:7, Heb 6:10; cf. Heb 10:34, Rev 2:19). A collection (two are mentioned) is a διακονία (Act 11:29; Act 12:25, Rom 15:31, 2Co 8:4; 2Co 8:19-20; 2Co 9:1; 2Co 9:12-13), and St. Paul speaks of his journey in charge of the latter as itself a part of the ministrations (Rom 15:25 πορευομαι ... διακονῶν τοῖς ἁγίοις, see Gifford’s note). The above passages show that ‘a faithful minister of Christ’ (Col 1:7, cf. 1Ti 4:6) is one who combines with the stated ministry of the gospel the service of his fellow-men in things temporal and external.—Thus διάκονος, διακονεῖν, in showing men the path to greatness, have themselves attained to greatness. It is true of words as well as of persons, that God as revealed in Christ ‘hath exalted them of low degree’ (Luk 1:52).

☞ Ministry

MINISTRY.—The word 'ministry' as now used in English has two leading senses: (a) service rendered, and (b) an official class, especially ecclesiastical. The latter has no place in this discussion, which has regard to the public service rendered by our Lord during His life on earth. In this connexion it describes both the period of the service and its contents. The word comes from the Latin minister, properly an adjective, but in its substantive use signifying an 'attendant' or 'servant' who usually performed services of a personal and more or less menial nature. It was also sometimes used of public or religious functionaries. In Greek there are three words which more or less nearly correspond to the Latin minister, namely, διάκονος, λειτουργός, ὑπηρέτης. See preceding article.

i. The Nature of our Lord's Ministry.—In the mind of Jesus Himself there lay the ideas of both sacrifice and service as the essential principles of His mission among men.

1. The first element to be noticed is service. This presents a threefold aspect: (a) It was notably and characteristically a ministry of teaching. The frequent mention of His teaching, the reports of His discourses and sayings, and the fact that He was often called 'Teacher,' emphasize as all-important this function of His ministry. The varied character, the weighty contents, the marvellous power and the sweet charm of His teaching, are familiar thoughts to students of His life. But we must remember also the arduous nature of this work. The bodily toil, the mental strain, the spiritual intensity, all were great; and these were increased by the constant opposition of critics and foes, and by slowness of comprehension on the part of His friends. (b) But incidental to and accompanying this work of teaching was Christ's great ministry of help and healing. All the narratives show how large a place this occupied in His public life. Here, too, His labours were vast in sum, and made extraordinary demands—as many indications show—upon His sympathy and strength. (c) Closely related to His teaching, but not exactly identical with it, was our Lord's ministry of founding His Church. The selection and training of His Apostles and other disciples, involving many details of precept in regard to both the principles and the positive institutions of the Kingdom of God, were elements of the first importance in the earthly work of Jesus.

2. The other element is that of sacrifice. This was no less prominent in the ministry of Jesus than service. (a) In the Synoptics there is a progress of thought in regard to the fact and meaning of His sufferings. After Peter's confession near Caesarea Philippi, Jesus began to impress on His disciples the certainty of His approaching death (Mat 16:16; Mat 16:21); at the Transfiguration, Moses and Elijah talked with Him of His 'decease (ἔξοδος) which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem' (Luk 9:31); soon after (Mat 17:22 f.) He again spoke of His coming death. The self-giving character of His sufferings is indicated in the manner in which they are spoken of in Luk 9:22-24, Mat 20:22, as compared with Luk 12:50; and the severity of this experience as being something more than death alone, however painful, is indicated in the passages noted, and powerfully enforced by the Agony in Gethsemane and the events of the Crucifixion. Finally, the atoning value of Christ's sacrifice is pointed out in Mat 20:28—the words 'and give his life a ransom for many,' and in the accounts of the Last Supper (Mat 26:27-28, Mar 14:24, Luk 22:19-20). (b) In the Fourth Gospel the sacrificial note is even more distinct. It appears in the announcement of the Forerunner (Joh 1:29; Joh 1:36), in the great saying to Nicodemus (Joh 3:14-16), in the discourse at Capernaum (Joh 6:32-33; Joh 6:48-51), in the parable of the Good Shepherd (Joh 10:11; Joh 10:15; Joh 10:17-18), in the remarks on the visit of the Greeks (Joh 12:20-33), and in the words of comfort to the disciples (Joh 15:13). (c) How strongly the Lord must have impressed this view of His ministry upon the minds of His disciples, is shown in utterances of Peter and of Paul in their addresses and in their Epistles, in the elaborate argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and in the representations of the Lamb in the Apocalypse.

ii. The Extent of our Lord's Ministry.—In regard to the extent of the public ministry of Jesus, three main questions present themselves: How long did it last? How much territory did it cover? How much labour did it include?

1. Duration.—On the point of duration the principal things to be considered are the limits, the dates, and the resultant theories of scholars.

(1) The limits of the public ministry of Jesus are properly placed between His baptism and His burial, leaving out at the beginning the thirty years of retirement and preparation at Nazareth, and at the end the forty days of occasional appearances after His resurrection. The determination of the time between is a hard problem.

(2) The principal dates to be determined in our Lord's life are those of His birth, baptism, and crucifixion—the duration of the ministry depending upon the latter two, but involving the first. If it were possible to fix with certainty any two of these, the problem would practically be solved; or, if even one could be placed beyond doubt, it would be greatly simplified. But as a matter of fact scholars have never been able to decide positively on any one of the dates. A full discussion is not called for here (see art. Dates), but the salient points must be presented.

(a) For the Birth of Jesus, we know that it occurred in the reign of the emperor Augustus (Luk 2:1-6), and not long before the death of Herod the Great (Mat 2:1; Mat 2:19). Herod died probably not later than b.c. 4, as is made out from statements of Josephus (see Dates), and thus it appears that by an early error (of Dionysius Exiguus, an abbot of the 6th cent.) the generally accepted era of Christ's birth has been irrevocably fixed a few years later than the actual time. The probable date of the Nativity is somewhere between b.c. 6 and 4.

(b) For the Baptism, we know that it took place at some time within the 'fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar' (Luk 3:1-2), for this was the time that John began to baptize, and Jesus was among those who received the rite at his hands (Mat 3:13, Mar 1:9, Luk 3:21); but none of the accounts gives any definite note as to the exact point during the ministry of John when the baptism occurred. St. Luke states (Luk 3:23) that 'Jesus when he began (presumably His ministry or teaching) was about thirty years old.' But neither His exact age nor the exact point of His 'beginning' is indicated. The probability is that He was either just thirty, or from one to three years past that—hardly under thirty. So that here we have no certain number of years to add to the already uncertain year of the Lord's birth. If we take b.c. 4 as the Birth date and add thirty years, it brings us to a.d. 26 as the probable year of the baptism; but if St. Luke's 'about thirty' be extended two years, it would be 28. Now, as to the 'fifteenth year of Tiberius,' that was probably the year 28, but may have been 26. Augustus died in a.d. 14 (Aug. 19), and, if the beginning of the reign of his successor Tiberius be reckoned from that date, the 'fifteenth year' would begin in Aug. 28, and the baptism of Jesus would be at some time in the twelve months following. But it is possible that St. Luke dates the beginning of Tiberius' reign from the time he was associated in the government with Augustus, i.e. in a.d. 12; and so the 'fifteenth year' could begin in Aug. 26. On this, however, it is proper to remark that the more common mode of reckoning would be from the actual sole reign, and not from the previous association of an emperor in the government.

(c) For the Crucifixion, we know that it occurred during the governorship of Pontius Pilate in Judaea (all the Evangelists), and this administration covered about ten years, from a.d. 26 to 36. Other data (see Dates) help to fix upon near the central part of this period as the time of the Crucifixion, between 28 and 31, more likely 29 or 30.

(3) These uncertainties have given rise among scholars to a number of different theories of the duration of our Lord's ministry. It will be sufficient to mention three, among which choice, according to what seems to be the greatest probability, should be made.

(a) The short period theory. This assigns but a little over a year to the ministry. According to it, the Baptism probably occurred early in the year 29, that is, during the fifteenth year of Tiberius, reckoning that to have begun in Aug. 28, and the Baptism to have taken place early in the year following. The first Passover (Joh 2:13) came soon after, and the last Passover just a year later. Between these two Passovers lay the whole ministry, hence this theory is called the bipaschal view. To obtain this result, the feast of Joh 5:1 is held not to be a Passover; the text of Joh 6:4 is regarded as incorrect (on slight documentary evidence), and read as omitting 'of the passover,' and so leaving this also an unnamed feast. After disposing of these two feasts, the order of feasts mentioned in John is fixed as follows: Passover (Joh 2:13), a.d. 29; Pentecost (Joh 5:1), nameless or omitted (Joh 6:4), Tabernacles (Joh 7:2), Dedication (Joh 10:22), and Passover (Joh 11:55), spring of a.d. 30. With this scheme derived from the Fourth Gospel, the data furnished by the Synoptics is made to harmonize by slighting the indications of a time of nearly ripe grain (Mat 12:1, Mar 2:23, Luk 6:1), which it is hard to locate if there were only two Passovers in the whole series of events. But this theory is defended (see von Soden in Encyc. Bibl.) on the following grounds: (i.) That the correct interpretation of the 'fifteenth year' of Tiberius is from the date of his sole reign, and therefore is a.d. 28-29. (ii.) The events of the Gospel narrative are too meagre to have extended over more than a year. (iii.) This view was held by many of the Fathers as early as the 2nd century. The only one of these grounds that has any real force is the first, and as to that it may be replied that we are not compelled to put the Crucifixion in 30, and thereby limit the time to one year. The second ground is entirely subjective—to many other scholars it seems far too short a time for all the events (with their implications of others and of intervals) to have taken place. As to the third ground, it may be said that the Fathers were not unanimous, and they had only the same data for forming opinions that modern and more accurate chronologers have. Besides its inadequacy to account for all the facts, this theory deals in an arbitrary way with the text of Joh 6:4 and with the indication furnished by the incident of the grain fields (Mat 12:1 etc.).

(b) The long period theory. This holds that there were four Passovers in the ministry, and is hence called the quadripaschal theory. It dates from Eusebius in the 4th cent., and is held by many modern scholars. This takes the unnamed feast of Joh 5:1 to be a Passover, holds to the commonly received text of Joh 6:4, puts the Baptism early in 27 and the Crucifixion in 30, thus making the ministry extend over three years. But there is difference of arrangement of details even among those who hold this view, and it is not at all certain that the feast of Joh 5:1 can be fixed as a Passover.

(c) The medium period theory. This holds that the feast of Joh_5:1 is not a Passover, and that there were only three Passovers in the ministry—so the tripaschal theory. As to what feast it was, and as to the arrangement of all the details, there is much difference among the advocates of the medium period. But from a year and a half to two and a half is the time allowed by those who reject both the other theories. If the Baptism occurred in the autumn of 28 or early spring of 29, then to get in three Passovers it will be necessary to put the Crucifixion in 31—to which there are serious objections. But if the Baptism was in 26-27, then the Crucifixion could be assigned to 29, which is not improbable. It must be said in view of all these difficulties, that no positive convictions in regard to the duration of the ministry are, in the present state of knowledge, tenable, but the probabilities are upon the whole in favour of a ministry of more than one and less than three years' duration.

2. Localities.—In regard to the topographical extent of our Lord's ministry we have a much simpler question to deal with. His labours extended throughout Palestine, and on a few occasions to contiguous lands. (a) Judaea, in several different places, and more especially Jerusalem, witnessed some of His most important deeds and teachings. (b) Galilee, however, was the principal scene of His teaching and healing work. The Lake and its cities,—Capernaum with others,—Nazareth, Cana, and other towns and a number of villages, the plains and mountains of populous Galilee shared in the deeds of His busy life. Two certainly, and probably three, separate tours of the whole of Galilee are mentioned: (1) Mat_4:23, Mar_1:39, Luk_4:44; (2) Luk_8:1; (3) Mat_9:35, Mar_6:6,—though it is possible that (2) and (3) are the same. (c) In passing through Samaria several times (Joh_4:4 ff., Luk_9:52 f., Luk_17:11) He paused to perform some work of mercy. (d) Into Phœnicia, 'the region of Tyre and Sidon,' He went at least once (Mat_15:21, Mar_7:24). (e) Several visits to districts contiguous to Galilee, to the east and north, are mentioned, namely, the visit to Gerasa or Gadara during His Galilaean ministry (Mat_8:28, Mar_5:1, Luk_8:26), to Decapolis (Mar_7:31), to the unknown Magadan (Mat_15:39) or Dalmanutha (Mar_8:10), and Caesarea-Philippi (Mat_16:13, Mar_8:27). (f) In regard to the region beyond the Jordan commonly known as Peraea, there are interesting notices, but some uncertainties. The first notice is in the account of John's baptism as taking place at Bethany beyond Jordan (Joh_1:28). Much later there was a ministry of uncertain duration in Peraea (Joh_10:40, Luk_13:22; Luk_13:32), and still later a journey through the same region on His last visit to Jerusalem (Mat_19:1, Mar_10:1).

3. Labours.—The extent of our Lord's ministry is also to be regarded from the point of view of the labours He performed during its course. (a) The actual labours recorded by the Evangelists are considerable in sum. (b) That these were only samples and specimens of His work is distinctly and repeatedly implied. (c) Pointed allusions to the magnitude of His work are frequent (Mat_4:23; Mat_4:25, Mar_1:32; Mar_1:34, Luk_4:14-15, and many similar passages). (d) There are many indications of the insistent demands upon His attention (e.g. Mar 1:35-37; Mar 2:1-2; Mar 3:7-9; Mar 3:20 and similar ones), of His weariness and need of rest (Joh 4:6, Mar 4:35 ff; Mar 6:30-32, and others), once of the anxiety of His relatives (Mar 3:21-31). (e) The enormous amount of His unrecorded labours is distinctly asserted (Joh 21:25).

The following conspectus may serve to present in clearer view some of the points already discussed:

iii. Results of our Lord's Ministry.—When we attempt to sum up the results of our Lord's ministry, we have to distinguish between those which were gathered during His life and those which have been maturing through the centuries following.

1. During His life.—Briefly, we should here have in mind: (a) the multitudes who were reached by His personal influence both in His teaching and His healing; (b) the number of particular adherents won, including the Twelve and all other disciples mentioned in the Gospels, together with those mentioned or alluded to in the early chapters of Acts; (c) the training of the Twelve for their work after His departure; and (d) the establishing of the institutions of the Kingdom of God—preaching, the ordinances, the Church.

2. Since His ascension.—The history of Christianity for nineteen centuries only partially describes the outcome of Christ's short ministry upon earth. It is indeed a commonplace, but withal a glorious truth, to say that no other term of service in any man's life, whether longer or shorter, was ever so potent an influence or so formative a force for all that is best in human affairs.

MINSTRELS.—See Flute-players.

☞ Mint

MINT (ἡδύοσμον, mentha) is mentioned only in Mat_23:23 and the parallel passage Luk_11:42, where it is represented as being subject to tithe. It is a familiar garden herb, belonging to the natural order Labiatae. The species commonly grown in Palestine is horse-mint (M. sylvestris), and there can be little doubt that this is the mint of Scripture. It is extensively used for culinary purposes, and is also highly valued as a carminative. Mint was probably one of the ‘bitter herbs’ with which the Paschal lamb was eaten.

☞ Miracles

MIRACLES.—The process of thought and research, both theological and scientific, has led to a position where belief in the actuality, in the career of Jesus, of those remarkable activities and manifestations summed up under the comprehensive and popular term ‘miracle,’ is made possible if not inevitable. The prevailing negative attitude of science shows signs of being abandoned in view of enlarging understanding of the possibilities both in Matter and in Spirit, and theology is coming to see that the miraculous events recorded of Him who was the Son of God and the Regenerator of the Race must not be conceived of as in any sense or degree a violation of the order of Nature; and that viewed in this way they become, instead of difficulties and stumbling-blocks in the way of faith, some of its most convincing reinforcements. It is scarcely too much to affirm that a belief in these occurrences as vital parts of the Christian revelation is rising, compared with which all previous belief is feeble and superficial. Without being unduly optimistic, we may anticipate that the ‘ages of faith’ in every department of Christian truth, and not least in that of miracle, are yet to come. This consummation is being prepared for in modern conceptions of the Order of Nature, of Human Personality, and of the Divine Being.

1. Modern conceptions of the Order of Nature. Christian advocates are becoming thoroughly disposed to accept unreservedly the scientific teaching of the Unity of Nature, carefully guarding the admission from being read as the Uniformity of Nature. They recognize and take account of the inalienable connexion between cause and effect by which the Universe consists. They do not regard the miracles of the Gospels as in the least degree arbitrary interruptions of the Order of Nature, but rather as a revelation of the infinite extent of that order. The ancient antagonism between the Natural and the Supernatural has broken down, and the two spheres are seen to be one, regarded from opposite poles. Grave objections lie against the term 'supernatural,' which is entirely un-Scriptural, and many modern thinkers prefer the term 'spiritual' to express the animating and sustaining Power which pervades all things. Without the spiritual the physical universe has no ground of being, and nothing exists, not the least fraction of the material, still less anything of human affection and sympathy and personal life-force, apart from the Universal Life. If the term 'supernatural' be retained, it must be on the distinct understanding that while all things may be conceived of as super-naturally sustained, it may with equal propriety be asserted that the whole Universe, including not only the physical but the mental, moral, and spiritual in human personality, is a part of the Order of Nature. The powers and sympathies that work in man cannot be separated from that order, and it is most natural, most agreeable to the whole constitution of human nature, that it shall be animated, sustained, and governed by the Divine Power and Life. Men of science, moreover, are increasingly willing to admit the necessity of the spiritual and rational as the ultimate ground of the physical; and recent investigations into the make of the so-called 'atom,' and the vast potentialities of Matter, will further develop the distrust of all dogmatic assertion that nothing in the nature of the events recorded in the Gospels and called 'miracles' is possible or credible. Sir Oliver Lodge (Hibbert Journal, October 1902) writes:

'The root question or outstanding controversy between science and faith rests upon two distinct conceptions of the universe: the one, that of a self-contained and self-sufficient universe, with no outlook into or links with anything beyond, uninfluenced by any life or mind except such as is connected with a visible and tangible material body; and the other conception, that of a universe lying open to all manner of spiritual influences, permeated through and through with a Divine spirit, guided and watched by living minds, acting through the medium of law indeed, but with intelligence and love behind the law; a universe by no means self-sufficient or self-contained, but with feelers at every pore groping into another supersensuous order of existence, where reign laws hitherto unimagined by science, but laws as real and as mighty as those by which the material universe is governed.'

2. The nature of Human Personality.—Researches, anthropological and psychological, into the nature and possibilities of man have greatly multiplied during the present generation, and something of the vast region of potentiality lying above and beneath and beyond all that is actually realized has been revealed. The conception of the ideal human personality has been immeasurably enlarged and exalted. Psychological investigation is only in its infancy, and yet enough has been arrived at to make it certain that the powers of humanity remain essentially unfathomed. Beneath or above the ordinary consciousness of man, and beyond the powers which at present his will controls and organizes, are other and larger powers at present uncontrolled and unorganized by the personal force, but manifest in exceptional phases of human life, such as dreams, hypnosis, clairvoyance, clairaudience, somnambulism, or unwonted excitement and spiritual exaltation. We may call man, as we are acquainted with him, a personality, a living centre of original will and action, made in the image of the Deity. But yet it is far truer to regard him as a personality which has not yet arrived, the mere rudiment of a personality whose powers, as he controls them, Teach out beyond his control to regions of potentiality as yet unrecognized, and showing that the true personality is vastly greater and mightier than the present actual. 'Man partly is, and wholly hopes to be.' The powers at present possessed and controlled by man are the veriest suggestion of the powers that are his by right of nature, made as he was for intimate alliance with the Divine Being. But the perfect Personality was realized in the Son of Man who was also Son of God. The perfect Personality cannot be conceived of apart from the Divine Personality, for it is of the very essence of the Ideal Man that his nature shall be possessed and controlled by the Divine. By the Divine power the human nature consists. And the Lord Jesus plainly marked it as the essential condition of His power that He was morally and spiritually one with God.

3. The Divine Nature.—A wholesome feature of modern conceptions of the Being of God is their sense of mystery. Holding fast, on the one hand, to the essential knowableness of the Deity and to His self-revelation as the centre of all Divine action, theologians, on the other hand, admit the impossibility of giving dogmatic expression to the mode of the Divine Being. 'In mystery the soul abides,' not only the Divine but even the human soul. But taking the teaching of the Lord Jesus, interpreted as it was by His life before God and man, and as it is by an increasing Christian experience, they conceive of God as the Infinite Will and Intelligence that animates while it transcends the whole creation, visible and invisible, a Divine Presence ever seeking self-realization and self-revelation in His creation, in some true measure expressing Himself in all the works of His hands, even in the non-human creation; but most really of all in human life with its manifold sympathies and powers, actual and potential, conscious and sub-conscious (or super-conscious). The conception is of a Living God present and active in all life, but supremely in the nobler impulses and humanities that glorify mankind. In the life of men as they are, in their poor actual, the Divine Mind finds a real though feeble and fragmentary expression, and as that nature is developed and its latent powers are evoked and made part of the conscious life, is destined to find a fuller channel for its living action. And the nature which was fitted to be a complete channel, and more than channel—an active co-operator with Himself—the Divine Being, revealing Himself as Father, finds in Him who was perfectly one with man and at the same time morally, spiritually, and essentially one with God.

In this fact, that the Divine Power dwelt in its fulness in the personality of Jesus, we find the unifying principle for all the miracles of the Gospels. The master-principle of them all is contained in our Lord's own declaration, 'If I by the funder of God cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come upon you' (Luk 11:20). This declaration is in complete harmony with His repeated affirmations that the ultimate power by which He wrought His beneficent and mighty works was the same as that by which He knew and taught the truth—the Divine power dwelling in Him (Joh 5:19; Joh 5:30; Joh 14:10).

The great deeds of healing and of revelation were due to the direct action of the Infinite Life and active Power by which all things consist (1) on the nature of Jesus, and (2) through Him, so empowered, upon the life of man and upon the world. Our Lord makes it perfectly plain that the miraculous deeds were morally conditioned, were therefore a moral achievement, and depended upon His living faith in and union with God. Of Himself He could do nothing (Joh 5:19). But He also has the feeling and knowledge that in His own nature there was a potentiality of superhuman working. And the chief point to emphasize is that the Personality of Jesus cannot be conceived of even momentarily as apart from the Divine Life. He perfectly lived in God. The purpose of all was to accomplish the Divine will by the establishment of His Kingdom among men. Here and elsewhere the miracles are represented, not as an arbitrary putting forth of a supernatural power altogether out of relation to any human capacity or possibility, but as arising spontaneously out of the unique relation He sustained to the Infinite Life; not as something given, while it could have been withheld, for the sake of commending the moral and spiritual and personal claims of Jesus, but as vital and essential parts of the Divine Revelation. The evidential value of the work was secondary, the need of man and the Divine impulse primary.

In order to get an intelligent faith in the Gospel miracles, it is of great consequence at what point we approach the problem. The important matter is to begin with the less obscure, with those works which are most closely and obviously related to what may be called the innate forces of human nature. This gives us as our starting-point the healing works of Jesus. Careful study must be given to the principles and methods employed in these cases of restoration from sickness, infirmity, and distress. A growing disposition is evident to receive these as genuinely historical, on the ground that they are not in themselves inconceivable, related as they are to the forces perceived to be at work in the complex nature of man. Psychical research has brought, and is more fully bringing, to light a vast wealth of resource in the depths and heights of human personality. And a close study of the method Of Jesus convinces us that He worked upon this complex nature (see art. Cures). His miracles were not simply the output of an alien force, but the living exercise of a Divine force, deeply akin to all human powers, already working in the capacities, sympathies, and life-ties of humanity, utilizing the known in all their unknown ramifications, and also the unknown and unsuspected. These works are no less Divine because they are not emphasized as supernatural, the Divine energy being more truly conceived of as the normal and natural. If these deepest principles which our Lord followed are duly recognized in our faith and conception, then the remaining miracles, most of which are rejected by many who receive the healings, become not only not incredible, but inevitable as the completion of a revelation otherwise essentially incomplete. One who has gained a rational and imaginative faith in the healing of body and mind, by the incarnate pity and power of God in Christ Jesus, will be prepared to believe that it is extremely unlikely that Christ should so freely reveal the power of God in this sphere, and not go beyond to give visible expression to the power that resides in and animates and at the same time controls all Nature. And those miracles which are associated with the life and career of Jesus, being wrought not so much by the power of our Lord, as by the Divine Power acting upon Him, have a strong presumption in their favour, congruous as they are with the whole method of His mighty works and with the one revelation given in Him.

A. Miracles of Jesus.

1. Our Lord's own description of them.—A distinction must be made between what Jesus Himself said of the miracles and the description given by the people of the time, who were under the influence of low and vulgar ideas of a Divine revelation, and by the Evangelists, who were not altogether emancipated from current conceptions. (1) It must be borne in mind that the Synoptics give very few specific terms which our Lord applied to His own supernatural action. They are the record of His deeds, not of His speech concerning them. But the Evangelists' description may be taken without much deduction as a faithful reflexion of the Master's usage. Jesus does refer to His works, as in Mat_16:9-10; He speaks of casting out demons by the Spirit of God (Mat_12:28) or by the finger of God (Luk_11:20), and declares that 'this kind' (τοῦτο δὲ τὸ γένος) goeth not out except by prayer (Mat_17:21 Textus Receptus). He refers to the deed itself and its blessed result, without characterizing it by any specific term. (2) His favourite term for them, according to the Fourth Gospel, was ἔργα, 'works' (Joh_5:36; Joh_10:25; Joh_10:32; Joh_10:37-38). He uses the same word also of the good and beautiful acts of others (καλὸν ἔργον, Mar_14:6). He makes no great distinction between His ordinary works of mercy and the extraordinary, regarding them all alike as wrought simply and naturally in the way of His life and vocation. The miracles were not the highest works; they belong to a lower level of manifestation as compared with His moral and spiritual revelation of God (Joh 14:11). But He also qualifies ἔργα: ‘the works that none other man did’ (Joh 15:24), probably including under that category the healing and other mighty deeds. Utility was the chief element in His view of all His deeds and actions. (3) He also calls them δυνάμεις (‘powers’ or ‘mighty works’), emphasizing the striking manifestation of Divine Power overpassing all human capacity (Mat 11:21). The Evangelists also commonly employ this term (Mat 13:58, Mar 6:5). (4) He also speaks of His works as σημεῖα, ‘signs’ (Joh 6:26), carefully separating Himself from the popular estimate of what constituted a Divinely significant act (see art. Sign). The Fourth Gospel consistently applies this word to the works of Jesus. Probably we must see in the fact a feature due to prolonged reflexion on the events in the light of after-history. But the term is singularly fitting to describe the Divinely significant works of our Lord as signs of another and higher order of things, leading on the thought and imagination to higher spheres of being, fuller powers of soul, Diviner possibilities for humanity. (5) The word τέρατα (‘prodigies’) is never applied by Jesus to His own working. Only once He uses the word, and then to disavow the idea involved in it and to sever His action from it (Joh 4:48). In the Apocalyptic discourse these τέρατα are associated with false Christs and false prophets (Mat 24:24, Mar 13:22). (6) The popular use of σημεῖον was most akin to the τέρας. With this the English word ‘miracle’ has most affinity. It is not the equivalent of any word used by Jesus. The Authorized Version uses it to translate σημεῖον and δύναμις. The Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 practically abandons it. The idea of the word ‘supernatural’ also is not found in the NT or in the whole Bible, and the term should be relegated to the region of the obsolete. The word ‘spiritual’ is an excellent substitute, conserving the idea expressed by it without committing the mind to any untenable and indefensible philosophy.

2. Characteristics of our Lord’s miracles.—Briefly, the features of the miracles which commend them to our judgment and affection may be stated as—(1) Spontaneity. They arise out of the occasion—are never deliberated, unless the raising of Lazarus be an exception (Joh 11:4), but spring from the present practical impulse of compassion and desire to help man, and the prompting of the Divine Spirit (Joh 2:4 ff., Luk 18:40-42 etc.). (2) High moral purpose. The miracles of Jesus ever sought the highest and Divinest ends, and were never ends in themselves. In all His works there were no signs of any ostentatious exercise of power. Sternly He forbade any public advertisement of His healings, etc., which might rouse the popular excitement. (3) Strong restraint in use of supernormal power. The Temptation of the wilderness witnesses to what was characteristic of all His life, His constant refusal to use His power for personal ease, gratification, or convenience. Nothing was done by extraordinary which could be done by ordinary means. (4) Moral dignity and congruity with the whole spirit and life of Jesus. His miracles spring out of His innermost nature, and reveal the moral harmony and winsomeness of His Person. Herein lies a most fruitful comparison with other alleged miracles, ecclesiastical and mediaeval and modern. The vast majority of these latter fail to commend themselves to us as worthy exercises of a Divine power. The criterion must not, however, be unduly pressed, for natures differ widely in what they regard as morally fitting and suitable for Divine action. But, employed broadly, it may help us to discriminate between alleged miraculous events as to how far they are worthy of credence. (5) Helpfulness to mankind was the abiding characteristic of our Lord's miracles. In most cases they were wrought for the immediate succour of suffering humanity, and for the revelation, in and through this, of the Divine love and pity. In His works on the non-human world also the need of man was continually served, more especially his need for vision of the higher facts of existence. His action never issued in meaningless marvels or needless wonders and in those that seem farthest removed from the requirements of mankind a revelation was given of the kind of power which animated and sustained all nature, and ordered its course.

3. The whole texture of the Gospel narratives is complicated with the supernormal. They presuppose a unique relation to God in Jesus, and His possession of a miracle-working power. 'In most of the reports the action of Jesus is so interwoven with unmistakably authentic words, that the two elements cannot be separated' (A. B. Bruce, art. 'Jesus' in Encyc. Bibl.). If excision be made from the Evangelic records (1) of all that directly narrates His unique action as a healer and wonderworker, (2) of all that presupposes the possibility and actuality of such unique action, (3) of all that testifies to His authority and power due to a unique relation to God—the Gospels are left bald and bare and mutilated beyond description. The very warp and woof of the fabric is destroyed.

As an example, apply the process to Mark 1-3. As a residue we have—

1. The account of the Baptist's preaching (without the reference to the prophetic witness).
2. The Baptism of John (robbed of the spiritual endowment of Jesus and its accompaniments).
3. The bare mention of a temptation in the wilderness (with angels excluded. The story cannot be filled up by reference to the other Evangelists, for their account presupposes a miracle-working power in Jesus).

4. John's imprisonment, and announcement of the Kingdom by Jesus.
5. Call of Peter, Andrew, James, and John.
6. Teaching of Jesus in the synagogue, and spread of His fame (the latter left like a pyramid on its apex without the restoration of the demoniac).
7. Entrance to house of Peter (healing of wife's mother excluded).
8. Account of solitary prayer (with no action of Jesus to account for such prolonged prayer).
9. Preaching in synagogue (mere repetition apart from healing of leper and casting out devil).
10. Account of sudden popularity (with no adequate reason given for it).
11. Another repetition of the statement that He taught the people (Mar_2:3-12 all being excised as entirely complicated with miracle).
12. Call of Matthew.
13. Conflict with scribes and Pharisees in regard to eating and drinking with publicans and sinners, and fasting, and His teaching consequent thereon.
14. Pharisees and Herodians take counsel to kill Him (but no reason given—the healing of withered hand being removed).
15. Withdrawal of Jesus (following by multitude being omitted because of motive given in Mar_2:8).
16. Call of disciples (commission reduced to preaching and teaching. Teaching in Mar_3:20-30 cut out as entirely dependent on His exorcism of demons).
17. Teaching of true relationship to Himself (strongly savouring of presumption, apart from reasons which have disappeared in process of excision).

The whole narrative is rendered colourless and dislocated, the only section which is left fairly un mutilated being Mar_2:13-28. 'That the healing ministry was not only a fact, but a great outstanding fact, is attested by the popularity of Jesus and by the various theories which were invented to account for the remarkable phenomena' (A. B. Bruce, l.c.). The above analysis forcibly illustrates this assertion.

| 39. Cleansing of Temple | Mt. | | Mk. | Lk. |
| 40. Healing of Malchus | Mt. | | Lk. | Jn. |
| 41. Falling to ground of soldiers | | | | Jn. |

Examining the above list, we may remark—

(1) The same event is probably referred to in 2 and 39. Possibly also, but on the whole not probably, 3 and 14 refer to same healing.

(2) Instances which seem to come so near to familiar human experience as to need no assumption of miracle are 2, 4, 41.

(3) In 31 no indication is given that the command of Jesus was meant to be obeyed. It may readily have been understood by the disciple as a parabolic expression of the surety of providential care.

(4) Cases where the reporting of the healing is so casual that nothing as to the method of Jesus can be securely built upon the narrative are 10, 12, 33, 34, 40. The chief interest of the Evangelist lies in the other part of the story. In the case of Malchus, St. John, who reports the injury, makes no mention of any healing, and the interest of St. Luke is evangelical rather than medical, emphasizing the generosity and compassion of Jesus.

(5) 'Nature miracles' are found (a) in each period; (b) in the Fourth Gospel; (c) in the Synoptic tradition, both in the Double and Triple Synopsis. They are therefore as well attested as the works of healing. The walking on the sea is found in the Double Synopsis; the stilling of the storm and the withering of the fig-tree in the Triple Synopsis; the feeding of the multitude in all four Gospels.

(6) The healings of nervous diseases, which many are more willing to accept on the ground of their likeness to well-known medical facts of to-day, are not better attested than those involving physical disorder and disease. The healings of fever, leprosy, issue of blood, and blindness are all recorded in the Triple Synopsis. The raising of the dead is found in all four Gospels; one case, the daughter of Jairus, is attested by the three Synoptics. The NT makes no distinction between these classes of miracles, but the evidence for all the classes is equally strong (see art. Cures, § 11).

5. Classification of miracles of Jesus.—As a typical example of the customary classification of miracles, may be given that of Westcott (Introd. to the Gospels)—

I. Miracles on Nature. 1. Miracles of creative power: (α) water made wine, (β) bread multiplied, (γ) walking on the water. 2. Miracles of Providence: (α) miracles of blessing: (1) first draught of fishes, (2) storm stilled, (3) stater in fish's mouth, (4) second draught of fishes; (β) Miracle of judgment: withering of fig-tree.

II. Miracles on Man. (α) Miracles of personal faith: (1) organic defects (blind): (α) faith special (Mat 9:29-31), (b) faith absolute—Bartimaeus restored; (2) chronic impurity: (α) open (leprosy)—faith special, the one leper—faith special and absolute contrasted, the ten lepers; (b) secret—woman with issue. (β) Miracles of intercession: (1) organic defects (simple intercession): (a) the blind (Mar 8:22-26), (b) the deaf and dumb (Mar 7:31-37); (2) mortal sicknesses—intercession based on natural ties: (a) fever (Joh 4:46-54), (b) paralysis—centurion's servant and man borne of four. (γ) Miracles of love: (1) organic defect—blindness (John 9); (2) disease—(a) fever, (b) dropsy, (c) withered hand, (d) impotent man, (e) woman with spirit of infirmity; (3) death—(a) death chamber, (b) the bier, (c) the tomb.

III. Miracles on Spirit World. (α) Miracles of intercession: (1) simple intercession—(a) dumb man with devil, (b) blind and dumb man; (2) intercession based on natural ties—(α) Syro-Phœnician's daughter, (b) lunatic boy. (β) Miracles of antagonism: (1) in synagogue—unclean spirit cast out, (2) in tombs—the lepers cast out.

The chief defect in the above is its endorsement of the term 'Nature miracles' as applied to the first class. If 'Nature' be rightly measured, the term may legitimately be used to cover the whole ground of our Lord's working, for the complex nature of man cannot be severed from the universal order. Moreover, the distinction is, apart from that consideration, an arbitrary one, for several of these so-called 'Nature miracles' are wrought in the sphere of our Lord's human nature, and are conceivably extensions of human, mental, and psychical faculty; and some of them are wrought in and upon the bodily form of Jesus Himself. The walking upon the water is an example of the latter. The draught of fishes is a miracle of vision, an extension of human perception, as well as an example of Divine control of the animal creation. A similar element must be traced in the instance of the coin in the fish's month, if we are to understand a miracle here.* [Note: The power of the mind over the body may reasonably be conceived as at work in these instances, for it is impossible, with the growing knowledge of the inter-relations of mind and body, to set an arbitrary limit to that influence.] Other defects are: 'Miracles of Providence,' 'Miracles of Blessing' and of 'Love,' are terms that may be applied to other than the classes given.

A truer classification may be suggested as follows:

I. Healings of bodily ailments—as blindness, leprosy, lameness, dropsy, deafness and dumbness, fevers, and manifold ailments and infirmities.

II. Healings of nervous diseases—as paralysis or palsy, simple epilepsy, possibly the woman with the spirit of infirmity (unless her ailment be physical).

III. Healings of nervous and psychical disorders—epilepsy associated with idiocy or insanity, and varieties of mania.

IV. Revelations of power in the nature of Jesus—walking on the sea.

V. Revelation of Jesus in nature and upon the organic world—as draughts of fishes, and stater in fish's mouth.

VI. Power upon the organic world—multiplied loaves and fishes, water made wine, fig-tree withered.

VII. Power upon the inorganic world—stilling of the tempest.

VIII. Raising of the dead—Jairus' daughter, son of widow of Nain, Lazarus.

B. 'Miraculous' events associated with Career of Jesus.

In the above, noteworthy facts are—

(1) Only one Evangelist in each case records 3, 4, 5, 10, 13. Number 10 stands by itself, and is not found in other Gospels, although these speak of the rending of the veil of the Temple. The latter event (11) is also possibly an accompaniment of the remarkable physical phenomena 12 and 13, which were associated with the time of our Lord's death. 1, 2, 12 are recorded by two Evangelists only.

(2) While the historicity, as objective events, of 1, 3, 4, 6, 7 cannot be reasonably denied with any dogmatism, especially if the principles enunciated above be intelligently accepted, yet we are free to admit that they are such as were not unlikely to be added to the Gospel tradition by disciples and by the first Christian community, who were not entirely freed from Jewish prepossessions (see art. Sign). It would be grossly disproportionate to give the same weight of authority to the details of the Birth, Baptism, and Death of Jesus as to the personal experience which He underwent, and to the significance of the Incarnation, Spiritual Endowment, and Atonement for human salvation.

(3) The Voice at the Baptism is well attested, but it is not clear if we are taught to regard it as more than subjective to Jesus Himself. Mt. and Mark seem to attribute the whole experience—the vision of the opening heaven, the seeing of the dove, the hearing of the voice—to Jesus; and the Baptist's vision of the Descent (Joh 1:32) may express his special insight into the whole event as it affected our Lord at that critical time and experience. It is noteworthy that Luke simply records the facts.

(4) The chief events that demand consideration are the Virgin-birth, the Transfiguration, the Resurrection, and the Ascension, for which we must refer to the separate articles on these subjects.

C. Miracles wrought in the name of Jesus by His followers.—The Evangelists make it plain that the disciples and other followers of Jesus were commissioned by the Master to go forth in His name to combine healing and exorcism with the teaching and preaching of the gospel (Mat 10:1; Mat 10:7-8, Mar 3:14-16; Mar 6:7, Luk 10:9). They also declare that a signal success was achieved by the Seventy, for they return to Jesus rejoicing greatly in the power of His name, extending even to the control of the evil spirits (Luk 10:17). Of this great success our Lord was aware, and it became to Him the occasion of a spiritual exultation, in which He saw, as already accomplished, the downfall of the Satanic power with all its accompanying ills and afflictions of mankind (Luk 10:18).

The evidence favours the idea that Jewish exorcists had a certain measure of success in their arts, even although much charlatanry may be believed to have mingled with their practices. The names they invoked, including the Ineffable Name, together, no doubt, with the drastic physical remedies they applied, were possibly efficacious in some cases (Mat 12:27, Luk 9:49). And we may be confident that the Name of Jesus, which was of vast import and of awful and mysterious significance (especially after the Resurrection), would make for healing and for liberating disordered minds and evil-controlled natures. There is reason, also, to make a distinction between these healings and exorcisms and the other works of Jesus, for nothing is said of these latter supernormal powers being possessed by the disciples and first Christians. It must also be remembered that St. Paul's Epistles are clear witness to somewhat kindred phenomena having been experienced in the Charismata of Apostolic circles (1 Corinthians 12, etc.). The closing section of Mark's Gospel, too, is a reflexion of 2nd century belief in the continuance of these miraculous endowments among the Apostles. Coming down to sub-Apostolic times, the evidence is too strong to be discredited that the same powers together with prophecy were familiar to those generations; and the question cannot be entirely avoided, as to whether we have any sufficient reason to draw the line at the close of this age, or, with other apologists, at the time of Constantine, and declare that, beyond it, all assertions of a manifest and direct Divine action through any servant of Christ are due to chicanery, or illusion, ignorance, or superstition.

If this question be left sub judice, and the story of the Christian Church of the following centuries be read without prepossession, an impression may well be produced that some of the alleged supernormal phenomena are far too well attested to be scornfully and summarily dismissed. In all generations of the Christian era, certain natures, specially God-sensitive, conspicuously consecrated to God and sympathetic with man and with all living things, appear to have wielded a real though imperfect control over the physical processes of life. Both through them and in them remarkable forces have been at work which we cannot but believe are God-sustained and God-energized, producing supernormal phenomena. In regard to all these, as well as to kindred manifestations of modern times, the right attitude is that of a watchful but unprejudiced and patient examination. Forces that make for healing undoubtedly lie in human nature, in certain gifted souls, and in others not conspicuously gifted spiritually, but 'sensitives'; and in times of great spiritual awakening, when the sense of the reality of the Unseen and Divine is quickened and God's presence is freshly and acutely realized, startling manifestations of these sub-conscious or super-conscious forces may occur, and need not surprise any who understand how closely the Divine power has access to all forces of human life. Such phenomena, and indeed all things that belong to the human race, must not be met with a non possumus, but with careful, scientific, and withal reverent, investigation. The miracles of Jesus are available as a criterion, and basing our judgment upon them we may demand: (1) an adequate and worthy moral purpose to be served [this must be clearly distinguished from personal or ecclesiastical convenience, advantage, or ambition, traces of which, together with offerings at the shrine of the saint, discredit so many mediaeval miracles]; and (2) a proper moral dignity—in which many alleged workings of the thaumaturgist are conspicuously wanting. It is by no means easy to say how far healings and other powers kindred to those wrought by Jesus are meant to be expected in our human life on earth. It seems natural to make a distinction between the healings and other restorations from human infirmity on the one hand, and works of revelation in the non-human sphere. The latter may not be expected in this earthly scene, although they point to large powers of soul in the evolution of our psychical capacities in some further stages of being. But the healings and exorcisms we have good reason to expect among men on earth; for in all investigation and experiment and self-devoted labour, in all spiritual prayer and aspiration for the physical, mental, and eternal welfare of the race, His presence is ever active who said, 'Lo, I am with you always.'

☞ Mission

MISSION.—The following article deals with the mission of the Lord Jesus Christ only as presented in the Gospel narratives. The Lord Jesus frequently manifested consciousness of being commissioned by God. Now the general (πέμπω) and now the specific term (ἀποστέλλω) for sending is used in reference to His work, the latter word signifying an intimate connexion between sender and sent (Cremer, p. 529). As God's trusted messenger He felt that there was a decree (δεῖ) for Him to execute (Luk 2:49; Luk 4:43; Luk 9:22 etc.), that He had His Father's authority (Joh 5:43; Joh 8:42), and that as the Father had sanctified Him and sent Him into the world (Joh 10:36), it was not for Him to do His own pleasure (Joh 6:38). The Fourth Evangelist, deeply impressed with the idea of the commission received by his Lord, mentions the fact repeatedly, and in one place stops to brood over the mere name of a place because it suggests a mission (Joh 9:7). Instead of considering Himself as being merely one among a number of Divine messengers, Jesus knew Himself to be the Messenger-Son (Mar 12:6-7). The Lord's consciousness refers to (1) the objects of His mission, (2) the means to be adopted to gain His wondrous ends, (3) the extent, and (4) the credentials of His mission.

1. The objects of the mission.—These are exhibited in various forms. Prophecy has to be fulfilled (Mar 12:10-11; Mar 14:21; Mar 14:27; Mar 14:49, Luk 4:21; Luk 10:24; Luk 24:27, Joh 5:46; Joh 13:18). It is the function of Jesus to be the King (Psalms 2), the Son of Man (Psalms 8, Dan 7:13-14), the Servant of Jehovah (Isaiah 42, 53), the founder a New Covenant (Jer 31:31-34); and thus to glorify God (Joh 12:28; Joh 17:4) and save men (Mat 1:21, Luk 2:11; Luk 19:10, Joh 3:17; Joh 10:10; Joh 12:47; Joh 17:2; Joh 20:31) by attracting men to Himself (Mat 11:28, Joh 5:40; Joh 12:32) and by giving Himself as a sacrifice (Mar 10:45, Joh 1:29; Joh 6:51; Joh 10:15; Joh 12:24).

2. Means to the ends of the mission.—The nature of these aims required that the Heavenly Apostle (Heb 3:1) should manifest the Kingdom and the character of God, together with the greatness of man's calling. The sacrificial death at Calvary sums up all the revelations. The speech, the life, the death of the Lord Jesus are the means whereby He discharges His unique mission to mankind.

(a) To succeed, it was imperative that Jesus should ensure the recognition of the sovereignty of God. The Kingdom of God must be established upon the earth (Mat 4:17, Luk 19:11 ff.). Where there are minds that gladly defer to God's will, there the Kingdom is. Submission may be incomplete (Mat 13:24-30; Mat 13:47-48) and transient (Mat 13:20-22). In Jesus alone were the claims of God fully and constantly heeded: therefore the leadership of men is His prerogative (Mat 23:10). He called men to Himself in order to make them loyal to the heavenly throne. God's subjects renounce evil habits (Mat 4:17), enjoy pardon (Luk 24:47), possess sincerity (Mat 7:21-27), are plastic and trustful as children (Mat 18:2-4, Luk 18:16-17, Joh 3:3), are willing to render costly service in meekness (Mat 20:25-28); they transcend national distinctions (Mat 8:11) and set all interests below those of the Kingdom (Mat 6:33; Mat 13:45-46, Luk 9:57-62; Luk 18:29-30). The presence of the Kingdom is known by its conquering power (Luk 11:20). Its growth cannot be accounted for unless the activities of God are adduced; albeit man's cooperation is required (Mar 4:26-29). A river (as the Nile) may not originate in the land that it waters, and yet may be indispensable thereto; similarly Christ's Kingdom is the blessing the world needs most, and its coining must be uppermost in prayerful minds (Mat 6:9-10), yet it takes its rise in the unseen heaven (Joh 18:36). Diseases, defects, excreescences of all kinds—physical, mental, spiritual—are foreign elements (Mat 13:27-28, Luk 13:16). It was the function of the Lord Jesus to reveal verbally and in His life the nature of God's reign. His loving and unswerving devotion to the Father's will is the central orb of the moral world, and all human wills should be planets ruled and lighted by His filial homage. Union with Him, harmony with Him, would bring about union and harmony among the races of mankind, and earth according to the great prayers (Mat 6:9-10, Joh 17:20-21), would be a province of heaven. In all its particulars—its purity, might, obedience, joyful loyalty, friendliness, prayerfulness, catholicity—the Kingdom of God is the life of Christ expanded. It was His task to give mankind, on the scale of His earthly experience, a clear and distinct conception of subjection to the authority of God. The Kingdom is where He is; it is He working through the wills, intellects, affections of His people. The laws of the Kingdom are those to which Christ conformed His purposes and deeds. The Beatitudes (Mat 5:1-12) are songs that first were sung in His own heart. Hence a description of the Kingdom is a description of the character of Jesus from the point of view belonging to duty and common service. If the precepts of the gospel—which were indeed citations from His own hook of life as child, friend, artizan, preacher, sacrifice—were heeded in home and Church and State, we should see the Kingdom of God an organism with Christ as its soul, devout, righteous, beneficent.

(b) He to whom the human will ought to be surrendered must be known to be supremely worthy of reverence, trust, and love. Inasmuch, then, as knowledge of God is essential to eternal life, it was one of the aims of Christ to impart this knowledge (Joh 17:3). God had often been represented as the Father of the Chosen People, and here and there individuals had thought themselves to be sons of God; but in the teachings of Jesus the Divine Fatherhood is asserted and illustrated so copiously, that some chapters of the Gospels consist almost solely of variations to the music of these good tidings (Matthew 5, 6, 7). Jesus made men think of God trustfully as well as reverently, with love as well as with awe. The revelation could be made only by the Son of God (Mat 11:27, Luk 10:22), and it was contained in Himself (Joh 1:18; Joh 14:7-10). The love and obedience of the Son have as their counterparts the Father's love and instructions; and so the paternal and the filial dispositions are mutually illuminating. The purposes of the Father are executed by the Son, and therefore to come to Jesus, to receive and honour Him, are acts that reach to God (Luk 9:48, Joh 5:22-23; Joh 13:20). The message is the Messenger. Not merely does a veil fall from before the Divine character; for Jesus, standing where the veil had stood, manifests the eternal righteousness and pitying love that cannot be content unless men are rescued from unrighteousness and wrath. Salvation is man's progressive advance (Joh 17:3 γινώσκω) to God, his growing communion with the Father, his increasing faith, love, and reverence. The Saviour invites men to come by penitence and trust to Himself, that they may become one with Him and, through Him, with the Father (Mat 11:28, Joh 17:21). whose holiness He discloses.

(c) The fulfilment of Christ's mission required the revelation of man. What is the moral condition of men? What is man in God's idea? What can make man's sin to be seen and hated? What can make God's thought and purpose concerning man attractive to sinners? Inasmuch as penitence, faith, hope, love are essential elements of a true life, to create them was included in Christ's gracious task. To produce the consciousness of guilt was an indispensable preliminary. His speech made sin exceeding sinful, and in His conduct there were presented such contrasts to man's misdoings that the evils were exposed. A sense of sin actually was produced (Luk 5:8; Luk 7:37 ff; Luk 19:7-8), and men learned to trust God's Son and to desire to be taught His life (Luk 11:1). He encouraged men to hope that His experience of pleasing the Father (Joh 8:29) might become theirs, seeing that they could become as intimately related to Him as the branches are related to the vine (Joh 15:1-8). The appearance of the Son of Man was a gospel, because, while it condemned sin, it affirmed moral evil to be an intrusion into man's nature, and it invited the sinful to receive forgiveness and enter into union with that victorious life which from the first had overcome the world (Mat 4:1-11, Joh 8:29; Joh 16:33; Joh 17:4). Corrupted man rejected and killed the Holy One, thereby disclosing human guilt and need; man, as God intended him to be, and as he may become by 'believing in him' (Joh 2:11; Joh 3:16), is revealed in Christ's meekness, devoutness, filial obedience and fraternal service. 'The Son of God' gives men authority to become God's sons (Joh 1:12-13), thereby causing men fully to unfold their manhood.

(d) The mission of the Saviour involved His death.—His death was a chief part of His work. The Evangelists record sayings which prove that the great sacrifice was present to our Lord's mind at an early stage of His ministry, so that there is no need to regard the explicit references to the death by violence made near Caesarea Philippi (Mar 8:31 ff.) as indicating a new outlook to the Lord's own mind. The tragic note that is heard early in the Fourth Gospel (Joh 2:19-21; Joh 3:14-15; Joh 6:51) is not left to the last in the Synoptic accounts (Mat 9:15, Mar 2:19-20, Luk 5:34-35). Moreover, the saving purpose of the sacrifice (Mat 26:28, Mar 10:45; Mar 14:24, Joh 10:11; Joh 12:23-24; Joh 12:32-33), its necessity ($\delta\epsilon\iota$ Mar 8:31, Luk 24:26), and its voluntary character (Mat 26:53, Joh 10:18), are affirmed. 'Through death to life' is illustrated in His experience. The enjoyment by Him of a fuller life in countless redeemed ones is conditional upon His uttermost self-renunciation (Joh 12:24). The life of the Saviour passes to men through His surrender, and it enters into them so far as they adopt its principle. The way of sacrifice is thus the way whereby the Saviour gives and the saved receive (Mat 16:24-25). The New Covenant (Jer 31:31-34) is connected with the shedding of the Lord's blood (Luk 22:20), and it is necessary that the saved should participate in this fundamental law of Christ's being (Joh 6:53-57). It was the Son's gracious will to come to earth on an errand which meant exposure to temptation (and therefore exposure to the possibility that He might not return to heaven) in order to destroy sin and to allure mankind to the paths of rectitude and peace. It was not the purpose of the Lord to ascend to God unless He could do so as the head of a new race,—a race healed (Joh 3:14-15), vivified and nourished by His sacrificial offering (Joh 6:51-58). This death, with its victory over death, and its sequel—the return to the Father—were intended to provide, through the gift of the Holy Spirit, those saving resources whereby the true life is initiated (Joh 16:7-11) and sustained (Joh 14:16; Joh 14:26, Joh 15:26, Joh 16:13-15).

3. The extent of Christ's mission.—While the regeneration of men was His first concern, His numerous miracles evince His care for man's physical needs. As all departments of life were to be purified and enriched by His example and teaching, so all men were to feel that they could be saved by His grace. It has been supposed that Jesus had no outlook beyond the Chosen People, and that the universalism of the Gospels is an interpolation; the catholicity which the Church subsequently manifested being read back into the teachings of the Lord. This conjecture is applied to the Fourth Gospel, to the world-wide commission (Mat 28:18-20, Mar 16:15), and to the universalism of St. Luke. True it is that at first the area of labour was restricted (Mat 15:24), but this was a necessity of the situation, and is no indication that the Gentiles were to be excluded from salvation. Sin is not local or racial, and Jesus hated it; and man, as man, was loved by Him. Any devout Jew would think that somehow the Gentiles were to reap advantage from the Messianic reign (Luk 2:30-32), and though it was deemed absurd to suppose that preference could be given by the Messiah to heathen men (Joh 7:35), even the Pharisees were zealous in making proselytes (Mat 23:15). Why should it be thought incredible that Jesus hoped ultimately to win men of all nations? Was not exclusiveness distressing to Him? Was He not ready with a reference to mercies granted to the woman of Zarephath and to Naaman the Syrian (Luk 4:25-27)? The outer court of the Temple was the only part of the sacred structure to which a Gentile had access, and all the Evangelists report that Jesus insisted that this enclosure should be kept clean and quiet 'for all the nations' (Mat 21:12-13, Mar 11:15-17, Luk 19:45-46, Joh 2:14; Joh 2:16). Jesus rejoiced in the centurion's faith—not found by Him in Israel (Luk 7:9), and the Syrophenician woman cheered His heart by her trust and loving ingenuity (Mat 15:28). At first the disciples were forbidden to preach to Samaritans (Mat 10:5), though, when they were fully equipped, the restriction was withdrawn (Act 1:8): He Himself laboured in Samaria (Luk 9:51-56, John 4), and called attention to the beneficence of one Samaritan (Luk 10:33-35), and to the faith and gratitude of another' (Luk 17:15-19). It is quite in harmony with the Saviour's love for the outcast and despised, the publicans and sinners amongst the Jews (Mat 9:9-13, Luk 7:37-50; Luk 15:1-2 ff., Luk 18:9-14; Luk 19:1-10), that He should foresee the approach of all men to Himself (Joh 12:32), and anticipate a time when He should be the Shepherd of one flock consisting of sheep gathered from far and near (Joh 10:16). The interest manifested by the Magi (Matthew 2) and by the Greeks (Joh 12:20-21) is not alien to Christ's mission. Moreover it is clearly declared that strangers will become workers in the vineyard (Mat 21:41), and that before His throne all nations are to be assembled for judgment (Mat 25:31-32). 'The Saviour of the world' (Joh 4:42) has grace and power wherewith to meet the needs which belong to every man in every age and country; for He is the Light (Joh 1:9, Joh 8:12, Joh 9:5, Joh 12:46), the Water (Joh 4:10, Joh 7:37), the Bread (Joh 6:35; Joh 6:48-51), the Life (Joh 11:25, Joh 14:6).

4. Credentials of the mission.—Jesus entered upon His task with the confidence that He was anointed with the Holy Spirit (Luk 4:18). John the Baptist declared that he saw the Spirit descending upon Jesus, and that he had been prepared for this sign (Joh 1:33-34). The testimony thus borne by the last of the Old Covenant prophets is referred to by the Saviour together with other credentials,—as the witness of His works, that of the Father and that of the Scriptures (Joh 5:32-47). Messengers came from the Machaerus prison, saying, ‘John the Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?’ In that hour Jesus wrought miracles which He adduced, together with His habit of announcing good tidings to the poor, as proofs of His Messiahship (Luk 7:18-22). The deeds were signs (σημεῖα) that the Divine messenger could quicken body and soul (Mar 5:41-42, Luk 7:14-15, Joh 11:25; Joh 11:43-44); cure physical and spiritual diseases; render efficient withered powers (Mar 3:1-5, Joh 5:5-9); add faculties, contrary to what might be expected, as in the case of the man born blind (John 9); redress evils caused by circumstances—for instance the fever due to the Capernaum district—(Luk 4:38-39); cleanse all the fountains of life, as in cures wrought for lepers (Mar 1:40-42, Luk 17:12-14); bestow abilities, receptive (Mar 8:22-25) and communicative (Mat 9:32-33). While the miracles were wrought in pure kindness, they afforded evidences to the thoughtful of the validity of Christ’s claims (Joh 3:2; Joh 7:31; Joh 10:37-38; Joh 14:11; Joh 15:24), and they were intended by the Lord to give assurance to men of His redeeming grace (Mar 2:10-11). The very term employed for saving processes (σώζω) will serve equally for temporal and spiritual blessings (Mat 1:21, Mar 10:26, Luk 7:50, Joh 3:17), even as the Worker shows Himself in reference both to the inner and the outer life to be the Great Physician (Mar 2:17). Some persons were allowed to have extraordinary aid to the belief that Jesus came from God, for they were with Him when He was transfigured, and heard a voice saying, ‘This is my Son, my chosen: hear ye him’ (Luk 9:35); nevertheless there was adequate support for the faith of all men in the remarkable interest Jesus took in the neglected (Luk 7:22-23; Luk 15:1 ff.), in His readiness to pray (Joh 17:1) and to serve (Mar 6:34, cf. v. 31), and in the union of qualities of character which are rarely found together. The credentials of Christ’s mission are in Himself. The grandeur and simplicity of His life, the meek and beneficent use of marvellous powers, the sinless One’s friendship with sinners, the strength and gentleness, the zeal and patience, the ardour and purity of His character—prove that He came forth from the Father (Joh 6:68-69; Joh 16:27). Believers in Him discover with more and more clearness, as they trust Him more and more fully, that His gracious promises are fulfilled. He is to their consciences the Goodness,—to their intellects the Truth,—to their hearts the supreme Beauty, the Way, the Truth, the Life.

MISSIONS

1. The prophetic background.—The missionary spirit and aims of Christianity have their beginnings in the history, literature, and character of the Jewish people. The OT, especially in the portions which express the ideals and spirit of prophecy, is full of principles and promises which find their fulfilment in the world-wide mission of Christianity (Horton, The Bible as a Missionary Book). The proselytizing energy of the Jews in the last cent. b.c. and in the time of our Lord ('Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte,' Mat 23:15) is a partial outcome of ideas and instincts which were long inherent in the race. These wide and lofty prophetic aims had to struggle against particularist tendencies, which made the Jews one of the most narrow and exclusive of the races of mankind. It is one of the paradoxes of history, that the missionary propaganda which aimed at the conversion and blessing of the world, sprang from a people whose predominant characteristics were pride in racial privileges, expectation of national greatness, and contempt for all who were not of the seed of Abraham. But the missionary activities and aims of Christianity cannot be rightly understood apart from the gradual development of missionary ideas which took place in the course of Jewish history. The words applied to John the Baptist in relation to Christ might be applied to the Jewish race, 'Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee' (Mar 1:2). These germinal missionary conceptions and movements found their end and fulfilment in the Person and work of Jesus Christ, and in the work which He originated. He absorbed and enlarged them, giving them such definiteness and fulness that they appear to be derived entirely from Him; for the spirit, aims, and motives of missions are distinctively Christian, and Christianity is essentially a missionary religion.

2. The missionary character of our Lord.—He regarded Himself as a missionary. At the beginning of His work in Galilee He applied to Himself the words of Isaiah (Isa 61:1), 'The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted,' etc. (Luk 4:18-19). He frequently describes Himself as one 'who was sent,' as when He says, 'he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me' (τὸν ἀποστείλαντά με, Mat 10:40); 'as the living Father hath sent me' (ἀπέστειλέν με, Joh 6:57); 'the Father which hath sent me' (ὁ πέμψας με, Joh_6:44). The references to His being 'sent' are most frequent in John.

It may be remarked that the verb ἀποστελλειν is applied to Jesus 17 times in John , 10 times in the Synoptics, while πέμπειν is applied to Him 25 times in Jn., but only once in the Synoptics. The distinction between the two verbs is slight. In most cases in the Gospels τέμπειν, applies to the sender and ἀποστελλειν to the person sent (cf. 'Neither is he that is sent (ἀπόστολος) greater than he that sent (πέμψαντος) him,' Joh_13:16); but the distinction is not always followed (cf. 'As thou hast sent (ἀπέστειλας) me into the world, even so have I also sent (ἀπέστειλα) them into the world' (Joh_17:18)).

Wilke and Grimm distinguish τίμπειν as the general term, which may imply accompaniment (as when the sender is God), while ἀποστελλειν includes a reference to equipment, and suggests official or authoritative sending). But the frequency with which both words are applied to Jesus in the Gospels (at least 53 times in all) is an emphatic indication of the missionary character of His work. (Under this heading it is not necessary to discuss the distinctive aims and character of His mission. See artt. Kingdom of God, Eternal Life, Salvation).

3. In the call and training of the disciples the missionary idea is also strongly emphasized. They were to be 'fishers of men' (Mar_1:7 || Mat_4:19). Jesus ordained them that 'they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach' (κηρύσσειν, Mar_3:14). The training was not only educative but practical. After a period of private intercourse He sent the Twelve forth two by two, as heralds to proclaim (κηρύσσειν) that 'the kingdom of heaven (or of God) was at hand' (Mar_6:7 || Mat_10:5-7 || Luk_9:3). There is recorded by Lk. (Luk_10:1-7) another mission of Seventy, also sent forth two and two, who were to go with the same message to every city and place to which He Himself was about to come. From the words 'also others' ([καί] ἑτέροις, Luk_10:1) it is probably 'to be understood that the Twelve were not included in this mission. In both missions of the disciples, the work they had to do was evangelistic in relation to the people, and educative in relation to themselves. There may have been other missions which have not been recorded, for Mk. uses the suggestive phrase, 'He began to send them forth two by two' (Mar_6:7); but the influence of such work on the training of the disciples, especially in giving them a firm grasp of the gospel they had to preach, is incalculable. Not a little of the teaching of Jesus which we have in the Gospels may have taken its present shape from the frequent repetition of their message.

4. The limits within which the personal work of Jesus was confined were declared by Himself: 'I am not sent but unto the house of Israel' (Mat_15:24). During the time of His personal ministry the work of the disciples was similarly limited. In sending them forth, He said, 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mat_10:5-6). This restriction, given at such a time, is of great importance, for it is an indication that the idea of a mission outside the bounds of the Jewish people was in the minds of the disciples when they were sent out on their first missionary journey. The restriction would have been needless if the disciples had not thought of such a mission as a possibility. It is an entire misreading of the Gospel history to imagine that the glorious conception of a world-wide mission was an afterthought, which only occurred to the disciples, or was suggested to them, after the resurrection of our Lord. The limitations which were so carefully laid down were temporary, and were evidently regarded as temporary. Even in declaring that He was sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, He had also said, 'Let the children first be filled' (Mar_7:27). The reasons for the limitation were adequate. The disciples had to be fully trained; the Kingdom of God had to be preached to the people who had been disciplined by the providence of God to receive it; the gospel had to be completed by the full disclosure of the redemption of grace, in the death and resurrection of the Saviour.

5. Indications of a world mission in the teaching of Jesus.—Apart from the essentially universal character of the gospel, which inevitably involved a universal mission, there are indications that the world-wide view was brought before the minds of the disciples prior to the time when the great commission was given. The disciples were to be 'the salt of the earth' and 'the light of the world' (Mat_5:13-14). When Jesus praised the faith of the centurion of Capernaum, He said, 'Many shall come from the east and from the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God' (Mat_8:11; cf. also the same passage in Lk. in another connexion, where He adds, as if in reference to the preference which the Jews had received, 'Behold there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last,' Luk_13:29-30). So also, when defending the woman who had anointed Him with the box of ointment, He said, 'Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, this ... shall be told for a memorial of her' (Mat_26:13). Then He warned the disciples, saying, 'Ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake, for a testimony against them and the Gentiles' (Mat_10:18). Many of the parables have references to or suggestions of a future extension of work among the Gentiles. In the interpretation of the parable of the Tares (one of the earlier parables) it is said that 'the field is the world' (Mat_13:38). In the later series of parables, as in that of the Vineyard and the Husbandmen, it is said, 'The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof' (Mat 21:43); in the Marriage Feast the direction is found, 'Go ye ... into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage' (Mat 22:9, Luk 14:23); in the Sheep and the Goats there is a picture of the judgment of 'all nations' (Mat 25:32). Direct intimations of a world mission are not wanting, as in the apocalyptic discourses in the Synoptics, which are prefaced with a declaration of the destruction of the Temple ('There shall not be left one stone upon another which shall not be thrown down,' Mat 24:2, Mar 13:2, Luk 21:6), and contain the announcement that 'this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness to all the nations' (Mat 24:14 || Mar 13:10). In the Fourth Gospel the evidence of a world view as part of the instruction given to the disciples is very plain. After saying that He lays down his life for the sheep' (Joh 10:15), Jesus adds, 'Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice' (Joh 10:16). In connexion with the visit of the Greeks, He uttered the pregnant and impressive prophecy, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me' (Joh 12:32); and a little further on in the same chapter we find the words, 'I came not to judge the world, but to save the world' (Joh 12:47). In the private converse of our Lord and His disciples, in the last days of the earthly ministry, the vision of the world is repeatedly brought before the minds of the disciples as the object of the Saviour's thought and the scope of the disciples' mission, as—'That the world may know that I love the Father ... even so I do' (Joh 14:31); 'As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world' (Joh 17:18; also Joh 12:46-48, Joh 16:8-11, Joh 17:2; Joh 17:21). Judas (not Iscariot) is even represented as asking, 'How is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?' (Joh 14:22), as if the limitation of His work was a source of perplexity to him. Unless we are to regard the Gospels as entirely unhistorical, and all such universal references as due to the mind of the Church (which would then be greater than its Lord) at a later time, it must be admitted that the disciples were aware of the world-wide character of the work they were to undertake. The frequency of the world references in the earthly ministry may to some extent account for the fact that the missionary commission is mentioned only once in each of the Gospels (Mat 28:16-20 || Mar 16:15 || Joh 20:21 || Luk 24:46-48), and in Act 1:8. For it is recognized that it is only in the brief records of the risen life of Jesus that the universal mission of the disciples is explicitly expressed in the form of a command. But that is no reason for imagining that it was an afterthought of Jesus, or an addition put into His mouth by followers of a later time. The universal commission is given then, because that is the time to which it belongs. The work of redemption had been 'finished'; the gospel was completed; the limitations which had restricted its extension were no longer necessary. The intimations of a universal mission, which had been given before, were carried to their inevitable conclusion in the majestic commission: 'All authority is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye into all the world, make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you all the days, unto the consummation of the age' (πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας ἕως τῆς συντελείας τοῦ αἰῶνος, Mat_28:16-20). The universal note predominates the whole passage. There is (i.) the claim of universal authority; (ii.) the direction to a universal field; (iii.) the universality of what is to be taught ('all things whatsoever I have commanded you'); (iv.) the promise of a universal presence, 'Lo, I am with you all the days, unto the consummation of the age.'

6. The genuineness of the missionary commission has been gravely questioned. In Mk, it appears in the closing section (Mar_16:9-10), which is now generally regarded as an addition by a later hand, possibly by the presbyter Aristion, who, according to Papias, was 'a disciple of the Lord' (F. C. Conybeare, Expositor, iv. viii. [1893] 241 ff.; but see Aristion). All critics admit the antiquity of the passage, and it may be accepted as 'embodying a true Apostolic tradition' (Salmond in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. p. 253^b).

The passage in Mt. (Mat_28:16-20) is characterized as 'a later appendix' (Moffatt, Historical NT, p. 647) entirely on account of its contents. The indications (in a different order) of its lateness are said to be—(i.) its incipient Trinitarianism, (ii.) the Trinitarian formula of baptism, which is found nowhere else in the NT. To these is added, (iii.) that the first disciples could hardly have known of the universal mission, or else they lived in flagrant disobedience to their Master's solemn command, and only reluctantly recognized its fulfilment in the Pauline gospel. But it may be said, on the other hand, as to (i.), that the incipient Trinitarianism of the NT is such a daring conception, especially to men who had been trained in the strict monotheism of Judaism, that its existence can hardly be explained without some word of the Lord Jesus in relation to it, such as that which Mt. records. How are we to account for the 'incipient Trinitarianism' of the Pauline benediction—'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost' (2Co_13:14)—if there were no words of the Lord Jesus to justify it? As to (ii.), the baptismal formula, as it has been called, may not have been a formula. It may have been the mistake of a later time to regard it as such. If it was not a formula, there was nothing to hinder the Apostles and others from baptizing in the name of the Lord Jesus ('The Baptismal Formula,' by J. H. Bernard in Expositor, vi. v. [1902] 43 ff.). (iii.) The apparent inaction of the disciples may not have been due to ignorance or disobedience. The command as given in Lk. and Acts indicates a gradually widening sphere of operations, in Jerusalem and Judaea, in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. The difficulties and persecution which the Apostles encountered at the beginning of their work may have been to them a proof that the time had not yet come when they could leave the nearer and narrower fields and go forth to the Gentiles. If any reliance is to be placed on Acts as an historical document, it is abundantly evident that the first disciples did know of the world mission, and that they were moving in the line of their instructions. For in his first recorded utterance St. Peter strikes the universal note repeatedly. He quotes the words of Joel in explanation of what had happened at Pentecost, saying, 'It shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, that I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh' (Act 2:17), 'And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved' (Act 2:21). He closes his appeal to the people with the assurance that the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call' (Act 2:39). Then in Act 3:25 f. there is the recognition of the coming of Christ as a fulfilment of prophecy, as a carrying out of the covenant made with Abraham ('And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed'); further, in the words, 'Unto you first God, having raised up his Servant (παῖς), sent him to bless you,' there is the recognition of a wider field to be entered in due time. The great declaration, 'Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved' (Act 4:12), is meaningless, if there was not behind it a consciousness of the universal character of Christianity, and, as a consequence, the consciousness of a universal mission.

The disciples are also seen to be moving in the line of their instructions. They certainly preached the gospel in Jerusalem and in all Judaea. It is also seen that they preached it among the Samaritans, towards whom Jews had as strong an antipathy as they had towards Gentiles ('Philip went down to the city of Samaria and preached Christ unto them.... (Peter and John) preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans,' Act 8:5; Act 8:25). In a few years after the Crucifixion (Harnack says 1, Ramsay 3, Lightfoot 4, Turner 6 or 7 [in fixing the date of St. Paul's conversion, see Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible, art. 'Chronology of the NT']) the faith of Christ had spread to Damascus, and had gained such hold there, that Saul was sent thither by the Sanhedrin to bring 'any of the Way,' whom he might find, bound to Jerusalem (Act 9:2). Lastly, some of those who were scattered abroad upon the persecution which arose about Stephen went as far as to Antioch, and preached the word to the Greeks ("Ἑλληνας, the reading adopted by Tischendorf, Nestle, etc.); and when tidings of these things came to the Church at Jerusalem, they sent forth Barnabas to visit and help them (which he did by finding Saul of Tarsus, Act 11:19-26).

Taking Turner's estimate as above (though we prefer Ramsay's), the gospel was firmly established in Damascus (and in Antioch) 6 or 7 years after the Crucifixion. The trouble which arose about Stephen marked the close of the comparatively peaceful progress of the Church. The hidden cleavage between Judaism and Christianity then became apparent, and an entirely new situation resulted, which affected those within and without the Church. The sympathy of the Jews (Act 2:47) towards the Christians had become antipathy (Act 12:2-3). The persecution created anxieties which naturally absorbed the attention of the leaders. Coming as it did when the Church had been extended throughout Palestine, the persecution may have arrested the forward movement which, in accordance with the line of progress sketched out in Act 1:8, had then become due. A little consideration of the difficulties which affect the progress of modern missions in different countries might lead to a better understanding of the situation in the Apostolic age, and to a higher appreciation of the results which the first missionaries achieved.

The dispute in the early Church in relation to the Gentiles, regarding which so much has been made, was not about preaching the gospel to them, but about the conditions on which they were to receive salvation and be admitted into the Church. No instructions on these matters had been given by the Lord Jesus, and difference of opinion was inevitable until the truth was made plain. St. Peter's reluctance to go to Cornelius did not arise from any unwillingness to preach to him, but from the natural shrinking of a strict Jew from entering the house of a Gentile. The accusation which was brought against him at Jerusalem by those who were of the circumcision was, not that he had preached the gospel to a Gentile, but that he had gone in to 'men uncircumcised and had eaten with them' (Act 11:3). It was 'they of the circumcision,' and not the first disciples, who glorified God, saying, 'Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life' (Act 11:18). These considerations are sufficient to establish the knowledge of the missionary command by the first disciples, and to account for the apparent delay (if any) in carrying it out.

7. The progress of mission work within the NT record.—The order is admirably given by Turner in his art. 'Chronology of the NT' in Hastings' DB. [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] He says that 'the picture in Acts is cut up, as it were, into six panels, each labelled with a general summary of progress'; and his arrangement is adopted here. First stage, the beginning at Jerusalem (Act 1:1 to Act 6:7); second stage, the extension of the Church throughout Palestine (Act 6:8 to Act 9:31); third stage, the extension of the Church to Antioch (Act 9:32 to Act 12:24); fourth stage, the extension of the Church to Asia Minor, as a result of St. Paul's first missionary journey (Act 12:25 to Act 16:5); fifth stage, the extension of the Church to Europe, resulting from St. Paul's second missionary journey (Act 16:6 to Act 19:20); sixth stage, the extension of the Church to Rome (Act 19:21 to Act 28:31). While that is the view of progress which is presented in Acts, it is not to be taken as complete. It exhibits for the most part the movement as connected with the great missionaries, St. Peter and St. Paul. The labours of the majority of the company of the Apostles are not recorded, and their activity might to some extent modify the above order of progression. Missionary enthusiasm also was not confined to the Apostles. Unnamed disciples, as in the case of Antioch (Act 11:20), and certainly also in the case of Rome, may have carried the gospel into many places of which no mention is made.

But for general purposes the sketch as given above represents the line of advance up to the year a.d. 70. Progress after that belongs to the general history of missions.

MOCKERY.—The Evangelists relate in the Passion history a series of narratives describing the brutal mockery of Jesus by the authorities and by their soldiers and servants. The passages are the following: (a) Mar_14:65 = Mat_26:67-68 = Luk_22:63-64; (b) Luk_23:11; (c) Mar_15:18-20 = Mat_27:27-31 = Joh_19:2-3.

There is no necessity to 'regard these stories as duplicates. A person who was condemned for the claims that Jesus was supposed to put forward was likely to meet with derision and brutality at every turn. Of course, it the story that Jesus was sent to Herod, which is peculiar to Lk., is unhistorical, the second of the stories would have to be struck out. If, however, that narrative is historical, and there is no cogent reason for doubting it, it was perfectly natural that Herod and his guards should mock one who claimed to be king. It is possible, indeed, that the narratives may have exerted an influence upon each other, but nothing compels us to affirm that any of them is unhistorical.

The first narrative records the mockery and ill-treatment inflicted on Jesus immediately after His condemnation by the Sanhedrin. Two stages are mentioned in Mark. The first consisted of spitting, blindfolding, buffeting, and the request that He should prophesy. Then, following this, we have a statement as to the attendants, the meaning of which is not perfectly clear. The better reading in Mar_14:65 is ἑλαβον.

Several Manuscripts , however, read ἔβαλλον or ἔβαλον (see Field). It is not quite clear how we should translate or explain the better reading. Swete renders 'they caught Him with blows,' others 'they took Him in charge with blows.' ῥαπισμασιν, means blows with the open hand, not blows with the rod. Another question touches the authors of this outrage. According to Mt., it is the members of the Sanhedrin. This seems to be Mk.'s meaning also, except that he limits it to 'some.' He mentions the servants at the close. Lk. represents the attendants who had charge of Jesus as alone concerned. Difficulties are also raised by the command to prophesy. Mt. and Lk. both explain it as a challenge to Jesus to prophesy who it was that smote Him. This in itself is perfectly natural, but it implies that Jesus was blindfolded, though there is no reference to this in Mt., and it is omitted by D [Note: Deuteronomist.] and Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin} in Mark. Even if original in Mk., it may imply that Jesus was condemned to death (cf. 'they covered Haman's face,' Est 7:8), rather than that He was blindfolded so that He might be asked to prophesy who struck Him. Accordingly, the meaning may be 'foretell the future,' either generally or with a specific reference to His own fate, or to the destruction of the Temple, which He had been accused of predicting.

The second mockery, that before Herod, is free from the element of physical ill-treatment. Jesus is simply arrayed in royal garments, and a mocking homage is paid to Him; then He is sent back to Pilate. Luk 23:10-12 is omitted, it is true, in Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin}, and is regarded by Wellhausen as a later addition (see his note on the passage and on Luk 23:15).

The third mockery is that by the Roman soldiers after the condemnation by Pilate. This narrative is omitted by Lk. but recorded by John. The soldiers take Jesus into the Praetorium and summon the whole of their company. Then they clothe Him in purple and put a crown of thorns upon His head; then they do homage to Him, saluting Him as king of the Jews. They keep on striking Him on the head with a reed, spitting upon Him, and bending the knee to Him in mock homage. To this account (of Mk.) Mt. adds, first, that before clothing Him in the robes they divested Him of His garments, and that they put a reed in His right hand, and subsequently took it from Him and struck Him on the head with it. Here Mt.'s account deserves preference, for it is intrinsically probable that the reed should have been given Him as a sceptre before it was used to smite Him. Jn.'s account is brief; he does not mention the reed, but says that they gave Him blows with the hand. It is a mark of historicity in the Gospel narratives that the Sanhedrists are represented as mocking the claims of Jesus to be a prophet, whereas the Roman soldiers, quite uninterested in His prophetic character, mock His claims to be a king, which would not be so ready a subject of jesting with the Jews, though they mocked Him for His pretensions to be a king of Israel as He hung upon the cross.

In recent years quite new significance has been attached to the mockery. Wendland in his art. 'Jesus als Saturnalien-König' (Hermes, xxxiii. 175-179) put forward the view that the Roman soldiers ridiculed Christ's royal and Divine claims by attiring Him in the dress of king Saturn. J. G. Frazer urges as an objection to this that, while it is possible that the Saturnalia may have been celebrated in Jerusalem at what seems to have been its original date in March, it is much more likely that it was really held in December, which, of course, does not harmonize with the time of year at which the Crucifixion took place. Frazer himself thinks that it resembled much more closely the treatment of the mock king of the Sacaea. He translates Dio Chrysostom's description as follows: 'They take one of the prisoners condemned to death and seat him upon the king's throne, and give him the king's raiment, and let him lord it and drink and run riot and use the king's concubines during these days, and no man prevents him from doing just what he likes. But afterwards they strip and scourge and crucify him' (Frazer, *Golden Bough*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , iii. 187).

Frazer argues that the Jewish Feast of Purim was a continuation of the Sacaea, and he conjectures that the Jews regularly compelled a condemned criminal to play a tragic part in that festival, and that Jesus perished in the character of Haman. He admits the difficulty caused by the fact that Purim fell a month before Passover, but he puts forward various suggestions to mitigate this difficulty. He thinks that possibly the Christian tradition may have shifted the date of the Crucifixion to coincide with the Passover, though he admits that this is perhaps not possible. He points out that the Bab. [Note: Babylonian.] festival seems to have fallen near the time of the Passover, and that the date of Purim was altered to a month earlier so as not to clash with it. He conjectures that the Jews may have sometimes, for a special reason, celebrated the Feast of Purim, or at least the death of Haman, at or near Passover. A further suggestion is, however, that possibly the licence of thirty days allowed to the mock king of the Saturnalia was allowed to the human representative of Haman. Yet as the mockery in question was not by Jews but by Roman soldiers, the question arises whether they would have been likely to take part in a Jewish celebration. To this Frazer replies that they may have fallen in with the local customs, but, quite apart from this, it was natural that without sharing Jewish beliefs they would be quite ready to join in the sport. He points out, however, that according to Lk.'s account, it was Herod's soldiers who mocked Jesus, and they were presumably Jews. Thus the Crucifixion on this view was not a punishment specially designed for Christ, but merely the fate which annually befell the malefactor who played Haman. It is argued that certain difficulties in the narrative thus gain relief. Pilate was reluctant to give up Jesus and yet acquiesced, though he had the power to release Him. This is due to the fact that someone had to be given up to play the part of Haman. Again, would Pilate have ventured to put over the cross the inscription declaring that Jesus was king of the Jews with a tyrant so gloomy and suspicious as Tiberius, unless it had been a formula of long standing and regarded as quite innocuous? Since Jesus represented Haman, it is suggested that Barabbas represented Mordecai; and if so, he was probably released in order to play the part of a buffoon king (cf. the story of the mockery of Carabas in Philo, adv. Flaccum, ii. 520-523, and the 'Ride of the Beardless One' in Persia, referred to by Lagarde in his Purim). The name Barabbas, Frazer suggests, was an official title mistakenly regarded as a personal name. Originally Haman and Mordecai were the same, but one personated the dead and the other the risen deity. The same person probably played both parts, he who was Mordecai one year was Haman the next.

This ingenious theory is open to the most serious objections. Some of these have been stated by Mr. Andrew Lang in the very elaborate investigation he gives in Magic and Religion. It is very difficult to make good the identification of Purim with the Sacaea even if Frazer's interpretation of the Sacaea could hold good, which is very doubtful. It is also very improbable that a victim was actually crucified in the character of Haman by the Jews. There is not a shred of evidence to make such a suggestion plausible. And when we come to apply it to the Gospel history, the theory becomes more improbable than ever. The licence allowed to 'the Beardless One' was such that he was permitted, if the shopkeepers did not give him what he wished during his ride through the city, to appropriate everything they had in their shops. It is not easy to see any real parallel between this and the overturning of the money-changers' tables and driving out of their sheep and oxen from the Temple by Jesus. There is all the difference between a raid on the shopkeepers for personal plunder and the cleansing of the Temple from an intolerable abuse. Jesus would not have been asked by the authorities by what right He did these things, if it had been a perfectly legitimate exercise of a power He possessed as the representative of Haman. Moreover, Frazer's theory involves our rejection of the Johannine date for the cleansing of the Temple, although that date has much that can be said in its favour. Apart from this, however, one insuperable difficulty remains. It is quite possible that Jesus should have suffered in any character chosen for Him by those who compassed His death. In that respect He was a passive victim. But it is quite incredible that He should have participated in these ceremonies of His own free will, or have given any colour whatever to superstitions of that kind. It is accordingly out of the question to interpret the cleansing of the Temple as Frazer does, since that would imply that Jesus lent Himself to this festival. Moreover, unless the Gospel narratives are altogether misleading, Jesus was not in the hands of His enemies till the night before His death, and therefore His triumphal entry and His attack on the desecration of the Temple could have been no part of the programme of a Purim festival. There would have been no need for secrecy through the fear of the people, or for the services of the traitor, if the mockery and death were but the last acts in a longer drama. Nor are the difficulties in the Gospel narratives really mitigated by this hypothesis. The ordinary explanation of Pilate's vacillation and surrender is perfectly adequate. The procurator was so unpopular that he dared not risk the charge of treason that might have been launched against him before Tiberius if he had let a claimant to Messianic dignity go free. However convinced Pilate may have been that Jesus was harmless to Rome, nothing would have been easier than to bring a very damaging charge against him before the emperor. Nor is the title over the cross to be interpreted along Frazer's lines. To have let Jesus go would have constituted a much more valid basis of accusation than to write the title 'This is the king of the Jews' over His cross, for that meant 'This is the king of the Jews, and thus I serve pretenders to the throne.' It mocked Jesus and exasperated the Jews. To imagine that by one course Pilate would have escaped the charge of treason which he would have incurred by the other, is indeed to strain out the gnat and swallow the camel. If, as Frazer says, Pilate was obliged to give up a prisoner, and all he could do was to choose him, he had others whom he might have chosen besides Jesus and Barabbas. It was a choice that was dictated by his position. He was in the grip of his past and of his dread of Tiberius. Another point that deserves mention is that the mockery of Christ's prophetic claims is precisely parallel to the mockery of His royal claims. In the one case they bid Him prophesy, in the other they dress Him up as a mock king and pay Him a ribald homage. The parallelism shows us how unnecessary it is for us to seek for far-fetched reasons to explain the conduct of the Roman soldiers. Nothing was more natural than that the supporters of an alien empire should mock royal claims put forward by one who belonged to the subject people, and no derision was more effective than the dressing up of their victim as king. The sceptre served to beat Him, and the jest of the coronation was all the more piquant that the crown was studded with thorns. As Mr. Lang reminds us, 'Wallace was crowned at his trial with laurel'; and Atholl, who was a pretender to the crown, 'was tortured to death with a red-hot iron crown' (Magic and Religion, p. 203).

Lastly, it should be observed that the passage from Dio Chrysostom will not bear too much weight. There is a resemblance in the clothing with royal robes, in the stripping, the scourging, and the death, but there is no resemblance to the royal privileges accorded to the condemned prisoner, and it is also not clear that the victim was crucified. The Greek word used (ἐκρέμασαν) may mean simply that he was hanged, though the other view is more probable. No stress can be laid on the scourging in the case of Jesus, for it was the usual preliminary to crucifixion, and crucifixion was unhappily among the Romans no exceptional form of execution.

☒ Money

MONEY.—We propose to treat first of money in general as referred to in the Gospels, and afterwards of the definite sums or coins which are there named.

I. Money in General.—In the Authorized Version six Greek words are rendered ‘money,’ ‘tribute money,’ or ‘piece of money.’ In two cases this is a mistranslation, and is rectified by the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885. The words are as follows:

1. ἀργύριον (Mat 25:18; Mat 25:27; Mat 28:12; Mat 28:15, Mar 14:11, Luk 9:3; Luk 19:15; Luk 19:23; Luk 22:5). (In three of the above passages it occurs in the plural without the sense being altered; thus, cf. Mat 25:18 with 25:27). This word originally means silver, hence silver money (also translation ‘pieces of silver,’ Mat 27:3; Mat 27:5-6; Mat 27:9; see below, under ‘Stater’); finally, as silver was the chief medium of exchange in the ancient world, money in general (cf. Fr. argent). 2. χαλκός (Mar 6:8; Mar 12:41). This word originally means brass, hence coins of brass (or copper), and, as copper money circulated largely among the common people, money in general. 3. κέρμα (Joh 2:15) comes from a verb meaning to cut, and means originally change or small coins. It is appropriately used in this passage for the stock-in-trade of the money-changers, a part of whose business it was to supply change for larger sums. 4. νόμισμα (Mat 22:19) comes from a verb meaning to acknowledge as customary or lawful. It means, accordingly, money in the sense of lawful coin. The νόμισμα τοῦ κήνσου, or tribute money, was the currency in which the Roman tribute had to be paid, that is, the denarius. 5. τὰ δίδραχμα (Mat 17:24 Authorized Version ‘tribute money,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 the half-shekel’). As is rightly indicated by the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885, this word is the name of a definite sum of money which was levied for the maintenance of the Temple (see below, under ‘Didrachm’). 6. στατήρ (Mat 17:27 Authorized Version ‘piece of money,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘shekel’). Here, too, the Authorized Version is at fault, the word meaning a definite coin (see below, under ‘Stater’).

To the above words used for money in general (though under slightly different aspects) may be added the comprehensive description of money in Mat 10:9 in terms of the three metals used as specie—gold, silver, and brass (or copper). This verse may be taken as evidence that gold as well as silver and copper coins circulated in Palestine in the time of our Lord, although no gold coin is mentioned in the Gospels. The current gold coin was doubtless the Roman aureus, frequently referred to in the Mishna as a golden denarius. In silver there was more variety. The Roman denarius was, of course, largely, in evidence, and was probably the silver coin in most common use. But there were also coins of larger size, bearing Greek names. When Pompey made Syria a Roman province (b.c. 65), he found in circulation tetradrachms of two different kinds. There were those issued chiefly from Antioch by the Seleucid kings on the Attic standard, weighing 262 grains troy. There were also those issued by the semi-autonomous cities of Phœnicia on the Phœnician standard of 224 grains to the tetradrachm. Tetradrachms of both standards were recognized by Pompey as equivalent to four denarii (Mommsen, Gesch. des Röm. Münzwesens, 36, 715). Both would still be lawful coin in the time of our Lord, though, as Mommsen surmises (ib. 72), the heavier royal tetradrachms would tend to be driven out of circulation by the lighter Phœnician coins, which, besides, as corresponding exactly to the Hebrew shekel, were in special demand in Palestine for religious purposes (see below, under 'Didrachm'). The supply of silver from the mints at Tyre and Sidon, which continued to issue tetradrachms and didrachms under the Emperors,* [Note: According to most numismatologists; e.g., Head (Hist. Num 675) says: From b.c. 126 down to the reign of Vespasian, we possess a plentiful series of Tyrian tetradrachms and didrachms.' On the other hand, Mommsen (op. cit. 36) holds that from the time of Pompey the Phœnician cities lost the power of issuing silver money, and points out that the extant Phœnician tetradrachms never bear the names of Emperors or any other indication of Roman sway.] was reinforced from the time of Augustus onwards by the tetradrachms coined in large numbers at Antioch for circulation in the province of Syria. These ranged in weight from 220 to 236 grains, and were no doubt reckoned for ordinary purposes as equal to four denarii, although, in accordance with the regular practice of the Romans of giving a preference to their own silver, they were tariffed for purposes of taxation as only equal to three denarii.

A vexed question, which cannot be held to be yet decided, is whether prior to the time of the first Jewish revolt any silver coins had been produced in Palestine itself. Until lately it has been usual for numismatologists to assign to Simon Meccabæus certain silver shekels and half-shekels struck on the Phœnician standard, and bearing the inscription in Hebrew, 'Jerusalem the Holy' (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 65-71; Head, Hist. Num. 681, 682). Strong historical reasons, however, have been brought by Schürer (HJP [Note: JP History of the Jewish People.] i. ii. 379-383) and others for dating these coins rather in the time of the revolt under Nero; and the opinion seems to be making headway that at the time of our Lord, and previously, the Jews were dependent for their silver money upon foreign sources. (For an able statement of the case, see Kennedy in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iii. s.v. 'Money,' § 5).

On the other hand, the supply of copper money must have been almost, if not quite, exclusively of native production. There were the copper coins of the Hasmonaean princes, those of the various Herods, and those which had been struck since a.d. 6 by successive procurators of Judaea. Unlike the foreign silver money, they have, in deference to Jewish feeling, no Imperial effigy or the likeness of any living thing; even those of the procurators have only the name of the reigning Emperor, and innocent ears of corn, palm-trees, lilies, and the like. As to their denomination we have no sure evidence. Schürer holds that the Romans imposed their monetary standard more rigorously in Palestine than elsewhere, and that even the Herodian coins followed the Roman system (HJP [Note: JP History of the Jewish People.] ii. i. 38). Other writers consider it to be more probable that the copper coinage of Palestine followed the subdivisions of the drachm common in Greek-speaking countries. The extant coins contain no indication of value, nor can any safe inference be drawn from their weight, seeing that, where a silver standard prevails, the copper coinage must always be very much of the nature of token money. (See, further, under 'Assarion,' 'Kodrantēs,' and 'Lepton,' below).

Before proceeding to speak in detail of the coins named in the Gospels, it will be well to give in tabular form the main elements of the two systems, the Greek and the Roman, which obtained concurrently in Palestine at the time of our Lord. For convenience of reference the average value in sterling money is put opposite the larger sums.

The point of connexion between the two systems is found in the identification of the Roman denarius with the Attic drachm. This identification was rendered easy by the fact that at the time when Rome began her career of conquest in the East the drachm of the Attic standard had fallen to a weight which only slightly exceeded that of the denarius; but there can be little doubt that it was made deliberately by the Romans as a matter of policy. Alexander the Great had made the Attic drachm the unit of his Imperial coinage, which he imposed upon all the lands he had conquered; and in adopting the Alexandrine drachm as equal to their own denarius, the Romans wished to indicate that they served themselves heirs to his kingdom in the East (Mommsen, op. cit. 691). In imperial times the identification was so completely established that Hellenistic writers regularly refer to the denarius as 'the Attic drachm.' This identification enables us to assign values to those coins which follow the Greek system. The weight of the gold aureus is known, and its value admits of easy calculation (see Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 427), and the other values, as given above, follow at once. This method of ascertaining the value of the silver coins of the Gospels does justice to the fact that, in the Roman Empire then, as in Britain now, the value of silver coins was legally defined in terms of the gold standard.

II. Definite sums of money and coins mentioned in the gospels.—These may most conveniently be treated of under three heads: money of account, silver coins, and copper coins.

(i.) Money of account.—Two sums of money, to which no actual coin corresponded, receive a special name in the Gospels. These are the talent and the mina.

1. Talent (τάλαντον, Mat 18:24; Mat 25:15-16; Mat 25:20; Mat 25:22; Mat 25:24-25; Mat 25:28) is originally the name of the highest weight in the various systems of antiquity, hence the sum of money represented by that weight in gold or silver. The talent of the Gospels, which is, of course, a talent of silver, might conceivably be the Phœnician talent, but is far more probably to be identified with the talent on the reduced Attic scale which had been formally recognized by the Romans (see above). It contained 6000 Attic drachms or denarii, and was thus worth 240 aurei or £240.

The talent is mentioned twice by our Lord. In the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mat 18:23-35) the one servant owes the king 10,000 talents, or nearly two-and-a-half millions of our money—an enormous sum, of which the 100 denarii (= £4) owed him by his fellow-servant represents but an insignificant fraction (1/6000). It may be remarked that the juxtaposition in this parable of the talent and the denarius is a confirmation of the view that it is the Attic talent that is meant). In the parable of the Talents (Mat 25:14-30) the master intrusts his capital of eight talents or £1920 to his three servants in sums of £1200, £480, and £240 respectively. It will be seen that even he who received but one talent had yet quite a respectable capital to trade with, so that the excuse which is sometimes made by commentators on his behalf, viz. that he was discouraged by the smallness of the sum committed to him, is as little valid as that which he offered for himself. The real reason for his conduct was, of course, just his slothfulness.

2. Mina ($\mu\nu\tilde{\alpha}$, Luk 19:13; Luk 19:16; Luk 19:18; Luk 19:20; Luk 19:24-25 Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 pound) is the sixtieth part of the talent. Like the latter, it is to be calculated on the Roman-Attic scale. It contains 100 denarii, and is thus equal to £4.

The only mention of this sum in the Gospels is in the parable of the Pounds (Luk 19:12-27), where a nobleman, going to a far country to get a kingdom, gives one mina to each of his ten servants, bidding them trade with it till his return. The smallness of the sum in such a connexion is remarkable, especially when compared with the companion parable of the Talents. The explanation (as far as the story is concerned) seems to be that the master is not in this case a trader making provision for the suitable employment of his capital in his absence, but one who, having in prospect the acquisition of a kingdom, desires to test capacity of his servants for high office in that kingdom. Ingenuity and diligence would be more thoroughly tested in multiplying a small sum than a large one.

(ii.) Silver coins.—Of these there are mentioned by name, the denarius, the drachm, the didrachm, and the stater. The ‘piece of money’ of the Authorized Version in Mat 17:27 is the stater, the ‘pieces of silver’ in Luk 15:8 are drachms, while the ‘pieces of silver’ in Mat 26:15 are probably staters, and are discussed under that heading.

1. Denarius ($\delta\eta\nu\acute{\alpha}\rho\iota\omicron\nu$, Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 penny; American Revisers, more happily, shilling).—This is the most frequently mentioned coin in the Gospels (Mat 18:28; Mat 20:2; Mat 20:9-10; Mat 20:13; Mat 22:19, Mar 6:37; Mar 12:15; Mar 14:5, Luk 7:41; Luk 10:35; Luk 20:24, Joh 6:7; Joh 12:5). It is the name of the most important Roman coin, which circulated throughout the Empire, and in terms of which all public accounts were made up. It received its name from being originally the equivalent of ten copper asses, but from b.c. 217 onwards it was equivalent to sixteen asses, and weighed 1/84; of the Roman pound, or 60 grains troy. Under Nero (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 60) it was reduced to 1/96; of the pound, or 52½ grains. At the time of our Lord its value was fixed at 1/23; of the aureus, which may be taken under the early emperors as equal on the average to our sovereign; thus the denarius was worth 9-6 pence, or roughly 9½d.

We find the denarius used in the Gospels for the reckoning of even fairly large sums. Thus in the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mat 18:28, see above under 'Talent') a sum of 100 denarii is mentioned, while in the parable of the Two Debtors (Luk 7:41) the two debts are stated at 500 and 50 denarii respectively (£20 and £2). In Mar 6:37 = Joh 6:7 the disciples estimate that it would seed bread to the value of at least 200 denarii (£8) to provide for the five thousand. (There is no probability in the suggestion that this figure was named as the amount of money then in 'the bag.' It is intended to indicate a sum far beyond the means of the little company). In Mar 14:5 = Joh 12:5 the vase of ointment with which Mary anointed our Lord is valued at 300 denarii (£12). The 'exceeding costliness' of this loving tribute is realized when we remember that the sum named represents at least the annual income of a labourer of those days. This appears from the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mat 20:1-15), where a denarius is evidently looked upon as liberal pay for a day's work; for we may be quite sure that the employer who dealt so generously with the labourers engaged late in the day had struck no niggardly bargain with those hired in the morning. (A passage which may be quoted in confirmation is To 5:14, where the disguised angel is promised by Tobit a drachm a day—at that time a little less than a denarius—for acting as companion to his son. It is true that this was to be exclusive of his necessary expenses; but, on the other hand, the position was one of trust, and would naturally be more highly remunerated than field labour). In the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luk 10:30-37) two denarii are given to the innkeeper as a reasonable payment in advance for the keep of the wounded traveller for a day or two, to be supplemented if necessary on the return of the Samaritan. (This is the most natural way to explain the reference; see Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, ii. 591. On the other hand, Ramsay in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible, Ext. Vol. 394, holds that the two denarii were simply payment for the one night that the two had spent in the inn).

Of special interest is the reference to the denarius in Mat 22:19 = Mar 12:15 = Luk 20:24 in connexion with the Pharisees' question as to the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar. The denarius was 'the money of the tribute' (Mat 22:19), all Imperial taxes being payable in terms of it in accordance with a rescript of Germanicus (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 18). It bore upon it the name and title of the reigning Emperor, along with the effigy either of himself or of some member of the Imperial family—the 'image and superscription' to which our Lord alluded. It was issued by the Imperial authority, even the Roman Senate having only the right to mint copper coins, and could thus must appropriately be spoken of as 'that which is Caesar's.'

2. Drachm (δραχμή, Luk 15:8-9 Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 piece of silver).—This is the name of the unit of the Greek system of silver coinage, and, as such, might be applied to a great variety of coins from different mints and of different standards. In the Gospels it occurs only in the parable of the Lost Coin, where, of course, it must be understood of some coin current in Palestine. Few coins of this denomination were issued from the Phœnician cities or from Antioch, and the city of Caesarea in Cappadocia had only recently begun to coin drachms on the Phœnician standard (of 55 grains) for use in the provinces of Syria and Cappadocia (Mommsen, op. cit. 734, 897; Head, op. cit. 634). Thus, while it is not impossible that the coins in question may have been drachms of the Phœnician standard, they are with greater probability to be identified with the ‘Attic drachms’* [Note: It may not be out of place to remind the reader that the word ‘Attic’ in this connexion implies only a remote association with the coinage of Athens. In his Notes on the Parables, Trench assumes that this drachm was Athenian, stamped with ‘an owl, a tortoise, or a head of Minerva,’ and reluctantly surrenders ‘the resemblance to the human soul, originally stamped with the image and superscription of the great King,’ which earlier expositors had delighted to trace. A sound method of parable exposition will indeed dispense with this fanciful suggestion, but not for Trench’s reasons (see Bruce, Parabolic Teaching, 279).] of the Hellenistic writers, that is, with Roman denarii. In any case, the value for ordinary purposes was the same—about 9½d. of our money. The ‘ten pieces of silver’ possessed by the woman thus amounted to eight shillings.

3. Didrachm (διδραχμον, Mat 17:24 Authorized Version ‘tribute money,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘half-shekel’).—As the name implies, this is a coin of the value of two drachms. τὰ διδραχμα in the passage quoted refers to the tax of half a shekel (Exo 30:13) levied each year in the month of Adar from all Jews above the age of twenty for the maintenance of the Temple. The only coins then current in Palestine which answered exactly to the ‘shekel of the sanctuary’—leaving out of account the shekels commonly but probably erroneously assigned to Simon Maccabaeus (see above)—were those which had for long been coined in the Phœnician cities; and the Temple tax, along with other sacred dues, was paid in this currency.

The well-established correspondence of the didrachm to the half-shekel has been obscured for some writers by the fact that the LXX Septuagint regularly translate שֶׁקֶל by δ·δραχμον. From the narrative in Mt. it is evident that the tax was a voluntary one, although the Mishna declares that the goods of those who had not paid it by the 25th Adar might be distrained (Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 112). After the destruction of Jerusalem, Vespasian made compulsory a poll-tax of the same amount to defray the cost of rebuilding the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

4. Stater (στατήρ, Mat 17:27 Authorized Version piece of money, Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 shekel).—The word στατήρ is derived from the verb ἴστημι in the sense of to weigh. It hence means, in the first place, a standard weight, and then derivatively a standard coin. In Athens it was at first applied to the didrachm, which was looked upon as the standard coin of the monetary system, but afterwards to the tetradrachm or piece of four drachms. It is evidently so used in the passage before us, for the stater to be found in the fish's mouth was to pay the Temple tax of a didrachm for two persons, our Lord and Peter. The tetradrachm of the Phœnician standard corresponded to the Hebrew shekel, and is no doubt the coin here indicated. Josephus refers in one passage (BJ ii. xxi. 2) to 'the Tyrian coin which is of the value of four Attic drachms,' and in another (Ant. iii. viii. 2) he gives the value of the Hebrew shekel as four Attic drachms. The stater would thus be worth 4s. 2d. of our money.

In Mat 26:15 Cod. D [Note: Deuteronomist.] reads σριάκοντα στατήρας; and though this reading is rejected by critical editors, it probably embodies a correct paraphrase of the ἀργύρια (Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'pieces of silver') of the Textus Receptus. That is, the thirty pieces of silver paid to the traitor as the price of blood were staters of the Phœnician standard. This appears from a comparison of the passages in Mt. where they are spoken of with Zec 11:12-13, in which shekels are plainly intended. It has been pointed out (O. Holtzmann, NT Zeitgesch. 110) that just as in Zec 11:12 the word שקל does not occur but is suggested by the word וישקלו, so also the word στατήρ is latent in the verb ἴστησεν in Mat 26:15. Reckoning the stater at 4 denarii, the sum paid to Judas amounted to £4, 16s. Thirty shekels of silver was the price that had to be paid (Exo 21:32) as blood-money for a male or female slave; and this coincidence has frequently been used as a striking illustration of the truth expressed in Php 2:7 that our Lord took upon Himself the form of a servant.

(iii.) Copper coins.—There are three copper coins mentioned in the Gospels: the assarion, the kodrantēs, and the lepton. The last is translation 'mite' in the Authorized and Revised Versions, while the two others are called, without distinction, by the name 'farthing.'

1. Assarion (ἄσσάριον Mat 10:29, Luk 12:6, Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 farthing, Amer. Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 penny).—The name is derived from the Latin assarius, a variant of as. It may either be the name given in Greek-speaking countries to the Roman as, or else the name of some local copper coin which in some way corresponded to it. Both views have been taken, by different scholars, of the significance of the word in the above passages. On the one hand, Schürer (HJP [Note: JP History of the Jewish People.] ii. i. 39) and others hold that it is the Roman as that is here mentioned, in value the sixteenth part of the denarius. In support of this view, it may be urged that copper coins were issued, by authority of the Senate, from the Imperial mint at Antioch for circulation in the province of Syria, that these coins bear Latin inscriptions, and that of the two sizes in which they are found one has been identified (e.g. by Mommsen, op. cit. 718, and Madden, op. cit. 301) with the sestertius or quarter-denarius, and the other with the as. Moreover, the Vulgate not only renders ἀσσάριον back into as in the passage in Mt., but in the corresponding passage in Lk. has dipondio, thus identifying the ‘two farthings’ which are named as the price of two sparrows with the Roman dupondius or piece of two asses. Schürer points out, besides, that the name אִסָּר (‘issar, evidently the Heb. form of ἀσσάριον) occurs frequently in the Mishna, and is sometimes expressly called אִסָּר אִיטָּלִי or Italian assarion. If this view is correct, the assarion of the Gospels will represent 6d.—roughly a halfpenny—in English money, or exactly 5 German pfennigs. On the other hand, this simple solution of the problem is challenged, and chiefly on account of those very references in the Mishna to which Schürer appeals. The qualification of certain assaria as ‘Italian’—which is also found in Greek on certain Cretan coins of the time of Claudius (Head, 384) and in a quotation from the Rescript of Germanicus in the Palmyra tariff—seems to imply that there were other coins of the same name, but of different value. And, as a matter of fact, the Mishna speaks of the dînar or denarius as containing 24 ‘issârîm, which cannot therefore be Roman asses of 16 to the denarius. If this distinction existed already in the time of our Lord, it is to be presumed that He used the word in the more popular sense.* [Note: Kennedy in Hastings’ DB, s.v. ‘Money,’ § 8, draws an interesting and instructive distinction between the ‘tariff’ and the ‘current’ value of the local copper money. Just as the tetradrachmon of Antioch was tarified as only equal to three denarii for purposes of taxation, so he supposes that the local assarion (1/24 of the drachm) was rated as equivalent to half of the Italian assarion or as. But this does not affect the calculation made above, for of course the purchase of sparrows would be one of those ‘ordinary purposes’ for which the coin would retain its current value.] In this case the price of the two sparrows (Mat 10:29) would be 4d., or rather less than a halfpenny—almost exactly 4 centimes.

2. Kodrantes (κοδραντης, Mat 5:26, Mar 12:42, Authorized Version, Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885, and Amer. Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 farthing).—There can be no question as to the identity of the coin that is intended in these two passages. It is the quadrans or quarter-as, the smallest coin in the Roman system, equal in value to 3/5 of a farthing, or a little more than the pfennig. It may, however, reasonably be doubted whether any coin known by this name was in circulation in Palestine in the time of our Lord. The word does not occur in the Mishna, and it has not been found in any of the inscriptions in Greek-speaking provinces (see ExpT [Note: xpT Expository Times.] x. [1899] 232, 336. where Sir W. M. Ramsay takes Prof. Blass roundly to task for assuming that the name κοδρόντης was familiar in the East, and that the provincial cities coined copper money with Roman designations). Nor are the allusions in the Gospels conclusive. Mk.'s explanatory note (λεπτὰ δύο, ὃ ἐστὶν κοδρόντης) is obviously intended for non-Palestinian (possibly Roman) readers. As for the use of the word in Mt., the fact that the parallel passage in Lk. has τὸ ἔσχατον λεπτόν instead of τὸν ἔσχατον κοδρόντην, suggests that it may have been inserted by the First Evangelist as the name of the smallest coin in the Roman system in place of the lepton, the smallest coin in the Palestinian system. It is, however, open to us to suppose that there was a local coin which for some purposes was identified with the quadrans, though rarely so named. A coin of Agrippa ii. has been found bearing the name χαλκοῦς (Madden, 146). In the ordinary Greek system the chalkus is equal to 1/48; of the drachm; but if we suppose that for purposes of taxation local copper was only accepted subject to a discount of 25 per cent., the chalkus would be tariffed as equal to the quadrans, which is 1/64; of the denarius. (Cf. note to last paragraph, and see the already quoted art. by Prof. Kennedy, who works out in detail the relations of the 'tariff' and 'current' values of the various coins).

3. Lepton (λεπτόν, Mar 12:42, Luk 12:59; Luk 21:2, Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 mite).—This name is originally an adjective meaning 'thin' or 'small.' It hence denotes a very small coin, but is otherwise indeterminate. 'In the Oriental provinces of the Roman Empire,' says Babelon (Monnaies Grecques et Romaines, i. i. 466), 'the word λεπτόν regularly denoted local copper money as distinguished from coppers of the Roman mint.' At different times and in various places it was used of coins of very different value. As used in the Gospels, however, there is no ambiguity. It is agreed on all hands that it denotes the smallest coin current among the Jews, known to the Mishna as the פְּרֻטָּה (pěřûtâh), of which we are expressly told that it was an eighth of the Roman as (see reff. in Lightfoot, ii. 453, and Schürer, ii. i. 40),—a statement which exactly agrees with that of Mk. about the value of the lepton. If, therefore, quadrans is to be identified with the chalkus, the lepton is a coin of half the value.

Nevertheless, the statement of Mk. (λεπτὰ δύο, ὃ ἴσιν κοδρόντης), has given much trouble to numismatologists, who, to quote the words of one of them, 'have serious difficulty in finding among the small coins of Judaea separate denominations for chalkous and lepton' (G. F. Hill in Ebi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.], s.v. 'Penny'). Accordingly, many attempts have been made to identify the lepton with the chalkus-quadrans. Thus Madden, following Cavedoni, cuts the knot by supposing Mk. to have meant the ὀιστι, to apply to the λεπτον and not to the λεπτα δύο (Coins of the Jews, 304), and appeals for corroboration to the correspondence of the kodrantes to the lepton in Mat 5:26 = Luk 12:59. Hill, on the other hand, following up the suggestion of Prof. Kennedy referred to in the preceding paragraphs, contends that the difference between the lepton and the chalkus-quadrans was only a matter of accounting. The difficulty, as stated by Mr. Hill, depends upon the assumption that the chalkus-quadrans was a current Palestinian coin. This, however, has not been proved. Agrippa's chalkus need not have been considered as equal to a quadrans.* [Note: Babelon (606) identifies the quadrans with the διχαλκον and the χαλκοῦς; with the lepton of the Gospels.] As stated by Mr. Madden, 'it is impossible to get over the fact that at this period the quadrans of the Empire, which still retained the name of χαλκοῦς, had the same weight as the lepton of the time of the Seleucidae' (Coins of the Jews, 304). The difficulty depends, further, upon an inference from weight,—an inference which, in the case of coins which were little more than tokens, is unusually precarious. In any case, the arguments advanced would need to be much stronger in order to upset the positive statement of St. Mark.

The value, then, as men reckon values, of the widow's gift was little more than a farthing. But the fact that it consisted of two tiny coins,—a fact which we constantly obscure by talking, in our careless way, of 'the widow's mite,'—is full of significance. She might have kept back one.† [Note: 'Quorum unum vidua retinere potuerat' (Bengel).] But of her penury she cast in all that she had; and so of her, too, as of another woman who from her larger resources made an equally lavish gift, it is true that, wherever the gospel is preached throughout the whole world (Mat 26:13), this that she did is told as a memorial of her.

Literature.—Madden's Coins of the Jews (vol. ii. of Numismata Orientalia) contains an exhaustive account of all the extant Jewish coins, and an appendix (289-310) on the money of the NT. The subject is treated briefly, but clearly, in Schürer, HJP [Note: JP History of the Jewish People.] ii. i. 38-40, and O. Holtzmann, NT Zeitgesch. 110-116. Mommsen's Gesch. des Röm. Münzwesens is a mine of information on all that concerns the money of the Empire. Articles on 'Money' in the various Bible Dictionaries can be read with advantage, esp. the admirably comprehensive and lucid art. by Prof. Kennedy in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible .

☒ Monotheism

MONOTHEISM.—At whatever period in their early history the people of Israel may be supposed to have passed through the obscure and uncertain stages of belief that precede a clear and reasoned theism, that period had been left behind long before the days of Christ and the NT writers. The bitter experiences of exile and suffering on the one hand, and on the other the lofty teachings of prophets and men of God, had eradicated all tendencies to polytheism, and had fixed immovably in the conscience and conviction of the entire nation the faith that Jehovah was the one God of the whole earth. If Israel's early beliefs, as some contend, were henotheistic, and conceded a place and right to other national gods, as Chemosh, Molech, or Rimmon, as equal and paramount lords of their own peoples, such recognition of external divinities had long since ceased to be permissible. There were not really gods many and lords many; there is one God the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ (1Co_8:6).

This monotheistic belief, however, is assumed rather than formulated or defined in the Gospels. The doctrine that God is one, universally supreme and without rival, does not need to be explained or defended, for it runs no risk of being assailed. Like the belief in the existence of God, it is an article of faith accepted on all sides, by Jesus and by His opponents, and is rather implicit in the thought than explicit in the teaching of Christ and of His disciples.

While, however, this is true, and all the more so because His controversy with the Jews turned largely upon the question of His claim to equality with God, and the blasphemy which this claim appeared to them to imply, epithets and phrases may readily be quoted from the Gospels which have no meaning except as presupposing an absolute and pure monotheism. Such phrases, as would naturally be anticipated, are more generally employed by St. John than by the Synoptists. Thus the Prologue of the Fourth Gospel, tracing all things back to God with whom the Word is one (Joh_1:1), asserts nothing less than the uniqueness as well as the eternity and sovereignty of Him from whom they proceed; and the true Light entering into the world enlighteneth not this or that nation only, but every man (Joh_1:9). To the same effect and with the same background of accepted and common belief are the repeated declarations of His oneness with the Father (Joh_10:30; Joh_10:38; Joh_14:10; cf. Joh_17:21; cf.

Joh_17:23). The area and claims of the Divine Kingdom, the Kingdom of God, are explicitly enlarged beyond any mere national limits, and made to embrace the whole world (Luk_16:16, Joh_4:21 ff.), and so the disciples are taught to pray that it may come upon earth, as it is in heaven (Mat_6:10). It is indeed not bodily or material (Luk_17:21), but transcends the world (Joh_18:36). In the Last Judgment, again, all nations are gathered before the throne, and all receive sentence. 'The field' in which the seed is sown is 'the world' (Mat_13:38); and the final injunction to Christ's followers is that they are to go into all the world to make disciples of all the nations (Mat_28:19).

The same teaching is conveyed with more or less directness in the assertion of the subordination and judgment of the prince of this world (Joh_16:11); in the stress laid upon the unique obligation and importance of love to God as constituting the first and greatest commandment (Mat_22:37 || Mar_12:30, Luk_10:27); in the appeal made by Christ Himself to a similar unique obligation of worship and service to the one only God (Mat_4:10 || Luk_4:8); in the emphatic affirmation of a common Fatherhood and Godhead (Joh_20:17; cf. Joh_8:41); and in the solemn declaration of the permanence and inviolability of the words of the Son (Mat_24:35 || Mar_13:31, Luk_21:33), while elsewhere there is ascribed to Him that omniscience which is an attribute of God Himself (Joh_16:30).

There are also passages in which the epithet 'one' or 'only' is directly applied to the Divine Ruler, thus claiming for Him with more or less emphasis the sole dominion and the exclusive right to homage. 'The Lord our God is one Lord' (Mar_12:29 from Deu_6:4, cf. Mar_12:32). The God who forgives sins is εἷς (Mar_2:7), or μόνος (Luk_5:21); He is unique in goodness (Mat_19:17 || Mar_10:18, Luk_18:19); the sole Father (Mat_23:9); and the only God (Joh_5:44).

Some of these expressions might, it is true, be satisfied by a wide conception, such as the ancient prophets had formed, of a God of Israel to whom the sons of Israel were a first interest and charge, or even of a Sovereign the limits of whose sway left room for other sovereigns beside Him. Not all of them, evidently, if read apart and by themselves, will bear the weight of a full monotheistic inference. Taken together, however, and in their context, their joint and several significance is unmistakable. They assume on the part of speaker and hearer alike a belief in the sole supremacy of one God. Nor is this inference as to their meaning seriously contested.

Moreover, in one passage (Joh_17:3) there is found a perfectly distinct and unequivocal assertion of monotheistic doctrine; eternal life is to gain a knowledge of the only true God (τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν). Other phrases, in themselves less definite or comprehensive, must clearly be received and interpreted in the light of this, if an adequate conception of Christ's teaching concerning the Father is to be reached. The principle is applicable to other elements of His instruction than that under consideration. The whole is to be construed and expounded by means of the loftiest and most comprehensive statements of doctrine, not to be attenuated to those which may be more particular or obscure.

The conclusion, therefore, is that a monotheistic belief is everywhere assumed in the Gospels; and if it is rarely formulated, the reason is to be sought in the universal assent with which it was received. Christ did not need to teach with definiteness and reiteration, as though it were a new truth, that there is one only Lord of heaven and of earth; for this belief was common to Himself and to His hearers, and formed the solid and accepted foundation of their religious faith.

MONTH.—See Time.

☞Moon

MOON.—In the NT the moon (σελήνη) is part of the established natural order. So when Christ prophesies the end of the world, 'The moon shall not give her light' (Mat_24:29, Mar_13:24). Twice in the Gospel of Matthew (Mat_4:24; Mat_17:15) σεληνιάζεσθαι (literally to be moonstruck) is used to describe mental derangement, as in our 'lunacy,' 'lunatic,' from Lat. luna, 'the moon.' See above, pp. 91^b, 96^b.

The Passover always took place at full moon, for it was held on the 14th of the month Nisan, and it was the lunar month that was used, as it is still used by the Jews (Josephus Ant. iii. x. 5; cf. Col_2:16). Thus there was moonlight in Gethsemane when Christ went there with His disciples, and when He was betrayed. Also, the darkness which lasted for three hours during the crucifixion could not be due to an ordinary eclipse of the sun by the moon. See also art. Time.

MORNING.—Mat 16:3; Mat 20:1; Mat 27:1, Mar 11:20; Mar 13:35; Mar 16:2; cf. Mat 28:1, Luk 24:1, Joh 20:1. There was no exact division of the day into parts among the Jews until after the Exile. The broad divisions current were ‘evening,’ ‘morning,’ and ‘mid-day,’ which followed this order usually, after the Jewish method of reckoning the day prevailed ‘with the triumph of the Law.’ The Roman division of the night into four ‘watches,’ extending from six o’clock to six o’clock, is brought into striking view in Mar 13:35, where ὄψε (in the evening), μεσονύκτιον, (at midnight), and ἀλεκτοροφωνίας (at cock-crowing), are given in connexion and contrast with πρωτ (in the morning). The passages in the Gospels in which πρωτ (morning) plays the most interesting and puzzling part are those connected with the visit of the women to the sepulchre after the resurrection of Jesus (Mat 28:1, Mar 16:2, Luk 24:1, and Joh 20:1). Here Mt. has ‘late on the sabbath’ (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), while Mk. says ‘very early on the first day of the week,’ and Jn. while it was yet dark.’ No explanation will prove satisfactory to all. But Mt.’s ‘late on the sabbath’ may be taken as reckoning the following night as a part of the Sabbath—a departure from Jewish usage (Meyer). In short, we may suppose that the Babylonian method of adding diurnally the night to the day, rather than the day to the night (Israelitish), had come at this time, more or less, into common use among the Jews, so that there were two ways of reckoning complete astronomical days; namely, first, by ‘night-days,’ and, secondly, by ‘day-nights.’ Then we need only to suppose Mt. to be thinking of the ‘day-night,’ and the difficulty vanishes; for ‘late’ in that ‘day-night’ would mean about the end of the night which followed the end of the Sabbath. This would accord perfectly with Mk.’s note of time, ‘very early on the first day of the week.’ Another solution of the difficulty is suggested by J. H. Moulton (Prolegomena, p. 72), that, according to the usage represented in the papyri, Mt.’s words rendered in Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘late on the sabbath,’ should be rendered ‘late from the sabbath,’ which is equivalent to saying ‘after the sabbath.’ This, too, would bring the words into harmony with those of Mark and John.

☞ Moses

MOSES (Heb. מֹשֶׁה in accordance with the derivation from מָשַׁח ‘to draw,’ given in Exo_2:10; LXX Septuagint and NT usually Μωϋσῆς [Vulgate Moyses], following the derivation adopted by Philo and Josephus from the Coptic mo ‘water’ and ushe ‘saved, occasionally, however, Μωσῆς in conformity to the Hebrew. On its declension see Blass, Grammar of NT, § 10)—For an estimate of the position occupied by Moses in the Gospels, and his relation to the Person and work of Christ, a good starting-point is afforded by the words of Heb_3:2-6, which may be paraphrased thus: Moses was intrusted by God with an influence which was to affect and permeate not only his own generation but the whole of the Old Dispensation; and he proved himself worthy of the trust. Christ was similarly faithful, but in two ways He far transcended Moses.—(a) Moses, for all the influence which he exercised, was yet a member, a portion, of the ‘house’ throughout which that influence extended; but Christ is God, the Builder and Maker of the house.’ (b) Moses had a delegated authority in the house; he acted under orders as a trusted servant in the early stages of man’s spiritual evolution; but his authority vanished when the Son came into possession. Moses may thus be considered under two aspects, which, however, are not entirely distinct, but blend into one another. (1) He is not so much a person as an instrument. He represented the Old Dispensation because he was the instrument through which the Law was given. (2) He is an historical personality. But, because he represented the Old Dispensation, many of his acts, and of the events of his career, and of the characteristics of his person, prove to be types—inferior and prophetic counterparts—of various factors in the Kingdom and the Person of Christ.

1. (a) It was the opinion universally held among Jews and Christians in Apostolic times, that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch. (On our Lord’s acceptance of this opinion, see below).

Mar_12:26. The passage in Exodus relating God’s appearance in the bush is said to occur ‘in the book of Moses.’ And in || Luk_20:37 Moses ‘pointed out’ (ἐμῆνυσεν) the truth of a resurrection of the dead in the passage about the bush, ‘when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham ...' It was God Himself who used these words (Exo_3:6), but Moses is spoken of as the author of the passage.

Mar_12:19 || Luk_20:28. The Sadducees, in referring to the Levirate law, claim that 'Moses wrote unto us.' On || Mat_22:24 see below.

Joh_1:45. Philip speaks of 'him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, wrote.'

Luk_16:29; Luk_16:31; Luk_24:27. Moses being the author of the Pentateuch, his name stands as synonymous with that which he wrote.

To these must be added the passages which speak of 'the law of Moses': Luk_2:22 (the offering after childbirth), Luk_24:44 ('the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms'), Joh_7:23 (circumcision; cf. Act_15:1; Act_15:5). See also Act_13:39; Act_26:22; Act_28:23, Rom_5:14; Rom_10:5, 1Co_9:9, 2Co_3:15, Heb_10:28.

(b) Besides this somewhat impersonal use of the name of Moses, there are passages which invest him with a more conscious responsibility and authority in connexion with the Law.

Mat_8:4 || Mar_1:44, Luk_5:14. The healed leper is told to offer the gift which 'Moses enjoined.'

Mat_19:7 || Mar_10:3 f. The Pharisees, 'tempting' Jesus, argue on the assumption that 'Moses commanded' a man to give his wife a writ of divorcement. And our Lord answers them—'Moses allowed you to put away your wives (Mt.), he wrote you this commandment (Mk.), with a view to (προς) your hardness of heart.' Moses is here conceived of as looking out with a prophetic eye over the ages, and seeing that all future generations of Israel would alike harden their hearts against God; and that it would therefore be advisable to permit divorce as a necessary evil under certain circumstances, in order to limit and check man's sinful disposition. The words 'recognize the validity of the husband's act, but do not create the situation' (Swete). In Mk. our Lord anticipates the appeal to Moses by saying, 'What did Moses command you?' Mt. misses this, putting the τι ἐνεταλατο into the mouth of the Pharisees (see Swete on the whole passage, Mar_10:1-6).

Mat_22:24. In citing the Levirate law, the Sadducees claim that 'Moses said'—for which the other Synoptists have the less personal 'Moses wrote.'

Mar_7:10 Our Lord quotes the Fifth Commandment of the Decalogue, together with Exo_21:17, with the words 'Moses said.' || Mat_15:4 has 'God said.'

Mat 23:2. Moses, as the great teacher of the Law, used to sit (cf. Exo 18:1 f.), and deliver ex cathedra decisions. And the recognized teachers of the nation, the scribes and Pharisees, took up the same authoritative position (ἐσὶ τῆς Μ. καθίδρας ικάθισαι) when they became the exponents of the traditional rules by which the old Law was 'hedged.' Jesus does not find fault with the position; He says, in effect, 'as interpreters of the Law of God, show them all due reverence; as keepers of the Law of God, beware of following their example' (see Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 74^a).

In the Fourth Gospel this view of Moses' authority appears no less prominently.—

Joh 1:17, 'The Law was given through Moses.' But this very fact places him and it on a lower plane than Christ and the Gospel. Moses was merely a channel, through whom the Law—which was something separate from himself—was given; whereas 'grace and truth came into being (ἐγένετο) through Jesus Christ,' because He Himself was, and is, grace and truth; so that we received the fulness of grace and truth 'because we all received of his fulness' (see Hort, The Way, the Truth, and the Life, p. 43 f.).

Joh 5:45. The national adherence to the Law is the resting of the national hopes upon Moses ('Moses on whom ye have placed your hope'). But (Joh 5:46 f.) this adherence on your part ought to mean a loyal acceptance of his words, even though their true meaning is at variance with national expectations. Moses' words accuse you, for belief in his writings really involves belief in My words. 'He wrote of me.'

There are two senses in which it may be said that Moses wrote of Christ. Christ said (Mat 22:36-40, cf. Deu 6:5, Lev 19:18) that on the two commandments—love to God, and love to man—'all the Law is hung, and the prophets.' so that the true underlying meaning and motive of the whole Law was reflected in the spirit of Christ (see 'Christ the Interpreter of Prophecy,' by Kennett, Interpreter, Jan. 1906). But the Pentateuch contains more than the laws. A further sense in which Moses wrote of Christ is indicated in the whole of § 2 of the present article. Moses was quite unconscious that he wrote of Christ when he hung' the Law upon love; and he was similarly unconscious of it when he related events which were afterwards to receive a spiritual fulfillment in the religion of Christ.

Joh 7:19; Joh 7:22. Our Lord shows the Jews that a strict observance of the letter of the whole Law is, in practice, impossible; and that He is therefore, from their own standpoint, entitled to heal on the Sabbath. 'Did not Moses give you the law? and yet not one of you carries it out in actual practice (ποιεῖ τὸν νόμον). For instance—Moses has given you circumcision; but in keeping that ordinance, you do not hesitate to break the letter of another, for you circumcise on the Sabbath. There is irony in the ἵνα μὴ λυθῆι ('that the law of Moses be not broken') of Joh 7:23. But a further thought seems to be implied in the διὰ τοῦτο ('for this cause') with which Joh 7:22 opens. Not only did Moses give you a law which it is impossible to keep with rigid exactness, but he gave it to you on this very account, i.e. that you might discover by experience its weakness and unprofitableness. A parenthesis, however, is thrown in to modify the δέδωκεν. Moses 'has given' you circumcision in the sense that he has authoritatively endorsed it as a binding ordinance; but it did not originate from him; it was handed down 'from the fathers,' i.e. from the days when Abraham circumcised himself and his sons. (Our Lord uses a similar argument with regard to the Sabbath in Mat 12:5).

Joh 9:28 f. The Pharisees taunted the man who had been healed of his blindness with being a disciple of Jesus, while they were 'Moses' disciples.' In their eyes Moses held a position analogous to that of Mohammed or Buddha, or any great founder of a religion. They were Moses' disciples because they revered his writings and obeyed his commands. But Christ's true followers, while they are His disciples, are at the same time far more, because they are partakers in His Divine life.

See also Rom 10:19 (the expression 'Moses saith' introducing the words of God, Deu 32:21), Heb 7:14.

The thought of this section finds concrete illustration in the narrative of Mat 17:1-8 || Mar 9:2-8, Luk 9:28-36. Moses and Elijah, the two grandest figures of the OT, who both fasted forty days and nights, who were both privileged to behold a theophany on Mt. Horeb, and who were both taken from the earth in a supernatural manner, represented 'the Law and the Prophets.' And they appeared to Him who was the fulfilment to which both pointed, and conversed with Him (Lk.) concerning His impending departure (ἔξοδος). Among other factors in the vision which taught a lesson to the watching disciples was the vanishing of Moses and Elijah when 'Jesus alone' remained. 'It helped them to see that the OT being fulfilled by Christ is done away in Christ' (Plummer in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iv. 808^a).

In all the above passages, both in (a) and (b), Moses does not appear strictly as a personality. He is not a man, possessed of individual character—of moral or spiritual attainments. He is the instrument through whom the Law was given to Israel (Act 7:38)—the hand which wrote and the voice which spoke. And Jesus, together with the Jews of His day, thought of him as such. This fact is held by some to cut away the ground from the critical arguments which go to prove that Moses was not the author of the Pentateuch as it stands, and, indeed, that the greater part of the Pentateuchal law is in its present form later than the age of Moses. The question has been very fully discussed by many writers, so that only a brief notice is needed here. If, as Hebrew scholars contend, the evidence is overwhelming that the Pentateuch and the Laws contained in it are the result of a long growth, which was not completed until a period after the return of the Jews from exile, it is impossible for us to shut our eyes to this evidence on the assumption (for it is only an assumption) that our Lord's use of the name of Moses precludes further argument. An explanation sometimes given is that Jesus must have known the exact truth about the authorship of the Pentateuch, but that He made a concession to the ignorance of the Jews of His day. But a growing body of students rejects this as untenable, because it detracts from the complete humanity of our Lord. If, as man, He had a full knowledge of the results which modern study has reached with regard to the literary problems of time OT, He must also, as man, have known all future results which will be reached by the study of generations to come. In other words, as man He was omniscient. But this conflicts alike with our conception of complete manhood and with the explicit declaration that He 'advanced in wisdom' (Luk 2:52). We know that He could feel hungry and thirsty and weary, that He could be overcome with sleep, that He could manifest surprise; and on one occasion at least He spoke of 'something which 'no one knoweth, not the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only' (Mat 24:36, Mar 13:32). He was subject, therefore, to the ordinary limitations of manhood, and, as man, He acquired His knowledge by the methods which other men follow. The problem is a part of a larger one—the problem of determining to what extent, or in what sense, His Divine powers and prerogatives were in abeyance during His earthly life. Although fully and completely man, He did not cease to be God, and He did not cease to be conscious of His Divinity. 'It is this continuous self-consciousness of the Son of God that gives the true measure of His transcendent humility' (Gifford, The Incarnation, p. 90). We can venture the statement with respect to His knowledge, that though, as God, He never ceased to be omniscient, yet He refused to know, as man, anything which could not be learnt by human means. But when we have said that, we have only enunciated and not solved the problem. This is not the place to enter into it further. But there can be no doubt that it is along this line of thought that we must move, to justify modern criticism in denying to Moses the authorship of the Pentateuch which our Lord and His Apostles ascribed to him. See also artt. Humanity of Christ and Kenosis.

2. But because Moses was the representative of the Old Dispensation, Jesus and the NT writers thought of him as something more. He was an historical personage of such unique prominence in Israel's history, that his whole career affords parallels to spiritual factors in the New Covenant. The history of the old Israel repeats itself in that of the new. To say this is not to affirm that the OT writers had the slightest idea that the events which they described were one day to receive a spiritual fulfilment. The mind of God alone knew it, when He guided the events and inspired the writings.

The series of Mosaic events which NT writers cite as affording points of comparison with things spiritual, form an extremely interesting study, since they cover so many of the distinctive features of the New Dispensation, and illustrate in a striking manner the essential unity of the 'Divine Library.'

(a) 2Co 3:7-18. The centre of Christianity is the Incarnation—the dwelling of God's glory among men in the Person of Jesus Christ (Joh 1:14). And St. Paul argues that the 'glory' upon Moses' face,* [Note: His use of the narrative is rendered easier by the LXX, which renders ἦν ('shone') by δεδόξασται and δεδοξασμένη (Exo 34:29 f.).] which accompanied his reception of the Law, was so great that the Israelites could not bear to gaze upon it, although that law was merely a ministration of death, and of condemnation: much more will the ministration of the spirit, and of righteousness, be of surpassing glory. Again, Moses realized that the 'glory' on his face was transitory, and so he could not boldly leave his face uncovered. And the veil which he wore still lies, spiritually speaking, on the hearts of the Jewish nation, and will not be removed till they 'turn to the Lord,' as Moses used to remove it when he returned to the Divine presence. But we Christians can speak boldly, and with unveiled face can reflect the glory of the Lord. If we are told that our gospel is obscure and hidden by a veil, it is only so in the case of those who are spiritually perishing. It is they who have been blinded by the 'god of this age,' to prevent the 'glory of God,' which is, in fact, the Incarnate Christ, from dawning upon them.

(b) Joh 3:14. The Incarnation had its issue in the Passion. The connexion of this verse with Joh 3:13 by the opening 'and,' and the repetition of the title 'Son of Man,' express this thought (see Westcott, in loc). The difficulties in arriving at the ideas attached to the brazen serpent in the original story (Num 21:7-9), and of our Lord's application of it, are great. Patristic writers deal with it in a variety of ways—some of them deeply suggestive (see Westcott, p. 63 ff.). Two points stand out clearly—the lifting up of the Son of Man upon the Cross, and the spiritual healing of those who look up with faith to Him. But two others suggest themselves, though we cannot estimate the exact part which they played in our Lord's thought. (1) The serpent on the pole symbolized the evil from which the people had suffered; and Christ identified Himself with sinful humanity so completely, that when He was crucified He took sin 'out of the way, nailing it to his cross' (Col 2:14, cf. Gal 3:13, 1Pe 2:24, with (Revised Version margin)). (2) The word 'be lifted up' (ὑψωθῆναι, exaltari) is applied elsewhere, not only to the Passion (Joh 8:28; Joh 12:32-34), but also to the Ascension (Act 2:33; Act 5:31, cf. Php 2:9 ὑπερῦψωσεν). Christ 'reigned from the Tree' in the supreme moment of victory, but that was only the first stage in a triumphal progress upwards.

(c) Joh 19:36. Christ's death and the shedding of His blood procured atonement. This, in the minds of all Christians, has its counterpart in the Passover (Heb 11:28). St. John traces a fulfilment of a particular detail in the fact that no bone of our Lord's body was broken. And see 1Co 5:7 f.

(d) Christ's sacrifice is more clearly connected with the covenant sacrifice at Horeb (Exo 24:4-8). Our Lord explicitly refers to it in the words of the institution of the Eucharist (Mat 26:28, Mar 14:21, Luk 22:20, 1Co 11:25; see also Heb 9:18-20, 1Pe 1:2, with Hort's note).

(e) Heb 12:18-24. Though pleading in heaven, Christ is still present among men; He is still incarnate; hence the existence of the Church which is His Body. In these verses the position and condition of the Church under the New Covenant is contrasted with that of the Israelites at Sinai, the characteristics of the two covenants being summed up in the words 'terror' and 'grace' (cf. Keble's Christian Year, 'Whitsunday').

(f) 1Co 10:2. Sacramental incorporation into Christ's Divine life had its counterpart in the old Jewish Church; all the Israelites were 'baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea.'

Joh 6:30-35; Joh 6:41-58. By the other great sacrament, the Divine life is fed and nourished in the members of the Church. Our Lord teaches that 'it was not Moses, but God revealing Himself through Moses, who gave the manna; and again the manna—the perishable bread—was not in the highest sense "bread from heaven," but rather the symbol of spiritual food.' [It is not here asserted that our Lord's discourse had reference exclusively to the Sacrament of the Holy Communion, which He was afterwards to institute. But it must have been impossible for St. John—and it is impossible for us—having heard the words spoken at the Last Supper, not to see in the present passage their fullest and deepest application].

1Co 10:3-4. As Christ is the Bread of Life, so He is the Water of Life. The Israelites, in the mind of St. Paul, did not eat and drink mere physical food and water, but spiritual. The two accounts of the striking of the rock by Moses for the production of water (Exo 17:6, Num 20:11) gave rise to the Rabbinic explanation that the rock which was struck followed them through the desert, affording a continual supply. That rock, says St. Paul, is typical of Christ.

(g) Act 3:22; Act 7:37. Besides the spiritual nourishment, which fosters the Divine life in the soul, Christians need a Teacher, who will at all times reveal the will of God. Both St. Peter and St. Stephen see in Christ the fulfilment of the declaration in Deu 18:15-18 that God would raise up a prophet like unto Moses. And John the Baptist, in his truthfulness and self-effacement, declares that he himself is not 'the Prophet,' but only a voice heralding His coming (Joh 1:21 ff.). And see Joh 6:14; Joh 7:40 [Luk 7:39].

(h) While the Israelites are the counterpart of the Christian Church, their enemies who opposed Moses (cf. 2Ti 3:8) afford a parallel to those who obey not the gospel. In Rev 8:5; Rev 8:7-8; Rev 9:2-4; Rev 15:6 ff; Rev 16:2-4; Rev 16:10; Rev 16:13; Rev 16:18; Rev 16:21 the symbolism of punishment is clearly based on the plagues of Egypt. On the other hand, those who have been redeemed from the slavery of sin can, like the Israelites rescued from Egypt, 'sing the song of Moses the servant of God' (Rev 15:3).

MOTE.—See Beam and Mote.

Moth

MOTH (σῆς).—The Bible frequently makes reference to the destructive action of the moth as a fit symbol of the perishableness of man and his earthly possessions. In Oriental countries, where so large a part of 'treasure' consisted of costly silken and woollen fabrics, the figure was peculiarly appropriate and impressive. Specially referred to is the 'clothes' moth,' one or more (not readily identified as to its particular member of the family) of the genus Tinea, which may be said to have an almost cosmopolitan distribution. The larva of this moth feeds on wool, silk, hair, fur, feathers, etc. Out of the material on which it feeds it forms a portable case or house, supposed to be alluded to as an image of instability (though Cheyne [Ebi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] , 'Moth'] denies this) in Job 27:18 a. The moth first finishes its case, which is often motley-coloured on account of the variety of material from which it draws supplies, and afterwards feeds voraciously on the substance from which the tent or house has been produced. For building purposes it selects the long straight fibres, but for food the shortest and thickest, and in order to get the latter it eats down below the surface pile to the fabric itself. The feeding process is therefore the most destructive to the fabric. The yellowish-brown pupa is either formed in this structure which the larva constructs, or in a slight cocoon. Before the perfect insect appears the mischief is accomplished, for large patches are eaten in the clothes, carpets, or tapestry where the parent moth has laid its eggs. If the action of the insect is undiscovered, or by carelessness allowed to be completed, it makes the fabric into a mere flimsy shell which falls into nothingness on the least touch or breath. 'Crushed before the moth' (Job_4:19) is a faithful description of this most effective destruction—an apt figure of the insidious, deadly work of evil in the human character.

Our Lord refers to this well-known phenomenon in the Sermon on the Mount (Mat_6:19-20, Luk_12:33). Along with the corroding work of the rust—due to chemical action on metals left unused and exposed—He classes the ravages of the moth, as illustrations of the inevitable corruption and decay which overtake all earthly things apart from the heavenly and Divine. Men are not to set their affections on things that belong to the earth (things which contain no higher and heavenly element), are not to make these their treasures, for in that case their heart, the centre of their life, set upon these decaying, perishing things, is itself subject to similar destructive forces—'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.' All earthly things are to be valued, not in themselves as ends, but as means to the higher spiritual life. The affection is to be positively fixed on the enduring things of human virtue, knowledge, and character, formed and obtained by fellowship with the Divine—elements which all lower things are adapted to subserve, and which themselves 'neither moth, nor rust can corrupt.'

☪ Mother

MOTHER.—Concerning the relations of Jesus with His mother, and her influence upon His training, we can but infer that the mother of such a son must herself have been an exceptional personality. See art. Mary (Virgin). Professor W. M. Ramsay, in his Education of Christ, shows how thorough was the instruction given to the Jewish youth. With this the mother had much to do. Granted that religious genius is not to be accounted for by environment, there still remains the overwhelming probability that the feminine qualities in the character of Jesus—His graciousness, gentleness, and sympathy—found a congenial setting in the home at Nazareth. Had it been otherwise, some hint of the fact must have been given in the records of His public ministry. It has been contended that such a hint is given in Mar_3:31 ff., an incident which also finds a place in the other Evangelists. Another is Mat_10:35-37 || Mar_10:29, Luk 12:53; Luk 14:26. But it should not be overlooked that these hyperbolic expressions by no means involve the repudiation of the filial tie. They are rather designed to mark the thoroughness with which the religious life should be embraced, the higher love absorbing and transforming the lower. The emphasis with which, in other connexions, Jesus denounces contemporary sins against the filial relationship is a proof that with Him the ideal life did not consist with holding it in contempt (Mar 7:10-13, Mat 15:4-9). The filial relationship is to be superseded only by the greater sacredness of the conjugal (Mat 19:5, Mar 10:7). In His response to the question of the rich young ruler Jesus emphasizes the command to honour father and mother (Mat 19:19 etc.), but (Mat 19:29 etc.) loyalty to the truth as expressed in Himself is made to take precedence of all other ties. The reason for this insistence is obvious, and has been abundantly illustrated in the history of the world's benefactors.

Concerning our Lord's dealings with other mothers than His own, few details are given in the Gospels. It is noteworthy that the mother of Zebedee's children (Mat 20:20) goes unrebuked, as does the action of the mothers who brought their children to Him (Mar 10:13). His sympathy with motherhood may be inferred from these incidents, as also from the healing of the daughter of the Canaanitish woman (Mat 15:22, Mar 7:26). The same is implied in the pathetic phrase (Luk 23:28) uttered on the way to Calvary. In nothing is the uniqueness of Jesus more clearly seen than in this kind of reverence for womanhood, so unexpected in a religious teacher of His time (Joh 4:27). See Woman.

☩ Mount Of Olives

MOUNT OF OLIVES (τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν, Mat 21:1; Mat 24:3; Mat 26:30, Mar 13:3; Mar 14:26, Luk 19:37; Luk 22:39, Joh 8:1; and τὸ ὄρος τὸ καλούμενον ἐλαιῶν, Luk 19:29; Luk 21:37).—One of the universally accepted holy sites around Jerusalem. It is to-day known as Jebel et-Tûr (the mountain of the elevation or tower) by the Moslems, and as Jebel ez-Zeitûn (the mount of olives) by native Christians and, indeed, also by Moslems. By the Jews, besides the above mentioned, the name 'mountain of light' has also been given, from the fact that here used to be kindled the first beacon-fire to signalize through the land the appearance of each new moon.

The mount due east of Jerusalem forms the culminating height of a range which, separating itself from the central plateau near the village of Sha'phat, runs for two miles, first S. and then S. W., and terminates beyond the village of Silwân at the Wady en-Nâr. The beginning of the range has very generally been accepted as the Scopus (prospect) of Josephus, and the part running S. W.—Batn el-Hawa—considerably lower than the part east of the city and not higher than the Temple area itself, has by many been identified as the Mount of Offence. Although these have been described by some authorities as parts of the Mount of Olives, there seems no real reason for including them in the description, and to do so is confusing.

The natural boundaries of Olivet are to-day well defined by two ancient roads. To the N. a very ancient highway to Jericho, after traversing a deep bay* [Note: This open valley, in which to-day are many olives and also at least one ancient olive press, is an attractive site for Gethsemane (which see), though it must be admitted that tradition is all against it.] in the range, which from the city side seems to separate the range into two, crosses a low neck cutting off the northern part, now crowned by the house of Sir John Grey Hill, from the southern loftier mass—the true Mount of Olives. To the S. the road which runs to Bethany forms a convenient if somewhat arbitrary division, cutting off Olivet from the so-called 'Mount of Offence' and from other spurs to the south. To the W. the boundary is sufficiently plainly marked off by the deep valley of the Kidron, while to the E. [Note: Elohists.] there are indications (see Luk 19:29; Luk 24:50; cf. Act 1:12) for including within the limits the projecting spur on which Bethany stands. Probably the limits were never defined geographically, but the whole area was distinguished, as it is to some extent to-day, by its thick plantations of olives, figs, and palms,—hence the names Bethphage (house of figs) and Bethany (house of dates). This fertility, though no doubt most constantly observed by the city dwellers, to whom the beautiful slopes, then as they do to-day, would appeal most refreshingly as viewed from the dirty, squalid streets, must also have held out to the tired and thirsty travellers, ascending the dry and dusty wilderness from the Jordan to the city, an enchanting prospect of coolness and refreshment. For this alone it would appear only reasonable to include the sites of the villages on the eastern side, with their abundant gardens, as an essential part of the Mount. There can be little doubt that in the days of Christ the hill was thickly spread with verdure over parts which to-day are given up to churches, hovels, and extensive cemeteries.

Viewing the mountain thus, two principal summits and two subsidiary spurs may be described. The N. summit is that known as Karem es-Sayuâd (the vineyard of the hunter), and also as the Viri Galilæi; it reaches a height of 2723 feet above the Mediterranean, and is separated from the S. mass by a narrow neck of land traversed to-day by the new carriage road. As far back as 530 this hill is spoken of as Galilee, and in the Acts of Pilate (about 350) a mountain near Jerusalem called 'Galilee' is mentioned, It is said to have first received its name Γαλιλαία because the Galilaeans attending the feasts used to encamp there, or as Saewulf (1102) says, it 'was called Galilee because the Apostles, who were called Galilaeans, frequently visited there.'* [Note: Attempts have been made to harmonize the accounts of the appearances of Jesus after His resurrection by supposing that this was the place where He appointed His disciples to meet Him. A recent discussion of the subject by Lepsius will be found in Das Reich Christi, Nos. 7 and 8 (1902).] The S. summit, of practically equal height, is the traditional Mount of the Ascension, and has for some years been distinguished by a lofty tower erected by the Russians. Here, too, Constantine erected his Church of the Ascension in 316 on the site where now stands its successor (erected 1834-5) of the same name. Here also is the Church of the Creed and the Paternoster Church, the latter a modern building on the site of one of that name destroyed long ago. Scattered over the summit is a modern Moslem village—Kefr et-Tûr—which combines with the noisy conduct of its rapacious inhabitants in spoiling the quiet beauty and holy associations of this sacred spot.

A small spur running S. is sometimes known as the Hill of the Prophets, on account of the interesting old 'Tomb of the Prophets'—a sepulchre generally believed, until recently,† [Note: According to Father Vincent and M. Clermont-Ganneau, it is not Jewish, but belongs to the 4th or 5th cent. a.d. (see PEFSt, 1901, pp. 309-317).] to have been originally Jewish—which is situated there; and the other somewhat isolated spur to the S. E. [Note: Elohist.] , on which stands the wretched, half-ruined village of el-'Azarîyeh, on the site of Bethany, should, for reasons given, be included in the Mount.

Along the W. slopes facing the city lies the reputed Garden of Gethsemane (part, too, of the Mount, cf. Luk 22:39; see Gethsemane) of the Latins and its Greek rival; and a little higher up the hill to the S. the great Russian Church of St. Magdalene. The greater part of the slopes of the S. W. part of the hill is filled with a vast number of graves, those from the valley bottom till a little above the Bethany road being Jewish, while higher up are some Christian cemeteries. The Jews have a strong sentiment about being buried on this spot, the slopes of the 'Valley of Jehoshaphat' being traditionally, with them and with the Moslems, the scene of the resurrection and final judgment.

Traversing this side of the Mount are three steep paths, all probably ancient. The most evident and important is the N. one, which continues the line of the path from the St. Stephen's Gate and the Tomb of the Virgin. It runs along the depression between the two summits, and is the direct route for travellers crossing the Mount from or to Bethany. Too steep for riding, it is essentially the short cut for the pedestrian. The second path, still steeper, branches off from this just above the Garden of Gethsemane, and after passing the traditional scene of the lamentation of Jesus over the city, leads to-day to the Russian tower and buildings. It is the path of the modern pilgrim. The third, more gradual in ascent, starts from the Garden of Gethsemane and ascends the hill through Russian property in a S. direction, passing near the 'Tomb of the Prophets.' Whether the first or second of these lies most in the direction of our Lord's frequent passages from the city to the Mount of Olives and to Bethany, it is difficult to say, but it can hardly be supposed that He came by such a path on the morning of His triumphal entry into the city. The only likely course for the highroad of Roman times must have been in the general direction of the present Bethany and Jericho road; and, as Dean Stanley has suggested, the most natural site for the scene of the lamentation over the city is the point where this highroad crosses the S. W. shoulder of the Mount and the first full view of the city is obtained. A viaduct appears to have connected the Mount with the Temple hill, probably on the site of one of the two bridges which to-day span the dry torrent bed of the Kidron.

The Mount of Olives in the days of Christ must have presented rural fertility, verdure, and quiet very grateful to country visitors to the great metropolis; fresh mountain breeziness in contrast to the closeness and foulness of the city atmosphere, and a view of the beloved and sacred city in which all that was sordid was lost, and only the beauty and grandeur remained. This view is, when the historical associations are taken into consideration, probably the most fascinating in the Holy Land. It is seen at its best about the hour of sunset. In its essential details it is one on which the eyes of Christ must frequently have rested.

To the immediate W. is the Holy City, separated from the onlooker by the deep Valley of Jehoshaphat; just within the wall lies the 'Dome of the Rock' and the al-Aksa mosque, and in the open space of the great Temple area figures of people may be discerned moving about. Beyond this enclosure lie, pile above pile, the domed houses of the modern city, interspersed with the minarets, the synagogue domes, and the church towers of the followers of the three great Semitic religions: most prominent of all are the two domes and the massive tower which go to make up the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Far to the W. lie the battlements of the so-called Tower of David, and behind that, on the horizon, the W. mountains of Judaea shut off the distant sea. The roar of the city is deadened, but the fresh breeze carries the chiming of many bells, the blast of a military bugle or the roar of a salute from the barracks, reminding the onlooker that it is no dead city of the far past he is looking at. Somewhat to the N. the eye passes from the close-packed streets of the Moslem and Christian quarters, past the long line of the N. wall, to the many buildings of the newer Jerusalem, chiefly mean Jewish houses, but among them many handsome buildings like the great French Hospice, the Russian Cathedral, or the Abyssinian Church. Here lies all that is progressive and of promise for the days to be. Beyond again, against the sky line to the N., rises the outline of Nebi Samwîl crowning the height of Mizpeh.

Turning S. the spectator sees the bare slopes south of the city walls, once thickly covered with the houses of the poor, terminating in the two deep valleys of Kidron and Hinnom, while on the opposite slope some of the houses of Silwân may be distinguished. Far to the S. in a gap in the hills lies the convent of Mar Elias on the road to Bethlehem; and to its left a crater-shaped hill—the Herodium—the burial-place of Herod the Great.

As the eye passes gradually E. [Note: Elohist.] over the wilderness of Judaea, it is caught by the still beauty of the Dead Sea lying nearly 4000 feet below, but in the clear atmosphere looking very near, while behind lies the long level line of the beautiful hills of Moab. More in the foreground a few houses of Bethany appear, and behind them the village of Abu Dîs—inhabited by the hereditary robbers of the Jericho road. Northward of the great lake, beyond a vista of tumbled hills and parched valleys, lies the Jordan Valley, through the centre of which may be traced, by a serpentine line of green, the course of the famous river itself. Eastward of this the line of Moab is continued N. as the mountains of Gilead, with their one distinct summit—Jebel Ôsha—almost directly E. [Note: Elohist.] of the onlooker.

Gospel incidents connected with the Mount of Olives.—Although, with the single exception of Joh 8:1, all the incidents expressly connected with the Mount of Olives belong to the Passion week, there can be no doubt (Luk 21:37) that this quiet spot was one beloved and frequented by the Master. Here He withdrew from the city for rest and meditation (Joh 8:1) and for prayer (Mat 26:30 etc). Once we read of His approach to the Mount from the Eastern side ‘unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives’ (Mar 11:1 || Mat 21:1 || Luk 19:29). Over a part of the Mount He must have made. His triumphal progress to the city (Matthew 21, Mark 11, Luke 19), and on this road He wept over Jerusalem (Luk 19:40-44). During the whole of that week ‘in the daytime he was teaching in the temple; and at night he went out and abode in the Mount that is called of Olives’ (Luk 21:37)—the special locality on the Mount being Bethany (Mat 21:17, Mar 11:11). Crossing over from Bethany, Jesus illustrated His teaching by the sign of the withering of the barren fig-tree (Mat 21:18-19 || Mar 11:12-14; Mar 11:20-22), and on the slopes of this hill, with the doomed city spread out before them, Christ delivered to His disciples His wonderful eschatological discourse (Mat 24:3 f. || Mar 13:3 f.). Then here, in the Garden of Gethsemane, occurred the Agony, the Betrayal, and the Arrest (Mat 26:36-56, Mar 14:26-52, Luk 22:39-53, Joh 18:1-12). Lastly, on the Mount, not on the summit where tradition places it, but near Bethany, occurred the Ascension (Luk 24:50-52, Act 1:12).

To these incidents where the Mount of Olives is expressly mentioned may be added the scene in the house of Martha and Mary (Luk_10:38-42), the raising of Lazarus (John 11), and the feast at the house of Simon (Mat_26:6-13, Mar_14:3-9, Joh_12:1-19); for, as has been shown, Bethany was certainly a part of the Mount of Olives.

☞ Mount, Mountain

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN (ὄρος).—Mountains figure often in the narratives of Christ's life. This is natural, considering the highly mountainous character of the country in which He lived. At no point in His journeyings were the mountains out of sight; and if He was not actually on or among them, they were never a great way off.

The Mount of Olives (wh. see) alone is named in the Gospels—the mountain that rises beyond the kidron valley, east of Jerusalem, from the S. E. slope of which Bethany looks out over the wilderness. In two passages we see from the context which mountains are referred to. In Mat_21:21 'to this mountain' points clearly to Olivet, on which Jesus and His disciples stood, viewing the cursed and withered fig-tree. In Joh_4:20 'this mountain' can be no other than Gerizim, on whose rocky summit, amid the ruins of ancient splendour, the remnant of Samaritans still annually chant their weird service at the feast of the Passover. In other places, such as Mat_24:16, 'mountain' must be taken generally as meaning the wilder and more inaccessible parts, forming natural places of refuge, Judaea itself being almost entirely mountainous (cf. Rev_6:15). So also with the haunts of the demoniac (Mar_5:5). The 'mountain' on (Luk_8:32) or near (Mar_5:11) which the swine were feeding must have been the western edge of the great plateau which stretches from the desert to the lip of the Ghôr, and drops a distance of some 2000 feet to the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee. The place intended is probably a little north of the old fortress of Gamala, where the foot of the swift slope runs almost to the water.

Perhaps only men familiar with the steep cliffs and beetling crags of Palestinian mountains would think of calling in their terror upon the mountains to fall and cover them (Luk 23:30).

Regarding the position of three mountains there has been much discussion—the mountain of the Temptation (Mat 4:8, Luk 4:5), the Mount of Beatitudes (Mat 5:1), and the Mount of Transfiguration (Mat 17:1 etc.).

The evidence we possess is mainly negative, tending to show that traditional identifications are impossible. As to the first, if any actual height is intended, Jebel Kuruntul, with its cave-fretted brows frowning over Jericho, and the district to the south, are bleak and inhospitable enough, and there certainly the sojourner by night would be ‘with the wild beasts’ (Mar 1:13) But there is no height at all suggesting the description ‘an exceeding high mountain.’

The tradition identifying Karn Hattin with the scene of the Sermon on the Mount dates only from Crusading times. To the traveller journeying towards Tiberias from Nazareth or Tabor, the double-peaked hill seems easy of approach. But from any part of the seashore the ascent is steep, and from Gennesaret, where our Lord was at work, the way, as the present writer knows from much experience, is both long and toilsome. With so many heights near the plain, quite suitable for the Master’s purpose, the necessity for this difficult journey is not apparent. ‘Further, certain traces of ancient buildings lend colour to the idea that, in our Lord’s time, the hill may have been occupied.

The Roman and Greek Churches still maintain the traditional identification of Mount Tabor with the scene of the Transfiguration, and, in accordance with their separate calendars, that august event is annually commemorated there. It must be remembered, however, that they have much valuable property on the mountain—the great monasteries—which an admission of error would render worthless, while the contributions received from streams of pilgrims would be diverted. Most modern students of the question locate the Transfiguration on Mount Hermon; if not on the summit itself, on one of the lower spurs. This would satisfy the requirements of the narrative; whereas the journey south to Tabor, through Galilee, and back again to Capernaum, within the time specified, while possible, is highly improbable. The present writer spent some weeks in the summer of 1891 on the top of Tabor, and was led to emphatic agreement with the opinion that the presence of a town or fortress on the mountain in the days of Christ makes the traditional identification utterly impossible. See art. Transfiguration.

On a mountain in Galilee the risen Jesus gave His disciples their great commission (Mat 28:16). The circumstances suggest some height familiar to all, not far from the scenes of the Galilaean ministry, commanding a wide prospect. Certain identification is, of course, impossible, but these conditions are well fulfilled by Jebel Kan'ân, a bold headland projecting southward from the great bulk of Naphtali. The spacious view ranges from Carmel and the Mediterranean to the eastern ridges of Bashan, and from snowy Hermon to the dim mountains guarding the Dead Sea. In the great hollow below sleep the blue waters of Galilee, the white-sailed fishing boats recalling imperishable memories.

In hours of devotion Jesus seemed to long for the solitude and stillness to be found only on lonely heights by night (Mat 14:23, Mar 6:46, Luk 6:12; Luk 9:28, Joh 6:15). From a mountain at last He passed into the invisible (Luk 24:50, Act 1:9; Act 1:12). See also art. Hill.

☞ Mourning

MOURNING.—An expression of grief for death or disaster. See also artt. Lamentation and Rending of Garments. Mourning is associated in the Gospels (1) with 'the appearance of the sign of the Son of Man,' Mat 24:30; (2) with the removal of the visible presence of the Saviour, Mat 9:15; (3) with the death of friends. It is also one of the conditions mentioned in the Beatitudes as bearing a special blessing (Mat 5:4, but cf. Luk 6:21). The laws of mourning were very minute. The general time of mourning was seven days, during which the mourner was forbidden to work, wash, anoint himself, or wear his shoes. This last provision might, however, be evaded by putting earth or ashes into his boots. For seven days the mourner might not read in the Law, the Prophets, or the Talmud, because it was a 'joy' to do so; but a teacher could teach others through an interpreter. The mourner was allowed during this period to read only the books of Job, Jeremiah, Lamentations, and the אבילות הלכות (Laws of Mourning). He had to sit away from his dead, with his head tied up, and on the first day he might not wear his phylacteries. He was forbidden to shave his head or his neck, or do anything which might be considered to be for his comfort. He could take no part in rejoicings, and the rent in his garments was to be seen for thirty days. Even a poor man, or one who lived on charity, was forbidden to work for three days;

but after that time, he might do work secretly, for his maintenance, or his wife might spin in his house. Travelling with goods was forbidden, and no business even at the risk of loss could be transacted by himself or his family or his servants. It was allowable, however, to have a business carried on, if he assigned it to another before the departure of the soul. The mourner was allowed to eat only in his own house; he might eat no flesh and drink no wine; nor could he ask blessing before or after food. Extra-Talmudical regulations enjoined that the mourner should sit on the floor and take his food from a chair instead of a table, and, as is still the custom, that he should eat eggs dipped in ashes with salt. He might not leave town for thirty days; and in the case of mourning for a parent he might not go out of town for the first year, till his friends told him to do so. After the death of a wife, a widower might not marry for a year (i.e. till after three feasts had passed); but if his wife had died childless, or if she had left young children, he might marry after seven days. A mourner being 'free' must attend the synagogue; when he appeared, the congregation faced him as he entered, and said: אבל מינחם ברוך 'Blessed is He that comforteth the mourner.' Immediately on a death, all water in the house and in three houses on either side was emptied out, because of the belief that the Angel of Death procured death by means of a knife which he washed in water close at hand. Between death and burial the mourner was free from all the Law, because he was supposed to be beside himself with grief. The following is the prescribed prayer before meat to be used in the house of the mourner after burial:—

'Blessed art thou, O God our Lord, King of the universe, God of our Fathers, our Creator, our Redeemer, our Sanctifier, the Holy One of Jacob, the King of Life, who art good and doest good; the God of truth, the righteous Judge who judgest in righteousness, who takest the soul in judgment, and rulest alone in the universe, who doest in it according to His will, and all His ways are in Judgment, and we are His people and His servants, and in everything we are bound to praise Him and to bless Him, who shields all the calamities of Israel and will shield us in this calamity, and from this mourning will bring us to life and peace. Comfort, O God our Lord, all the mourners of Jerusalem, and all the mourners that mourn in our sorrow. Comfort them in their mourning, and make them rejoice in their agony as a man is comforted by his mother. Blessed art Thou, O God, the Comforter of Zion, and that buildest again Jerusalem' (Jewish prayer-books from רעה יודה).

The practice of hiring mourners was common with such as could afford it, and, as in the story of Jairus' daughter, these hired mourners used flutes to increase the sounds of woe. The apostasy of a member of the family was the occasion of mourning as for the dead, and a blasphemy spoken in the presence of the high priest was also a reason for a demonstration of mourning. ☞ Mouth

MOUTH (Mat_4:4; Mat_12:34; Mat_15:11; Mat_18:16; Mat_21:16, and Luk_1:70).—In conformity with Oriental usage, ‘mouth,’ considered as the organ of speech, is used in the NT, as in the OT, in the sense of ‘language,’ ‘utterance,’ etc.—a notable instance of the primitive employment of the concrete for the abstract. Indeed, among the ancient Hebrews ‘mouth’ was even personified, e.g. in such expressions as ‘The mouth of the Lord has spoken it,’ etc.—a usage that helped not a little to prepare the Jewish mind at last to apprehend the meaning of the Word made flesh. Most passages of the Gospels where ‘mouth’ is found are quotations from the OT (LXX Septuagint), e.g. ‘Every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God’ (διὰ στόματος θεοῦ, Deu_8:3); ‘in the mouth of two or three witnesses’ (ἐπὶ στόματος, Deu_17:6; Deu_19:15); ‘out of the mouth of babes and sucklings’ (ἐκ στόμ., Psa_8:2 etc.); cf. Zacharias’ words, Luk_1:70 ‘as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets’ (διὰ στόματος); and Jesus’ words to His disciples, ‘I will give you a mouth (στόμα) and wisdom’ (Luk_21:15).

☞ Multitude

MULTITUDE.—This word is used in Authorized and Revised Versions to translate ὄχλος and πλῆθος.

(1) ὄχλος is defined by Grimm-Thayer as ‘a casual collection of people, a multitude of men who have flocked together in some place, a throng.’ The plural οἱ ὄχλοι, which often occurs in Mt. and Lk., is found twice in Mk., viz mark. Mar_6:33 (Textus Receptus; all the best Manuscripts omit] and Mar_10:2 without the article; once only in Jn. (Joh_7:12 where ⲛD Vulgate give sing.), meaning probably the various groups or companies (cf. Luk_2:44) which had come up to the feast. In Authorized Version it is rendered ‘multitude’ and frequently ‘people,’ also ‘press’ (Mar 2:4; Mar 5:27; Mar 5:30, Luk 8:19; Luk 19:3) and ‘company’ (Luk 5:29; Luk 6:17; Luk 9:38 (but ‘people’ in Luk 9:37] Luk 12:13, Joh 6:5). Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 usually gives ‘multitude,’ but in some passages prefers ‘crowd,’ from A.S. crúdan, ‘to push,’ ‘throng, apparently in cases where the ὄχλος would cause inconvenient pressure, cf. Mar 3:9 (διὰ τὸν ὄχλον ἵνα μὴ θλίβωσιν αὐτόν), also Mat 9:23, Mar 2:4; Mar 5:27; Mar 5:30, Luk 8:19; Luk 19:3; yet in Mar 5:31 where σὺνθλίβοντα is used of ὄχλον (translation ‘crowd’ in the previous verse), and in Luk 5:1 where the ὄχλος is described as pressing upon Him (ἐπικειῖσθαι), Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 rather inconsistently uses ‘multitude.’ The following phrases may be noted—(a) ὄχλος ἰκανός, which Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 in Mar 10:46 translates ‘great multitude’ (Authorized Version a ‘great number of people’), yet in Luk 7:12 renders, as Authorized Version, ‘much people,’ probably because in the preceding verse ‘great multitude’ is used for a different collection of persons; (b) ὁ πολλὺς ὄχλος or ὁ ὄχλος πολλὺς forming almost a composite term ‘the common people’ (Mar 12:37, Joh 12:9; Joh 12:12 (Revised Version margin)); (c) ὁ σὺν εἰστοὶ ὄχλος, Mat 21:8 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘the most part of the multitude,’ Authorized Version ‘a very great multitude,’ Vulgate plurima turba; in Mar 4:1 ὄχλος πλείστος is read by $\aleph B$, al.; (d) τῶν μυριάδων τοῦ ὄχλου, Luk 12:1 ‘the many thousands of the multitude’ (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), ‘an innumerable multitude of people’ (Authorized Version), multis turbis (Vulgate); this ὄχλος appears to be the largest mentioned in the Gospels, and the words ‘in the meantime’ (ἐν οἷς) at the beginning of the verse suggest that it was drawn together by the conflict between Christ and His adversaries which is narrated in the previous chapter.

(2) πλῆθος occurs 12 times in the Gospels, of which 8 are in Lk. (Luk 1:10; Luk 2:13; Luk 5:6; Luk 6:17; Luk 8:37; Luk 19:37; Luk 23:1; Luk 23:27), 2 in Mk. (Mar 3:7-8), and 2 in Jn. (Joh 5:3; Joh 21:6); in only two cases is it used otherwise than of a collection of persons (Luk 5:6, Joh 21:6 a ‘multitude of fishes’). Authorized Version renders the word by ‘multitude’ in all passages except Luk 23:27 where it gives ‘company.’ There is more variety in Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 which employs ‘multitude’ in 9 places, but also ‘company’ (Luk 23:1), ‘number of the people’ (Luk 6:17), and ‘people’ in Luk 8:37, where Humphry (Commentary on the Revised Version) says it would not be in accordance with English idiom to say ‘the whole multitude of the country’; yet the latter is the translation of Authorized Version, which does not usually err in this respect. ‘People’ is elsewhere almost invariably reserved by Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 to translation λαός. All three Gr. words occur in Luk 6:17 ὄχλος πολλὸς μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ καὶ πλῆθος πολλὸ τοῦ λαοῦ (Authorized Version ‘the company of his disciples and a great multitude of people,’ Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘a great multitude of his disciples and a great number of the people’).

The multitude occupies a distinct position in the Gospels; those of whom it was composed are marked off from the disciples (cf. Mar 8:34, Luk 9:16; Luk 9:18, and Mat 23:1, where the disciples appear round Jesus in the foreground, the multitude farther off, and the Pharisees in the background). They are also distinguished from the ruling classes who despised them and held them in contempt, regarding them as accursed through their ignorance of the Law (Joh 7:49), and a prey to any designing teacher (Joh 7:12; Joh 7:47 f.). Thus the ‘multitude’ answers to ‘am hâ’ârcz, ‘people of the land,’ ‘common persons,’ which was the name given to those who were not hăbçrîm, i.e. not strict observers of the Law (see Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 743^a, 826). Hillel used to say, ‘No brutish man is sin-fearing, nor is one of the people of the land pious,’ and Rabbinical writers used such contemptuous expressions as ‘the ignorant is impious; only the learned shall have part in the resurrection’ (Godet on Joh 7:49). Yet it was felt that the multitude would be formidable from its very numbers if it were only united under a leader in one common purpose. Accordingly we read that Herod was restrained from putting John the Baptist to death since he feared the multitude, because they counted him as a prophet (Mat 14:5). For the same reason the chief priests and elders dared not say that John’s baptism was of men (Mat 21:26). This same fear prevented the chief priests and the Pharisees from laying hold on Jesus (Mat 21:46); they decided not to arrest Him on the feast day (Mar 14:2), ‘lest haply there shall be a tumult of the people’ (λαοῦ, note the future ἔσται, which shows their positive expectation of trouble); and they arranged with Judas for His betrayal ‘in the absence of the multitude’ ((Revised Version margin) ‘without tumult,’ ἄτερο ὄχλου, Luk 22:6; cf. Luk 19:47 f.). The multitude, however, at ordinary times was greatly under the influence of their rulers, looking up to them as guides in religious matters, cf. Joh 7:12-13 ‘there was much murmuring among the multitudes concerning him: some said, He is a good man; others said, Not so, but he leadeth the multitude astray. Howbeit no man spake openly of him for fear of the Jews.’ This whole chapter is important as showing the relations between the ruling classes and the multitude, and also the discussions between different sections of the latter as to the claims of Jesus, and the gradual development into belief or disbelief (see especially Joh 7:25-27; Joh 7:31; Joh 7:40-44 and art. Murmuring). Here also perhaps may be noted Luk 12:1. The violent scene of ch. 11 ‘had found its echo outside; a considerable crowd had flocked together. Excited by the animosity of their chiefs, the multitude showed a disposition hostile to Jesus and His disciples. Jesus feels the need of turning to His own, and giving them, in presence of all, those encouragements which their situation demands' (Godet). The power of the same influence is seen in the account of the Trial, cf. Mat 27:20 'the chief priests and the elders persuaded the multitudes that they should ask for Barabbas and destroy Jesus'—words which suggest that if left to themselves they might have listened to Pilate's proposal, but their leaders turned the scale against Jesus. It must be remembered that this multitude which cried for His blood was mainly, if not entirely, composed of Jews of Jerusalem. It was therefore quite distinct from the multitude which had accompanied Jesus at His triumphal entry, and which largely consisted of pilgrims from Galilee coming to the feast. For the meeting of the two multitudes see Mat 21:10-11, and note how the answer of Mat 21:11 is already greatly modified from the Hosanna cries of Mat 21:9. Accordingly the favourite use of these incidents as illustrations of the proverbial fickleness of a crowd—shouting Hosanna and waving palm branches one day, and crying 'Crucify him' the next—though attractive, is without justification.

Jesus regarded with deep pity the multitudes who came to Him. We read that on one occasion He had compassion on them because they were ἐσκυλμένοι καὶ ἐρριμμένοι, as sheep not having a shepherd. (Mat 9:36).

If these words primarily describe the physical aspect of those who came to Him on this occasion, then ἐσκυλμένοι, which properly means 'flayed,' 'mangled,' will signify here 'distressed and wearied by long traveling'; and ἐρριμμένοι, 'prostrated by fatigue, lying down like tired sheep' (cf. Vulgate iacentes). Thus they will express mute misery, and a half unconscious appeal to the Divine compassion, and they are so taken by Meyer, and Bruce in Expos, Gr. Testament. But if, as seems more likely, the expressions are mainly figurative, ἐσκυλμένοι will mean 'hunted and distressed by spiritual foes,' harassed by the tyranny of the scribes and Pharisees with their 'heavy burdens' (cf. Mat 23:4); and ἐρριμμένοι, 'scattered,' without true spiritual shepherds, John the Baptist being imprisoned and their regular teachers shamefully neglecting their duties. This agrees better with the Lord's remark in v. 37 that 'the labourers are few,' and with the commission of the Twelve immediately following in ch. 10, as the result of His compassion; so Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'distressed and scattered'; Authorized Version 'they fainted,' following Textus Receptus, which reads ἐκλελυμένοι for ἐσκυλμένοι, with very little MS support.

On other occasions His compassion for the multitude led Him to heal their sick (Mat 14:14), and to feed the 4000 (Mat 15:32, Mar 8:2).

The astonishment and wonder with which the multitude regarded Jesus is a very marked feature in the Gospels, especially in Mk. and Lk. (see art. Attributes of Christ, ii. 9). These feelings were excited by the manner and substance of His teaching (Mat 7:28; Mat 22:33, Mar 1:22, Luk 4:32), by His words of grace (Luk 4:22), and also by His mighty works (Mat 9:8; Mat 9:33; Mat 15:31, Mar 2:12; Mar 5:20; Mar 7:37, Luk 4:36; Luk 5:26; Luk 7:16; Luk 9:43; Luk 11:14). The people never became so familiar with His miracles as to take them as a matter of course. It is noted that they received His words and acts with gladness (cf. Mar 12:37 and Luk 13:17, where there is a contrast to the feeling of His adversaries who 'were ashamed'). They greatly enjoyed the discomfiture of His enemies when He easily replied to their subtle questions and escaped their cleverly laid snares. Jesus was very popular with the ordinary people; it is frequently recorded that great multitudes followed Him (cf. Mat 4:25; Mat 8:1; Mat 12:15; Mat 19:2). At other times we read that, attracted by His teaching and His miracles, 'all the city was gathered together at the door' (Mar 1:33); 'they came from every quarter' (Mar 1:45); their attendance was so persistent that Jesus and the disciples 'could not so much as eat bread' (Mar 3:20); it was necessary to address them from the boat (Mat 13:2); they brought their sick and maimed to Him (Mat 15:31, Mar 1:32); they pressed upon Him and heard the word of God (Luk 5:1); and their rapt attention to His preaching, even during the last days at Jerusalem, is described by St. Luke (Luk 19:48) in emphatic language, 'the people all hung upon him, listening' (ἐξεκρέματο αὐτοῦ ἀκούων). The feeding of the 5000 produced such an effect that they were 'about to come and take him by force to make him king' (Joh 6:15), proclaiming Him the Son of David (cf. Mat 12:23; Mat 21:9; Mat 21:15); and His enemies bore striking testimony to His popularity when they said, 'Lo, the world is gone after him' (Joh 12:19). Even in the region of Caesarea Philippi, whither He had gone for retirement, we are surprised to find mention of a multitude, which may indeed have consisted mainly of Gentiles (Mar 8:34). Edersherm (LT [Note: T Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah [Edersheim].] ii. 45 f.) thinks there is a previous mention of a non-Israelite multitude in Mat 15:31 'the multitude wondered ... and they glorified the God of Israel' (but see Alford's note). 'By the reiteration of this word we are constantly reminded that our Lord, wherever He went, drew about Him eager crowds of the common people, who sometimes thronged and pressed upon Him too closely, sometimes followed Him, far from their own homes, and always heard Him gladly' (Humphry, Commentary on the Revised Version, on Mat 7:28).

Christ, however, was not deceived as to the depth of these impressions; He did not court their applause or seek their favour. On the contrary, it is recorded that on several occasions He withdrew Himself from the multitude (cf. Mat 8:18, Joh 6:15), and the expression ἀφείλς τοὺς ὄχλους, used in Mat 13:36, Mar 4:36, means 'leaving the multitude' (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), not 'sending them away'

(Authorized Version). Knowing that such popularity would not further the Kingdom of God, and would lead afterwards to serious disappointment, He sought at times to repress it, and showed the danger and loss and self-sacrifice involved in being His disciples; cf. His teaching as to the necessity of being willing to forsake everything (Luk 14:25 f.). The parables of Matthew 13 give a very sober estimate of the value of the professions of the multitude. Yet His popularity with the simple-hearted people of Galilee continued until the end, as was shown at His triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

Certain sections of Christ's teaching were specially addressed to the multitude, viz. the discourse about defilement (Mat 15:10 f., Mar 7:14 f. where, turning from the Pharisees and the scribes, 'he called to him the multitude, and said unto them, Hear and understand'; ἐκείνους μὲν ἐπιστομίσας καὶ καταισχίνας ἀφήκεν ὡς ἀνιάτους· τρέπει δὲ τὸν λόγον πρὸς τὸν ὄχλον ὡς ἀξιολογώτερον, Euthym.); the first three parables of the Kingdom (Matthew 13); the passage showing the need of renunciation and of counting the cost (Luk 14:25 f. ||); the section dealing with the Bread of Life (Joh 6:24 f.); the questions concerning John the Baptist, and the statement as to his character and mission (Mat 11:7 f.); and the passage dealing with the scribes and Pharisees (Mat 23:1 f.), which was spoken to the multitudes and to His disciples; cf. also Mar 2:13. See also Crowd.

☒ Murder

MURDER.—The observance of the Sixth Commandment, as of the rest, is taken for granted in the Christian system (Mat 19:18, Mar 10:19, Luk 18:20). It concerns those who are outside of the society founded by Jesus. Thus the guilt of murder is predicated of Barabbas (Mar 15:7, Luk 23:19; Luk 23:25, Joh 18:40 'robber'), and of the unwilling guests (Mat 22:7), and Satan is designated the original ἀνθρωποκτόνος (Joh 8:44). In the doctrine of Jesus, the crimes of the Mosaic codes are traced to their source in the heart (Mat 15:19, Mar 7:21), and murder to the passion of anger. He who is angry with his brother, or who says to him 'Raca,' or 'Thou fool,' is accounted guilty of murder (Mat 5:22). With this saying of Jesus may be compared one of Mohammed, 'Whosoever shall say to his brother, Thou unbeliever, one of the two shall suffer as an unbeliever.’ It is also interesting to note that the Arabic verb katala means both to kill and to curse (Koran, lxxx. 16). In the Koran murder is atoned for by retaliation (cf. Mat 5:38), a free man dying for a free, a slave for a slave; or the relatives of the slain may accept a money payment, which in practice does not exceed £500 (Koran, ii. 173; Lane’s Arabian Nights, vi. 8). The Jewish Rabbis distinguished between manslaughter and murder (Exo 21:13-14): only in the latter case did capital punishment follow (Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 375 f.; W. R. Smith, *RS [Note: S Religion of the Semites.]*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] p. 420). Self-murder is rare among Semitic peoples, though cases do occur (Mat 27:5, Act 1:18; Josephus BJ iii. viii. 5).

☞Murmur, Murmuring

MURMUR, MURMURING (Lat. murmur, a reduplication of an imitative syllable mur; cf. Gr. μορμύρω).—A low continuous sound, as of a stream or of bees, hence a whispering, something said in a low muttering voice. The verb represents:—

(1) γογγύζω, to murmur, say in a low tone; according to Pollux and Phavorinus, it was used of the cooing of doves, like τονθούζω and τονθορούζω of the more elegant Greek writers. It is found in the Gospels with the accusative of the thing said (Joh 7:32), with περί τινος (Joh 6:41; Joh 6:61; Joh 7:32), κατά τινος (Mat 20:11), σρός τινα (Luk 5:30), and μετ’ ἀλλήλων (Joh 6:43). (2) διαγογγύζω only in Lk. (Luk 15:2; Luk 19:7), where διά seems to give the idea of a general pervasive murmuring through the whole assembly, or perhaps it means alternative murmuring ‘among one another,’ certandi significationem addit’ (Hermann). (3) ἐμβριμᾶσθαι is used in one passage (Mar 14:5) of the disciples murmuring against Mary; it implies that they were moved with indignation. The noun γογγυσμός occurs only once in the Gospels (Joh 7:12); it as well as γογγύζω and διαγογγύζω are frequently used in LXX Septuagint of Israel in the wilderness.

The word ‘murmur’ appears in itself to have a neutral meaning, the context deciding whether it expresses favour, doubt, or hostility; hence in several cases ‘muttering’ or ‘whispering’ might be a better rendering. For its use in a friendly sense see Joh 7:31-32, where the murmuring was that of persons who believed on Jesus, and who said, ‘When the Christ shall come, will he do more signs than those which this man hath done?’—a dangerous omen to the Pharisees. The noun γογγυσμός, as used in Joh 7:12, includes both favour and hostility: ‘There was much murmuring among the multitudes concerning him; some said, He is a good man; others said, Not so, but he leadeth the multitude astray.’ It implies a discussion low and whispered, not free and open; it was hardly safe to speak out plainly, for they feared the Jews (cf. Joh 7:40-41) The development of such differences of opinion is recorded in Joh 6:52 ‘they strove (ἐμάχοντο) one with another’; Joh 7:43 ‘there arose a division (σχίσμα) in the multitude because of him’; cf. also Joh 9:16, Joh 10:19, Joh 11:45-46. The sense of doubt and dissatisfaction predominates in Joh 6:41; Joh 6:43, as also in Joh 6:61 ‘his disciples murmured at this,’ namely, at the ‘hard saying.’ There is some uncertainty as to what precisely is here meant: whether the new teaching of life through death (Westcott); the paradoxical nature of the words just spoken by Jesus, the need of eating His flesh and drinking His blood (Godet); His claim to have come down from heaven (Lampe and others); the apparent pride with which He connected the salvation of the world with His own Person (Tholuck, Hengstenberg); or the bloody death of the Messiah (de Wette, Meyer). Dissatisfaction is seen highly intensified in Luk 5:30; Luk 15:2, where the Pharisees and the scribes murmured because He ate with publicans and sinners. Compare also Luk 19:7, where all, apparently even the Twelve, shared in it with a sense of outrage done to propriety; Edersheim calls it a murmur of disappointment and anger; but perhaps Bengel is more correct, ‘ex haesitatione potius quod ad majoreni partem attinet quam cum indignatione.’ Hostile murmuring is found in the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mat 20:11), and in the story of the Anointing in the house of Simon the leper (Mar 14:5).

Music

MUSIC.—The Jews cultivated music from the earliest times, perhaps the more because sculpture and painting were practically forbidden (Exo 20:4). It gave expression to all their emotions, and found a place in all the chief events of public and private life (cf. OT, passim).

1. References in the Gospels are few and indirect, (a) Song: Mat 26:30 ||, Luk 15:25 (?) seem to be the only instances. (b) Instruments: Mat 9:23; Mat 11:17 || pipe (wh. see) or flute (see Flute-players); Mat 24:31 trumpet (wh. see), probably the curved trumpet as in Exo 19:16. In Dan 3:5; Dan 3:15 (LXX Septuagint) συμφωνία is usually taken to mean a bagpipe; but such a meaning in Luk 15:25 is unlikely. It is in the OT that the various national instruments appear, of which the following are the principal types:—(1) Stringed: lyre (Authorized and Revised Versions ‘harp’), harp (Authorized and Revised Versions variously ‘psaltery,’ ‘viol,’ ‘lute’); (2) wind: pipe, of wood; curved trumpet, of horn or (in later times) of metal; straight trumpet, of silver; (3) percussion: hand-drum (Authorized and Revised Versions ‘tabret,’ ‘timbrel’) of skin; cymbals (Authorized and Revised Versions once [Zec 14:20] ‘bells’) of brass, used, especially the precentor as it appears from 1Ch 16:5, no doubt for rhythmical purposes. Several others are mentioned, but some are foreign, and the nature of the rest is unknown.

2. The general character of Jewish music in the time of Christ is wholly a matter of inference. There were no theoretical writers, as among the Greeks; of their instruments sculpture portrays the silver trumpet alone; and, notation not having been invented, specimens of their music contemporaneously committed to writing do not exist. Yet within definable limits inference amounts to certainty, (a) As to rhythmical structure, all ancient music was of the free form, in contrast to the measured form of modern music: ‘time,’ in our sense, was then unknown. (b) The variety and combination of instruments employed, together with the musical arrangements generally (e.g. 1Ch 15:16-22), imply at least some definite system whereby the intervals of melodic progression were regulated. The existence of scales or modes, of some sort, cannot therefore be questioned, (c) They seem to have been in accord with those in use at Babylon (Psa 137:1-3). Moreover, habitual contact with Greek influences in Alexandria and elsewhere probably produced (or at least goes to prove) an affinity with the Greek modes. (d) The ‘traditional melodies’ now used in Jewish synagogues are, in some cases, similar in kind to the music that we may infer to have existed in the time of Christ. Tradition might preserve melodies down to the invention of notation, much as it preserved the vowel-system down to the invention of ‘points.’ But the Jews themselves seem to have discontinued the Temple melodies after its destruction; so that the synagogue melodies, whatever their origin, would not be those of the Temple. It may be supposed that Jewish Christians imported some of their Temple melodies into the Christian Church. Perhaps it was they who introduced antiphonal singing: and even Greek liturgies are held to have been largely ‘affected by Mosaic rites’ (Swainson, Gr. Liturgies). It is therefore not impossible that a Jewish element still survives in some of the ancient ecclesiastical plainsong. But no one can say for certain that this is so, or identify any particular instance.

Literature.—Chappell, History of Music; Stainer, The Music of the Bible; Edersheim, The Temple, etc.; art. ‘Music’ in Hasting’s Dictionary of the Bible; Helmore, Plainsong, etc. The traditional Jewish melodies can be seen in E. [Note: Elohists.] Pauer’s Hebrew Melodies (Augener), and in the collection of music for the synagogue edited by Cohen and Davis.

☒ Mustard

MUSTARD.—In a simile the word (σινάπι) occurs in Mat_13:31, Mar_4:31, Luk_13:19; as a bold metaphor, in Mat_17:20, Luk_17:6. It used to be strongly contended that the mustard referred to is not any of the familiar wild species of the Holy Land (such as the Sinapis nigra), but an arboreal plant (Salvadora persica) found in the extreme south or sub-tropical part of Palestine, and said to be called among the Arabs by the same name (Khardal) as mustard. This theory, however, may now be said to be exploded (cf. Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible, art. 'Mustard'). The passages concerned clearly suggest, not a perennial shrub, but an annual sown among and comparable with other garden herbs; and if the expression 'tree' be a difficulty ('great' in Luk_13:19 is of weak authority, cf. Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), it is to be remembered that, when Jesus spoke to the multitude, it was in popular language. He meant that the tiny seed became to all intents a tree. An accurate botanist (Dr. Hooker) found the black mustard on the banks of the Jordan 'ten feet high, drawn up amongst bushes, etc., and not thicker than whipcord.' And Dr. Thomson says that he has seen it 'on the rich plain of Akkâr as tall as the horse and his rider' (LB [Note: The Land and the Book.], p. 414).

Equally prosaic is the criticism that the mustard is not 'the least of all seeds' (Mt.), or 'less than all the seeds that be in the earth,' i.e. annuals (Mk.). Enough, as before, that the language is not absolute and scientific. The mustard was probably the smallest a gardener ordinarily sowed. But the fact is, the saying is proverbial (found as such in the Talmud and in the Koran), and in good proverbs there is often the suppressed note of poetic licence (cf. the Semitic form of poetry in the introductory verse of the passage Mar_4:30, Luk_13:18). The broad effect of the image is plain, that out of a speck of seed there was to come in due course marvellously great growth—a plant towering among the pulse and pot-herbs like a Titan, and with branching sprays on which the birds of the air find shelter and rest.

The Arabs are given to special cultivation of mustard as a condiment (Hooker), and there is clearly emphasis on the statement that it was 'a grain, (not a handful) which was taken 'by a man' (Mt. and Lk.) and cast 'into his own garden.' (Luk_13:19 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885)—the garden ('field' in Mat_13:31) being a place where, as observation attests, wild plants attain more than the normal size. Elsewhere this is the thought of Jesus—that God's Kingdom is taken from the world and developed on lines of its own (cf. the fig-tree favoured by being put in the choice and carefully protected place usually devoted to vines, Luk_13:6).

The essential point in the application is not any seeming rapidity of growth; rather it is the striking contrast between the initial insignificance and the amply beneficent result. Jesus, the spokesman of the coming Kingdom, was derided in His teaching, persecuted in His Person, doomed to violence and degradation; but He felt, and knew, and here affirms that the cause was supremely great, and that its greatness should be manifested to the world.

The remaining passages (Mat 17:20 and Luk 17:6) describe the wonder-working power of faith, which, within its own sphere, produces miraculous results (cf. art. Faith in vol. i. p. 569).

☞ Myrrh

MYRRH (σμύρνα, Mat 2:11, Joh 19:39).—A gum-resin, the exudation of a shrub (Balsamodendron myrrha) and some other allied species of shrubs growing in the dry regions of Arabia, in Somaliland, and in certain districts bordering on the Red Sea. The myrrh shrubs are of a low stature, unattractive, rigid, spiny, with scanty foliage and minute flowers and small oval berries. Myrrh exudes from the bark, or is obtained by incisions made in the bark, and appears in resinous, yellow drops, which gradually thicken and become harder. The smell is balsamic, and the taste bitter and slightly pungent. Myrrh has been known to mankind from the remotest times, and was among the most precious articles of ancient commerce. It is used in medicine as a tonic and stimulant, and was much employed by the ancient Egyptians in embalming. It is collected in great quantities to-day by the Somali tribes and sold to traders. There has been considerable controversy as to the real nature of the ancient myrrh, and particularly as to the regions from which it came; but the σμύρνα of NT appears, on the whole, to have been the substance described above.

Myrrh was one of the gifts brought by the Magi to the Infant Christ (Mat 2:11), and it was used, along with aloes, by Nicodemus to anoint the body of Christ before burial (Joh 19:39). All the ancient commentators affirm that each of the three gifts—gold, frankincense, and myrrh—offered by the Magi is replete with spiritual significance. Thus it was widely accepted in early times that the myrrh was emblematic of the death of Christ, inasmuch as myrrh was used for embalming. It was ‘offered to Christ as to one who is about to die for all’ (Aug. ad loe). Others regarded it as setting forth His true human nature, and therefore as teaching the mortification of the flesh by abstinence. The well-known ancient hymn, part of which refers to this, says:

‘Gold, a monarch to declare;
Frankincense, that God is there;
Myrrh, to tell the heavier tale
Of His tomb and funeral.’

Though we may admit that in the gifts presented there was an unconscious fulfilment of prophecy (Isa 60:6), no symbolism of the nature referred to can have been designed by the Magi. So far as their intention was concerned, they simply offered to the new-born King, whom they came to worship, the choicest and most precious products of their country, and thus expressed their homage.

In Mar 15:23 we are told that there was offered to Christ, probably just before He was nailed to the cross, ἐσμυρνισμένον οἶνον, ‘wine mingled with myrrh.’ It was offered, of course, as an anodyne; but as myrrh was often infused into wine to give it a more agreeable flavour and fragrance, it has been held by some that Mt.’s expression οἶνον μετὰ χολῆς, ‘wine mingled with gall,’ is the more correct, because the mingling of gall with wine to render it anaesthetic was a well-known practice. It is, however, possible that the gall of Mt. was the same as the myrrh of Mk., the corresponding Hebrew words being from the same root, and both signifying ‘bitter.’ The mingling of myrrh with the wine would certainly render it more potent as an anodyne, and we must therefore accept the word given by Mk. as conveying the purpose for which the draught was offered. Such a draught, called by the Romans sopor, was regularly offered to criminals just before their crucifixion. It was provided by an association of wealthy women in Jerusalem, who prepared it for the purpose. But, having tasted it and ascertained its object, He would not drink. This action is in contrast with what He did at a later period of the day; for when, in response to His cry ‘I thirst,’ one of the soldiers soaked a sponge in ‘vinegar’ and, holding it up to Him on a reed, gave Him to drink, He received it. This was not to soothe His agony, but only to moisten His parched tongue and lips, perhaps that He might be able to utter ‘with a loud voice’ His triumphant τετέλεσται, perhaps also to sanction and sanctify the friendly office which is often the only one that can be rendered to the dying, and possibly in fulfilment of the prophecy of thirst (Joh 19:28, cf. Psa 69:21). However this may be, His purpose in refusing the draught offered as an anodyne is clear. He would ‘look death in the face,’ and meet the King of Terrors in full possession of all His faculties. He was dying of His own accord, fulfilling His words, ‘No man taketh my life from me’ (Joh 10:18). His death was an act of voluntary self-surrender, and He would ‘taste death for every man’ (Heb 2:9). He ‘endured the cross, despising shame’ (Heb 12:2).

☞Mystery

MYSTERY (μυστήριον from μύστης ‘one initiated’; stem μύω ‘to close,’ ‘shut’ (cf. Lat. mutus, English ‘mum’).—1. In classical Greek μυστήριον means a hidden thing, a secret; in Biblical writers primarily a hidden or secret thing; in the plural (usually) individual matters of revelation or superhuman knowledge (Mat_13:11, Luk_8:10, Rom_11:25, 1Co_4:1; 1Co_15:51). In the singular with the article τὸ μυστήριον is used, principally by St. Paul, of the hidden counsel of God, especially His redemptive plan culminating in the final judgment (Rom_16:25, 1Co_2:7, Eph_3:3; Eph_3:9, Col_1:26 f.). This counsel of God is further characterized as the ‘mystery of his will’ (Eph_1:9) ‘which he formed’ (Col_2:2 [1Co_2:1, text of WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort’s text.]]) ‘respecting Christ’ (Col_4:3), and constitutes the contents of the gospel (Eph_6:19). It is consummated in the parousia (Rev_10:7). In antithesis to ‘the mystery of the faith’ or ‘of godliness’ (1Ti_3:9; 1Ti_3:16) stands that of ‘lawlessness’ (2Th_2:7), the purposed impulse of an antagonistic power operative in the world.

Besides this primary sense, the word μυστήριον is also used like מֵטֵר and חֵט in Rabbinic writers to designate the hidden or mystic sense of a Scripture (Eph_5:32), a name (Rev_17:5), or the image or form seen in a vision (Rev_1:20; Rev_17:5).

It is important to observe that the connotation of intrinsic difficulty of comprehension, obscurity, which has become inseparable from the word in modern use, is misleading. In Biblical and in ancient use generally the ‘mystery’ is simply that which is made known only to the initiated, be its content easy or hard to understand, hence revealed as against reasoned knowledge.

2. In a looser sense the term ‘mysteries’ was transferred from the teaching symbolized to (a) the rites enacted in certain cults or rituals known to classic authors as τελεταί (Wis_14:23), and (b), still more loosely, to the τελεταί themselves. From the former sense (a) the designation of the sacraments, or even the Church service generally, as ‘the mysteries’ becomes common from the 2nd cent. onward. From the latter is doubtless derived the designation of mediaeval religious dramas or pantomimes as ‘mysteries’ (cf., from the same stem, ‘mummery’).

3. The τελεταί, loosely called ‘mysteries,’ are of importance to our consideration as affecting the application of the term ‘mystery’ to the gospel as a whole in Mar_4:11. They consisted of secret rites in honour of certain divinities especially representative of the drama of life, vegetable and animal, annually failing and renewed. These divinities are always chthonic, as against the Olympian (national) divinities of the upper air; and their worship, maintained by guilds, was commonly associated with the rites of ancestor and hero-worship. Mystery-religion transcended all lines of mere nationality, substituting its own brotherhoods of initiates, and offered the idea of personal deliverance and immortality as the goal; as the means, it offered sacramental (instead of sacrificial) union with a Redeemer-god (θεὸς σωτήρ), who, in contrast with the Olympian divinities, participated in the suffering and death of humanity, and won for men victory over their spiritual foes. Its strong monotheistic tendency, added to these other traits, gave it an obvious resemblance to the gospel as preached to the Gentile world, and made it a much more formidable rival than the various religionized forms of Greek and Oriental philosophy, in bidding for the adherence of popular faith in the Empire, after the dissolution of the national religions. Christianity itself, in the transition from a national to a universal religion, necessarily passed through some of the same phases as the mystery-cults; for these had already connected themselves in a syncretizing spirit with the mythology of every people. Their influence is most apparent, as we should expect, in the development of the Pauline Church, supremely in the ultra-Pauline or Gnostic. The resemblances were in fact so striking alike in dogma, terminology, and ritual, as to lead early apologists to account for them by the theory of diabolic travesty (Justin M. Apol. i. 66, Dial. lxx.). Some modern students of the history of religion find it impossible to deny a relation of dependence on the side of the Church, especially in the Pauline and post-Pauline period. [For an able presentation of the view that it is impossible to establish any direct relation during the Pauline or early post-Pauline period, see Anrich, Das antike Mysterienwesen], This appears not only from terminology, but even from the Pauline doctrine and ritual, in particular as regards the theory of the sacraments. In the Gospels this influence is scarcely traceable outside the Fourth, wherein the type of the δράμα μυστικόν and the sacramental interest are very apparent (Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung, pp. 169-173—John and Origen the profoundest mysteriosophists of the Church); but in the single passage Mar_4:11 = Mat_13:11 = Luk_8:10 even the Synoptic writers must be admitted to have been affected through St. Paul both as to phraseology and as to thought.

4. Mar_4:11 seems to be earlier in form than its parallels; for the context shows that the thing given or withheld is not certain elements of the gospel, conceived as μυστήρια and therefore uttered only in parables (understood as enigmas; cf. Mat_13:35, Joh_16:29)—the sense conveyed by the use of the plural in the parallels (τὰ μυστήρια, Mat_13:11 = Luk_8:10)—but is the gospel as a whole conceived as a ‘mystery’ in the Pauline sense, i.e. a Divine revelation (cf. Mat_13:16-17). The teaching in parables is regarded by Mk. (and still more by Mt.) as a fulfilment of Isa_6:9 conceived as a sentence of judicial blindness. In answer to the question (Mat_13:10), ‘Why speakest thou to them (the motley Galilaeen multitude) in parables?’ (i.e. enigmas), Jesus answers that it is a fulfilment of the prophetic curse of Isaiah upon a disobedient and gainsaying people, of whom such fruitless hearing had been foretold. The inner circle (Mar_4:10; cf. Mar_3:13; cf. Mar_3:34-35) are alone intended to receive more than the husk. The parallels, in altering to τὰ μυστήρια, give a dilution of this sense (cf. the secondary sense above under 1).

5. Not the word alone, but the entire context of Mark 4 and parallels are Pauline in aim. Romans 9-11 attempts a theodicy of the rejection of Israel the covenant people in favour of the Gentiles, based upon the same idea of judicial hardening, and employing the same passage from Isaiah. In Rom_11:6 Paul writes after 30 years of disappointing experience in preaching to the Jews: ‘It is written, God gave them a spirit of stupor, eyes that they should not see, and cars that they should not hear, unto this very day.’ To St. Paul, accordingly, must be attributed the first utilization of Isa_6:9, which henceforth becomes the locus classicus to account for the rejection of the Messiah by His own people (with Mar_4:11 and parallels, cf. Joh_12:39-41, Act_28:24-28). Manifestly an interpretation of parabolic utterance which supposes it adopted in order to fulfil the prophetic sentence of judicial blindness on Israel cannot be attributed to Jesus, since the end sought in the parables themselves is the reverse of intentional obscurity. Mar_4:11, accordingly, which does not stand alone in this Gospel as regards its Pauline phraseology (cf. Mar_1:15 with Mat_4:17), is equally Pauline in the employment of this theory of the intention of the parabolic teaching.

6. Linguistically the results are at least equally conclusive. The word μυστήριον occurs 21 times in the Pauline Epp., elsewhere in the NT only here, and 4 times in the Apocalypse. The conception of the gospel itself as a ‘mystery’ is found nowhere else save in the Pauline Epistles. With St. Paul it is fundamental (1Co_2:1-16, Eph_1:9; Eph_3:3-11, Col_1:27, Rom_16:25-27), usually involving the contrast of philosophy versus revelation, the ‘wisdom of this world’ versus the spirit of prophecy. It is noteworthy that the removal of Rom_16:11-12 from the context of Mar_4:10-20 produces a simpler and more intelligible connexion (cf. Mar_4:10 ‘asked of him the parables’).

7. The agraphon quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. v. x. 69) from ‘a certain Gospel’: ‘My mystery belongs to me and to the sons of my household’ (μυστήριον ἐμὸν ἐμοὶ καὶ τοῖς υἱοῖς τοῦ οἴκου μου), and also found in Clem. Hom. xix. xx. in the form, ‘Keep the mysteries for me and the sons of my house,’ is manifestly connected with Mar 4:11, but probably not dependent upon it, nor upon St. Paul. This, however, does not counteract the above conclusions. It is quite probable that Mar 4:11 rests upon a traditional logion of some such form as this, rather than directly or exclusively on Rom 11:8. The utterance in this form is not indeed attributable to Jesus, to whose doctrine its suggestion of esoteric teaching is abhorrent (cf. Philo, de Vict. Off. i. f., on the superiority of the Mosaic to heathen ‘mysteries’ as concealed from none; also Wis 6:22); but proper appreciation of the Pauline use of the word μυστήριον will show a common basis in the real teaching of Jesus. Mat 11:25-27 = Luk 10:21-22 is the canonical equivalent of the agraphon, and affords the real point of connexion between the teaching of Jesus and the Pauline and post-Pauline application of the term μυστήριον to the gospel. In respect to the superhuman, Divinely revealed character of the one message, Jesus and St. Paul are both emphatic. The expressions of 1Co 2:1-16 from this point of view are not only in agreement with Jesus’ whole teaching as ‘with authority and not as the scribes,’ but form a striking parallel to Mat 11:25-30. However open to suspicion the logion of Mar 4:11 may be in its present canonical or post-canonical form, the words are at bottom nothing more than the translation into Greek equivalents of a claim of Jesus that is unquestionably historical, namely the claim for His teaching to be by revelation, a wisdom of God accessible to His ‘little ones’ though ‘hid from the wise and prudent.’

Myth

MYTH.—Neither the word $\mu\tilde{\upsilon}\theta\omicron\varsigma$ nor the conception of a myth occurs in any of the Gospels. Outside of the Gospels the word appears in the NT several times (in plur. $\mu\tilde{\upsilon}\theta\omicron\iota$.) in the Pastoral Epistles (1Ti 1:4; 1Ti 4:7, 2Ti 4:4, Tit 1:14), and once in 2 Pet. (2Pe 1:16). In all these cases a myth is a story unworthy of credence, a foolish tale without sufficient foundation in fact or significance in principle to make it worth while to give heed to it. This is not, however, the ordinary meaning of the word in the Classic period or in modern usage. A myth in the Classic writers is either (1) akin to parable or legend; i.e. a story constructed with a specific design or conveying a moral or philosophical truth—aesop's Fables; Plato's Phaedo, 61 B, Prot. 320 C, 324 D; or (2) a story in which, through a process of growth, has come to be embodied a truth of nature or of conscience. Of this class of myths, illustrations are such as those in Plato, Legg. 636 D, Rep. 330 D [Note: Deuteronomist.] (cf. Grote, Hist. Gr. i. 480). Modern historical terminology would make myth a story whose basis is past verifying. An account is said to be mythical when external evidences for its being a true narration of facts are not forthcoming, and when its internal characteristics render it incredible.

In the Platonic sense of the word no myths can be said to exist in the Gospels unless, contrary to all usage, the parables of Jesus be called myths (against this cf. Trench, Parables). In the modern sense it has been alleged that the Gospels are a tissue of mythological material (Strauss, Leben Jesu). This was the mythical theory of Gospel history, which for a time disputed the ground with the Tübingen hypothesis of 'tendency' literature, on the one side, and the earlier traditional view that the Gospels should be taken as precise and accurate history, on the other.

With the rise of the critical method all these theories have been compelled to yield the field to the view that the Gospels are the sources of history rather than history strictly so called; and that they are to be used as sources precisely upon the same principles as all other first-hand documentary testimony. But this view does not exclude the possibility of some mythical elements in these sources. The question, then, is whether there actually exist mythical accounts in the Gospels, and, if so, whence and how they came there. Whereas, therefore, the mythical theory propounded by Strauss has been entirely set aside, a new one has arisen to take its place.

The grounds on which the Straussian theory had been set aside were that the age of Jesus was not a mythopœic age in the sense assumed by its pro-pounder. No matter what the truth may be about a mythology in the OT, where a prehistoric period certainly comes into view, the age of Jesus falls within a clearly lighted historic period, and the conditions for mythological growth of the nature assumed do not exist.

Accordingly the new mythical theory does not posit that these Gospel myths are the creation of the period and country in which Jesus lived. It rather undertakes to affiliate the narratives with the mythology of the environing heathen world. They are not creations of, but importations into, the Christian tradition. The age of Jesus was not a myth-making age, but a large stock of myths was already in existence among the peoples to whom the gospel came. These myths were diffused in the atmosphere, and could not but be absorbed into the very texture of the history. The search for the origin of Gospel myths is therefore not to be made in the Gospel story itself, but in the field of Comparative Religion.

The special passages of the Gospel history where, according to the new mythical theory, these myths were drawn in and found ready lodgment, are the account of the birth of Jesus, the accounts of His miracles, and the accounts of His death and resurrection. The accounts of the birth (Mat 1:18-25, Luk 1:34 f.) are to be regarded not as parts of the original story of Jesus, but as 2nd cent, additions to it. They owe their origin to Gentile-Christian imagination. Like all true myths, they embody an idea, that of the Divine sonship of the founder of a great religion. The conception and phrase of Divine sonship are not foreign to the more direct Hebrew and Jewish antecedents of the gospel (Psa 2:6 ff., Enoch 45-51, 2 Esdras 13). Yet it is among the heathen that the idea was more commonly ascribed to great personages, especially rulers and sages. In Egypt, even to the latest days, the Pharaohs were regarded as incarnations of the deity (Wiedemann, Egypt. [Note: Egyptian.] Rel. p. 92 ff.). Alexander the Great deemed it wise, upon conquering Egypt, to permit himself to be called the son of the god Ammon-Ra. In Babylon, from the time of Sargon I. onwards, the kings were considered emanations of the godhead (Radau, Early Hist. of Babylon, p. 308 ff.). These incarnations are, moreover, often associated with a virgin birth. Pythagoras and Plato were both regarded as born of virgin mothers and the god Apollo (Olympiodorus, Vit. Plat. p. 1). The mother of Alexander the Great was believed to have been visited by Zeus in the form of a serpent before king Philip had consummated his marriage with her. In the narratives of the birth of Buddha (which are of pre-Christian origin) there are some marked similarities to the Gospel accounts of the birth of Jesus.

The myths alleged to have grown about the career of Jesus as a wonder-worker are prefaced by parallel accounts of a temptation and a conquest of the power of evil. The prince Siddhartha was tempted by the spirit of evil, who urged him to abandon his foolish and futile purpose of living a simple and abstemious life, and to return to the comfort, glory, and power of the royal palace; but he resisted. The prophet Zarathustra had been urged by the evil spirit Ahriman to 'renounce the good law of the worshippers of Mazda,' and thereby to win dominion over the nations of the earth. But he had declined to do so. All the subsequent miracles recorded of Jesus are said to be abundantly paralleled in the legendary lore of the Orientals. The miraculous element did, in fact, persist through the Patristic age and down into the mediaeval period.

The last portion of the Gospel story is said to be specially overlaid with myths of this genus. All that is apparently distinctive and remarkable here is represented as the reflexion and counterpart of the myths current among pagans. The idea of the death of Christ as the propitiation for sin is paralleled by the numerous instances of vicarious human sacrifices. The burial and resurrection are the Christian equivalents of the Egyptian myth of Osiris, who was slain by his brother Set, 'the demon of the withering heat of summer,' and who lives again in the person of his son Horus. Likewise the fabled death, resurrection, and translation into heaven of Adonis, the rape of Persephone, and her rescue upon the compromise that she thereafter spend part of the year with her mother upon earth and part in Hades, are expressions of the same thought.

These cases are associated with mystic rites. In fact, it seems to be a peculiarity of mysteries that death and restoration to life again should be symbolically represented in them. In their best form these rites occur in the Dionyso-Orphic festivals. Here the death of the god was enacted in the sacrifice of a bull, whose flesh was then torn and devoured by the worshippers without being drained of its blood. Thus, it was supposed, the immortal life of the god passed into and conferred immortality upon the worshippers (Clem. Alex. [Note: Alexandrian.] Protrept. i. 12, 17; Frazer, *Golden Bough*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] , ii. 165).

If the death of Jesus is pictured as a voluntary descent into the realm of shades that He might there conquer death, the same thought is seen to run through the Babylonian myth of Ishtar (Schrader, Höllenfahrt d. Istar), the Mandaean myth of Hibil Ziwa (Brandt, Mandäische Religion, p. 213 ff.), and the myths of Orpheus and Herakles, both of whom accomplished descents into Hades, and, according to the Greek classical mythology, achieved conquests there.

The Gospel account of the ascension is paralleled first of all in the OT by the ascensions of Enoch and Elijah, then in the Graeco-Roman legendary lore by the ascensions of Romulus and Herakles. Legends of ascensions were, in fact, common even in the later periods. Some of the Roman emperors were said to have been raised at their death into equality with the gods (Rhode, Psyche, p. 663). The case of Peregrinus Proteus, recited by Lucian, is quite noteworthy. Peregrinus took Herakles as his ensample. As Herakles had made his exit from the world by consigning himself to a funeral pyre, so Peregrinus built a pyre and cast himself into it; but at the moment of his doing so a trustworthy old man reports that he saw an eagle issuing from the flames and flying up into the heavens. Further, the same old man testifies that he beheld Peregrinus clothed in a white garment, and with a garland of victory on his head. Apollonius of Tyana is also reported to have disappeared quite mysteriously, either in the temple of Athene at Lindus or in that of Dictynna at Crete. Philostratus, his biographer, appeals to the fact that nowhere on earth could a grave of him be found, in proof of his ascension and deification.

To the question how these myths filtered into the Gospel story there is no clear answer given. It is simply assumed that they were in the air, and that a new religion must somehow adopt them, and embellish the life and personality of its founder with them. This is a serious difficulty with the new mythical theory. For it is precisely the manner of their infiltration into the Christian tradition that is the crucial point in it. The existence of the myths themselves among the pagans has always been known, and is no new discovery. It is not by simply re-telling these stories that the theory can gain support to itself, but by substantiating the claim that they actually passed from the world of heathen thought into the Christian tradition. This difficulty is enhanced and made practically insuperable when it is further borne in mind that the Hebrew antecedents of the Gospel had resolutely and effectively resisted the incorporation of such myths for a thousand years. Moreover, there is no room in the time interval between the life of Jesus and the writing down of the Gospel accounts of Him for such a process as is assumed, unless we except the birth-narratives of St. Matthew and St. Luke upon purely textual grounds. Criticism has been busy with the origin of the Gospel story as found in the extant narratives, and the more light it throws on the subject the more clearly it appears that the main data come from eye- and ear-witnesses. The old Strauss theory, assuming that the myths were constructed by the disciples of Jesus under the power of an excited and vivid imagination, was at this point stronger than the new one.

Furthermore, when these parallels are closely scrutinized, the first aspect of plausibility given to the mythical theory by them vanishes. The parallels are in most cases far-fetched. In some instances the resemblances are striking indeed. But a relation of derivation of one from the other or from a common source seems to be out of the question. In other instances where a genetic connexion might be possibly established, the parallelisms are forced.

In the case of the birth-narratives (Mat 1:18-25, Luk 1:34 f.), the question is one of evidence. The effort to reduce these to mythology is based upon the a priori conception that they are mythical. If it could be proved, apart from the theory itself, upon purely critical grounds, that these accounts are of later origin, a basis for the theory might be found; but, as a matter of fact, the assumption that they are mythical furnishes the strongest consideration for their critical rejection—a process which can scarcely be called scientific.

☩ Naaman

NAAMAN (Luk 4:27 Νεεμάν, Textus Receptus ; Ναιμάν, Tisch., WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] ; Heb. נַעֲמָן = 'pleasantness').—The famous captain of Benhadad ii., whose cure by the instrumentality of Elisha is related in 2 Kings 5, and who was referred to by our Lord as 'Naaman the Syrian' in His discourse in the synagogue at Nazareth.

Whether our Lord's visit to Nazareth took place early in His ministry as here related by St. Luke, or later on as some think (cf. Mat 13:54-58, Mar 6:1-6), or whether there were two distinct visits, does not concern this article, since the purpose of our Lord's reference to Naaman is the same at whatever period of His ministry He may have made it. He suggested to His audience that they were ready to quote the proverb 'Physician, heal thyself,' and to say, 'Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country.' 'And (better 'But') he said, Verily I say unto you, No prophet is accepted in his own country.' His hearers apparently inferred from these words that He had determined to work no miracle among them, and were irritated accordingly, although perhaps our Lord intended to imply no more than that He had little hope of being able to do so (cf. Mat_13:58, Mar_6:5). Then, to justify and to illustrate His action in Working miracles outside the limits of His own city, He referred to the cases of the widow of Sarepta and of Naaman, which were instances of blessings bestowed through the instrumentality of two of Israel's greatest prophets on persons who were not of the house of Israel at all. This afforded a complete justification of His own action, and was, further, a very pointed rebuke to them if, as seems the case, they were annoyed that He had neglected them for Capernaum, which, situated in that region known as 'Galilee of the Gentiles,' might be considered as less a Jewish town than their own. And, further, our Lord in these words rebuked Jewish exclusiveness in general, and quite clearly indicated the great truth that the benefits of His gospel, whether bodily or spiritual, were not only for the Jew, but also for the Gentile. It is probable that it was this underlying suggestion, coupled with His application to Himself of the great passage from Isaiah 61, which caused the final outbreak of His hearers' wrath (cf. Act_22:22; Act_28:28-29).

☞ Nain

NAIN (Ναΐν ⚭BCD Ti WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] , etc.; Ναεῖν EΓΔ, etc., Ναεῖμ 1 and 209, al pauc) is named only once in Scripture. St. Luke mentions it (Luk_7:11) as the 'city' to which the widow, whose dead son Jesus raised to life, belonged. The miracle was wrought near to the 'gate,' and in the presence of 'much people.' This Nain cannot be the same as the village on the E. [Note: Elohist.] side of the Jordan mentioned by Josephus (BJ iv. ix. 4). Robinson (*BMP*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] ii. 361) identified Nain with the modern Nein, a collection of squalid huts on the N. slope of Jebel cd-Duhy (Little Hermon), 2 miles W. of Endor and about a day's journey from Capernaum (cf. Luk_7:1; Luk_7:11 (margin)). Robinson's view has been generally accepted. It agrees roughly with the statements of Eusebius and Jerome, both of whom place it S. of Tabor and not far from Endor. Eusebius reckons it 12 miles to the south (Onom. s.v. Ναεῖν), Jerome (ib. s.v. 'Naim') says 2 miles. The situation of the present village is bleak and uninviting, though it commands a wide and interesting view. A few hundred paces above the huts, to the S.E. [Note: Elohist.] , are rock-tombs in the hillside. Ramsay (Education of Jesus, Preface, p. ix) says he has 'little doubt that the ancient city was on the top' of the hill, somewhere above the modern village. He expresses his belief that this site has more claim to be the 'city set on a hill' (Mat_5:14) than Safed. It should be noted that Cheyne doubts the correctness of the reading Ναΐν here (Encyc. Bibl. iii. 3263), and claims Nestle (Philol. Sacra, 20) as also recognizing 'the doubtfulness of the locality assigned in Luke.'

☞ Nakedness

NAKEDNESS (γυμνότης).—Oriental dress is generally a draping of the figure in one or more continuous gowns or cloaks. The clothing may be drawn to the body by the waist-band or sash, but the tendency is to avoid as far as possible any exact shaping and rigid fastening of the costume, as such close adaptation to the figure is considered both immodest and undecorative, and in a warm climate would cause friction and perspiration (Eze 44:18). With Orientals, to a greater extent than in the West, out-door dress carries a meaning of investiture and embellishment, with a consciousness of self-appreciation and an expectation of comment. This is partly because in the daytime, in the retirement of the family, they undress more than is customary in the West. In the OT, the garments that were continually put on and off, as one went out and returned to the house, were called suits of apparel or exchange (Jdg 17:10, Isa 3:22). The cotton or linen gown worn beneath these is the permanent under-garment, and any one wearing only this is conventionally said to be naked or unclothed. In this loose costume—a long robe reaching to the feet—members of the family, both male and female, attend to their active household duties, or enjoy the passive luxury of the unoccupied hour. It is, however, unbecoming to receive visitors in such undress, and hence the impropriety of entering without due announcement and permission received, or of looking down from the flat roof of the house into a neighbour's enclosure. The linen cloth mentioned in Mar 14:51-52 was a substitute for the ordinary under-garment. The solitary fisherman when diving from the side of the Lake of Galilee after his cast-net usually divests himself of all clothing. The same is frequently done in summer weather when fishermen haul the drag-net into the boat (Joh 21:7), or a loincloth is worn, as in the case of the tanner and potter at their work.

Nakedness thus means: (1) the state of undress permitted in Oriental family life, and preferred as an adaptation to the climate; (2) insufficiency, amounting sometimes to complete want, of clothing, involving discomfort and suffering in the case of the poor and destitute (Mat 25:36, Rom 8:35, 2Co 11:27); (3) the nudity connected with immodest behaviour (Exo 20:26), or inflicted as a humiliation on prisoners of war (Isa 20:4); and (4) in a metaphorical sense, unnatural and shameless disloyalty to God (Eze 23:29, Rev 3:18).

☞ Name

NAME (ὄνομα).—1. In the Gospels the word is frequently used in the ordinary sense of a distinctive appellation or title, and especially to denote personal proper names (e.g. Mat_10:2, Mar_5:22, Luk_1:5; Luk_1:27, Joh_1:6). See following article.

2. Rarely it is found in the sense of ‘reputation,’ ‘fame,’ ‘glory’—the result of a person’s name being on every tongue. So it is said of Jesus, ‘His name was spread abroad’ (Mar_6:14; cf. ‘a name which is above every name,’ Php_2:9).

3. But especially ὄνομα is used, like Heb. שֵׁם, not as a mere external designation, or distinguishing label attached to an individual, but with the suggestion of its significance as characteristic of personality. Hence the importance attached, just as in the OT, to the choosing of a name (Mat_1:21, Luk_1:13; Luk_1:31; Luk_1:63). hence also (cf. Gen_17:5; Gen_17:15; Gen_32:28) the alteration of a name, or the addition of another name, when some vital fact of experience has made the character different from what it was before (e.g. Mat_16:17-18, Act_13:9). It is when we remember that ‘name’ stands for character that we see the force of such an expression as ‘to receive a prophet in the name of a prophet’ (Mat_10:41). This does not mean to receive him in the name or for the sake of someone else, but to receive him in his character as a prophet—for his work’s sake, and on the ground of what he himself is.

4. This use of ὄνομα as significant of character is of very frequent occurrence with reference to God—corresponding here again to the employment of שֵׁם in the OT. When Mary sings in the Magnificat, ‘Holy is his name’ (Luk_1:49), it is the revealed character of God that is meant. When Jesus teaches His disciples in the Lord’s Prayer to say, ‘Hallowed be thy name’ (Mat_6:9 = Luk_11:2), it is that Divine quality of Fatherhood which He has just set in the very forefront of the prayer that He desires them to hallow. When He did works in His Father’s name (Joh_10:25), He did them by appealing to His Father’s self-revelation, and hence by His Father’s authority. When He exclaims, ‘Father, glorify thy name’ (Joh_12:28), He is asking the Father to complete in the eyes not only of the Jewish people, but of the great Gentile world represented by those Greek seekers who now stood before Him, the manifestation of His holiness and love given in the Person and ministry of His Son. And when He says in the Intercessory Prayer, ‘I have manifested thy name’ (17:6, cf. v. 26), He is speaking once more of that Fatherhood of God of which His own earthly life had been the revelation and the pledge.

5. Corresponding to the foregoing use of ὄνομα as expressive of the revealed character of God, is the constant employment of the word, not only in the Gospels, but throughout the whole of the NT, to denote the character, dignity, authority, and even the very Personality of Jesus Christ. This is the use made of it by the First Evangelist (Mat 12:21) when he applies to Jesus the words of Deutero-Isaiah according to the LXX Septuagint reading, ‘And in his name shall the Gentiles hope’ (Isa 42:4). The meaning of the author of Acts is similar when he writes, ‘The name of the Lord Jesus was magnified’ (Isa 19:17). When our Lord speaks of those who ‘receive a little child in my name’ (Mat 18:5 ||), or gives a gracious promise to the two or three who in His name are gathered together (Mat 18:20), or assures us that whatsoever we shall ask in His name the Father will bestow (Joh 16:23 f.), He is certainly not speaking of the use of His name as a species of magical formula—nothing could be further from the mind of Christ (cf. Mat 7:22)—but of a service and worship and prayer undertaken for His sake or inspired by faith in His Person. And when in the Johannine writings the very same blessings are assured to those who ‘believe on his name’ (Joh 1:12; Joh 2:23; Joh 3:18, 1Jn 3:23; 1Jn 5:13) and to those who believe on Himself (Joh 3:16; Joh 6:40, 1Jn 5:10; cf. esp., as occurring in close juxtaposition, Joh 3:15 with Joh 3:18, and 1Jn 5:10 with 1Jn 5:13), it seems plain that by ‘the name of Jesus’ is meant the Personality of Jesus as that has been summed up in ‘the name’—the name, above all, of ‘only-begotten Son of God’ (Joh 3:18, cf. 1Jn 5:13).

6. There are certain phrases in which ‘the name of Christ’ occurs that call for more particular consideration.

(1) Persecution for the name.—When our Lord said to His disciples that they should be hated and persecuted ‘for his name’s sake’ (Mat 10:22; Mat 24:9, Mar 13:13, Luk 6:22; Luk 21:12; Luk 21:17); when ‘for his name’s sake’ shame and suffering actually fell upon the Apostles and the early Church (Act 5:41; Act 9:16; Act 15:26). and when St. Paul expresses his readiness not to be bound only, but also to die ‘for the name of the Lord Jesus’ (Act 21:13)—what are we to understand by these expressions? No doubt in several of these cases ‘name’ is practically synonymous with Person; and so to suffer for Christ’s name is equivalent to suffering for His sake—an alternative phrase which is also employed (Joh 13:37-38, 2Co 12:10, Php 1:29). But sometimes it seems more natural to think of the primary meaning of ‘name’ as an external designation. The expression ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος used in Act 5:41 (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘for the Name’) and 3Jn 1:7 (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘for the sake of the Name’) suggests that ‘the Name,’ like ‘the Way’ (Act 9:2; Act 19:9), was a technical term, and that to suffer for ‘the Name’ meant to ‘suffer as a Christian’ (1Pe 4:16), i.e. as one who bore the name of being a disciple of Christ. It is true that the name ‘Christian’ (wh. see) does not appear to have been originally used by Christ’s followers themselves. But at all events it was employed by outsiders (Act 11:26; Act 26:28), and came to be employed especially by enemies (1Pe 4:16). And if the name Χριστιανοί was not current within the Church, there was a party in Corinth that claimed to be distinctively ‘of Christ’ (Χριστοῦ, 1Co 1:12), while St. Paul not only protests, with reference to this claim, ‘Is Christ divided?’ (1Co 1:13), but says a little further on in the Ep., with regard to the whole Christian body, ‘Ye are of Christ’ (ὕμεῖς δὲ Χριστοῦ, 1Co 3:23). When, again, St. Peter writes, ‘If ye are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are ye’ (1Pe 4:14), it is evident that the reproach is brought not so much against the name of Christ itself as against those who bear it (cf. 1Pe 4:16). And this view is confirmed when we find St. James speaking of ‘the honourable name which was called upon you’ (Jam 2:7 (Revised Version margin)), the reference being apparently to Christ’s name as a designation that came to be applied to His people—probably from the fact that His name had been invoked over them at the time of their baptism.

(2) Working of miracles in the name.—In the Gospels references to the working of miracles (esp. the casting out of evil spirits) with the use of the name are found in Mat 7:22, Mar 9:38 f. = Luk 9:49 f., Luk 10:17, and in the Appendix to Mk.’s Gospel, where, before His Ascension, Jesus is represented as assuring His disciples that those who believe shall have the power of casting out demons in His name (Mar 16:17). In Act 3:6 ff. (cf. Act 3:16; Act 4:10; Act 4:30) St. Peter cures the lame beggar at the gate of the Temple by commanding him in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth to walk. In Act 16:18 St. Paul, with the invocation of the same name, casts the spirit of divination out of the slave-girl at Philippi. In Act 19:13 ff. certain vagabond Jews, exorcists, take upon themselves to call over those possessed by evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, and the sons of Sceva in particular do this to their own confusion; but the implication of the narrative evidently is that the ‘special miracles’ which had just been wrought by St. Paul himself were accomplished with a like invocation (cf. Act 19:11-12 with Act 19:13). In Jam 5:14 the elders of the Church are told to pray over the sick man, ‘anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.’

The view has been taken that this use of the name of Christ for the working of miracles was nothing more than the employment of a theurgic formula, which finds its analogue in the invocations and incantations of ancient magic (so esp. Conybeare, JQR [Note: QR Jewish Quarterly Review.] viii, ix). We may be sure that in so far as such a use of His name was commanded or approved by our Lord Himself, this view is quite impossible (cf. Mat 7:22). And as for the Apostolic Church, while it is clear that the name of Jesus was invoked by both Peter and Paul before the performance of a miracle, Peter’s prayer, after the miracle at the Temple gate, that God would accompany the use of the name by stretching forth His hand to heal (Act 4:29-30), points to the conclusion that the name of Jesus was invoked by the Apostles in these cases simply because every appeal to God was made through the Person of the Mediator. The influence of Greek and Oriental superstition soon brought into the Church a magical and theurgic element, which gathered specially round the use of Christ's name in formulas of exorcism. But within the Apostolic sphere, at all events, it was not a formula, however sacred, that was believed to cast out demons or work cures. St. James, after enjoining the use of the Lord's name at a sick-bed, adds that 'the prayer of faith shall heal the sick' (Jam 5:15). And in the case of the impotent man, St. Peter, when the people came crowding into Solomon's Porch, greatly wondering (Act 3:11), said, 'By faith in his name hath his name made this man strong ... yea, the faith which is through him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all' (Act 3:16).

(3) Baptizing in (or into) the name.—Christian baptism, as we meet with it in the Apostolic Church, is performed in (or into) the name of Christ (Act 2:38; Act 8:16; Act 10:48; Act 19:5, Rom 6:3, Gal 3:27). On the other hand, in our Lord's parting instructions to the Eleven, as given at the end of Mt., He directs them to baptize 'into (or in; but εἰς is the preposition used) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost' (Mat 28:19)—a formula that is found nowhere else in the NT. This is not the place to discuss the genuineness of the logion (in support of it see Resch, TU [Note: U Texte und Untersuchungen.] x. 2, summarized by Marshall in ExpT [Note: xpT Expository Times.] vi. [1895] p. 395 ff.; Bruce, Kingdom of God, p. 258 ff.; against it, Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. 378 ff.; Harnack, Hist. of Dog. i. 79; Moffatt, Hist. NT, p. 647 ff. See, further, art. Baptism, § 5). But if we accept the triple formula as coming from the lips of Jesus, the fact that we have no direct evidence of its use in the Apostolic Church certainly creates a difficulty. The suggestion that the shorter form is simply a designation of the fact that baptism was administered on confession of Jesus as Christ and Lord, and that the Trinitarian formula would invariably be employed in the actual administration of the sacrament, does not meet the case, for we know that in the 3rd cent, a baptism in the name of Christ was still common, and that in the time of Cyprian the controversy about re-baptism gathered round this very point.

The solution of the problem may lie in the fact that at first the efficacy of baptism was not attached to any set form of words. The Trinitarian formula itself occurs in different versions. Justin gives it after a paraphrastic fashion (Apol. i. 61); Tertullian associates the name of the Church with the names of the Three Persons of the Trinity (de Bapt. vi.), and a like usage is found in the Syrian Church (see Scholten, Taufformel, p. 39). Corresponding to this lack of fixity in the longer form is the absence of anything like uniformity in the shorter one. The name used is 'Jesus Christ,' or 'the Lord Jesus,' or perhaps even simply 'Christ' (1Co 1:13 suggests the last); while the relation to the name is variously expressed by εἰς, ἐν ἐπί (ἐπί [or ἐν] τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, Act 2:38; εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, Act 8:16; Act 19:5; ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου, Act 10:48; εἰς Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, Rom 6:3; εἰς Χρ ιστόν, Gal 3:27). It is hardly legitimate to simplify this diversity by assuming, with Dean Armitage Robinson, that εἰς and ἐν are really synonymous in every case, and that ‘in the name,’ not ‘into the name,’ is always the proper English rendering (EBi [Note: Bi Encyclopaedia Biblica.] i. 473). No doubt it is true, as he says, that ‘the interchangeability of the two prepositions in late Greek may be plentifully illustrated from the NT’ (cf. J. H. Moulton, Gram, of NT Gr. i. 62, 66, 234 f.). But this is far from deciding the question whether in the case of baptism they are used indifferently, and passages like Rom 6:3, 1Co 12:13, Gal 3:27 strongly suggest that they are not.

All this diversity of usage seems to show that slight importance was attached at first to the question of a formula, provided that it was clearly understood what Christian baptism meant, and what it implied. Relation to Christ was the essential matter. And as Christian baptism in the NT is invariably conditional upon confession of Christ, so it was administered with an appeal to Christ’s authority (ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι); it depended for its reality upon a faith that rested on His name (ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι); and it was the outward symbol of an actual union with His Person (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα).

Names

NAMES.—Jewish children usually received their names very soon after their birth; in the case of male children, at the time of their circumcision on the eighth day (Luk 1:59; Luk 2:21). The name was selected in honour of a parent or relative (Luk 1:59), or because of some circumstance connected with the birth of the child, as in the case of Thomas (Aram. Aramaic :ܛܘܡܝܢ, Gr. Θῶμας), meaning ‘twin’; in the case of our Lord and of John the Baptist the name had been selected beforehand by special Divine communication (Mat_1:21, Luk_1:13). Indeed, Jewish names generally were significant, referring to some trait in the child, actual or prophetic; some feeling or hope of the parent at the time of the birth, though this was perhaps not so generally true as in the early OT period. Such old-fashioned names still survived in names like Nathanael (Ναθαναήλ, Heb. נְתַנְיָאֵל ‘God gave’); Zachariah (Ζαχαρίας, Heb. יְבִרְיָהוּ ‘Jehovah remembered’).

Surnames were quite common in NT times. Frequently one person was distinguished from another of the same name by the adding of the father’s name, joined by the Aramaic word bar (בַּר), ‘son of,’ as in Simon bar-Jona (Mat_16:17), and also in such names as Bartholomew, ‘son of Tolmai,’ and Barabbas, ‘son of a father.’ The Greek idiom is frequently followed, however, as in Joh_21:17 ‘Simon of Jonas’; or, written more fully with υἱός, ‘son,’ ‘Simon son of Jonas’ (Joh_1:42).

The presence of two names for the same person in the Gospels is sometimes to be accounted for by the fact that many of the people of Palestine in Christ’s day were bilingual. Hence persons would have an Aramaic and a Greek name, the second translating the first, or being quite similar in sound. The Greek for Thomas (‘twin’) was Didymus (Joh_11:16); for Cephas (כִּפְיָא ‘stone’) it was Peter (Πέτρος, Joh_1:42). Many of the Jews mentioned in the Gospels are known to us only by Greek names, so widespread had the influence of that language become; cf. Φίλιππος, Philip (Joh_1:45), and Ανδρέας, Andrew (Mat_4:18).

A noteworthy feature of personal names in Christ’s day—though the custom existed much earlier and was widespread (cf. Gen_32:28, Dan_1:7)—was that of changing the name or adding a new name at some important crisis in the life, or because of some manifest characteristic of the person so named (Mat_16:18, Mar_3:16; Mar_3:18).

Surnames were sometimes given from the place where one lived or from which one came, as in the case of Judas Iscariot (wh. see), Mar_3:19; or from the party to which one belonged: Simon the Zealot (Ζηλωτής), Luk_6:15.

On names applied to Christ see following article.

Names And Titles Of Christ

NAMES AND TITLES OF CHRIST.—That special significance is attached in the Gospels to the names which are applied to our Lord, is clearly suggested by the reason assigned by the angel of the Lord for the name which he directed Joseph and Mary to bestow upon the Babe whose birth he foretold. ‘Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins’ (Mat_1:21). This explanation of the name Jesus suggests that the other titles that are used to distinguish our Saviour have each its own didactic purpose, and are intended to shed light on some special aspect of Christ’s mission and nature.

1. Jesus.—The name Divinely bestowed upon our Lord, ‘Jesus’ (Ἰησοῦς, the Gr. equivalent of the Heb. Joshua or Jeshua יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, יֵשׁוּעַ), ‘Jehovah is salvation,’ was one of the commonest of male names among the Jews. Its bestowal upon Christ had, as is expressly stated in Mat_1:21, peculiar and special significance. It meant that the bearer of the name should in this unique instance of its application be in the fullest sense all that the word meant, the Divinely sent Saviour of His people, and in particular that the salvation which He should work out should be a moral and spiritual, not a temporal deliverance. The name Jesus, as being that by which He was commonly known among His countrymen, is used by the Evangelists as a proper name, with or without the addition of other names or titles employed by way of distinction. See separate article and also Salvation.

2. Immanuel.—In connexion with the miraculous birth of Jesus and with the assurance that in Him should be fulfilled the promise of the Messiah, St. Matthew applies the prophecy (Is 7:14), ‘Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel, which is, being interpreted, God with us’ (Mat_1:23). The thought present to the Evangelist, in his use of this prophecy of Isaiah, is that which was embodied in the OT types of the Tabernacle and the Temple, and may be compared with the use in the Fourth Gospel of the expression, ‘The Word was made flesh and dwelt (ἐσκήνωσεν, lit. ‘tabernacled’) among us’ (Joh_1:14). The name Immanuel, as applied to Christ in respect of His Incarnation, thus denotes the union of the Divine and the human natures in the person of the God-man. See also separate article.

3. Christ.—This name (Χριστός, ‘anointed,’ the exact equivalent in Greek of the word ‘Messiah’ מָשִׁיחַ) holds a very important place among the titles of our Lord.

The word is variously applied in the OT. It is used of the high priest, who is called ‘the anointed priest’ (ὁ ἱερεὺς ὁ χριστός [ἱερεὺς ἁγιασμένος]), or more fully, ὁ ἱερεὺς ὁ χριστὸς ὁ τετελειωμένος, ‘the anointed priest who has been consecrated,’ the participle τετελειωμένος, ‘consecrated,’ being added to the translation apparently in order to call attention to the meaning of the anointing (Lev 4:5; cf. Lev 6:22). Its use as a designation of kings is familiar, as in the title ‘the Lord’s anointed’ (ὁ χριστὸς τοῦ Κυρίου [יהוה מָשִׁיחַ]) applied to Saul (2Sa 1:14 etc.), to David (2Sa 19:21, Psa 89:38; Psa 89:51; Psa 132:10-17), to Cyrus, in connexion with his mission as the deliverer of God’s people (Isa 45:1). It is applied even to the people of Israel as a nation consecrated to God (Psa 105:15 || 1Ch 16:22, Hab 3:13). It occurs as a title of the expected Messiah in Psa 2:2 and Dan 9:25. In the latter book it occurs with special reference to royal authority, as a result of which it came to be regularly used as the recognized title of Israel’s promised deliverer; cf. its use in the Book of Enoch (48:10, 52:4), an apocalyptic work which strongly influenced the theology of the Hebrews.

The word is used in the Gospels, but very rarely, as a proper name, in the first chapters of St. Matthew and St. Mark, where the subject of the narrative is mentioned in such expressions as ‘Jesus Christ, son of David, son of Abraham’ (Mat 1:1), ‘Jesus Christ’ (Mar 1:1, where υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ is omitted by the best authorities), or where Jesus of Nazareth is distinguished from others who bore the same name, as in the phrase ‘Jesus who is called Christ’ (Mat 27:17; Mat 27:22, cf. Mat 1:16). It appears as a proper name in the passage in which St. Matthew, commenting ‘upon the genealogy of the family of Abraham, notes that ‘from the carrying away to Babylon unto the Christ’ there were fourteen generations (Mat 1:17); and probably also in the one passage in which the word occurs without the article (Mar 9:41), where Jesus uses the words ‘because ye belong to Christ.’ With these exceptions the name has in the Gospels some special reference to our Lord’s offices and claims, or to the Messianic expectations of the Jews. Thus it is said of Simeon (Luk 2:26) that it was revealed to him that he should not see death till he had seen ‘the Lord’s Christ’ (τὸν χριστὸν Κυρίου—the familiar LXX Septuagint translation of יהוה מָשִׁיחַ ‘the Lord’s anointed,’ the title of all Hebrew kings), and the angel announced to the shepherds the birth of a Saviour ‘who is Christ the Lord’ (Luk 2:11). “We learn from St. Matthew (Mat 2:2) that the Magi inquired in Jerusalem, ‘Where is he that is born King of the Jews?’ Herod, who took this as referring to the current form of the Messianic hope, and regarded the Messiah concerning whom the inquiry was made as a possible rival to himself, called the chief priests and scribes, and put the question of the Magi in another form, demanding 'where the Christ should be born.' Herod and the Jewish rulers evidently considered the title 'Christ' as synonymous with that of 'King of the Jews,' in accordance with the general expectation current at the time. To them the Messiah was a king who should derive his royal authority from his Davidic descent and reign as a temporal prince. The Jews, in fact, influenced largely by their apocalyptic literature, had so narrowed their conceptions of the meaning of the title 'Messiah' as to make it signify little more than a king by Divine right, and, leaving out of account all other elements of the Messianic promise, to associate it with thoughts of a kingdom which was of this world. Our Lord, probably for this reason, refrained from claiming the title for Himself, and discouraged its use by others. He forbade the demons whom He cast out of those possessed to confess that He was Christ (Luk 4:41, cf. Mar 1:25; Mar 1:34 etc.). When Peter, in reply to the direct question, 'Who say ye that I am?' confessed His Messiahship, Jesus strictly commanded the disciples to tell no man that He was the Christ (Mat 16:20). On the other hand, He revealed Himself as the Christ to the woman of Samaria (Joh 4:25-26). He answered the doubting message of John, 'Art thou lie that should come, or do we look for another?' by pointing in proof of His Messianic claims to His teaching and His works of beneficence (Mat 11:2-6 || Luk 7:19-23). Even at the beginning of His ministry He accepted the confession of the first disciples when they acknowledged Him to be the Messiah (Joh 1:41 ff.), as He afterwards accepted the confession of Peter (Mat 16:16); and when the high priest adjured Him to declare whether He was the Christ, He answered in the affirmative (Mat 26:63 || Mar 14:61 || Luk 22:67); and before His final rejection, when the Jews challenged Him, 'How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly,' He replied that He had already told them, and that His claim was confirmed by the works which He did in the Father's name (Joh 10:24-25). The murmuring of the people when He spoke of the lifting up of the Son of Man, showed that by that time the impression produced by His ministry was that He did claim to be the Christ. Jesus had just said, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me,' to which the people replied, 'We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth for ever: and how sayest thou, The Son of Man shall be lifted up?' (Joh 12:32 ff.); and again St. John tells us, in connexion with the incident of the cure of the man who had been born blind, that the Jews had agreed that if any man should confess that Jesus was the Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue (Joh 9:22).

From these various instances the conclusion appears to be, that Jesus discouraged the application to Himself of the title 'Christ' in every case in which it was likely to be misunderstood or to lead the people, with their narrow views as to what the Messiah should be, to form inadequate conceptions of the nature and scope of His actual claims and His actual mission.

His aim throughout His ministry was to correct the current conceptions of the expected Messiah by calling attention to the spiritual significance of the national hope, and to the true meaning of that word which was so often upon their lips, thus gradually preparing them to accept Himself as the Deliverer who had been promised and whom they required. This explains, on the one hand, His reticence on most occasions as to His personal claim to be the Christ; and, on the other hand, His frankness at other times, as when He revealed Himself as the Christ to the woman of Samaria, who had learned to look upon the promised Messiah as One who should reveal the Father and the Father's will.

Jesus sought to effect His purpose in various ways. To adduce one conspicuous example, He called the attention of the Pharisees to a well-known Messianic prophecy, evidently in order to correct that popular belief which they shared. He asked them, 'What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he?' (Mat 22:42 f., cf. Mar 12:35 f. || Luk 20:41), clearly treating the matter as a question in Biblical theology or Scripture interpretation: They answered His question in terms of the belief then current, 'The son of David.' Then Jesus, by quoting from the Psalms a passage which they understood to be not only distinctly Messianic, but an utterance of David himself (Psa 110:1), showed some of the practical difficulties involved in the belief that the Messiah of prophecy owed his authority to his Davidic descent. 'How is David's son David's Lord?' Thus our Lord suggested the need there was of carefully revising the whole question of Messianic prophecy, that the people should ask themselves whether they had taken into account not one element or aspect of the problem only, but all that the prophets had spoken concerning the Christ. Until they had done this and were in a position to judge the Person, mission, work, and claims of Jesus by the light shed upon the subject by such a careful study of the whole question, they must necessarily find not merely the teaching and work of Jesus, but the OT revelation itself, a dark problem full of insoluble enigmas.

Thus Jesus sought gradually to lead His countrymen to rise above their narrow views, and, instead of making an unintelligent use of words and names, mere signs of spiritual truths, to apprehend the thing signified by them. Thus He taught them that 'the Christ,' 'the Messiah,' 'the Lord's Anointed,' simply meant 'him whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world' (Joh 10:36) that He might 'do the' Father's 'will and finish his work' (Joh 4:34; cf. Joh 17:4). The anointing which the name denoted, and of which under the old economy priests and kings, as types of the coming Deliverer, were the subjects, was only a symbol of the Holy Spirit by whose effectual working God's will was done. The Christ of God, the Anointed One by way of eminence, the Antitype to which those types more or less clearly pointed, was He upon whom the Spirit of God rested and abode according to the prophecy (Isa 11:2-3), and who was thus equipped for the fulfilment of the Father's will. We may compare with this what we learn from the Fourth Gospel of the manner in which the Baptist knew that Jesus was the Christ. The appointed sign was the descent upon Him of the Spirit in the form of a dove. 'Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost' (Joh 1:33). That was the anointing which constituted Him the Christ, and by which He was publicly set apart for the perfect accomplishment of the Father's purpose of redemption. This truth was not fully learned, and therefore the name in which the truth was enshrined could not be used, with a correct understanding of its meaning, even by the most intimate disciples of Jesus, until after the Resurrection, when they knew that the doing of the Father's will, for which He had been anointed with the Spirit, involved the sufferings, death, and resurrection of the Christ (Luk 24:46), after which, and as a result of which, Christ should impart to His followers the gift of the Holy Ghost, and so communicate to them all the benefits of His redemptive work. See also art. Messiah.

4. Son of David; King of Israel; King of the Jews.—These titles, closely connected with that of 'Christ,' and, like it, associated in the minds of the people with inadequate conceptions of Messianic prophecy, were little favoured by our Lord. They had, however, their own significance for the Evangelists in respect of their bearing upon the fulfilment of prophecy. Thus St. Matthew in the beginning of his Gospel calls Jesus 'son of David,' and prefaces his narrative with a genealogical table in which he notes Christ's place in history as a descendant of the royal house of David (Mat 1:1 ff.), while in ch. 2 he calls attention to the general expectation prevalent among the nations that the Messiah should appear as a Prince of the house of Judah (Mat 2:2). St. Luke also traces the genealogy of Jesus, and calls attention to His descent from David, in connexion with which he explains how it happened that He was born in Bethlehem, though the home of Mary and Joseph was in Nazareth in Galilee (Luk 2:1 ff; Luk 3:23-38). The Evangelist further emphasizes the point of our Lord's Davidic descent by recording the words of Gabriel at the Annunciation: 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David' (Luk 1:32). The aim of these Evangelists in noting these points is to show that in Jesus of Nazareth, OT prophecy, and, in particular, the promise that the Christ should come of the house of David, find their fulfilment. The connexion between the Old Covenant and the New having been thus established, and Jesus proved to be the subject of OT prophecies of the coming Deliverer, the title 'Son of David' ceases to be used or referred to until the Gospel narrative reaches the closing scenes of the life of Christ. Then we learn that Jesus was addressed as 'Son of David' by the two blind men (Mat 9:27), by the Syrophœnician woman (Mat 15:22), by the blind men at Jericho (Mat 20:30 || Mar 10:47-48 || Luk 18:38-39); and that He was saluted as such by the multitude at His triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mat 21:9 || Mar 11:10). That the popular belief made the Davidic descent of the Messiah an essential element, is illustrated by the exclamation of the multitude on the occasion on which He healed one 'possessed with a devil, blind and dumb,' 'Is not this the son of David?' (Mat 12:23); by the objection raised at another time by those who maintained that Christ should come not from Galilee, but 'of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was' (Joh 7:42); and by the answer of the Pharisees to our Lord's question, 'What think ye of Christ?' (Mat 22:42, cf. Mar 12:35 || Luk 20:41).

Closely connected with the title 'Son of David' are those of 'King of Israel' and 'King of the Jews.' Jesus is spoken of as 'King of the Jews' by the Magi (Mat 2:2, cf. Luk 1:32-33), and the first recorded instance of His being addressed as 'King of Israel' is the confession of Nathanael, 'Thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel' (Joh 1:49). All other instances of the use of these titles belong to the narrative of the last week of Christ's ministry. He was hailed as 'King of Israel' (Joh 12:13, cf. Luk 19:38) at His triumphal entry, when He seemed to be on the point of acceding to the popular desire, and when He so far countenanced it by literally and in the most public manner fulfilling the prophecy of Zechariah (Zec 9:9), riding into Jerusalem upon a young ass, the use of which He had claimed on the ground that 'the Lord hath need of him' (Mat 21:3 || Mar 11:3 || Luk 19:31). The title appears after this in direct connexion with the sufferings and death of Jesus, whose claim to be 'Christ, a King,' was the pretext used by the chief priests for delivering Him over to Pilate (Luk 23:2). Pilate, hearing this charge brought against his prisoner, asked Jesus, 'Art thou the King of the Jews?' (Mar 15:2 || Luk 23:3). Jesus replied in the affirmative, but explained that the Kingdom which He claimed was spiritual, not temporal (Joh 18:33-37). After this the titles 'King of Israel' and 'King of the Jews' are 'applied to Jesus by Pilate, the Roman soldiers, and the Jews, with associations of mockery and abuse (Mat 27:29; Mat 27:42 || Mar 15:18; Mar 15:32 || Luk 23:37 || Joh 19:3; Joh 19:14-15); and with the same associations the title 'King of the Jews' was affixed to the cross (Mat 27:37 || Mar 15:26 || Luk 23:38 || Joh 19:19). The explanation already suggested of our Lord's avoidance of the name Christ has special force here. Misunderstood as those titles were, Jesus systematically discouraged their use as being calculated to create a false impression of His actual claims. The trial before Pilate and Herod and the scene at the Crucifixion themselves illustrate the reason for Christ's refusal to accept the royal honours which the people would have pressed upon Him. In the opinion of Jew and Gentile the royalty of Jesus and His crucifixion as an impostor and malefactor involved a grotesque contradiction. The cry of derision, 'He is the King of Israel, let him come down from the cross' (Mat 27:42 || Mar 15:30), was but another form of the popular belief that a suffering Saviour was a contradiction in terms, that the Christ could not be subject to death (Joh 12:34). See also art. King.

5. Son of God.—This title, as it was known among the Jews, had in it a very considerable element of ambiguity. We can understand why this was so when we reflect upon the fact that in OT Scripture the expression is more than once used of others besides a Divine Being. It is used of angels (Gen 6:2; Gen 6:4, Job 1:6; Job 2:1; Job 38:7), of kings, and even of the nation of Israel (2Sa 7:14, Psa 82:6, Exo 4:22). In the New Test., again, it is applied to Adam (Luk 3:38), where the reference is to the relationship in which by his creation he stands to God; and Jesus Himself uses the expression ‘sons of God’ with reference to believers, where He says that in heaven ‘they are equal unto the angels; and are the ‘children (Gr. υιοί, “sons”) of God’ (Luk 20:36).

The use of the name as a title of the Messiah is traceable to OT prophecies like that of Psa 2:7 ‘Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.’ Thus ‘Son of God’ came to be synonymous with ‘Christ.’ It is possible that it was so used even by Peter in his confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mat 16:16, cf. Mar 8:29 ‘Thou art the Christ,’ and Luk 9:20 ‘the Christ of God,’ with Joh 6:69 ‘the Holy One of God,’ ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ θεοῦ), and it was certainly understood in that sense, i.e. as strictly Messianic, by the Jews generally in the time of our Lord. To them the Messiah as such was Son of God. Thus in Nathanael’s confession the latter name occurs in conjunction with the Messianic title ‘King of Israel’; and John the Baptist, after relating the incident by which the Spirit of God showed him that Jesus was the Christ, concludes with the words, ‘I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God’ (Joh 1:49, cf. Joh 1:34). It is of rare occurrence in the Synoptic Gospels. We find it in the Annunciation: ‘That holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God’ (Luk 1:35). In the Synoptic accounts of the Baptism and the Transfiguration we learn that on both occasions Jesus was hailed as God’s Son by a voice from heaven (Mat 3:17 || Mar 1:11 || Luk 3:22, cf. Mat 17:5 || Mar 9:7 || Luk 9:35). Again, the Synoptists give various instances in which Jesus was called ‘Son of God’ by others, as by Satan (Mat 4:3; Mat 4:6 || Luk 4:3; Luk 4:9), by the demons whom He cast out of those who were possessed (Mar 3:11, Luk 4:41), and by the occupants of Peter’s boat after the second stilling of the storm on the lake (Mat 14:33). Again, as already noted, Peter confessed ‘Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.’ To these may be added the testimony at the cross by the centurion and others (Mat 27:54), ‘Truly this was the (a) son of God.’ Of its use by Jesus Himself the Synoptists record no direct instance, though they record allusions in His parabolic teaching which clearly point to Himself as the Son of the King (Mat 22:2 ff.) or of the Lord of the vineyard. (Mat 21:37-39 || Mar 12:6-8 || Luk 20:13-15), and take note of His acceptance of the title as involved in His answer to the direct questions of the chief priests and scribes, ‘Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?’ (Mar 14:61); ‘Art thou then the Son of God?’ (Mat 26:63, cf. Luk 22:67; Luk 22:70). Further, in the baptismal formula Jesus instructs the disciples to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost (Mat 28:19).

In addition to the instances already cited in which He was called ‘Son of God’ by others, there are those in which Jesus was challenged to prove Himself Son of God by coming down from the cross, though in the latter case the title is used in its purely Messianic sense as that was currently understood among the Jews (Mat_27:40).

In the Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, considerable prominence is given to our Lord's claim to be the Son of God. In the discourses of our Lord as recorded by St. John, Jesus clearly conveys the impression that the Divine Sonship there spoken of means very much more than was involved in the popular Messianic use of the name. But even in that Gospel the actual use of the title is confined to a very few passages. Jesus applies it to Himself in the narrative of the man who was born blind (Joh_9:35-37); again (Joh_10:36) where He says, 'I said, I am the Son of God'; justifying His claim to the title in that passage in which He says 'The Father loveth the Son,' etc. (Joh_5:20); in His remarks on the illness of Lazarus: 'This sickness is ... for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby' (Joh_11:4); and in the Intercessory Prayer (Joh_17:1). Elsewhere He is acknowledged as the Son of God by Nathanael (Joh_1:49) and by Martha (Joh_11:27). Among the charges brought against Him by His enemies this is specially emphasized, that 'He made himself the Son of God' (Joh_19:7).

The conclusion to which we are led by a careful consideration of such instances as we find in the Gospels of the use of the name 'Son of God' is, that, as it had come to be employed by the Jews, it was at best a vague and indefinite term. It did not necessarily involve the conception of essential Deity, eternal participation in the attributes of Godhead. The object of the Gospels was to show how Jesus appeared as the Revealer of the Father, and that salvation could come only through One who was Himself equal with God assuming the nature of humanity, dwelling among men, and suffering in their place. Such a revelation so far transcended the current expectations of the people as to the nature and work of the promised Messiah, that the full realization of the significance of Christ's mission could not be attained until His work was completely accomplished and Jesus was revealed as the Son of God with power. This view of the history of the title 'Son of God' is well illustrated by Wendt (The Teaching of Jesus, ii. p. 133): 'According to the Jewish idea, the Messianic King was also Son of God; according to Jesus' idea, the Son of God as such was the Messianic King.' Here as elsewhere Jesus sought to enlarge and elevate the current conception of the Messianic hope, and to show that the Redeemer of Israel and the world was none else than the Son of God, by nature and essence equal with God, and not in that secondary sense in which that name had hitherto been understood. Such a revelation could be made only gradually, hence the sparing use by Christ of the title 'Son of God.'

The Fourth Gospel gives special prominence to the doctrine of the essential Divine Sonship of Jesus. That indications of it are found in the Synoptists themselves is evident not only from the cases already cited, the testimony of the voice from heaven at the Baptism and at the Transfiguration, and our Lord's argument from Psa_110:1 that Christ must be more than Son of David since David himself calls Him Lord, but from such an utterance as this of our Lord Himself recorded by St. Matthew and St. Luke: 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whom-soever the Son will reveal him' (Mat_11:27 || Luk_10:22). But our Lord's claim to be Son of God κατ' ἐξοχήν is one of the central features of the Johan-nine discourses no less than of the teaching of St. John himself. St. John identifies Christ with the Eternal Logos, and calls Him 'the only-begotten of the Father' (Joh_1:14); and Jesus applies to Himself the same expression (Joh_3:16; Joh_3:18) in terms which distinctly assert His essential Sonship and His pre-existence, and declares that the unbelieving are 'condemned already' because they have 'not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God' (Joh_3:18). Jesus associates His work with that of the Father (Joh_5:17), and that in such a way as at once to expose Himself to the charge of blasphemy. So the Evangelist tells us that the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because 'He said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God' (Joh_5:18), their interpretation of His words being justified by His language on other occasions, as when He said, 'Before Abraham was, I am' (Joh_8:58), an expression at once suggestive of the Tetragrammaton, the sacred name Jehovah itself. And notwithstanding the fact that the Jews put such a construction upon His words, Jesus enlarged upon the theme, and claimed for Himself power and authority to give life to the dead and to execute judgment (Joh_5:19-30). In the same connexion He declares it to be the Father's will 'that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father' (Joh_5:23); and in other places asserts His essential oneness with the Father (Joh_10:30), and claims to have shared His glory 'before the world was' (Joh_17:5). He claims, moreover, to have received from the Father 'power over all flesh,' to 'give eternal life to as many as' the Father has 'given him' (Joh_17:2); while in more than one passage emphasis is laid upon the fact that He came from God and should return to Him (Joh_13:3, Joh_6:38; Joh_6:46; Joh_6:62, Joh_7:28; Joh_7:33; Joh_7:36, Joh_8:14; Joh_8:16; Joh_8:18; Joh_8:26; Joh_8:42, Joh_16:28; Joh_16:30). Again, while He teaches His disciples to regard God as their Father (so Joh_20:17, where He says 'My Father and your Father'), and to pray to Him as such (as He does also in the Synoptic Gospels), 'He never places His filial relationship on a level with theirs (Weiss). On the contrary, He speaks at times of the Fatherhood of God with exclusive reference to Himself, as, e.g., where He says (Joh_6:46), 'Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God, he hath seen the Father,' a passage which, as Holtzmann points out, 'shows clearly that there the historical appearance of the Son is connected with the supra-historical being of the pre-existent Logos.'

From all this it is evident that while the title 'Son of God,' which had come to be associated with essentially theocratic ideas, as of the election of Israel by the adoption of grace as sons of God, and of the Messiah as King of Israel, and was therefore open to misunderstanding and misconstruction, was seldom used by Jesus or His disciples as a title of our Lord; the testimony of all the Gospels, and especially of the Fourth, distinctly shows that Jesus claimed to be the Son of God in the strictest sense of the term, as essentially and eternally One with God the Father (cf. St. John's summary of the aim of his Gospel in Joh 20:31 'These are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name'). See also sep. article.

6. The Word or The Logos. This name is peculiar to the Fourth Gospel, and there it occurs only in the Prologue (Joh 1:1; Joh 1:14). Much controversy has arisen as to the probable sources from which the Apostle derived his conception of Christ as the Logos—a controversy the more natural that the term 'the Word' as used by St. John represents the meeting point of Hebrew theology, Hellenic philosophy, and the religion of Jesus Christ. To that controversy little reference need here be made. See art. Logos.

The Logos doctrine of St. John may be summarized thus. God's revelation of Himself in the history of mankind is a complete unity. Creation, Providence, and Redemption are parts of the same grand purpose, whose object is the highest well-being of God's creatures, and especially of man, the head and crown of the creation. In each we have God revealing Himself, and that through a Mediator. This Mediator, more or less darkly imagined by mankind from the beginning until these last times, and more or less clearly revealed to God's chosen people in the days of the fathers as the Angel of the Covenant or the Angel of the Presence, is the same in whom He has now manifested Himself, the Christ by whom God has now spoken to those to whom the promise was given, and who had long been expecting their Messiah, and to all the sons of men, as many as will receive Him. Thus is the Christ, the Redeemer of Israel, the very Word of God, the last, the perfect revelation of the Most High, and the Redeemer of the world.

The Prologue of the Gospel is St. John's appeal to the nations, and speaks thus: 'In Christ Jesus, whom we knew, who as a man among men companied with us, God has spoken, has manifested Himself to us who beheld His glory, and to all that have welcomed that Word of the Father. In Christ the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. In Him was life, and the life was the light of men.' This conception of Christ as the Logos, the same that was in the beginning with God, necessarily involves the doctrine of the essential Deity and eternal pre-existence of Christ. But the point which St. John specially brings out by his use of the term is that in Christ God perfectly reveals Himself to man, and gives to all that receive Christ that adoption by which they may become 'children of God' (τέκνα θεοῦ, not υἱοί, Joh 1:12; cf.

1Jn 3:1). Having in the Prologue established this point, St. John makes no further use of the term Logos in his Gospel, where ‘Son’ or ‘Son of God’ takes its place.

7. Son of Man.—This title seems to have been most favoured by our Lord, and occurs with great frequency, especially in the Synoptic Gospels. Two typical instances may be given of our Lord’s preference for this name. One is found in the Gospel of St. John, where the title least frequently occurs—that of Christ’s answer to Nathanael, who had just acknowledged Him as Son of God. Jesus, accepting Nathanael’s confession, replied thus: ‘Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these. And he saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man’ (Joh 1:50-51). The other is His reply to the adjuration of the high priest, who asked Him whether He was the Christ the Son of God, in which again, immediately after acknowledging that such was His claim, He spoke of Himself as Son of Man, and that in connexion with a prophecy of His appearing on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven (Mat 26:63-64 || Mar 14:61-62 || Luk 22:67-70). For the origin and history of the title ‘Son of Man,’ see separate article.

With regard to the question as to the sense in which Jesus used the title ‘Son of Man,’ the answer is suggested by the connexion in which at various times He so described Himself. It may be briefly stated in this way: God manifesting Himself to man in a form which man as man can understand. Comparing the passages in which the title is used by Christ, the first thing that strikes us is that He uses it in connexion both with His humiliation and with His exaltation. We find it associated with thoughts of the privations and sufferings of Jesus,—as where He says: ‘Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head’ (Mat 8:20 || Luk 9:58). It occurs repeatedly in connexion with His sufferings and death, as where He tells His disciples that as John was slain by Herod, so shall it be done to the Son of Man (Mat 17:12 || Mar 9:12). Again, that the Son of Man must ‘be delivered into the hands of men’ (Luk 9:44 || Mat 17:22, cf. Mat 20:18 || Mar 10:33 || Luk 18:31-33, Mat 26:45 || Mar 14:41), ‘and suffer many things’ (Mar 8:31 || Luk 9:22). Thus also Jesus states this as the mission of the Son of Man, that He ‘came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many’ (Mat 20:28 || Mar 10:45). Again, the title is used where the thought expressed is that of the sympathy of Jesus with human joys as with human sorrows, in the contrast drawn between the asceticism of John and the sociable disposition of our Lord (Mat 11:18-19 || Luk 7:33-34); while the same thought appears in another form, where Jesus, justifying His acceptance of the hospitality of Zacchaeus, says: ‘The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost’ (Luk 19:10). In other passages the use of the name suggests the coexistence of Messianic authority with the lowliness of Christ’s human nature, as in the narrative of the healing of the paralytic, in connexion with which Jesus says that ‘the Son of Man has power on earth to forgive sins’ (Mat 9:6 || Mar 2:10 || Luk 5:24); and St. Matthew notes the impression produced upon the multitude, as that ‘they marvelled, and glorified God which had given such power unto men.’ To this class of passages may be referred also our Lord’s saying concerning blasphemy against the Son of Man and that against the Holy Ghost (Mat 12:32). The Son of Man, in His humiliation, veiling His Divine nature, appearing to men like one of themselves, may not be recognized for what He is. Blasphemy against Him, therefore, as resulting only from ignorance and unbelief, admits of forgiveness; whereas blasphemy against the Spirit of God, a presumptuous offence against the Deity, cannot be forgiven. Again, the title is used of Jesus in respect of His representative character, where He asserts His right as Son of Man to interpret the Sabbath law (Mat 12:8 || Mar 2:27-28). ‘Jesus regarded the institution from a philanthropic point of view, and He claimed lordship over it for the Son of Man on the ground of His sympathy with mankind, which He deemed a far more reliable interpreter of the Divine purpose and guide in observance, than the merciless rigour of the Rabbis’ (Brnce, Kingdom of God, p. 174). A connecting link between these uses of the title and those which specially refer to Christ’s Exaltation is found in those passages in which Jesus so calls Himself with reference to His mission as Founder of the Kingdom of God. So in the parable of the Tares. ‘He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man’ (Mat 13:37). ‘The Son of Man shall send forth his angels’ (Mat 13:41). Here Jesus identifies the Founder of the Kingdom of God in the world with the Judge of the world, using the same title in both connexions. He who as Son of Man seeks with all patience and forbearance to establish His Kingdom by manifestation of the grace of God, is He who must judge mankind according as they have accepted or rejected His message of salvation.

But undoubtedly the most remarkable use of the name Son of Man is that which is directly and specially connected with the thought of Jesus in His Exaltation. We see this in all His predictions of His Second Coming. Thus, speaking of the suddenness and unexpectedness of His appearing, He says: ‘At an hour when ye think not the Son of Man cometh’ (Mat 24:44 || Luk 12:40). The Son of Man is to appear with the suddenness of lightning (Mat 24:27 || Luk 17:24), and the circumstances of His appearing are compared to those of the world in the days of Noah and of Lot (Mat 24:37 || Luk 17:26-32). He is to come after the great tribulation (Mat 24:30 || Mar 13:26 || Luk 21:27). His advent is to be announced by ‘the sign of the Son of Man appearing in the heavens’ (Mat 24:30). He is to sit as a King upon the throne of His glory (Mat 25:31), when His Apostles shall be associated with Him, judging the tribes of Israel (Mat 19:28, cf. Luk 22:29-30).

In the Fourth Gospel the name ‘Son of Man’ is used in connexion with the pre-existence of Christ: ‘No man hath ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven’ (Joh 3:13; cf. Joh 6:62). As

Son of Man He is Mediator between Heaven and Earth (Joh_1:51). Judgment is committed to the Son of Man as such (Joh_5:27). Special emphasis is laid upon associations of this title with the coming judgment (cf. besides the passages just noted, Mat_26:64 || Mar_14:62 || Luk_22:69). Again, Jesus concludes one of His discourses on 'The Last Things' with an emphatic warning to His own disciples to watch and pray that they 'may be accounted worthy ... to stand before the Son of Man' (Luk_21:36). The meaning of all this is plain. The Son of Man as such is the Judge of man. Man is, as it were, to be 'tried by his peers.' The Son of Man, as bearing the nature of man, capable of understanding and sympathizing with him, is to appear at last as the Judge of the human race.

It is clear that the meaning of the title cannot be limited to any of those conceptions which have been suggested of Christ as the ideal of humanity, still less to the thought of the humanity as distinguished from the Divinity of our Lord. It was rather used, as Wendt puts it, very much 'to raise problems and to incite,' among Christ's hearers, 'reflexion and the use of their own judgment.' 'It contained, in nuce, through reference to the testimony of OT Scripture,' 'a solution of the paradox of the coexistence' in Jesus 'of lowly humanity with lofty Messianic dignity' (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, ii. p. 148).

8. To these characteristic titles of our Lord may be added those of Lord, Master (κύριος, ἐπιστάτης, διδάσκαλος), Rabbi, which are variously used. The title 'Lord' appears most frequently as the equivalent of 'Master' (ἐπιστάτης), 'Teacher' (διδάσκαλος) simply. So Martha addressed Jesus as 'Lord' (Κύριε) when complaining of Mary's conduct in the household of Bethany (Luk_10:40). The same word is used by the disciples in peril on the Sea of Galilee (Mat_8:25), in which case the parallels 'Teacher' in St. Mark's account (διδάσκαλε) and 'Master' (ἐπιστάτα) in St. Luke's, illustrate the sense in which it occurs (Mar_4:38, cf. Luk_8:24). So again, in the narrative of the Transfiguration, where Peter says, 'Lord, it is good for us to be here,' the word κύριε in St. Matthew corresponds to 'Master' (ἐπιστάτα) in St. Luke and 'Rabbi' (Ραββει) in St. Mark. Peter addressed Jesus as 'Lord' (Κύριε) when he remonstrated with Him at Caesarea Philippi (Mat_16:22); and the same title is used by the disciples when they ask Jesus to teach them to pray 'as John also taught his disciples' (Luk_11:1); again, when they say of Lazarus, 'Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well' (Joh_11:12), and by Martha and Mary in the same narrative (Joh_11:3; Joh_11:21; Joh_11:27); and Jesus Himself uses the title 'Lord' in connexion with that of 'Teacher' (Joh_13:13): 'Ye call me Master (teacher) and Lord.'

The title 'Lord' (κύριος) is also applied to Christ, especially by St. Luke, as an alternative for Jesus or Christ, apparently by anticipation, speaking of Jesus in the manner which became current after the Crucifixion. Thus we read that 'the Lord said' to the widow of Nain: 'Weep not' (Luk 7:13); that 'the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward?' etc. (Luk 12:42); 'the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith' (Luk 18:6); and again, that 'the Lord appointed' the seventy disciples (Luk 10:1). Again, in St. John we read, 'When therefore the Lord knew that the Pharisees had heard,' etc. (Joh 4:1); that 'the Lord gave thanks' (Joh 6:23); and that Mary of Bethany was she 'who anointed the Lord with ointment' (Joh 11:2).

Occasionally also the title 'Lord' (κύριος) is applied to Christ where text and context plainly demand that it should be interpreted in the highest sense of the word, as where Elisabeth calls Mary 'the mother of my Lord' (Luk 1:43); where the angel says, 'a Saviour which is Christ the Lord' (Luk 2:11); where Thomas addresses Christ, 'my Lord, and my God' (Joh 20:28); and by Jesus speaking of Himself in connexion with the Last Judgment (Mat 7:21-22; cf. Mat 25:11 etc.). See also separate articles.

9. The various figurative or parabolic names of Christ do not call for any special remark, as their use by Christ in the passages where they occur sufficiently explains their meaning. Such is that of the Good Shepherd (Joh 10:2; Joh 10:11 etc., cf. Luk 15:3 ff.), where He shows how, like the Shepherd of Messianic prophecy, He tends and protects the sheep entrusted to His care, and how He must lay down His life for them; and again, that of the Door of the Sheep, an expression which means simply that acceptance of Christ by faith is the first condition of entrance into the Kingdom of God (Joh 10:7; Joh 10:9; cf. Joh 14:6). Again, impressing upon His hearers the dependence of His disciples upon Himself as the source of their spiritual life, He described Himself as the Bread of Life (Joh 6:35 ff.). The same truth is taught in the parable in which He calls Himself the True Vine, with the added thought of fruit-bearing as the legitimate test of life in all that are joined to Him by faith (John 15). Again, in justification of His work among the outcasts of society, He compares Himself to the Physician, of whose aid only the sick stand in need (Mat 9:12 || Mar 2:17 || Luk 5:31). Speaking of the conflict of good and evil in the heart of man when first he looks to Christ for help, our Lord uses the similitude of a strong man armed, successfully defending his house against all assailants until there comes one stronger than he who overpowers and binds him, where the meaning of the passage is that Christ is that Stronger One, who breaks the power of the strong man—Satan (Luk 11:21, Mat 12:29 || Mar 3:27). Lastly, Christ's mission to save sinners by His vicarious sufferings and death is shadowed forth by the words of John the Baptist (Joh 1:29), 'Behold the Lamb of God [see Sheep, § 4] which taketh away the sin of the world.' ☞ Naphtali

NAPHTALI (Νεφθαλειμ)

1. Description.—With the Captivities all practical use of the tribal divisions came to an end, and, but for such a reference as that given in Mat 4:15 to the OT prophecy of Isa 9:1, the lands of Zebulun and Naphtali could scarcely appear as geographical names in the NT. The boundaries of these divisions we can know at best only approximately. Many of the towns named in Joshua's description of the tribal territories are unknown to us, and, besides, the tribes are not likely ever to have had the unbroken compactness the maps would lead us to believe. Villages among the mountains of Naphtali have to this day their arable lands near the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and similarly in Zebulun the inhabitants of Nazareth cultivate portions of the plain of Esdraelon. Thus the tribes might in many cases possess detached portions, and difficulties connected with their extent and boundaries may sometimes be explained from this fact. This uncertainty as regards the boundaries of these tribes is of no consequence to our present purpose, as the indefinite statement in Mat 4:15 cannot be used in any argument regarding the site of Capernaum; nor can we fix the boundaries from any supposed relationship to that city, as Reland has sought to do (Pal. [Note: Palestine, Palestinian.] p. 161). The lands of Naphtali then, generally speaking, occupied the N.E. portion of Galilee, together with the west and south of the Lake. Josephus (Ant. v. i. 22) defines its northern boundary as Mount Lebanon and the Fountains of Jordan. The Rabbis tell us that 'Naphtali rejoiced in his portion, having seas and fish.' They assign the Sea of Galilee to the portion of Naphtali, and give him also 'a full measure' to the south of the Lake (Bab. [Note: Babylonian.]

Baba Kama, 81b; Sifri on Deu_33:23). In Naphtali were represented the three divisions of Galilee—of varying elevation (Mishn. Shebiith ix. 2); (1) Upper Galilee, from Kefr Hananyah (Kefr Anân) northwards, which is described as the portion ‘where the sycamores do not grow’; (2) Lower Galilee, extending downwards till we reach (3) the third division, which is designated מבדיה תהום or העמק—‘the depression of Tiberias’ or ‘the valley.’ For description of the last of these districts, see artt. Sea Of Galilee, and Gennesaret (Land of).

From the north end of the Plain of Gennesaret and the Sea of Galilee (-682.5 ft.) the land rises through a series of steep ascents and small plateaux to Safed (+2750 ft.) and Jebel Jermuk (4000 ft.), the highest peak in Western Palestine. To the north of these points, and until the valley of the Litani is reached, we have an undulating tableland, with vast stretches that are arable and everywhere tilled, with swelling hills in view all round, covered with prickly shrubs and trees and forests of small oak. This district is broken into by two deep valleys, somewhat like but narrower than Wady Hamam. From the N.W. of the Plain of Gennesaret the Wady Leimon, otherwise called Wady Amûd, and in ancient times מרוך מעלת, the ‘ascent of Meiron,’ extends to the neighbourhood of the village of that name. It is a narrow gorge, for the most part enclosed by steep rocky walls and natural pillars. It is now impassable, but in ancient times it was accessible to passengers in single file (Erubhin, 22b; Rosh-hash., 16a). About half-way up this ravine a smaller wady branches off eastward, to beyond the great rock of Akbara—a cliff as grand and impressive as anything met with in Wady Hamam. In later days there grew up under its shadow a famous Rabbinical school, and the district was renowned for its coverts of pheasants. Farther north, Upper Galilee is divided by another valley (Wady Fara), almost equally deep, but less rocky. It extends eastward from the neighbourhood of el-Jish, and opens out into the plain beside Lake Huleh and the Jordan.

In the neighbourhood of el-Jish and Taitabeh (said to be the Tishbe of 1Ki_17:1) we meet with three extinct craters and quantities of black volcanic rock, and by it the slopes to the Huleh valley and the Jordan as far as the Sea of Galilee are also fringed. Between Kerazeh and Tell Hum great quantities of basaltic boulders cumber the ground, and the stones of Tiberias again are black. Volcanic forces have been active in the past. They have created for us these wild gorges and gigantic cliffs, and their continued existence is proved by the hot springs, as also by the frequent earthquakes in ancient (Ant. xv. v. 2; Joma v. 2; Sota viii. 7) and in modern times. Of these latter the most terrible known is that which occurred on 1st Jan. 1837. Elsewhere the rocks of Naphtali are generally a species of limestone, known in Palestine by the name of nâri. On the hills above the Lake there are great stretches of these white rocks, hard as flint, bare, desolate, and painful to the eye, especially under the summer sun. But though the surface is hard and glossy, we have only to get below it to find that the rock is really soft. It may be cut with a saw with even greater facility than wood. All sorts of trees—olives, figs, and vines—can send their roots through it and draw nourishment thence, while the hard exposed surface is there to conserve the moisture below. With little trouble these rocky desolations may be turned into vineyards, olive groves, and orchards, and we have every reason to believe that they were such in the early Christian centuries (Bab. [Note: Babylonian.] Megilla, 6a).

Naphtali will thus be seen to have, in virtue of its lands of varying altitude and deep depression, a greater variety of climate, scenery, and possible variety of production than any other tribe of Israel. To it more than to any other could be applied the words of promise uttered ere the Land was yet entered—‘a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates, a land of oil olives and honey’ (Deu 8:7-8). Apart from the barren stretches mentioned, these words describe most naturally the state of Naphtali to-day. Different parts are renowned for their varied products—Rameh for the excellence of its olives and its oranges, el-Jish for its vineyards, the north and the Huleh valley for their fine crops of wheat and barley. Elsewhere we meet with the lemon, fig, mulberry, apricot, and even tobacco and tomatoes, in great abundance. As the Targum (on Gen 49:21) has it, ‘Naphtali’s lot was cast in a pleasant land.’ From shortly after the commencement of the rainy season it is brilliant with flowers—anemones of many varied tints, cyclamens, and lilies, while all its water-courses may be traced by the red bloom of the oleander. The hills are greener than those of any other tribe, and the grass and the spring flowers continue among its uplands long after the rest of Palestine is burned black and bare. This arises from the fact that Naphtali enjoys first and most of all the much praised ‘dews of Hermon that descend upon the mountains of Zion’ (Psa 133:3). When the N.E. wind has come gently blowing over the great mountain, we have seen the dew-clouds rolling down in great volumes over its fields, supplying all nature with fresh vigour and sensations of pleasantness. Modern products, such as oranges, tobacco, and tomatoes, were absent in our Lord’s time, as was also another feature that attracts the eye in these days, viz., the great hedges of prickly pear or cactus, by which many of the villages are practically fortified. This plant is of modern importation, though, unfortunately, it has often found its way into pictures of Bible scenes. Compared with the present day, the hills of Naphtali were much more wooded in NT times. Just after such another period of unrest and unsettlement as Galilee had passed through before the Advent, Arculphus, a pilgrim (a.d. 670), found that the hills in his time were wooded down to the shores of the Lake. The woods of Naphtali are mentioned in the Palestinian Talmud (Baba Bathra v. 1).

Of the productiveness of the soil there is ample testimony. We are told that Gush Halab (Gischala; el-Jish) was famous for the quantity of its oil (Erakhin ix. 6; Menakhoth, 85b), and as this was considered to be a border town adjoining the tribe of Asher, the Rabbis saw here a fulfilment of Gen 49:20, Deu 33:24. Josephus, speaking of the same place, tells us that its people were generally husbandmen, and applied themselves to the cultivation of the fruits of the earth (BJ iv ii. 1). The quality of the wheat of Chorazin and Capernaum is well spoken of (Men. 85a). It is elsewhere stated that Naphtali possessed vines and fruitful fields (Bab. [Note: Babylonian.] Meg. 6a), and we meet with incidental reference to the honey of Safed, the indigo of Magdala, and the raw silk of Gush Halab. And, in so far as productiveness is concerned, it must be remembered that whatever may be said of the hills of Naphtali applies with tenfold more force to the Plain of Gennesaret and the southern shore of the Lake (Josephus BJ iii. x. 8). If the evidence of Josephus and the Talmuds does not all refer to the time of our Lord's ministry, at least it shows us clearly what the district was becoming during that period.

2. The people.—Zebulun and Naphtali were in the year b.c. 135 practically Gentile (1Ma 5:23), but from that time onward they became gradually reoccupied by a population of Jewish blood, and from the time of this resettlement its people were pre-eminently patriotic (Ant. xiv. ix. 2, xv. 10). It was a district of great memories and inspiring scenes, and the new settlers acted up to them. The kind of immigrants—those who sought a freedom unknown at the court of Herod—would guarantee their quality, and, besides, there is something in the free air of the mountains—especially mountains that have a past heroic history—that goes a long way to make heroes and warriors. In b.c. 4, Judas the son of Hezekiah had made an unsuccessful attempt to revolt, and again in a.d. 6, Judas of Galilee and his Zealots (cf. Luk 6:15), declaring 'There is no king but God' (Ant. xviii. i. 6). [With this saying we may compare that in the Jewish Morning Prayer, אֲתָהּ אֱלֹהִים מֶלֶךְ לְנוּ אֵי, and its repudiation in the cry of the Jews to Pilate (Joh 19:15), as well as the Galilæan Arabic proverb met with in el-Jish to-day, 'Mâ fish sultân ghçr alla,' 'There is no king but God']. The milder government of Antipas, and his presence, as a 'half-Jew,' between them and their conquerors, kept the Zealots at peace during a long period in the 1st cent. [a.d. 6-a.d. 66), and allowed the population to grow, so that probably all the villages of to-day represent cities of that time (BJ iii. iii. 2). The population did not in peaceful days sink into sloth and indulgence. They were essentially sturdy sons of hardy toil; and where commerce, agriculture, and fishing did not afford employment, they engaged in trades, as in dyeing at Magdala, weaving at Arbela, and pottery manufacture at Kefr Hananyah. Though despised by the people of Jerusalem, Naphtali was itself becoming a centre of learning, and, even before the Christian era, had given birth to one in the direct line of succession as transmitters of the oral law or traditions of the elders (Mat 15:2)—Nitai or Mattai of Arbela—who has left us this saying, which is almost characteristic of the people: Remove from a bad neighbour, have no partnership in evil, and despair not of reward' (Pirkç Aboth i. 7).

3. Christ's sojourn.—Our Lord's settlement in the lands of Naphtali began probably about January of the year a.d. 27 (Mat 4:13), a short visit of 'not many days' having been made before the previous Passover (Joh 2:12). The time of sojourn would then extend till Sept. [Note: Septuagint.] a.d. 28—a period of about 20 months; but this was broken in upon by circuits in Galilee (Mar 1:34, Luk 8:1-3, Mat 9:35, Mar 6:6), to Tyre and Sidon (Mat 15:21), to Decapolis (Mar 7:31), to Caesarea Philippi (Mat 16:13), and a visit to Jerusalem to the Passover (Joh 5:1). In virtue of Christ's being asked for and paying tribute in Capernaum (Mat 17:24), we may conclude that He was recognized as a citizen there; and the light thrown on this transaction by the Talmud enables us to infer that He had been domiciled in Naphtali one year before the 15th Adar preceding the request for payment (cf. M. Shekalim i. 3; Baba Bathra i. 6; Sanhedrin 112a). As the circuits through Galilee took place for the most part during the hot season, when the inhabitants are in the mountains, we can see, when we consider the smaller Galilee of those days, that the greater part of one year at least would be spent among the people of Naphtali. It was from among them that the Lord chose most of His friends and disciples. It was in Naphtali, too, that He made the selection. It was there that He did most of His mighty works (Mat 11:20). Its towns were the best known in Gospel history—Capernaum, Bethsaida, Chorazin, Magdala, and Tiberias—and it was over three of these that He uttered the sentence of woe because they believed not (Mat 11:21-24). It was in Naphtali that most of His teaching, as recorded in the Synoptics, was given. Its flowers, its fruits, its crops, its birds and beasts, its mountain torrents, its manners and customs, were all used to illumine the Gospel message, and to bring light first to its people, and then, through them, along the world's highways to all that sit in darkness. In this, Matthew (Mat 4:15), and with him the whole Christian world, sees the fulfilment of Isaiah's old prophecy, and, apart from individual opinions that it might be understood of the glory to which Rabbinism attained here in the 2nd and 3rd cents., the older Synagogue teaching is so far at one with them that all the midrâshîm declare that the Messiah ben Joseph should appear in Galilee. So also writes Sa'adiah ha-Gaon in his work on Faith and Knowledge, § v.; while the Book of Zohar on Exo 1:8 clearly states that the 'Messiah shall arise and be revealed in the land of Galilee.'

NAPKIN.—The Gr. σουδάριον translation ‘napkin’ in the Gospels (cf. Act 19:12 ‘handkerchief’), is Lat. sudarium, and became current in the East through the extension of the Roman Empire. The piece of cloth, a yard or so square, of which the σουδάριον consisted, was turned to various purposes. It usually served as a head-dress to protect the head of the living from the sun, and to give a finish to their costume, but it served other purposes as well. Two of these are mentioned in the Gospels. In Luk 19:20 the unfaithful servant confesses that he had wrapped up his master’s pound in a napkin. In Joh 11:44; Joh 20:7 we are told that the head of the dead had been bound about with a napkin.

With regard to Luk 19:20 the words put into the lips of the unfaithful servant are an example of Christ’s irony, and help to show us the true character of the servant. The fact that he admits having put the pound in a sweat-cloth is significant. It stamps him not only as a man who was discontented with his pound, but also as a man of indolent character, unwilling to use the opportunities of service which were given him. The misuse of the napkin, revealing as it does the lazy habit of the man, is of importance for the right understanding of the parable.

The reference to the napkin in Joh 20:7 is worthy of special attention in connexion with the Resurrection of Christ. Unfortunately neither the Authorized Version nor the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 gives the exact translation of the Greek text. The literal rendering of the passage makes it clear that the napkin which had been placed about Christ’s head before burial was discovered by the two disciples lying where His head had been, in the undisturbed form of a coiled or twisted head-wrapper. The verb ἐντετυλιγμένον should be rendered ‘coiled’ or ‘twisted up,’ and not ‘wrapped together’ as in Authorized Version, or ‘rolled up’ as in Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885, and implies that the napkin was found coiled or twisted together in turban-like fashion, just as if His head had somehow slipped out of it, while the words χωρὶς ... εἰς ἓνα τόπον, translated in both Authorized Version and Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 ‘in a place by itself,’ would be better translated ‘separately (not touching the linen clothes which had been swathing the body) into one place,’ εἰς ἓνα τόπον being the equivalent of εἰς ταῦτό in classical Greek. This rendering of the passage is confirmed by the impression made upon the two disciples by what they witnessed on entering the tomb. It is said that they ‘saw and believed’—saw something, that is, which persuaded them so completely that their Master was risen from the dead that their doubts were immediately resolved, and they proceeded at once to their own home (Joh 20:10) to await the development of events. For a full discussion of the passage and its bearing on the Resurrection, see H. Latham, The Risen Master, p. 40 ff.

☞ Nard

NARD (Heb. נָרְדָּ, from Skr. naladurtha, probably through Persian; Gr. νάρδος, Arab. [Note: Arabic.] sumbul-i-kindī [= Indian spike]).—The chief ingredient in the costly unguents used in the East, and from thence imported to Rome. The word is found in the OT (Son_1:12; Son_4:13-14) and twice in the Gospels (Mar_14:3-5, Joh_12:3-5), occurring in both cases in the account of the anointing of our Lord, in a house at Bethany, by a woman whom St. John identifies as Mary the sister of Lazarus.* [Note: connects this incident closely with the last Passover, but Jn. makes it clear that it happened on the night before the triumphal entry into Jerusalem.] In classical literature there are frequent references to nard. Theophrastus speaks of it as a root (de Odor. 28), and says it came from India (Hist. Plant. ix. 7. 2). Dioscorides, a physician who flourished about a.d. 100, also tells us that it came from India, being found in the Ganges district, and that it had many shaggy (πολύκομος) spikes growing from one root (i. 6. 77). Athenaeus (xv. 691 B), Horace (Od. ii. xi. 16, iv. xii. 16), Ovid (Ars. Am. iii. 443), and Tibullus (ii. 2. 7) make references to it. But our chief authority is Pliny the Elder (Nat. Hist. xii. 26, 27, xiii. 2). He speaks of its great value,† [Note: and Jn. mention 300 denarii (about £10) as the cost per pound of the unguent. Pliny (xii. 26) says that the ‘spicae’ were worth 100 denarii a pound, and in xiii. 2 mentions the price of a similar unguent as rising to 300 denarii per pound.] its adulteration, and the means by which genuine nard may be distinguished from spurious. Genuine (sincerum) nard is known by its lightness, its red colour, its sweet smell, and its peculiar taste (gustu maxime siccante os, sapore iucundo). He also speaks of the use of alabaster boxes to preserve it. (See Alabaster).

It was formerly supposed by Linnaeus and other botanists that nard was an Indian grass; but Sir W. Jones and Dr. Royle, director of the Government Botanical Gardens at Saharunpore from 1823 to 1831, have conclusively proved that it is to be identified with Nardostachys Jatamansi, a plant of the order Valerianaceae, found at great altitudes in North India. This plant bears small spikes of purple flowers, each with four stamens. The part used for making the perfume was the root and lower portion of the stems, which are shaggy ‘like tufts of ermine,’ and to which the skeletons of former leaves adhere, giving them a bristly appearance. It is probably these stems, rather than the flower heads, which Pliny calls spicie. The epithet πιστική applied in Mk. and Jn. to νάροδος may possibly be an attempt to reproduce spieata, which, in vulgar Latin, may have become spicita (see Swete's St. Mark, ad loc., and art. Spikenard in present work).

NATHAN.—A son of king David, named in our Lord's genealogy, Luk_3:31.

☩ Nathanael

NATHANAEL (= Θεόδωρος, 'Gift of God' Heb. נַחֲמָאֵל, [Num_1:8, 1Ch_2:14 etc.]; cf. Adcodatus, Deodatus, Dcusdedit).—We know nothing about him except what is told us in Joh_1:45-51; Joh_21:2. On the question of his identity with Bartholomew, see art. Bartholomew, i. p. 173^a. The place at which Nathanael was found by Philip and brought to Jesus is not mentioned; but it is not improbable that Nathanael was returning from listening to the preaching of the Baptist. He may have been baptized by him. The very detailed account of the calling of Nathanael leads one to suppose that it was an important event, such as the calling of one who was afterwards to be an Apostle. In any case, the local knowledge shown in Joh_1:44 f. is very real and, so far as it goes, it tells in favour of Johannine authorship; for St. John would possess this knowledge, and a later writer would not, and would not care to invent such details. Philip, like Nathanael, was a Galilaean, the one of Bethsaida, time other of Cana (Joh_21:2): they were therefore neighbours, and evidently friends. Like Andrew and John, Philip no sooner finds, or is found by, Christ, than he seeks to make Him known to others. The plural, 'We have found him,' etc., seems to imply that Philip, with Andrew and Peter and John and James, was now a disciple of Jesus. These five formed the beginning of the Christian Church. The order of the words in the Greek is noteworthy: Him of whom wrote Moses in the law' comes first, 'and the prophets' being added as an afterthought; and the whole of this comes with emphasis before the verb, 'we have found.' It looks as if Nathanael and Philip had at times discussed the OT descriptions of the Messiah. At this time Philip would know nothing of the virgin birth at Bethlehem: he quite naturally describes Jesus as He was commonly known. The Scriptures to which he specially refers would be Gen 17:7; Gen 49:10, Deu 18:15.

Nathanael's question, 'Can any good thing?' etc., does not imply that Nazareth had a bad reputation, but that the insignificant village, so close to his own home, was not a likely birthplace for the Messiah. Was a petty place, so familiar to them both, thus honoured? What prophecy said anything of the kind? The prophecy alluded to in Mat 2:23 is not known to us, and was probably unknown to Nathanael. In any case, Nathanael's question confirms the statement that the miracle at Cana was the first of Christ's signs. If Jesus had worked miracles at Nazareth, Nathanael at Cana must have heard of them.

Philip's 'Come and see' is in harmony with the practical bent of his mind (Joh 12:21; Joh 14:8), and is the best answer to anything like prejudice. 'He that doeth the truth cometh to the light' (Joh 3:21, cf. Joh 1:9); and this is what Nathanael does, with good results. It is part of his guilelessness that he is willing to have any prejudice removed, and he at once accepts Philip's proposal; cf. Joh 4:20; Joh 4:30. Christ praises him as truly an Israelite, i.e. as one who has something more than the blood of the patriarch, viz. a character which corresponds to the dignity of the name (Psa 73:1). In him the guile of Jacob the supplanter has given place to the righteousness which wins a victory with God. He is one whose death a prophet may desire (Num 23:10).

Nathanael overhears the praise of himself, and the question with which he replies to it has been criticised as arguing a want of modesty on his part. But his reply does not mean, 'I know that I am all that; but how do you know it?' Rather, he exhibits surprise that a total stranger should express any opinion about him, lie somewhat coldly intimates that he doubts the value of praise which can hardly be based upon experience. But, like Mary's 'How shall this be?' (Luk 1:34), his question does not so much ask for proof as express astonishment. In both cases the proof which was not demanded was granted. Gabriel gave Mary a sign that he could read her future, for he showed that he knew all about Elisabeth's prospects of a son; and Jesus gives Nathanael a sign that He could read his character, for He shows that He knows all about his private conduct (cf. what we read of Elisha in 2Ki 5:26; 2Ki 6:12). Nathanael at once recognizes the significance of this knowledge, and in his reply 'the true Israelite acknowledges his King.'

It is right to allow for the possibility that in Nathanael's confession (Joh 1:49), and in that of the Baptist (Joh 1:34), the Evangelist may be putting into the mouths of others language which had become natural to himself, but was not actually used by them. St. John was so full of the doctrine that Jesus as the Messiah was the Son of God, that he may have made those who accepted Him as the Messiah express their belief in a form which was not used until somewhat later. We must admit that thus to antedate the terminology of a fuller appreciation of the truth would be possible. But Psa 2:6-7 will suffice to explain the language which the Evangelist attributes to the Baptist and to Nathanael. This Psalm was generally recognized as Messianic, and seems to have been very familiar (Act 4:25-28; Act 13:33, Heb 1:5; Heb 5:5). In the fulness of his conviction Nathanael quite naturally uses the fullest Scriptural designation of the Messiah with which he was acquainted. Experience of Christ's miraculous knowledge had convinced him, as it convinced the Samaritan woman (Joh 4:29) and Thomas (Joh 20:27-28), that Jesus stood in the closest relation to God. Hence he uses this title of the Messiah (Joh 11:27, Mat 26:63, Mar 3:11 || Mar 5:7 || Mar 15:39 ||, Luk 4:41) rather than the common 'Son of David' (Mat 9:27; Mat 12:23; Mat 15:22; Mat 20:30-31; Mat 21:9-15; Mat 22:42 etc.). Although 'Son of God' and 'King of Israel' both indicate the Messiah, the titles are not quite synonymous, as is shown by the repetition of 'Thou art.' 'Son of God' gives the relation to God—a relation which would be only vaguely understood by Nathanael; 'King of Israel' gives the relation to the Chosen People. Thus the two titles complete one another.

Nothing is gained by suggesting (Cheyne in Enc. Bibl. iii. col. 3338) that 'when thou wast under the fig-tree' ought to be 'when thou wast making supplication,' because the Hebrew for the one (מִתְחַנֵּן וְאֵתָא, wěattâ mithhannçn) would resemble the Hebrew for the other (תְּתַחֵּן תַּחַת הַאֵילָנָה, wěattâ tahath hattě'çnâ). What the Evangelist gives us is intrinsically more probable, as being more definite, and therefore more likely to impress Nathanael. Nathanael seems to have believed that Jesus knew what he was thinking about under the fig-tree, just as the Samaritan woman believed that He knew all about her past life. Fresh from the teaching of the Baptist, Nathanael may have been meditating on the coming of the Messiah as near at hand. It was under a fig-tree that Augustine heard the 'Tolle, lege' (Conf. viii. xii. 1). See OT reff. to 'fig-tree.'

'Believest thou?' implies something of surprise at the rapidity of Nathanael's conviction (contrast Mar 6:6); but 'thou believest' is perhaps right. Christ approves of his faith and of its basis; and He forthwith promises him an ampler basis, and therefore the prospect of a loftier faith. This wider basis of 'greater things' refers to the public signs which are to follow, and which seem to be alluded to in 'the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.' Angels are instruments of the Divine power in nature (Rev 14:18; Rev 16:5). Nathanael has believed because of a miracle of knowledge which could be appreciated by himself alone: he is hereafter to witness miracles of power which can be appreciated by all. And here it is to be noted that, while the 'Israelite indeed' enters upon a new life in recognizing his King by the sign granted to him, the Messiah Himself enters upon a new career in granting the sign. This private sign to Nathanael was a prelude to those public miracles in which Christ 'manifested His glory' to the Jewish nation and through it to all the world. The angels, who are to be instruments of the manifestation, are represented as being already on earth, the 'ascending' being placed first. They are ready to carry men's prayers to heaven, and to bring down the blessings which prayer wins. But there is a reference to Jacob's dream (Gen_28:12), suggested possibly by the place; for Bethel, Mahanaim, and the ford Jabbok all lay close to the route which Christ would take in going from Judaea to Galilee; and in the narrative in Genesis the ascending angels are mentioned first. What Jacob had dreamed was fulfilled in Jesus. Heaven was opened and remained so (perfect participle) to mankind. Heaven came down to earth in the Person of the Son of God, and, by a regular intercourse between His place of sojourn and His home, man became capable of attaining to heaven. It narrows the meaning far too much when the promise to Nathanael is interpreted of the angels who appeared after the Temptation, at the Agony, and after the Resurrection and Ascension.

The change in the designation of the Messiah is significant. Nathanael had called Him 'the Son of God': He calls Himself 'the Son of Man,' and it is the earliest occasion on which He does so. In the Synoptic Gospels the title 'son of Man' occurs 69 times, and Christ is represented as using it (always of Himself) on about 40 different occasions. In John the title is used 11 or 12 times, Joh_9:35 being doubtful; and none of these passages is parallel to anything in the Synoptics. Here the point may be that He is come, not to revive the old theocracy, nor to 'restore the kingdom to Israel' (Act_1:6), but to redeem the whole human race. It may also be that at this beginning of His ministry Jesus will not definitely accept the title 'Son of God.' Without rejecting it, He substitutes for it a title which seems to have been adopted by Him to veil, rather than to reveal, the fact that He was the Messiah. But here again we must allow for the possibility that the Evangelist is wording Christ's reply according to language which he had often heard from His lips, but which was not used quite so early in the ministry as this.

In Nathanael we have an instance of a good man hampered by prejudice, but quite willing to be enlightened. He comes to the Light, and is searched, approved, and illuminated. In Christ's treatment of him we have an instance of His knowledge of what was in man (Joh_2:25), not only in the case of mankind in general, but with regard to individual character; also of the working of the law that 'whosoever hath, to him shall be given.'

The narrative of the call of Nathanael, like the rest of John 1, strongly confirms the belief that the writer is a Jew of Palestine, well acquainted with the Messianic hopes, and with the traditions and phraseology current in Palestine at the time of Christ's ministry; able also to give a lifelike picture of Christ's first disciples.

⚠Nation

NATION.—This word has two meanings, according as it distinguishes Israel from other peoples, or as it concerns Israel within itself. In the former sense it signifies a State more or less organized, and its keynote is independence; in the latter, a race of common speech and religion, and its keynote is unity. There are two pairs of Greek words corresponding to this distinction. Ἰουδαῖοι is used under the former category, and most frequently by John, who wrote when the Jewish and Christian communities were decisively separated from one another;* [Note: Paul, too, puts Ἰουδαῖοι on the same secular footing as Ἕλληνας; cf. the phrase καὶ Ἰουδαίους καὶ Ἕλλησιν καὶ τῆς ἰσραηλῆσιν τοῦ θεοῦ (1Co_10:32).] whereas Ἰσραήλ is used always with a note of affection and pride by those who count themselves as its members, sharers in the Divine choice and covenant. There is a similar contrast between the words ἔθνος and λαός, the former and ἔθνη (in the phrase 'all nations') being used generally of political States. τὰ ἔθνη has the special meaning of 'the Gentiles,' the non-Jewish peoples (Heb. גוֹיִם), and gradually became ethically blackened, so that Authorized Version instinctively translates 'heathen' (Gal_1:16; Gal_2:9, cf. Mat_6:7 ἔθνηκοί). But the common noun which corresponds with Ἰσραήλ is λαός. It conveys the sense of God's possession and purpose, which are creative of the national unity maintained by the sacrifices and observances of the Law. Its analogue in Heb. is אָמָּץ. As ἔθνη sank down into the meaning of heathen, so λαός is at length appropriated by the Christian consciousness.

The few exceptions to the above rules should be noted. In Luk 7:5; Luk 23:2, and throughout the Fourth Gospel, ἔθνος is used in the place of λαός; for, as was just stated, in the later Apostolic circles the old prerogatives of Israel were claimed for the 'Israel of God,' i.e. the Christians. In Luk 2:10 λαός is translated in Authorized Version as if it were ἔθνη; but Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 corrects it from 'all people' to 'all the people.'

1. Ἰουδαῖοι, ἔθνος, ἔθνη.—In so far as the Jews constituted a body politic, they had lost their independence since Pompey's occupation of Jerus. [Note: Jerusalem.] in b.c. 63, and the Roman hold was tightened by the rule of the Imperial protégé Herod the Great, b.c. 37-4. He obtained from Augustus the title of 'king' in b.c. 30, and large slices of territory, first Samaria, Jericho, and towns in the west, and afterwards the regions between the Lebanon and the Lake of Gennesaret, and eastwards. He greatly enhanced the material glories of the Holy Land, especially by wealth expended on the Temple (Mat 23:16; Mat 24:1, Joh 2:20), by which he hoped to secure the loyalty of the nationalists. But, though he gave lavishly with one hand, he took away cynically with the other. He filled the high priest's office with his own creatures; and by building theatres and pagan temples showed scant respect for the national ideal. 'He founded Καισάρεια (i.e. temples of Caesar) in many towns' outside Judaea (Josephus Ant. xv. ix. 5). His strength lay in his bodyguard of 3000, who were drawn from the Samaritan population, and in the fortified palaces which he built at Jerusalem and Caesarea. By intrigue and assassination he exterminated the rival Hasmonaean house, including his favourite wife and her popular sons. The frenzied act of massacre of the babes of Bethlehem, for which Mat 2:16 is the only authority, is quite in accord with his temper in the later years of his life.

On the death of this Idumaeen tyrant an even sadder chapter from the standpoint of national independence began. For Herod's kingdom was divided among three sons: Philip having the newly added territories of Trachonitis, Ituraea (Luk 3:1), etc.; Antipas succeeding to Galilee and Peraea; and Archelaus, after a long suit at Rome, obtaining the most important part with an allotted income of 600 talents. In a.d. 6, the last-named was finally summoned for his evil courses to Rome, and the unhappy people sank one stage lower in the scale of national independence, being placed under a procurator. This was an exchange for the worse, even from the tyranny of Herod the Great and the iniquities of his son. For although these were only half Judaeans, and in subtle and sometimes pronounced antagonism to the nationalist party, they did not fail to give it some regard; whereas Pontius Pilate and his four predecessors mostly gave up even the attempt to understand so impracticable a people. No wonder 'the revolutionary current was continually increasing among the Jewish people in the time of Christ' (Schürer).

These procurators (ἡγεμόν in NT, ἐπίτροπος more often in Josephus) were not of senatorial or praetorian, but only of equestrian rank, and not absolutely independent of the Syrian governor, though their dealings were mostly direct with Rome. Their power included (a) military and police control. The Jews were themselves free from conscription for military service. But there were plenty of Gentiles in the land to supply the small garrisons required. The centurion (Luk 7:2; Luk 23:47) and his cohort would be required only in a few of the larger towns. The Temple was dominated by the tower of Antonia. The procurator had also (b) judicial authority. His confirmation was required for capital sentences (Joh 18:31), and his executive force carried them into effect (Mat 27:27). Ordinary civil and criminal cases, however, affecting Jews were dealt with at the sessions of the Sanhedrin, and when they appeared to have the people behind their verdict, Pilate was loth to deny them (Mat 27:18; Mat 27:24). He also used his powers of release with a view to propitiating the populace (Mat 27:15). But the name of procurator conveys a special reference to the duties respecting (c) the Roman treasury. Being an Imperial province, the taxes of Judaea were paid to the account not of the Senate, but of Caesar (Mar 12:14). The country was divided into some ten toparchies for fiscal purposes. Tacitus (Annals, ii. 42) speaks of Judaea in a.d. 17 as fessa oneribus. The taxes (land and poll) were collected by State officers; but the customs were farmed to publicani such as Zacchaeus (ἀρχιτελώνης, Luk 19:2) of Jericho.

The rights of the procurator were also enjoyed by the tetrarchs, as well as the right to issue copper coinage. Herod Antipas built Tiberias, S.W. of the Lake, for his capital. Like his father, he tried to propitiate or rather seduce national sentiment by his outlay on public works; and he was at any time ready to use it for his own ends (Mar 3:6; Mar 12:13). Jesus warned His fellow-countrymen against the leaven of Herod (Mar 8:15); and, in response to a crafty attempt to get rid of Him, described the tetrarch as a fox (Luk 13:32). John the Baptist, whose preaching was in his territory, was his victim (Mar 6:17 ff.). But though his partisans were hand and glove with the Pharisees in their hostility to Jesus (Mar 3:6; Mar 12:13), and though we learn from Luke that he associated himself with the condemnation of Jesus, he was not ready to take that awful responsibility upon himself (Luk 23:7-12). The advent of Jesus apparently raised no political excitement in the regions under Philip, because the bulk of the population was non-Jewish. But there was often danger in Galilee (Luk 4:29); and infinitely more in the furnace of fanaticism at Jerusalem (Mar 10:32 f., Joh 11:8).

When Herod the Great died, his policy of getting material benefit for the nation at the cost of its religious ideals was continued by the priests, who exercised the highest civil as well as religious functions. They constituted the majority of the Sanhedrin, which, as the supreme court of appeal, professedly represented the remnant of Jewish independence. But it represented no cause so truly as the vested interests of an order dependent first on the favour of Herod, and then on the pleasure of Rome. Thus in the name of a bastard independence, which meant that they had leave to grow rich and their country leisure to grow outwardly splendid, they opposed any national movement which might provoke the Romans to take away not only the nation, but also 'our place' (Joh 11:48). It was, e.g., the high priest Joazar who checked the threatened revolt in a.d. 7 on the taking of the census by Quirinius. There were even some of the Pharisees who, whether because they were satisfied with the measure of religious liberty accorded under the Imperial administration, or because they shut their eyes to the facts (Joh 8:33), or because they saw in the foreign yoke the discipline of God, resented any movement towards national independence; and perhaps it was some of these who associated themselves with the Herodians in Mat 22:16.

2. Ἰσραήλ, λαός.—But while the independence of the Jewish people was irretrievably mutilated, and the State as a geographical or governmental entity about to perish, the other note of national existence, viz. unity as focussed in the word λαός, was very completely realized. Indeed, as the outer husk decayed, the inner shell grew the harder and tougher. The succession of Pharisees and scribes proved a far surer defence than the dynasty of David. The soul of Judaism was not devoured even by the omnivorous influences of Greek culture. The first steps in this movement were taken by Ezra and Nehemiah, who put an end to mixed marriages among those who had returned from the Exile. The race was adulterated, however, even so late as b.c. 125, when the Idumaeans, being defeated by Hyrcanus, submitted to circumcision. And in respect to language, the Jews of the Dispersion spoke Greek, and read the Scriptures therein; while 'the people of the land' understood Aramaic only (Act 21:40). Religiously, however, the nation was undivided after the Exile, feeling itself to be the special property and instrument of God (Mat 2:6; Mat 3:9, Luk 1:68, Joh 8:41). This unity was expressed not only by the rite of circumcision (Joh 7:22), but also by the keeping of the Sabbath (Mar 3:4), the abstinence from unclean foods, and the worship, without images, of one only God. And these distinctions were guarded by a multitude of observances, which called into requisition the school of scribes trained in the principles of the Pharisees.

But although the scribes claimed to sit in the seat of Moses (Mat 23:2), their authority was not recognized in what may be called the outer circles of Judaism. The Samaritans declined to follow the national Church in its later developments. Hence they were referred to with contempt (Joh 8:48) as outsiders (Luk 17:18), because of their particular objection to the religious monopoly of Jerusalem (Luk 9:53, cf. Joh 4:30). But for all that, they were counted Jews, though grudgingly, as heretics—'the foolish people who dwell in Sichem' (Sir 50:25 f.), and were proud of the Israelite strain in their blood (Joh_4:12). More than that, their doctrinal shortcomings received some countenance in high places; for the Sadducees say only what is written is to be esteemed as legal ... the tradition of the fathers needs not to be observed' (Josephus Ant. xiii. x. 6).

Taken as a whole, however, in despite of the home-land being penetrated under Herodian and priestly influence with Hellenistic speech and culture, and although, what with Essenes on the one hand, and Samaritans on the other, they did not all keep step, the people preserved such unity that they became, if not politically independent, socially isolated. On the one hand, their exemption from military service, from Sabbath employment, and their refusal of market food, drew out the dislike of the populace and the contempt of the cultured classes, so that they were regarded as 'haters of mankind.' On the other hand, the word ἔθνη, meaning the nations outside the Law of the chosen λαός, gathered more and more of moral connotation, as it passed through the meanings of 'Gentile,' 'heathen,' and finally 'sinners' (Mat_26:45; cf. Gal_2:15). The symbol of this rejuvenated Judaism was still the Temple, whither the tribes went up at the national festivals; but its rallying-point was the synagogue, where men were instructed in the Law and Hope of Israel, and where the Pharisees ruled supreme. Their rivals, the Sadducees, had no influence beyond the aristocratic circles at Jerusalem, in the Hellenized cities, and perhaps in Samaritan villages; and though they had a large place in the Sanhedrin, they had to comply with Pharisaic watchwords.

Thus the national life was knit from within, and ruling functions were exercised through officers of the synagogue, such as προεσβύτεροι (Mat_21:23; Mat_26:47), πρώτοι (Luk_19:47), γραμματεῖς (Mar_9:11), or νομικοί (Luk_10:25). Although Palestine was not politically the mistress of her own territories, she was religiously the mother of a people throughout the Empire. The Jews of the Dispersion could but rarely visit the Temple, and they read the Scriptures in the Greek tongue; but in their separate communities they maintained the precepts as to Sabbath rest and clean food under the protection of Roman governors and the Emperor (cf. Act_18:12-15). The Jews could say with Josephus, 'Even if we were deprived of wealth, of towns and of other possessions, the Law remains to us for ever. And no Jew will be so far from his native land, or so much fear a hostile ruler, as not to fear the Law more than him' (c. [Note: circa, about.] Apion. ii. 38).

If it was by the hands of the priests, in the name of national independence, that the Lord was betrayed to the 'nations,' so the chief antagonism which He met in His ministry, and which His spirit encountered afterwards in the Apostolic mission, came from this close-knit theory and practice of national unity. The Pharisees pursued Him from the first because they instinctively saw that the tendency of His teaching (see Nationality) was to break the bonds their traditions had woven, and to act as a solvent on the rigidity of national isolation, which was the only thing left to their pride.

☒ Nationality

NATIONALITY.—This term includes the characteristics created by national ideals and facts. The national environment of Jesus and His disciples has been set forth in the preceding article under the two ideals of independence and unity. Of these ideals the former rested on the Messianic Hope, the latter on the Mosaic Law, which were the key-notes of the most ancient Scriptures of the Jews—the Prophets and the Pentateuch respectively. They provide the clue to all that was distinctive in the nationality which appeared in, around, and against Jesus.

1. The Messianic Hope, with its meaning for independence.—The expectations aroused at the birth of Jesus were by no means of a cosmopolitan character (Mat 1:21; Mat 2:6, Luk 2:10—‘all the people,’ not ‘all people’), even as they appear in the perspective of St. John’s transcendental point of view (Joh 1:29; but cf. Joh 1:31). It was with the hope of keen patriots that the disciples remained with Him to the end (Act 1:6, Mar 10:28). St. Matthew especially represents Him throughout with a glow of nationalist pride, as son of Abraham and of David (Mat 1:1; Mat 9:27; Mat 21:15), and the heir of the prophets (Mat 2:15; Mat 2:23; Mat 4:14; Mat 8:17).

As to Jesus Himself, it cannot be denied that He so far shared the patriotic hopes of His fellow-countrymen as to believe they were to be fulfilled in His own person (Luk 4:21; Luk 7:23; Luk 20:13). We may even venture to say that He counted it a temptation to make His ministry succeed on popular lines (Mat 4:5 f.). At any rate He withdrew from advertisement (Mar 1:36 f.), and from the popular desire to make Him king (Joh 6:15), refused to give a ‘sign’ (Mar 8:12), and seemed to repudiate any claim that rested on succession from David (Mat 22:43-45). But He took as the very keynote of His acceptable and authoritative preaching the phrase which the nationalists used in the name of independence, 'the kingdom of God' or of 'Heaven.' He spoke of His disciples sitting on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes (Mat 19:28). And though He baffled their material hopes over and over again, and left them dumb, He quickened enthusiasm to the highest pitch by His entry into Jerusalem (Mat 21:5 ff.) on lines sketched out by prophecy. And these advances were no accommodation to the popular feeling; they were the expression of His own patriotic consciousness. He declared to the Samaritan woman that salvation is of the Jews (Joh 4:22). He forbade the disciples to address themselves to others than the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mat 10:5 f.). He was loth to discount the value of nationality by admitting a Syrophœnician woman, an alien both in race and in religion, to an equal claim on His brief ministry with the elect people (Mat 15:24; Mat 15:26). Although He allowed the rights of Caesar (Mat 22:21), and authorized His disciples to pay the tribute-money that was due, He reserved the right to consider it an unrighteous infliction (Mat 17:26). With the love of a patriot He wept over Jerusalem because it knew not the day of its visitation, and was near its final ruin (Luk 19:41-44). Though rejected by those who had formulated their own material notions of the Messianic Hope (Mat 16:20 f., Joh 7:45-52; Joh 9:22), it was after all on the ground of His patriotism that Jesus was betrayed into the hands of the Gentiles. When Caiaphas urged this policy, he was moved more by fear for 'our place' than 'our nation.' It was on the charge of having spoken against Caesar (Luk 23:2) that Pilate was induced to condemn Jesus (Joh 19:12; Joh 19:16). It was in the name of the Messianic Hope that He was mocked by the soldiers, and over His cross were written as accusation the words, 'The King of the Jews' (Mar 15:26).

2. The Mosaic Law in its bearing upon unity.—National pride also centred in the unity which was epitomized in the Mosaic Law. Before the death of Herod the Great, two Pharisees were burnt alive for leading an assault upon the golden eagle he had fixed over the gate of the Temple court. And the passion for the Law was no less exaggerated throughout the period of direct Roman rule, as when there was a riot on the occasion of Pilate's bringing the Roman ensigns within the city walls. Jesus Himself was very conscious of the national unity through the Law. He kept the feasts, being found in Jerusalem at the Passover, the Feast of Tabernacles, and of Dedication (cf. Mat 26:55). He was a regular attendant at the synagogue at Nazareth (Luk 4:16); and His interest in these nurseries of nationality was so far recognized that the liberality of Jairus in providing one was assumed to be a claim on His favour (Luk 7:4-5). His works of healing were kept so far as possible on the lines of the Law (Mar 1:44; Mar 5:12-13). He thought of Israel as the Chosen People, and spoke of them as the children' (Mat 8:12; Mat 15:26). Indeed His reverence for the Scriptures (Luk 4:4; Luk 4:8; Luk 4:12; Luk 16:31; Luk 24:25-27), for the Law (Mat 5:19; Luk 10:26-28, Joh 5:45), and for the Temple (Mat 23:17; Mat 23:21, Joh 2:16-17), went far deeper than was appreciated by worldly-minded ecclesiastics (Joh 2:18; Joh 7:46-49).

But with all this tenderness for the obligations of Jewish religion as ties, He resented them as bonds. His perfect allegiance to the truth and grace of God (Joh 1:17) made every lesser loyalty stand in subordination. He withdrew Himself more and more from the passion of nationality as embodied in the religious pedantry and exclusiveness of the Pharisees, until at last it was almost wholly arrayed against Him and He against it (Mat 23:15 etc.). The disparagement of Gentiles with which He began (Mat 6:32; cf. Mat 20:25), turned to denunciation of the false children and unfaithful servants (Mat 21:28-44, cf. Mat 8:12; Mat 11:21). And Luke especially records His kindly attitude towards Samaritans (Luk 9:52; Luk 10:33; Luk 17:16). In regard to the terms of the Mosaic Law, He did not hesitate to act as Lord of the Sabbath in the interests of humanity (Mar 3:4). And, further, He taught that a man could not be defiled by the eating of meats (Mar 7:15), or cleansed by the washing of pans (Mar 7:8). He distressed His disciples by sending away sorrowful a young devotee of the Law (Mar 10:17-22), and offended religious sentiment when He kept company with publicans and sinners (Mat 9:11, Luk 15:2; Luk 19:7).

Thus at length the devoted Student of the Scriptures and whole-hearted Champion of the Law was ejected from the national party as a deceiver (Joh 7:12; Joh 9:22-28, Mat 27:63), and delivered up to the priests and the Romans. While He was finally accused to the Romans as a pretender in the cause of independence, He was attacked from the beginning by the legalists as an enemy to the cause of unity. Though He embodied the Hope of Israel and fulfilled the Law of Moses, it was in the name both of the Hope which the priests mistook and of the Law which the scribes misinterpreted, that Jesus was brought to the cross.

But the essential attitude of Jesus in respect to nationality can be better read in the varied witness of His disciples even than in His own. Within the limits of His short career He conformed to the Law, for He was born under it (Gal 4:4); and He spoke out of a Messianic consciousness (Luk 4:21), because He came unto His own (Joh 1:11). But when He was departed, His disciples 'saw greater things than these.' They perceived that the use of current speech and even contemporary ideals was compatible with a more perfect independence of their limitations than the most antagonistic and revolutionary attitude could express. The ideals of Christ moved with such ease in a plane of thought which is as universal as it is inward, that they could be embodied in the contemporary forms as well as in any other. Whereas the most ardent of reformers, ready to deny standing room to everything established, may be quite exclusively the product of his age, and governed by the most pedantic ideas. Thus the gospel of Jesus was released at once and instinctively from its nationalist setting, with this unique result that it lost nothing but gained everything by its liberation. It is true the company of original Apostles remained Christian Jews; but the leaders came to recognize that they enjoyed no distinctive privilege of the Kingdom which was withheld from the Gentiles. And St. Paul, son of Benjamin and pupil of Gamaliel as he was, drew out to the full logical issue the universal implication of the gospel.

The influence of Jesus upon nationality has been of a composite nature. On the one hand, He has loosened its bonds by enlarging the conception of God and emphasizing the fact of human brotherhood. Nationality was at first constituted under the aegis of the national deity, and provided the practice-ground and range for social ethics. Thus nationality and religion were virtually the same thing, where either meant anything, and where Rome had not obliterated them both by the triumph of material force and the deification by the reigning Emperor. It was to the sacred union of these two ideas of nationality and religion that Jesus was sacrificed. But the sacrifice enabled religion to pass into the higher stage of association with humanity (cf. Joh 12:24; Joh 12:32), for which, through the providential advance of Rome, the world was craving, and towards which in the region of philosophy the Stoics had already felt their way (Act 17:26). What nationality had hitherto done for religion, in providing the scope for its practice of social ethics, humanity was to do henceforth. The barriers had been broken down between Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian, bond and free; they being brought by the blood of the Cross near to God, and so to one another, in order that henceforth the bonds of brotherhood might be of a purely human character, and that the parables of the Good Samaritan and of the Shepherd-judgment might be the pattern and sanction for next-door philanthropies and world-wide missions.

☞ Naturalness

NATURALNESS.—Few terms are more fruitful of fallacious thought than the group including ‘nature,’ ‘natural,’ ‘naturalness.’ In modern usage they are very frequent, and the range of varied meanings which they cover is wide. Thus we speak of natural instinct, natural conduct, natural religion, natural science, and the natural creation, though the single epithet has a different sense in every case. Two phrases like ‘the law of nature' and 'natural law' are verbally equivalent, yet they are very different in significance, the one drawing its connotation from Roman jurisprudence, the other from modern science; the one being concerned entirely with human thought and conduct, the other mainly with inanimate phenomena or those regions of Biology which include creatures of lower organization than man. It is always needful to be on one's guard against the fallacies which so easily arise through such changes in the meaning of a term; for they are apt to be unnoticed when the term itself is constant. But the danger becomes greater when these terms are carried back to a period in which they were in far less frequent use, and when they covered a smaller range of meaning. This was the case in the age of the NT. We have now generalized our ideas, and we speak of 'Nature' in the sense of the Cosmos. It is commonly with a reference more or less definite to the observed order of the Cosmos as a whole that we employ the words 'natural,' 'naturalness'; although there are many instances also in which they have a narrower reference. But in antiquity it was either a particular person or thing, or else a particular class of persons or things—a kind—which was in view; and the nature of this group of instances was the standard of naturalness. So 'life according to nature' meant, not what was in harmony with the universe, nor even what corresponded with environment, but what fulfilled the nature of the man himself. What was 'contrary to nature,' on the other hand, was not what put a man into antagonism with his surroundings, but what amounted to violence done to his better self. The later Stoics, indeed, made approach to the modern use in some directions, and in turn influenced legal principles, and later movements of thought which sought a 'return to nature,' such as that with which the name of Rousseau is connected; but they afford no more than an exception to the general truth that in ancient times the use of the terms under consideration was particularist, while to-day it is commonly generalized or even cosmical.

An examination of the passages in the NT in which naturalness is spoken of bears out this difference fully. In Jam 3:7, e.g., the 'nature of beasts' (φύσις θηρίων) is contrasted with human nature (ἡ φύσις ἡ ἀνθρώπινη); and St. Paul opposes the teaching of nature in the case of the Gentiles to the teaching of law in the case of Jews (Rom 2:14; Rom 2:27); while in 2Pe 1:4 we read of 'a Divine nature' (θεία φύσις). But all such instances which develop the idea of naturalness lie outside the Gospels, and most of them occur in the writings of St. Paul. It is not necessary, therefore, to discuss them fully here; it may suffice to refer to an instructive note by Dr. Armitage Robinson in his Com. on the Epistle to the Ephesians (on Eph 2:3), pp. 49-51.

The words which are rendered by 'nature' or the like in the Authorized and Revised Versions are φύσις, φυσικός, ὁμοιοπαθής, and ψυχικός, but the last is only translated ‘natural’ where it stands opposed to πνευματικός, and there the rendering is not satisfactory though none better is easily found. None of these words, however, occurs in the Gospels at all: and the entire absence from the Gospels of terms directly expressive of naturalness is in itself a warning against attempting to bring the facts of Jesus Christ’s life under this category without care and caution.

There is, however, profound truth in Tertullian’s saying, ‘Anima naturaliter Christiana,’ and it is no false extension of this if one speak of the naturalness of Jesus Christ as perfect, since in Him the best and highest nature of man is shown complete and unalloyed for once. Such a mode of expression would only serve to heighten the supplementary aspect of the truth which comes out in the contrast that St. Paul emphasizes between the first Adam as the ‘natural man’ (ψυχικός), and the last Adam as the ‘life-giving spirit’ (1Co_15:45). It is along this line that the explanation must be sought of what some have felt as a serious difficulty, namely, that few principles in Christ’s teaching can be instanced to which parallels of earlier date may not be adduced. Not only the writings of the OT Prophets and Psalmists, but also the religious teachers of other races, such as Gautama, Epictetus, or those collected in the Tao of China, afford numerous anticipations of the Lord’s words. It could not be otherwise if the true nature of man be realized in Him; if God purposed ‘to sum up all things in Christ’ (Eph_1:10); if He was ‘the true light which lighteth every man’ (Joh_1:9). A similar consideration enables one to understand the remarkable fact that Christ’s appeal is to men of all races. ‘One touch of nature makes the whole world kin’: apart from this, the fact, to which ever-widening experience bears witness, that in all races ‘his sheep hear his voice,’ would be most wonderful, not to say inexplicable.

It is quite in keeping with this view of the facts, that the Lord Jesus never hesitated to appeal to the natural instinct of men On questions of conscience. e.g. ‘Doth not each one of you on the Sabbath loose his ox or his ass ...? And ought not this woman to have been loosed from this bond ...? (Luk_13:15 f., cf. Luk_14:5). He also employed expressions in reference to Himself which may be said implicitly to make naturalness the criterion of conduct. e.g. ‘Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness’ (πρέπον ἐστὶν ἡμῖν, Mat_3:15); ‘Behoved it not the Christ to suffer?’ (οὐχὶ ταῦτα ἔδει παθεῖν τὸν Χριστόν, Luk_24:26). This last usage is very characteristic of the Ep. to Heb. (cf. Heb_2:17 ὄφειλεν ... ὁμοιωθῆναι; Heb_2:10 ἔπρεπεν αὐτῷ), and the similar expression in Heb_7:26 ἡμῖν καὶ ἔπρεπεν ἀρχιερεὺς, which bases on the nature God has given us the natural expectation which must be formed of Christ). See Newman Smyth, Old Faiths in New Light, 105.

☒ Nature And Natural Phenomena

NATURE AND NATURAL PHENOMENA.—1. The inquiry as to the attitude taken up by Jesus towards the natural, visible, tangible world which is the physical environment of the soul, is affected and limited by the fact that our Lord was not a philosopher or a scientist, but a spiritual teacher. His only mission was to preach the doctrine of the Kingdom of God, and to this He rigidly restricted Himself. Thus He nowhere enunciates a cosmology; He gives us no explicit theory of the providential order; He leaves the scientific conceptions of His day where they were, correcting no current mistakes as to the meaning of natural phenomena, and giving no intellectual synthesis of His own of the facts of the physical universe (see Wendt's Teaching of Jesus, i. pp. 151-153). This at once both hampers us and frees us in dealing with our special subject. It hampers us because we have to glean such hints as are possible for our purpose from scattered references to natural phenomena and to the order of nature as a whole, which occur incidentally in His teaching. But it also assists us by enabling us to understand that no sinister or misleading suggestions lurk behind the silence of Jesus on the innumerable problems that try the modern mind in its outlook on the natural order. The revelation of Jesus does not contain a complete conspectus of the facts of the world in all their aspects: it is a spiritual revelation, which aims at the enlightenment of the soul as to the vital truths of conduct, and as to the ideal relations between it and its Heavenly Father. Every element in the teaching is subordinate to this central consideration. In seeking for such light as is possible on the attitude of our Lord to the physical world, we must, therefore, bear this limitation constantly in mind.

2. We also find here the key to the kind of references which are made by our Lord to the facts of nature. These references are, fortunately for our purpose, very numerous in proportion to the bulk of His teaching as it has come down to us, and this for a reason we shall presently deal with. But they all belong (1) to the class of facts that were quite familiar to His hearers. His aim was always entirely practical, and His illustrations and references to nature are thus extremely simple and obvious. We seek in vain for any recondite, or technical, or unusual allusions; they all lie consistently in the path of common observation; so much so that hardly any of them need interpretation to the simplest modern minds. And (2) they are of that class which lend themselves obviously to the uses of illustration, being vivid, pictorial, and frequently recurrent in the lives of ordinary men and women, so that anyone familiar with His teaching could not fail afterwards to be reminded of the spiritual truths He had taught, because no one could go through a single day of average experience without coming across one or more of the natural facts used in His matchless collection of illustrations. By this means He turned nature into a whispering gallery of spiritual truths, and filled each common day with perpetual reminders of His central teaching, thus enlisting both the understanding and the memory of His followers in His permanent service as a revealer of religious truth. Any devout and careful student of the Gospels will readily find the justification of these remarks in the pages of the Evangelists.

3. Incidental, however, as are the references to nature and natural phenomena in the words of Jesus, they are full of suggestiveness as to His attitude to the material world. Through the rigid self-limitation which He imposed on Himself we catch the glow of His spirit; through the narrow windows of His imagery rays of light pour out in many directions on the mysteries of life and providence. It is not, perhaps, possible to construct a complete Christian Weltanschauung, or 'View of the World,' out of the scattered references of Jesus to nature; but in the light of His teaching it is certainly possible to suggest the lines along which such a theory must run. His doctrine of the Fatherhood necessitated an attitude towards nature as well as man, and this attitude is consistently maintained by Him in all His words and habits of thought as recorded in the Gospels.

4. Christ's theory of Providence in the natural order.—(1) The first characteristic in the attitude of Jesus towards the facts and arrangements of the organic world is a certain beautiful calmness and serenity. The facts which so deeply disturb us in our view of nature—suffering, the preying of one animal on another, death—were just as familiar to Him, who was an accurate and careful observer, as to ourselves; moreover, He who was so sympathetic with men in their sorrows, must have been equally accessible to the sorrows of dumb creatures. Yet there is no trace of any disturbance of mind in Him as He met these familiar facts. His profound trust in God's goodness to His creatures enabled Him to view their sufferings with an equanimity in which there could have been no trace of hardness or indifference. It is the calmness of a mind so firmly centred in the idea of the Divine love and care that it suffers no shock at the most disturbing and harrowing of natural events. His references to the Providence that looks after the interests of flowers and birds, which are 'clothed' and 'fed' by God Himself, are full of a sense of the Divine benignity and goodwill towards His meanest creatures, and He uses this fact as an argument to quell the needless anxiety of men, who belong to a far higher order of being (Mat_12:12), as to the sources and sureness of the natural provision for their own life and wellbeing. If God so 'clothes the grass of the field,' and 'feeds the fowls of the air,' He will surely much more attend to the temporal wants of His children so that they may consider themselves free to attend to their proper spiritual interests (Mat_6:25-34). That the optimism of Jesus is not the result of careless observation or lack of sympathy is seen also in His acknowledgment of the evanescence and perishableness of vegetable and animal life (Mat 6:30). Jesus teaches us that ‘God feeds the sparrow and also attends his obsequies’ (Luk 12:24, cf. Mat 10:29). The sufferings peculiar to animal life and the incidence of natural death are clearly normal facts in our Lord’s view of nature, and need contain no problem for faith.

(2) Another feature of our Lord’s view of the providential order is His recognition of the orderliness and faithfulness of natural law. There is every indication that in realizing this He found a deep and constant pleasure. The world to Him was the home of order, and, as such, an indication of the will and character of the Creator and Sustainer of all things. He loved to notice and draw attention to this characteristic of the natural world (cf. Mat 5:13; Mat 7:16-18; Mat 7:24-27, Mar 4:4-8; Mar 4:26-28; Mar 9:50, Luk 10:18; Luk 12:24; Luk 13:8; Luk 19:34, Joh 3:8; Joh 10:3-5; Joh 15:1-4 etc.) Specially interesting to Him were all the phenomena of growth, which He so often uses as a symbol of the laws of the spirit (Mar 4:4-8; Mar 4:26-28; Mar 4:31 f., Mar 13:28, Luk 13:8; Luk 13:21, Joh 15:2-4), and of the habits of animals (Mat 6:26; Mat 7:15; Mat 10:16, Luk 13:34; Luk 17:37, Joh 10:3-5; Joh 10:12 etc.).

(3) This leads us to the most important of all the characteristics exhibited in our Lord’s treatment of natural phenomena—His profound sense of the function they fulfil as suggesting spiritual facts and laws. His purpose in using natural imagery is not summed up in the fact of its picturesqueness and mnemonic aptness. However handy it may have been as a mould into which to throw His teaching, He evidently believed that there was in addition to this a real correspondence between the laws of organic and of spiritual life. He lived in two worlds, with an intensity of interest that has seldom been approached—the world of sense and the world of spirit. These two worlds to most men are divided by a deep chasm; but to Him there were innumerable bridges of connexion between them, and His thoughts traversed these in a perpetual play of happy insight, finding in both unending correspondences that were real and true, each shedding light into the heart of the other. Or, to vary the simile, we may say that to Him nature was the mirror of the spirit, in which He ever caught glimpses of the profoundest laws and operations of the higher life of the soul and of the character of God as the Lord of both. When He said, ‘The kingdom of God is like—,’ He was exercising no mere ingenuity of fancy, neither was He inventing fictitious similarities between disconnected spheres of existence; rather He was holding up the gold and silver sides of the same bright shield of Truth.

(4) In entire consistence with this view of our Lord’s imagery, we notice the complete absence, in His view of the world, of any such distinction as has been drawn by modern thinkers between the natural and the supernatural. Living, as He did, in the perpetual sense of His Father’s presence and power and love, such a distinction would be to Him utterly unreal. In His cosmology there was no third term, such as ‘force,’ or 'energy,' or 'law,' coming in immediately between the Divine will and its result. There was only God—the Creator and Sustainer—and nature was the material expression of His loving care and energy. What we would attribute to a secondary or efficient cause He always attributed to the direct activity of the Father. 'Your heavenly Father feedeth them.... Shall he not much more clothe you ...?' 'Not one of them falleth to the ground without your Father ...' 'My Father worketh hitherto.' In this sense of the immediacy of the Divine activity we find one of the most characteristic traits of the religious attitude of Jesus towards the natural world. The same consideration throws a suggestive light on the way in which He exercised His 'miraculous' gifts. To Him there was nothing 'supernatural' or inexplicable in the wonderful deeds He wrought. They were rather perfectly natural signs of the activity of God in and through Him: 'My Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works' (Joh 14:10). Even in the case of an act of healing which was performed without any overt reference to the Divine power, as when He said, 'I will, be thou clean' (Luk 5:13), the same attitude of dependence on the Father's favour and power must be presupposed (cf. Joh 5:19). To Jesus, therefore, the wonderful works which He wrought were but the expression of the will of God through Him, and were as natural as the forces that eventuate in the 'blowing clover and the falling rain.' If this were borne in mind, perhaps the difficulty of the miraculous would not be what it is to many nowadays. The key would be seen to lie in the region of personality rather than of a 'supernatural' law over-riding a natural law. Jesus being who and what He was, it was as natural for Him to work miracles' and to exercise an exceptional control over the 'forces' of nature, as it was for Napoleon to do extraordinary things through his gift of control over men, or for a great scientist to initiate fresh changes in the forms and conditions of matter. The differentia of the soul of Jesus was an unbroken fellowship with God as His Father, which manifested itself in all He did, and, among other ways, ill the power to use natural forces in a unique way in order to fulfil His filial mission.

5. There is another aspect of the attitude of Jesus to nature and natural phenomena which must not be overlooked, and which, however incidental it may be to His mission as such, is replete with suggestion and helpfulness. We have pointed out that His scientific and philosophic interest in nature was merged into the religious interest which always controlled His soul. What of the artistic interest which is so strong in the highest type of mind? Here again we must speak of the subordination of all to the spiritual outlook and temper. None the less is it clear that Jesus was profoundly sensitive to the beauty of the world. He loved Nature for her own sake, and because she ministered to His love of what was fair and good to look at. And if it is true that the 'function of art is (1) to teach us to see, (2) to teach us what to see, and (3) to teach us to see more than we see,' then the discourses of Jesus reveal the artistic temperament in all His references to the facts of the natural order. See art. Poet.

(1) His faculty of observation was extraordinary. His eye took in the smallest detail of the outward world with loving appreciation. We have references to the march of the seasons (Mat_24:32, Mar_13:28); to the orderly stages of growth (Mar_4:28); to the varying response of various kinds of soil (Mar_4:4-8); to the mystery of development (Mar_4:27; Mar_4:31); to the habits and dispositions of animals (Mat_10:16, Luk_9:58; Luk_13:34; Luk_17:37, Joh_10:3-5; Joh_10:12, cf. Mat_7:15); to the customs of the household (Luk_13:21, cf. the many references to the law of hospitality, and to human intercourse and social life). He was never at a loss, indeed, in drawing upon the resources of His observation for the purpose of illustrating His own teaching, but was like a householder, 'bringing forth from his treasure things new and old' (Mat_13:52).

(2) In the same way He teaches us what to see. A wise selection must be made in storing the mind with facts and impressions, so that the multiplicity of Nature may not overwhelm the mind, or cause us to lose our way in the confusion of her wealth. And while, as we have seen, there was nothing too great or too small to arrest His eye or interest His mind, there is one interest which evidently dominated His mind in His watchful observation of natural phenomena. That was the ordinary human interest. And this is always true of the highest art. The painter, the poet, the sculptor, are eminently and broadly human in their approach to Nature; what has no reference to human experience and action and passion lies outside the scope of her appeal to them. A glance at our Lord's parables and illustrations at once reveals this dominant human interest. He refers only to those aspects of nature that in some more or less definite way intermingle with the daily or occasional experience of human beings. There was a practical as well as artistic purpose in this; for He was thus able to interest His hearers more readily in the higher truths which He was anxious to impress upon their minds and to commend to their sympathies.

(3) He teaches us to see more than we see, for the natural became in His hands a translucent veil through which the spiritual poured its light and inspiration into the hearts of men. Here art once more became handmaid to religion: and the beauty of nature became a vehicle for the higher beauty of holiness and truth. The same artistic gift is seen in the beautiful, vivid, and balanced form in which He clothed His imagery and parabolic teaching. His language is wonderfully clear and pictorial and apt: the mould into which He runs His illustrations is in keeping with the simplicity and beauty of its content. There is the happiest marriage of word and fact, type and antitype, in His teaching. This reveals the Master both of material and of expression. The earthly forms in which the Incarnate Word enshrined His message have caught something of His own Eternal quality and beauty, and will stand for ever as unique and unforgettable as the truth they embody. 'The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life' (Joh_6:63).

⚡ Nazarene

NAZARENE

1. Introductory.—‘Nazarene’ is a descriptive term applied in the Gospels and Acts to Jesus and His followers. The epithet is also regularly applied in the Talmud to Jesus (צַרְתָּנוּ לְיֵשׁוּעַ Sanh. 43a, 107b; Sota, 47a) and His disciples (צַרְתָּנוּ Taan. 27b). As usually understood, ‘Nazarene’ in the first place meant ‘of [the town of] Nazareth,’ and indeed this explicitly appears in some passages in the Gospels (e.g. Mar_1:9 ‘Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee,’ Luk_2:4 etc.); but, according to Cheyne, the name Nazareth in its original significance was the designation not of a town but of a district, and ‘Nazarene’ is primarily equivalent to ‘Galilaeen’ (see, further, below, and art. Nazareth).

Sometimes a descriptive clause with ἀπό followed by the place-name appears: e.g.

Mat_21:11 ‘This is Jesus the prophet from Nazareth of Galilee’ (ὁ ἀπὸ Ναζαρέθ τῆς Γαλιλαίας); cf. Act_10:38 (Ἰησοῦν τὸν ἀπὸ Ναζαρέθ).

2. The two Gr. equivalents of ‘Nazarene.’—In the Greek Test. two words correspond to ‘Nazarene,’ viz. Ναζαρηνός and Ναζωραῖος. In WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort’s text.]’s text the former occurs in Mar_1:24; Mar_10:47; Mar_14:67; Mar_16:6, also in Luk_4:34 (where it may be dependent on the Markan source).* [Note: It occurs again only in Luk_24:19, where, however, the reading is doubtful (AD read Ναζωραῖος).] In Mt., Jn., Acts (and perhaps originally in Lk.), Ναζωραῖος is exclusively used. Probably Ναζαρηνός was employed in the earliest source, and this was given up later for Ναζωοαῖος.

Ναζαρηνός is derived from Ναζαρά, like Μαγδαληνή from Μαγδαλά. The forms Ναζωοαῖος, Ναζαρετ, Ναζαρεθ imply Heb. forms נַצְרַת, נַצְרַת.† [Note: such forms as נַצְרַת (1Ki 17:9) in Bibl. Hebrew.] The Talmudic form נַצְרַתִּי may be derived from נַצְרַת (or its masc.) with change of â to ô (ô). See Dalman, Gram. d. Jüd.-Pal. [Note: Palestine, Palestinian.] *Aram.*² [Note: designates the particular edition of the work referred] p. 152 n. [Note: note.] The same scholar thinks Ναζωοαῖος implies a Heb. form נַצְרַתִּי (connected with a by-form of the place-name נַצְרַת), op. cit. p. 178, n. [Note: note.]
2. Does Ναζωοαῖος (= נַצְרַתִּי) represent the dialectical form current in Judaea (cf. esp. Joh 19:19, Act 24:5)? This is possible. For a different view, see below.

The exact relation borne by these two forms to one another, as well as the significance to be attached to this relationship, raise a difficult problem. The points involved come to a head in Mat 2:23, where it is stated that the child Jesus was brought to Nazareth that 'it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene' (Ναζωοαῖος). Of the various explanations of this passage that have been proposed the most important are: (1) those that connect it with the Hebrew word naḥzer ('branch,' 'sprout') in the Messianic passage, Isa 11:1. (2) The interesting view of Hitzig that Ναζωοαῖος (Act 24:5) was suggested by נַצְרַתִּי in the (unpointed) text of Isa 49:6 regarded as = σωζόμενοι ('those who are being saved') in contradistinction to ἀπολλύμενοι (1Co 1:18; 1Co 1:21 'them that are perishing'). Later the word נַצְרַתִּי was taken to be a singular to correspond with the parallel עַבְד (‘servant’), and applied to Jesus (with a play upon the place-name Nazareth). This is very ingenious, but hardly convincing. It would be better to suppose that the (unpointed) נַצְרַתִּי of the passage was read נַצְרַתִּי, the Heb. form implied, as Dalman thinks, by Ναζωοαῖος, and applied by Jewish-Christian exegesis to Jesus.‡ [Note: The verse so interpreted would run: 'It is too light a thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and (shouldst be) the Nazarene (נַצְרַתִּי) to restore Israel; I will also give thee for a light of the Gentiles,' etc. This is one of the Servant-passages which was undoubtedly applied to Jesus in early Jewish-Christian circles. Cf. Luk 2:32.] (3) Cheyne§ [Note: Developing a theory suggested by Neubauer and Grätz. See EBi, col. 3360, s.v. 'Nazareth.'] doubts whether Nazareth was ‘originally the name of a town (or village) at all.’ The earlier and more correct form of the word is Nazara, implying a Heb. form נָצְרָה (or נְצֻרָה, also desiderated by the Talmudic נְצֻרִינוּ): and this again is a by-form of the same word which enters into the second element of the name Gennesar (Gennesaret). This Nazara is really a name of Galilee, and Ναζωραῖος = Galilaeen. The word of the ‘prophets’ referred to in Mat 2:23 becomes, on this view, Isa 9:1 f. (‘the land of Zebulun, and the land of Naphtali ... Galilee of the Gentiles’) rather than Isa 11:1.

It seems clear from the NT data that the term ‘Nazarene’ was an early designation applied to Jesus and His disciples generally. It thus was the Jewish (Oriental) equivalent of the specifically Gentile term ‘Christian.’ ‘Nazarene’ was not the title given by the Christians of Palestine to themselves, but by others outside the Christian fellowship. The names for, and used by, themselves were much more probably such as ‘believers,’ || [Note: | See Faith. It is always important to distinguish the names used by a body of itself from those given by outsiders. Another case is probably ‘Pharisees,’ Heb. רִשְׁוֹנִים = (?) ‘separatists.’ Their own name for themselves in the earlier period may have been hâsîdîm, ‘pious’: later, such terms as חֲכָמִים ‘wise,’ חֲכָמִים, חֲכָמִים ‘colleague,’ were used. Cf. also remark on Ebionites at end of article.] ‘brethren’ (e.g. Act 9:30), ‘saints’ (Act 9:13, etc.), ‘elect.’ In time ‘Nazarene’ seems to have acquired a somewhat contemptuous or, at any rate, hostile nuance (cf. Joh 1:46). The followers of ‘the Nazarene’ had evidently been made to feel the reproach of the alleged Galilaeen origin of their Messiah.* [Note: The Galilaeen population seems to have been by no means strict in carrying out certain legal enactments regarded as important by the Rabbis. A feeling of distrust, if not of contempt, of the Galilaeen population seems to have prevailed in Rabbinical circles. For a full and minute investigation of the relevant data, see the valuable monograph of A. Büchler (Der galilaische ‘Am-ha-ares des zweiten Jahrhunderts, Vienna, 1906).] Moved by these influences, the Jewish-Christians seem to have transformed the title Ναζαρηνός –which had now become in the mouths of their opponents an opprobrious one–into the honorific one Ναζωραῖος, and to have substituted the latter for the former. In this way, at any rate, Mt. seems to turn the edge of the reproach levelled at the Christian Messiah in the characteristically Jewish-Palestinian designation of Jesus as ‘the Nazarene’ (נְצֻרִינוּ יֵשׁוּעַ). Assuming, then, that the term Ναζωραῖος is an honorific title educated in this way by the Jewish-Christians themselves, it remains to elucidate the process by which the form was arrived at, and its exact significance.

Ναζωραῖος may be a Greek form of nâzûrû (נְצִירָא), † [Note: Or rather the adjectival form of this, נְצִירָא. The Aram. word נְצִירָא is guaranteed by the SYR. ܢܘܨܝܪܐ = surculuc (Heb. נֶצֶר); see Payne-Smith, Thes. col. 2443.] the Aram. Aramaic equivalent of the Heb. Messianic term נֶצֶר ‘Branch’ or ‘shoot.’ The selection of this particular Messianic term was dictated by the necessity of finding a counter-term to Ναζαρηνός. Ναζωραῖος is thus an honorific title given by the disciples themselves to Jesus, and expresses the conviction that He was the nezer of Isa 11:1—the ‘Branch’ of Messianic Prophecy. Its application to members of the Christian community naturally followed. See also following article.

3. ‘Nazarene’ as a community-designation.—It is clear not only from Act 24:5 but also from Mat 2:23 that the Christian communities of Palestine, and even outsiders, at first bore the name of ‘Nazarenes.’ The writer of Mat 2:23 evidently belonged to a community so designated. The name is, of course, specifically Jewish, and it remained the characteristic Oriental-Jewish term for Christians generally (e.g. in the Talmud), though primarily it was the Jewish Christians of Palestine who were thought of. An interesting piece of early evidence of this usage has in recent years come to light in the Palestinian recension ‡ [Note: Discovered by Prof. S. Schechter among the Cairo Genîzâh MSS, and published by him in the JQR, vol. x. [1898] pp. 654-659.] of the Shemoneh Esreh. As is well known, the 12th of these ‘Benedictions’ contains the famous imprecation on ‘slanderers’ or ‘heretics.’ In the Palestinian version an explicit reference is made to ‘Nazarenes and Sectaries’ (mîmîm). § [Note: See, further, an art. by the present writer in Church and Synagogue, vol. v. [1903] p. 167 ff. (‘The Jewish Prayer against Heretics’).] Though the clause containing these words may not belong to the earliest form of the prayer (early 2nd cent. a.d.), it is, at any rate, not very much later. Jerome (Ep. 112) makes allusion to the use of this ‘cursing’ prayer in the Jewish synagogues throughout the East.

A Jewish-Christian sect of ‘Nazarenes’ is referred to both by Jerome and Epiphanius. They are apparently to be distinguished from the Ebionites, though very little exact information is extant concerning them. || [Note: | Possibly ‘Ebionites’ (Heb. עִבּוֹנִי = ‘poor men’) was a more general term, and may have been given by Jewish-Christians to themselves. See art. Ebionism.]

☩ Nazareth

NAZARETH (Ναζαρά, Ναζαράτ, Ναζαρέθ, Ναζαρέτ).—The town of Nazareth, the modern en-Nâsira, was situated in Lower Galilee, 5½ miles almost due west of Mount Tabor, and nearly as far in a southwesterly direction from Kefr Kennâ, the site that is usually identified with Cana of Galilee. The road that ascends from the latter place winds through the high valley in which Nazareth lies, and divides a short distance south of the town, the south-eastern branch finding its way to Jezreel, and thence down the valley to Beth-shean and the Jordan, the western crossing the low pass of the Samaritan hills, by ancient Megiddo, to join eventually the great trunk road north and south, on the plain by the sea. The town itself, however, lay retired from the great highways of commerce, though within easy reach, almost within sight of them; and its secluded position explains the absence of any mention of Nazareth in the OT or Josephus. The modern village, with a population of seven or eight thousand, clings to the foot of the hill. But the ancient town seems to have spread considerably higher up the slope, and from 'the brow of the hill on which the city was built' (Luk 4:29), 1600 ft. above the level of the sea, one of the finest views in Palestine is said to be obtained, embracing on the one side the valley of the Jordan and the mountains of Gilead, and on the other the blue waters of the Mediterranean.* [Note: For a description of Nazareth and its site see G. A. Smith, HGHL, London, 1894, p. 432 ff.; Baedeker's Palestine; PEF Memoirs, i. pp. 262 f., 275-79, 328 f.; A. P. Stanley, SP, London, 1860, p. 365 ff.; cf. W. Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels, Oxford, 1903, p. 49 f., with plates; Ramsay, Education of Christ, p. 47.]

That in our Lord's time Nazareth was a place of considerable importance is indicated by the fact that it is always referred to in the NT as a city (πόλις, Mat 2:23, Luk 1:26; Luk 2:4; Luk 2:39) not a village (κώμη). It was in touch with, but not harassed by the currents of popular, commercial, or political life. And there appears to be no real justification for the belief that Nazareth or its people were in any sense insignificant or despised.† [Note: See especially Selah Merrill, Galilee in the Time of Christ, London, 1886, chs. xvii, xviii.] The words of Nathanael (Joh 1:46), which have given currency to this view, are perhaps misunderstood. He must himself have shared the universally accepted belief that the Christ could come only from Bethlehem (cf. Mat 2:5, Joh 7:42); and if his language is intended to express disdain, it is no more than that of the polished town-dweller for the uncultivated rural population who know nothing of his artificial rules of propriety and manners. As to the Athenian every native of Bœotia was a dullard, so to the refined habitué of Jerusalem the rustic of Galilee may well have appeared uncouth and contemptible. These characteristics might not improbably have become accentuated in the case of Nazareth, owing to its withdrawn position in a self-contained upland valley. Under any circumstances Nathanael's words bear witness only to a personal opinion, and are no evidence of a widespread or general belief.

With the exception of the events of the early ministry recorded in Luk 4:16 ff., the direct references to Nazareth in the Gospels are all associated with the birth and boyhood of Jesus. It was to Nazareth that the angel Gabriel was sent, to Mary His mother (Luk 1:26); and thither His parents came to find a home after the flight into Egypt (Mat 2:23). From Nazareth they journeyed into Judaea for the purpose of the Roman enrolment (Luk 2:4), returning to the same city when the requirements of the Jewish law for the purification of Mary had been satisfied (Luk 2:39). Twelve years later a similar visit to Jerusalem, in accordance with His parents' annual practice (Luk 2:41 f.), and return to Nazareth (Luk 2:51), make it evident that the home during this period had been at the latter town. On the occasion of His baptism, it is from Nazareth that, according to St. Mark (Mar 1:9), Christ came to the Jordan; the other Synoptists merely state that the journey was made from Galilee (Mat 3:13), or name no place (Luk 3:21). His early life, therefore, was spent at Nazareth, and only in consequence of the opposition aroused by His preaching in the synagogue and the murderous attempt upon His life (Luk 4:28 f.) did He abandon Nazareth and take up His abode at Capernaum (Mat 4:13). Thenceforward He does not appear to have visited, or to have had any direct relations with, His former home. Its name, however, continued to cling to Him, and by that designation He is known to the 'multitudes' at Jerusalem at the Passover, the stranger-pilgrims from Galilee His native province (Mat 21:11). Philip uses the name when he calls Nathanael to Jesus (Joh 1:45); and later in the history it is employed by Peter at Caesarea (Act 10:38) as a well-known title with which Gentiles also would be familiar.

The precise form of the word and its signification are alike uncertain. In two passages (Mat 4:13, Luk 4:16) the oldest Manuscripts read Ναζαρά, and are followed by all recent editors. Elsewhere in the Synoptic Gospels WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] print Ναζαρέτ, with the exception of Mat 21:11 (Ναζαρέθ), Tischendorf reads

Ναζαορέθ consistently in all passages of Matthew and Luke (except Ναζαορά, as above), adding with reference to the usage of the latter a note (on Luk 1:26) that on a comparison of all the instances in which the name occurs in St. Luke, including Act 10:38, the decision must be that the Evangelist wrote Ναζαορέθ not Ναζαορέτ, a variable usage between the two forms being inconceivable.* [Note: ναζαορετ, C. ⚭ BKLXII al permn e q. Conlatis omnibus hujus evangclii locis (quibus accedit Act 10:38 - εθ ⚭BCDE) Lucam ναζαορεθ scripsisse statuendum est non ναζαορετ, nisi quod Act 4:16 formam eum ναζαορα adhibuisse suadent testes. Inter -εθ enim et -ετ eundem scriptorem fluctuasse incredibile est.] In Mark and John the form Ναζαορετ and in Acts Ναζαορέθ is accepted by all with the more ancient Manuscripts ; and in Mar 1:9; the form Ναζαοράτ is found in AP. Dr. Hort also states that in eight out of the eleven passages in the Gospels the Codex Sangallensis has Ναζαοράθ, but that the form ‘has little other attestation.’ It would seem probable that the variations in spelling, where they are not merely accidental, are due to local or dialectic peculiarities,† [Note: Compare shibboleth and sibboleth (Jdg 12:6),] and are to be ascribed to the transmitters of the tradition or the copyists of the documents rather than to the original authors.‡ [Note: Hort, however, write:—‘The evidence (for the spelling of the name Nazareth) when tabulated presents little ambiguity, Ναζαορά is used at the outset of the Ministry in Matthew 1/3, (Mat 4:13) and Luke 1/5, (Luk 4:16); Ναζαορέθ in Matthew 1/3, (Mat 21:11), the only later place in the Gospels where the name occurs, and in Acts; and Ναζαορετ certainly or probably in all other places’ (New Testament in Greek, Notes on Orthography, p. 160).]

The adjective also appears in two different forms. The Second Gospel uses only Ναζαορηνός (Mar 1:24; Mar 10:47; Mar 14:67; Mar 16:6); Matthew and John have always Ναζαοραιος (Mat 2:23; Mat 26:71, Joh 18:5; Joh 18:7; Joh 19:19). St. Luke has both in his Gospel (-ορηνός, Luk 4:34; Luk 24:19; -ορηνός, Luk 18:37), but in the Acts only Ναζαοραιος (Act 2:22; Act 3:6; Act 4:10; Act 6:14; Act 22:8; Act 24:5; Act 26:9). In no instance is there any important difference of reading. Neither the noun nor the adjective is found in the Epistles or the Book of Revelation.

There is no agreement, again, with regard to the meaning or derivation of the name. St. Matthew sees in the return to Nazareth a fulfilment of the prophecy of Isa 11:1 (‘a branch (nçzer) out of his roots shall bear fruit’), thus connecting Nazareth with the Hebrew נִצֵּר ‘shoot,’ ‘sprout’; and some have therefore supposed that the name was given to the town in reminiscence of Isaiah’s language, and on account of the circumstances of our Lord’s early life there. Such an origin of the term is perhaps not impossible, although it hardly commends itself as probable; and of course no such thought was in the mind of the writer, or is intended to be suggested by his words. Others have sought a connexion with the root נִצֵּר in the sense of keeping watch or guard; e.g. Dr. Swete would follow Delitzsch and Dalman in explaining Nazareth to mean ‘watch-tower.’ § [Note: See his note on Mar_1:9; Aram. נִצְרָה, נִצְרָה. Cf. also Merrill. loc. cit. p. 122.] This would imply either that the town itself was on the top of the hill, or that it took its name from the hill on the slopes or at the foot of which it stood; the former would seem to be contrary to fact, and the latter improbable. It would be preferable to understand the word in a passive sense from נִצֵּר, to preserve, protect (Old Aram. Aramaic נִצֵּר, Assy. [Note: Assyrian.] nasâru),* [Note: G. A. Cooke, North Semitic Inscriptions, pp. 185, 189; Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. נִצֵּר.] so that Nazareth is the town secluded, protected, and the name describes its position in a valley surrounded by hills. The word might also be explained as a Niphal participle of צִוַּר, צָרַר, with the same meaning of ‘confined,’ ‘shut in’; compare the adjectival form Ναζωραῖος. Heb. or Aram. Aramaic צָ, however, usually becomes σ in Greek, e.g. נִצֵּי = Σειών, Σιών, צְבֹאוֹת = Σαβαώθ, מִצְפָּה = Μασσώχ, Μασσηφά, etc.; or a dental, e.g. צִוַּר = Τύρος. But צַעַר is represented by Ζόγορα in Gen_13:10. A derivation from נוֹר, denom. of נוֹדֵד, has also been suggested; Nazareth would then be ‘the town of the Nazirites.’ נוֹדֵד becomes in the Greek of the Septuagint ναζιρ, ναζιραιος. Compare the modern name of the town en-Nâsira. The latter, however, is more likely to be a conscious or unconscious assimilation of the sound and perhaps the spelling to a well-known descriptive title. See also preceding article.

Nazirite

NAZIRITE (Heb. nâzîr), in Authorized Version spelled 'Nazarite,' means etymologically 'one separated,' a religious devotee. The historical references are in Judges (Jdg_13:2 ff. the case of Samson) and Amo_2:11-12; the 'law of the Nazirite' is found in Numbers 6. A comparison of these passages reveals the fact that there was considerable difference between the earlier and the later type of Nazirite. Samson had been 'a Nazirite unto God from his mother's womb' (Jdg_16:17); his Nazirate was lifelong, and due not to any vow, but to the appointment of God (Jdg_13:1; Jdg_13:4-5; Jdg_13:7). In his case the abstinence from wine, which is emphasized in the 'law of the Nazirite,' is not specified, and the avoidance of contact with the dead is apparently excluded. On the other hand, great stress is laid on the hair being left unshorn even from childhood (Jdg_13:4; Jdg_13:7; Jdg_13:14). This, which may be taken to be the most marked feature of a Nazirite in early times, rests upon the belief that the hair is part of a man's vital being, and a symbol of his vitality. Thus to let it grow un-polled or to offer it in sacrifice has an expression of the devotion of the entire manhood to God. From the reference in Amos it may be inferred that the Nazirites formed a numerous class in the 8th cent., and that abstinence from wine was then a marked feature in their outward life. According to W. R. Smith (Prophets of Isr. [Note: Israelite.] 84), this prohibition 'was undoubtedly a religious protest against Canaanite civilization in favour of the simple life of ancient times. This appears most clearly in the case of the Rechabites, who had received from their father Jonadab the double precept never to drink wine and never to give up their wandering pastoral life for a residence in cities (Jeremiah 31).'

The 'law of the Nazirite' describes the obligations of the Nazirite, the ceremonies to be observed on the accidental interruption of his vow, and the sacrifices to be offered at its termination. It is clear that the vow is now contemplated as one which might be taken for a specified time only. A passage in Josephus (BJ ii. xv. 1) suggests that in his time thirty days was regarded as the minimum duration of the vow. It included three points: abstinence from intoxicating drink of every kind, and from the fruit of the vine in any form, avoidance of all contact with the dead, and the letting the hair grow with a view to offering it on the sacred fire (Num_6:18). Accidental defilement was followed by seven days of uncleanness, after which the period recommenced, and the vow was renewed with elaborate and costly rites. In like manner the termination of the vow is marked by offerings and libations, and specially by the shaving of the hair 'at the door of the tent of meeting,' followed by its being 'put on the fire which is under the sacrifice of peace-offerings' (vv. 13-20). 'After that the Nazirite may drink wine.' 'It appears most probable that the combination of observances in the law is not ancient, that in the regulations for the Nazirite of later times we see a fusion of several originally distinct customs, which, like many others, had lost much, and, in some cases, all of their original meaning' (G. B. Gray, ad loc.). 'Through this change, however, it lost its value; in old times it was Jehovah who raised up the Nazirites as He did the prophets. These were men of God, ensamples of the genuine Israelite God-pleasing life, and therefore of great significance for the whole people. Under the Law the Nazirate had sunk to a private practice of asceticism, through which the individual obtains favour from God' (Benzinger).

Later allusions to the practice of the Nazirite vow are found in 1Ma 3:49, and in Josephus Ant. xix. vi. 1, BJ ii. xv. 1 (case of Berenice). John the Baptist, in some respects at least, resembled the Nazirites (Luk 1:15; cf. the account of James the Just in Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica ii. xxiii. 3). It has been supposed by some that the vow taken by St. Paul at Cenchræe, and discharged by him at the Temple, was Nazirite in its character (Act 18:18; cf. Act 21:23-26); but the information given in the Acts is not sufficient to warrant the conclusion (see Knowling, ad loc., in Expos. Gr. Test.).

☞ Necessity

NECESSITY.—We exclude from this article all problems not directly raised by the Four Gospels.

1. Necessity and the Divine nature.—Metaphysicians distinguish between (1) contingent existence, and (2) necessary existence. A thing exists contingently, of which the beginning or end or change can be conceived. A thing exists necessarily, of which neither the beginning, nor the end, nor the change can be conceived. The Universe exists contingently, for we can imagine its annihilation; the laws of Nature also exist contingently, for we can imagine them altered. On the other hand, the laws of Reason, of Mathematics, and of (fundamental) Morality exist necessarily, for we can imagine no beginning or end or change in them.

Thus there never was, or will be, or could be, a time when things which are equal to the same thing could be unequal to one another. Nor can we imagine a time, or a world, in which cruelty would be other than odious, and lying other than contemptible. If cruelty and deceit were seated on the throne of the universe, they would still be what they are, odious and contemptible; and benevolence and truth, their opposites, would still be what they are, admirable and praiseworthy. Time and the vicissitudes of things can make no difference to the laws of Reason and the Moral Law. These are eternally and immutably true,—true not only to the human mind, but to every rational mind that does or can exist; valid not only in this universe but in all possible universes.

There exists, therefore, a body of eternal and necessary truth. But this conception of necessary truth carries with it the further conception of necessary Being, or necessary Substance. A truth cannot exist as it were ‘in the air,’ or in an infinite void: it must be true to some mind. And since the truths in question are independent of all created minds, there must exist some Eternal Uncreated Mind, to which these truths are eternally true. Moreover, since the truths are partly moral truths, this Mind must be moral, or, to use the language of religion, holy. Now it is obvious that to this Infinite Mind the predicate of necessary existence belongs in a higher degree than it belongs to what is called necessary truth. The laws or truths which are called necessary derive their necessary character from the fact that they are the laws of His Mind; but He, the Ultimate and Absolute Mind itself, exists with a degree of necessity transcending theirs. They inhere in Him, not He in them, and consequently He, the Infinite, Absolute, Ultimate Substance, is not only necessarily existent, but also self-existent.

The self-existence, or necessary existence, of the One True, Living, Personal God is a fundamental doctrine of Scripture. It was taught, according to the traditional exegesis of Exo 3:14, to Moses at the bush, and our Lord endorsed this view of the meaning of the Mosaic revelation (Joh 8:58). According to the Johannine theology (with which the Pauline is in essential agreement), necessary existence belongs primarily and originally to the Father, who is emphatically ὁ θεός (with the article), and the Living One (ὁ ζῶν πατήρ, Joh 6:57). To Jesus also, as consubstantial Son, belongs eternal and necessary existence (Joh 8:58). He has ‘life in himself’ (Joh 5:26), and is to creatures ‘the resurrection and the life’ (Joh 11:26). Yet He has this ‘life in himself’ by derivation from the Father (Joh 5:26, Joh 6:57), and consequently is (in this aspect) an Effect, of which the Father is the Cause.* [Note: Quite Scriptural, therefore, is the Greek theology which regards the Father as αἴτιος, and the Son and Spirit as αἴτιατα]

2. Necessity and the Divine freedom.—The Divine freedom, though absolute in the sense that God is free to achieve all that is possible, is limited by the laws of necessary truth and necessary substance as defined in § 1. Thus, since the laws of Reason are eternally valid, He cannot not achieve the essentially irrational, or (what is really the same thing) the essentially impossible. For instance, He cannot annihilate the past, or make the angles of a plane triangle unequal to two right angles. Similarly, since He is a necessary Substance, He cannot will His own annihilation; and since He is the supreme necessary, Good (Mar_10:18), He cannot cease to be good, or will what is evil.

The necessary character of the Divine perfections is fully recognized in Scripture† [Note: The perfections of the Son of God have the same necessary character as those of the Father (see Heb_13:8).] (Psa_102:24-27, Mal_3:6, Num_23:19, Heb_13:8, Jam_1:17), as also is the doctrine that God's freedom is limited by His character. All that is worthy of Him, He can perform, but deceit, cruelty, and injustice are to Him impossible (Gen_18:25, Job_8:3 etc.).

3. Necessity and the laws of Nature.—It is an important corollary of the Divine freedom, that the laws of Nature do not possess immutable and necessary validity. So far from Nature being a self-contained system of blind, inexorable, materialistically determined forces, it is a realm of Providence, in which a Being friendly to man guides the course of events providentially, with the object of securing ultimately to each individual his proper good (Mat_10:29 ff.).

In both Testaments the laws and operations of Nature are regarded as expressions of Jehovah's free, will (Genesis 1, Psalms 104, Job 26, Mat_5:45; Mat_6:26 ff. etc.), and consequently as capable of being providentially or miraculously interfered with (Exodus 3-15, etc.). The NT lays particular stress upon Christ's control over the forces of Nature (Joh_21:1 ff., Mat_14:22 ff. etc.; see esp. Luk_8:25 'Who then is this that commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him?').

4. Necessity and human affairs.—The recognition of God as the sole Absolute and Ultimate Being, excludes the heathen conception of an inscrutable Fate or Necessity (ἀνάγκη) to which gods and men are subject, but it does not of itself exclude the doctrine of Theological Determinism as taught by Calvin. The advocates of this view can appeal plausibly to a considerable number of NT passages.

Thus there are texts which teach that the general course of events is predetermined from eternity (Eph_1:4; Eph_3:11, 2Ti_1:9, Tit_1:2, 1Pe_1:20 etc.), and others which seem to deny human freedom of choice. Most of these are in the Fourth Gospel; see, e.g., Joh_6:37 'All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me' (cf. Joh_6:39); Joh_6:44 'No man can come unto me, except the Father draw him' (ἐλκύσει αὐτον); Joh_10:28 'they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand'; Joh_12:39 'for this cause they could not believe, for that Isaiah saith again, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart'; Joh 17:9 'I pray for them, I pray not for the world'; Joh 17:12 'not one of them perished, but the son of perdition, that the scripture might be fulfilled' (cf. Joh 13:18, Joh 17:12, Mat 26:24). Even in the Synoptics we have Mat 13:11 ff. 'unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given,' etc.; Mat 18:7 'it must needs be that offences come' (ἀνάγκη γὰρ ἐστὶν ἔλθεῖν τὰ σκάνδαλα); see also Mat 24:6 and Mat 26:24.

But these passages of deterministic tendency are balanced by others of opposite import.

Thus Christ's invitation to be saved is addressed not to selected individuals, but to all men: 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden' (Mat 11:28); 'it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish' (Mat 18:14); 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto myself' (Joh 12:32); cf, 1Ti 2:4 'God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.'

Since, however, some reject God's benevolent purpose, and refuse to be saved (Mat 25:41; Mat 26:24, Joh 17:12), it follows that the human will is free, and that the apparently deterministic passages of Scripture must be so interpreted as to leave room for human freedom. We are led, therefore, to some such view as this, that only the main events of human history are absolutely determined beforehand. The persons by whom, and the times when, the Divine purposes are to be realized, are not predetermined absolutely, but only conditionally. Thus God willed conditionally that the Chosen People should play the leading part in winning the world to the gospel of Christ (Isaiah 60-62, etc.), but, when they proved unfaithful, the Gentiles were called (Mat 21:43; Mat 8:11-12 etc.). Similarly the time of the Last Judgment is not fixed absolutely, but only conditionally (Mar 13:32 compared with 2Pe 3:12 (Revised Version margin)). Applying the same principle to the interpretation of the apparently deterministic passages quoted above, we conclude that Eph 1:4; Eph 3:11 etc. refer mainly to conditional predetermination; that 'all that the Father giveth me' (Joh 6:37) are simply those whom the Father foresaw would be genuine believers; that the statement that 'no one (i.e. no hostile power) shall snatch them out of my hand' (Joh 10:28) does not preclude the possibility that they may snatch themselves out of Christ's hand by unfaithfulness; that the 'drawing' of the Father (Joh 6:44) is the attraction of Divine Love, not the Irresistible Call of Calvinism; that the 'I pray not for the world' of Joh 17:9 is to be read in the light of Joh 17:23, that the 'blinding' and 'hardening' of Joh 12:40 are a penalty for past sin; and that even the case of Judas was not one of individual predestination. The general principle bearing upon the case of Judas is laid down in Mat 18:7 'Woe unto the world because of occasions of stumbling! for it must needs be that the occasions come; but woe to that man through whom the occasion cometh.’ That is to say, in a wicked world great crimes are morally certain to be committed, but there is no need for any individual to commit them, therefore woe to that individual by whom they are committed. To apply this to the case of Judas—the world being what it was, alienated from God and full of treachery and malice, some one was morally certain to betray Jesus to death. But that some one need not have been Judas. He freely undertook the evil business, and therefore his condemnation is just (Mat 26:24).

5. The predetermination of the events of Christ’s life.—Much stress is laid by the Fourth Evangelist on the predetermination of the events of Christ’s life, even with regard to such details as their precise dates and incidental circumstances.

See, e.g., Joh 2:4 ‘Mine hour (for changing the water into wine) is not yet come’ [it came a few minutes later]; Joh 7:8; ‘I go not [yet] up unto this feast, because my time is not yet fulfilled’ [it was fulfilled a few days afterwards]; Joh 7:30 ‘no man laid his hand on him, because his hour was not yet come’ (cf. Joh 8:20); Joh 12:23 ‘the hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified’ [by death]; Joh 12:27 ‘for this cause came I unto this hour’ [of my death]; Joh 13:1 ‘knowing that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father’; Joh 17:1 ‘Father, glorify thy Son [by death and resurrection], that thy Son may glorify thee.’ Cf. Mat 26:39; Mat 26:53, Luk 13:33, which imply that the length of Christ’s ministry and the time of His death were predetermined; also the very strong expression in Luk 22:22 ‘the Son of man indeed goeth as it hath been determined’ (κατὰ τὸ ὄρισμένον). In all these passages the language is strongly predestinarian, but, for the reasons given in the preceding section, the present writer holds that conditional predestination is, for the most part, meant.

6. The necessary fulfilment of prophecy.—According to the ordinary view, it is the nature of the future event that determines the nature of the prophecy. But often in the Gospels it is the nature of the prophecy that is regarded as determining the nature of the future event. This conception is specially characteristic of the First and Fourth Gospels, but it is not peculiar to them.

In St. Matthew, Christ is born of a virgin at Bethlehem, is named Jesus, sojourns in Egypt, resides at Nazareth, migrates to Capernaum, heals the sick, speaks in parables, enters Jerusalem riding an ass, is deserted by the disciples, is betrayed and put to death, ‘that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet’ (ἵνα πληρωθῆ το ῥηθεν ὑπὸ τον Κυρίου διὰ τοῦ προφήτου λέγοντος, κ.τ.λ.: so, with slight variations of phrase, Mat 1:22; Mat 2:15; Mat 2:23; Mat 8:17; Mat 12:17; Mat 13:35; Mat 21:4; Mat 26:53; cf. Mat 2:5; Mat 13:14-15; Mat 26:31; Mat 27:9). similarly, St. John regards the blindness of Israel as the result of a prophecy of Isaiah (Joh 12:39, referring to Joh 6:9); the betrayal of Jesus as happening ‘that the scripture (i.e. Psa 41:9) might be fulfilled’ (ἵνα ἡ γραφή πληρωθῆ); the prevalent hatred of Jesus as coming ‘to pass that the word may be fulfilled that is written in their law [viz. in Psa 35:19; Psa 69:4], They hated me without a cause.’ See also Joh 17:12, where ‘the son of perdition’ perishes ‘that the scripture might be fulfilled’; Joh 19:24, where the casting of lots is necessitated by the prophecy, ‘They parted my garments among them’ (Psa 22:18); Joh 19:36, where the piercing of Christ’s side takes place to fulfil Psa 34:20, and the refraining from breaking His legs to fulfil Exo 12:46; cf. also Exo 18:9 and Exo 20:9. For Synoptic parallels see Luk 24:26; Luk 24:44.

Without entering deeply into the philosophy of the question, we may point out that the two views in question do not necessarily exclude one another. We may suppose that God has a plurality of motives for causing or allowing events to happen, and that when events have been predicted by a duly accredited prophet, one of His motives in causing or allowing them to happen, is to maintain the credit of the prophet. This, at any rate, seems to be the view of the Evangelists, who esteem prophecy so highly that they regard a prediction once uttered by a prophet as (in a sense) placing God under a moral obligation to fulfil it. Jesus Himself, on several occasions, acknowledged the obligation of fulfilling the ancient prophecies (see Mat 26:53; Mat 16:21; Mat 21:4, Joh 19:28, etc.).

7. The necessity of means to ends.—The ‘musts’ of Christ, of which there are numerous examples in the Gospels, generally refer to the necessity He was under (in order to fulfil the purpose of His Incarnation) to do or to suffer certain things. His original purpose to become incarnate, and to redeem the world, was freely chosen (Php 2:7, 2Co 8:9 etc.); but the choice once made, a whole series of experiences (many of them painful and humiliating) became necessary.

As a child of twelve, He was already conscious, according to one interpretation of Luk 2:49 (see (Revised Version margin)), of the necessity of being about His Father’s business, and the same idea frequently recurs during the ministry. Almost at the beginning of it He declares to Nicodemus that His purpose to give eternal life to believers can be achieved only by His death: ‘As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must (δεῖ) the Son of Man be lifted up’ (Joh 3:14).* [Note: Some critics assign this saying to the Evangelist, not to Jesus.] He frequently declared the necessity He was under of working during the appointed time—‘We must (δεῖ) work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work' (Joh_9:4); 'Howbeit I must (δεῖ) go on my way to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following, for it cannot be (οὐκ ἐκδέχεται) that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem' (Luk_13:33); 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work' (Joh_4:34; cf. Joh_5:17; cf. Joh_5:19 etc.). His visit to Zacchaeus was determined by a redemptive purpose (Luk_19:5 'to-day I must (δεῖ) abide at thy house.' From the time of Peter's confession at (Caesarea Philippi, intimations of the necessity of the Passion and Resurrection become more frequent; 'From that time began Jesus to show unto his disciples how that he must (δεῖ) go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be raised up' (Mat_16:21); 'but first must (δεῖ) he suffer many things, and be rejected of this generation' (Luk_17:25); 'Behoved it not (δὲν ἔδει) the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory?' (Luk_24:26).

Corresponding to Christ's obligation of doing and suffering all that is necessary for man's salvation, is man's obligation of appropriating (if he would be saved) the necessary means. Frequent stress is laid upon the latter obligation in the Gospels: see, e.g., Mat_4:17 (the necessity of repentance), Mat_18:3 (of conversion), Mat_22:37 (of love), Joh_3:5 (of baptism), Joh_6:53 (of the Holy Supper), Joh_15:4 (of abiding in Christ), etc.

☞ Neck

NECK.—(1) In the embrace of family salutation the smooth part of the neck below the ear is the part that is kissed, first on one side and then on the other (Luk_15:20). This is implied in Hebrew by the use of the dual form (Gen_46:29). (2) Prisoners and those condemned to punishment had the chain attached to a metal ring around the neck (Luk_17:2). (3) It was on the neck of the oxen that the yoke was placed in ploughing. The freedom from all other bondage, which is conferred and naturalized by the grace of Christ, is conditioned by the yoke of service to Him (Mat_11:29-30).

Needle

NEEDLE.—Although the needle is of prehistoric origin, having been made out of fish bones before the discovery of bronze, it is mentioned only in one passage in the Bible: ‘It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle,’ etc. (Mat 19:24 || Mar 10:25, Luk 18:25). The eye of a needle is, in Hebrew and Greek, called simply ‘the hole,’ but in later Arabic it is also called ‘the eye.’ Thus one modern Arab poet (Mcj. Ad. ii. 231) asks, ‘What animal has its hoof in its head, and its eye in its tail?’ and another (ib. iii. 273) speaks of ‘the eye which never tastes of sleep and is never filled with tears.’ The needle is often used as a symbol of self-neglect, in that it clothes all the world and itself remains naked (Burckhardt, 563).

The phrase cited above from the Gospels was used in the schools, with the substitution of an elephant for a camel, to express something which does not happen. Thus in Baba Mezia, 38*b*, in the course of a discussion on dreams and their interpretation, R. Shesheth says to R. Amram, who had tried to convince him of something incredible: ‘Perhaps you are from Pumbeditha [where there flourished a famous academy of the Babylonian Rabbis], where they can drive an elephant through the eye of a needle’—that is, can prove that black is white. Similarly, Berakhoth, 55*b*: ‘No one ever saw a golden palm, nor an elephant entering the eye of a needle.’ For other occurrences of the phrase, see Buxtorf’s Lex. s.v. אֵינָהּ.† [Note: The proposals that have been made to identify the ‘needle’s eye’ with the small door in a large city gate, or to substitute ‘cable’ (κάμιλος) for ‘camel’ (καμηλος), have nothing in their favour. Neighbour

NEIGHBOUR.—To the people of Israel, God had given the commandment, ‘Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself’ (Lev 19:18); but in their hardness of heart they had put a limit to it. They had deduced from the commandment, ‘Thou shalt love thy neighbour’—its converse—‘and hate thine enemy’ (Mat 5:43); and they had made the latter as binding as the former. To a people who regarded themselves as the sole recipients of Jehovah's favour, the limitation was not unnatural; but with the revelation of God as the universal Father, who showers His blessings equally upon all the world, just and unjust alike (Mat 5:45), the limitation must of necessity be swept away. To make men like to God was the essential aim of the life and teaching of Jesus Christ; and as the love of God is limitless, the love of man to man must be no less. All His doctrine in reference to man's treatment of his neighbour He summed up in the words, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect' (Mat 5:48). 'Neighbour,' then, upon our Lord's lips becomes a term synonymous with 'humanity.' 'Who is my neighbour?' asked a scribe; and Christ made answer with the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luk 10:25-37), seeking by a picture of pure compassion to shame him of his question. 'Dost thou ask,' He seems to say, 'who thy neighbour is? Set about at once to relieve the misery of every one thou meetest. Make thyself the neighbour of all who need thy help.' It is to be noted that in the application of the parable He does not ask which of the three was, but which of the three became (γεγονέναι, Luk 10:36) neighbour unto him that fell among thieves. In the Sermon on the Mount He makes the same thing clear by direct statement—that 'neighbour' includes all the world of men, even those who hate and persecute us (Mat 5:43-44).

To the old commandment, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' Christ gives a new and striking form in the words, 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mat 7:12); and that the all-importance of this rule may be made plain, He adds, 'for this is the law and the prophets.' He thus makes a man's own longing for love and kindness and compassion the measure of the treatment which he should extend to others. But this love and compassion must not be the outcome of any selfish motive. To do good to others that we may receive the same again, is to miss wholly love's reward (Mat 5:46-47 || Luk 6:32-34); for the joy of love is loving: it is more blessed to give than to receive (Act 20:35). To ask to our feasts only those who can invite us in return is no manifestation of love—is but a bid for earthly recompense. To obtain God's blessing we must invite the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, who can give nought in return (Luk 14:12-14). The presupposition of our Lord's teaching, then, is this, that love is its own reward, that to lose one's life for love's sake is to find it (Mat 10:39 || Mat 16:25, Mar 8:35, Luk 9:24). The true servant of the Kingdom, therefore, must be ever ready to give unstintingly and ungrudgingly of all that he has and is; and even to those who would take from him by violence he must offer no resistance (Mat 5:39-42).

It follows naturally that the Christian must be as ready to forgive as to give. When a brother seeks forgiveness, it must be granted gladly, even unto seventy times seven (Mat 18:21 || Luk 17:3-4). There can be no refusal of pardon to the penitent, for so the Heavenly Father treats His erring children (cf. the parable of the Prodigal Son, Luk 15:11 ff.). To refuse to remit the offences of others means to remain unpardoned by God; for the Heavenly Father cannot forgive His children if they will not in turn forgive their brethren, who also are His children: for thus they cut themselves off from the family of God, exclude themselves from His love (Mat 6:12; Mat 18:35). The hatred of a brother becomes a sin which cannot be pardoned except it be repented of, except the hatred be wiped out and love restored. The universal Fatherhood of God is thus once more the basis of the argument (1Jn 4:20-21; 1Jn 5:1). And not only towards those who are fellow-subjects of the Kingdom is love inculcated: it must extend even to those who are our enemies and the enemies of God (Luk 6:37-38); for Christ came to seek and to save the lost, and the Christian must follow in his Master's steps. Yet, on the other hand, forgiveness must in no case flow from mere weak benevolence which foregoes revenge for injury, and leaves the matter there. An entrance must be won for pardon into the heart of the offender before the Christian's work is done; for pardon must be accepted as well as granted. It is not for his own but for his brother's sake that a man must forgive; and forgiveness is spiritually useless to the offender unless he repent of his offence. To win souls for God's Kingdom is the Christian's noblest work, and it is to that end that his whole treatment of his neighbour must be directed (Mat 18:15). Reproof, therefore, must not be wanting. The offence must be pointed out, and the sinner urged to amendment. In Mat 18:15-21 (|| Luk 17:3 ff.) a course of treatment is prescribed for the impenitent. He is to be dealt with privately as a first step; if that fails, in the presence of witnesses; and as a last step the Church is to be called in to aid in effecting a reconciliation. Only when all has proved vain is he to be regarded as a heathen man and a publican. But even then love's offices may not cease. The publican and the heathen still remain the Christian's care, are still sharers in the love of God. Love must still strive with him, by returning good for evil, by heaping coals of fire upon his head, to win him back to God and love (Mat 5:44, Rom 12:20). When all else has failed, there still remains the duty of prayer to God, who in His providence may find a way to penitence.

It follows from the humble self-forgetting attitude which this implies, that all loveless judgment of the weaknesses and sins of others is wholly forbidden. To judge is to usurp the prerogative of God, and to bring upon ourselves His condemnation of our lovelessness (Mat 7:1-2). Yet men are not to close their eyes to the characters of those about them. They must certainly seek to find the best that is in every man, and to draw it to the light even as Christ did; but to treat the notoriously wicked man as if he were good and upright is to make him a cause of offence to others, and at the same time to tempt the man himself to greater wickedness. To act thus is to cast pearls before swine (Mat 7:6). There is no more grievous sin against love than to disregard or to play upon the weaknesses of others. We must know others' weaknesses that we may avoid offending them and causing them to stumble. But that we may be able to do this—to help the weak brother and to save him from his defects—it is first needful that we should be conscious of our own. If our own eyes are blinded by the beam of self-righteousness and pride, we cannot see clearly to cast out the mote out of our brother's eye (Mat_7:3-5 || Luk_6:41 || Gal_6:1). In the very strongest terms our Lord warns against the giving of offence to others, even to the least. It were better, He says, to suffer the most miserable death than so to endanger the salvation of another, and sin against God's love (Mat_18:6-7; Mat_18:10). In 1 Corinthians 8 St. Paul treats of the matter in reference to a particular instance, pointing out that even Christian liberty must be willingly laid aside if it in any way tends to hurt the conscience of a weaker brother. Love for souls is so absolutely the law of the Christian life that it makes right wrong and wrong right. Charity is the greatest virtue of all, so that the want of it makes every other virtue worthless (1 Corinthians 13).

To summarize the doctrine, the revelation of the new relationship between God and man, and the new law which rests thereon, make of love the highest principle in life, and make the love of God and the love of man one and the same; and since love is the divinest element in human nature, it must be love's object to beget and to increase love in others. Hence towards all who are our brethren in the Lord we must be humble and meek and forgiving, 'in honour preferring one another' (Rom_12:10), seeking greatness not in dominion but in service (Mat_20:26-27 || Luk_22:26); for it is ever the over-estimate of self that takes offence and causes hate (Mar_7:22); and to the sinner and the unbeliever who are ignorant of love, there is but the greater need to make love manifest by unwearying self-sacrifice and unceasing kindness; for so the evil in the other's heart will be overcome, and the Divine germ of love within him will be fanned into a living flame, and he also will become a true son of God (Mat_5:38-48 || Luk_6:28-31 || Rom_12:19-21). It is those whose whole lives make for peace—the peace that springs not from indifference but from love—who shall be called the children of God (Mat_5:9).

☛ Nest

NEST.—Orientals, while often indifferent to the study and explanation of natural processes, have always been attracted by the provisions of instinct for the preservation of animal life. They observed the home-like motive of rest and safety in the selection and construction of birds' nests (Job 29:18, Psa 84:3; Psa 104:17, Jer 48:28; Jer 49:16). In the Gospels the word translation 'nest' (κατασκήνωσις) means generally the place of night shelter for birds (Mat 8:20), or where they alight in search of food during the day (Mat 13:31-32). By contrasting His own with the more fortunate condition of the birds, Christ intimates that whoever, like the scribe, would follow Him to the uttermost, may for His sake have to endure loneliness, misunderstanding, and rejection. The reference to the mustard seed, which in its wild state produces a shrub reaching to the seat of a horse's saddle, indicates that power of rapid expansion inherent in Christ's Kingdom which has often surprised both its friends and its foes.

☛ Nets

NETS.—Nets were in ancient times used not only in fishing but in hunting beasts and in bird-catching. In the Gospels they are mentioned only in connexion with fishing, which was an important industry on the very prolific inland waters of Palestine. See Fish. Three terms occur.

1. δίκτυον (perhaps from δικεῖν, 'to cast'), Vulgate rete, is the general term, including various kinds of nets. It is found in the parallel accounts of the call of the disciples (Mat 4:20-21, Mar 1:18-19, Luk 5:2-5) always in the plural. In St. John's narrative of the great draught of fishes (Joh 21:6; Joh 21:8; Joh 21:11) it is found in the sing., possibly referring to a net of larger size. See 3 below.
2. ἀμφιβληστρον (which may perhaps be an adjective, δίκτυον being understood), a casting-net (deriv. ἀμφιβάλλω, which verb stands, without a noun, for the action of the fisherman in using the net, Mar 1:16), bell- or pear-shaped, thrown by hand from the shore or from a boat, which was skilfully wielded so as to fall upon the water with its circular mouth fully extended. The edges, being weighted, sank immediately to the bottom, and the fish within the area of the mouth were enclosed. This net is still much used in Palestine. The individual skill required in its employment is in point if it was with this kind of net in mind that our Lord invited the fishermen to become 'fishers of men.' In the Gospels the word is found only in Mat_4:18 and (in the Textus Receptus) Mar_1:16.

3. σαγήνη (Lat. [so Vulgate] sagena; French and English, 'seine'), from σάπτω, 'to load, fill': a drag-net (Mat_13:47 (Revised Version margin)) or sweep-net, often of immense size (Manilius, 'vasta sagena'). Such nets have been in use from early times down to the present day, and are extensively employed on our own coasts, as, for instance, in Cornwall. A common way of working the seine is to have one end of it attached to the shore, while the other is taken seawards by a boat in a wide circuit, and at length brought to land again. The upper side of the net is sustained by corks, while the lower, being weighted, sweeps along the sea-bottom. The ends are gradually drawn in till the whole net is brought up on the beach, carrying with it all the fish in the area through which it has passed. The seine may also be worked entirely from a boat or boats. In classical Latin this kind of net is called everriulum (verro, 'to sweep'); cf. Hom. Il. v. 487, λινον παναγρον, a take-all net. σαγήνη is found in the Gospels only in Mat_13:47 (translation 'net,' the word 'draw-net, is not in the English text, but only in the Authorized Version chapter-heading), where the choice of this term instead of δικτυον or ἀμφιβληστρον greatly strengthens the meaning of the parable. See Draw-Net. It occurs in LXX Septuagint Is 19:8, Eze 26:5; and ἀμφιβληστρον and σαγήνη are mentioned together in Hab_1:15.

☩ New Birth

NEW BIRTH.—See Regeneration.

☩ New Commandment

NEW COMMANDMENT.—The definition of the Christian law of love as a 'new commandment' is peculiar to the Johannine writings (Joh_13:34; Joh_15:12, 1Jn_2:7-8, 2Jn_1:5). In the Fourth Gospel the Supper is regarded as the prototype of the Agape rather than of the Eucharist, and the institution of the 'new covenant' gives place to that of the 'new commandment' of brotherly love. The commandment, like the covenant, is inaugurated by a symbolical act, the washing of the disciples' feet.

In the Synoptic Gospels our Lord repeatedly insists on love for one's neighbour as the paramount ethical duty (cf. Mat_5:43-48, Mar_12:31, Luk_10:30-37); He contrasts this new conception of the Moral Law with the rule that held good 'in old time' (Mat_5:43-44). The words in the Fourth Gospel thus sum up with an exquisite simplicity the authentic substance of the social teaching of Jesus. At the same time there are elements in the Johannine idea which differentiate it from the apparent parallels in the Synoptics.

(1) Jesus in His teaching, as given in the Synoptics, does not impose His ethic under the form of 'commandment.' Accepting the moral code of the Decalogue as Divinely given, He contents Himself with 'fulfilling' it by a deeper and more inward interpretation. The effect of His 'fulfilment' is indeed to replace the ancient Law by a new one, but in this Christian law the idea of commandment is altogether transcended. It is a 'law of liberty,' which the enlightened conscience originates for itself. The Fourth Gospel reverts to the idea of 'commandment'—of a moral law enforced from without. Jesus as the Son of God has power to impose a new law, equally binding with that of the Decalogue; and it is henceforth valid in virtue of His authority.

(2) The divergence from the Synoptics is still more marked in regard to the scope of the 'new commandment.' The love which it requires is the φιλαδελφία that found expression in the Agape; not love to one's neighbour in the universal sense, but love of Christians to one another. Here more signally than elsewhere the Fourth Evangelist betrays the influence of the later Church-idea which had narrowed the original intention of the teaching of Christ. A sharp distinction had grown up between the community of believers and the 'world,' and the duty of Christians was primarily, if not exclusively, to their brethren. The passage in the Fourth Gospel already contemplates a time when mutual love within the Church was the γνώρισμα τῶν Χριστιανῶν (Joh_13:35, cf. Tert. Apol. 39). There is no indication of a wider demand, in the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount and the parable of the Good Samaritan.

The commandment is expressly called a new one, although in its Synoptic form it appears as a direct quotation from the ancient Law (Mat_22:39 || Mar_12:31 = Lev_19:18). The newness has been explained in various ways. (a) According to the Greek commentators (Cyril, Theod. [Note: Theodotion.] Mops. etc.) it consists in the higher degree of love implied in καθὼς ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς—not ‘as thyself, but ‘more than thyself’ with the self-forgetting love of Christ. This, however, overstrains the meaning of καθὼς, which says nothing of the quality of Christ’s love, but states the simple fact of His example. (b) Several modern commentators (e.g. Meyer, Godet, Bugge) have still sought the explanation in the words ‘as I have loved you.’ The love of Christ experienced by the believer is to be the motive power to a new and higher kind of love. Our love to one another is henceforth to be Christian love—not grounded in a mere natural instinct, but in an inward fellowship with Christ. This idea is certainly present in the Gospel, and in the Epistle it comes to definite expression. ‘Hereby we know love, because he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren’ (1Jn_3:16). The love required in Christians is the greater love which was revealed for the first time in the Cross of Christ. This, however, does not seem to be the idea involved in the ‘new commandment.’ The newness is ascribed to the commandment itself, not to the motive or the quality of the love enjoined in it. (c) An attractive explanation is that suggested by Olshausen. The commandment of love is new in the sense that it is for ever fresh, always renewing itself. Such a meaning seems to be plainly implied in the beautiful antithesis in the Epistle (1Jn_2:7-8), ‘I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment. Again, a new commandment I write unto you.’ This passage, however, is a kind of poetical expansion of the idea of a ‘new commandment,’ and cannot be construed as an exegesis. (d) The simplest and most natural explanation is that Christ has in effect established a new morality by His insistence on love as the fulfilment of the Law. In outward form the demand was an old one, and this is acknowledged in the Synoptic parallels by the quotation from Leviticus. But the place assigned to it by Jesus as the sum of the Law, the sovereign principle of the moral life, invests it with a new significance. The ancient morality is superseded by the Christian law of love. The words in the Fourth Gospel thus give expression to the truth which had emerged ever more clearly in the course of later reflexion,—that the teaching of Jesus, based as it was on the religion of the OT, was something radically new. The Law had been not only fulfilled but abrogated. In its place there was a new commandment, a new determining principle for the moral life.

As indicated above, the definition of the Christian ethic as a ‘new commandment’ is in one respect inadequate, and even involves a self-contradiction. The true originality of the moral demand of Jesus consisted in its breaking away from the idea of outward requirement. The Law imposed from without was replaced by the inward spirit of faith and love and obedience. In the Fourth Gospel we have probably the earliest phase of the reaction which ended in the formulation of Christianity as nova lex. The development of the Church as an institution was accompanied by a certain externalizing of moral and religious ideas, while at the same time the influence of the OT favoured the relapse into a modified legalism. Thus where St. Paul, in full accordance with the Synoptics, demanded a new spirit (cf. Rom 12:2, Gal 5:16), the later Church was satisfied with obedience to a 'new law.' The Fourth Gospel appears to mark the transition between these two conceptions of Christian morality. The true character of the 'commandment' is still safeguarded by the profound religious spirit of the Gospel, but the idea of outward ordinance has begun to re-establish itself. In a subsequent age, which had drifted out of sympathy with the original teaching of Jesus, the 'new commandment' became literally the nova lex.

☩ New Testament

NEW TESTAMENT.—The expression 'New Testament' (καινή διαθήκη) has a double meaning. (1) The New Covenant itself (Luk 22:20, 1Co 11:25, 2Co 3:6 etc.). See artt. Covenant and Testament. No other meaning is possible in the Bible. (2) The books that contain the New Covenant. The latter is the subject of this article.

1. The genesis of a NT literature.—This is to be assigned, humanly speaking, to the slowly developing needs of the Christian society. The Apostles were commissioned not to write but to preach. The OT, interpreted in the light of its fulfilment in Christ, contained both for them and for their earliest converts the whole deposit of Divine truth (2Ti 3:15 etc.). (a) Epistles, as a class, were needed first, in order to settle questions that soon arose on the conversion of Gentiles (Acts 15). Many of the Epistles plainly show their 'occasional' origin (1Co 7:1, 2Co 9:1, Gal 1:6, 2Th 2:1 f. etc.). Formal communications were evidently no new thing in Jewish communities (Act 9:2; Act 28:21). (b) Narratives of Christ's words and works, such as the Gospels, were not at once so necessary. Men were looking for Christ's speedy return (2Th 2:2), and eye-witnesses of His ministry were at first plentiful (Act 1:22, 1Co 15:6). The demand for written and authentic narratives was forcibly realized only when Apostles and eye-witnesses began to pass away (2Pe 1:15 ff., 2Ti 4:6 ff.), and irresponsible persons took in hand to supply the want (Luk 1:1 f.). Yet even in the next generation there lingered a preference for traditional reminiscences, cf. Papias (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 140) ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica iii. 39. On the shortest reckoning no Gospel was committed to writing in its present shape within twenty-five years after Christ's Ascension.

2. The canonical reception of NT writings.—This may be said to have passed through three stages, not wholly separable in point of time.

(1) The first stage is that of collective recognition (extending roughly to a.d. 170). Christian writers of this period exhibit—(a) Coincidences of language with NT expressions: e.g. Clem. Rom. [Note: Roman.] (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 95); Ign. (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 110); Polyc. (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 116); Barn. (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 70-130); Didache (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 90-165); Herm. (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 140-155); Heges. [ap. Eus.] (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 155).—(b) Anonymous references—which seem to have been the set rule for all writers of 'Apologies,' whatever their custom in other works: e.g. Just. M (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 150); ad Diogn. (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 170?); also 2 Ep. Clem. (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 140).—(c) Direct references: e.g. Clem., ad Cor. xlvi., alludes to 1 Co.; Polyc., ad Ph. iii., to Philipians; Papias (before a.d. 150), ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica iii. 39, mentions a record of Christ's words and deeds by Mark, and 'logia' (originally in Hebrew) by Matthew; Just. M., Dial. ciii., speaks of 'Memoirs by Apostles and those that followed them,' and refers to the Apocalypse (Dial. lxxxi.) by name.—(d) Dogmatic recensions: Tatian, Diatessaron (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 150), harmonized the four Gospels; Marcion (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 140) mutilated Luke and (acknowledging ten Pauline Epistles) rejected the three Pastoral Epistles.—(e) Catalogues: e.g. the Muratorian fragment (composed c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 160), which, according to Westcott, gives 'a summary of the opinion of the Western Church on the Canon shortly after the middle of the 2nd century.'

(2) The second stage is that of unique authority.—(a) A succession of contrasts is drawn by Christian writers. (α) Apostles and themselves: cf. all the Apostolic Fathers—Clem. Rom. [Note: Roman.] viii, xlvii.; Polyc. ad Ph. iii; Ign. ad Rom. [Note: Roman.] iv. ('not as Peter and Paul'); Barn, i, iv ('not as a teacher'). (β) Apostolic records and traditions: Justin M., ap. i. 33, says the Memoirs of the Apostles relate 'all things concerning Jesus Christ.' 'These words (Westcott observes) mark the presence of a new age.... Tradition was definitely cast aside as a new source of information.' (γ) Canonical (ἐνδιάθηκοι) and un-canonical (ἀπόκρυφοι) books: generally, e.g. Dionysius of Corinth (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 176), ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica iv. 23, says, 'the Scriptures of the Lord ... and those that are not of the same character'; and in detail, e.g. Clem. Alex. [Note: Alexandrian.] (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 165-200) ib. vi. 14; Origen (a.d. 286-353), ib. vi. 25; Dionys. Alex. [Note: Alexandrian.] (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 248) ib. vii.

25—representing the opinion of Alexandria; Tertullian (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 160-240), de Pudic. 20, that of Latin Africa; Caius (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 213), ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica vi. 20, that of Rome; Irenaeus (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 135-200), ib. v. 8, cf. Iren. Haer. iii. 7, that of Asia Minor and Gaul; Serapion (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 190), ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica vi. 12, that of Syria. These exhibit substantial agreement, together with variety in detail. From Tertullian's time the general estimate was much as it is to-day.

(b) Illustrations of this developing consciousness are seen in two matters arising from constant use of the books. (i.) The descriptive titles. Barnabas, Ep. iv., is the first to use the formula 'as it is written' in quoting words taken from the N.T. [= Mat 22:14]. In Justin M., ap. i. 66, the term 'Gospels' is first applied to books. Melito of Sardis (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 170), ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica iv. 26, refers to 'the books of the Old Testament,' implying undoubtedly by contrast 'the books of the New.' The latter description is expressly used by Irenaeus, Haer. ii. 58, and the two Testaments are from that time on a level. Chrysostom is said to have been the first to adopt the expression 'Bible' (τὰ βιβλία) for the two Testaments as one whole. (ii.)

Public reading. For some considerable time (varying much in different places) profitableness seems to have been the only absolute test required. Dionys. of Corinth (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 170-175), ap. Eus. Historia Ecclesiastica iv. 23, refers to the public reading of a letter from Soter, as well as to the better known instance of the Ep. of Clem. of Rome. Eusebius (ib. iii. 3) relates that Hermas had formerly been read in public on account of its usefulness for 'elementary instruction.' Apostolic nature (i.e. practically 'inspiration') was subsequently the regular test: cf. Eus. l.c. and Cyril of Jerus. [Note: Jerusalem.] (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 340), Catech. iv. 33-36. Hence δημοσιεύεσθαι under the former conditions refers merely to the fact of public reading; under the latter it is a declaration of canonical authority.

(3) The third stage is that of formal definition.—Diocletian's persecution (a.d. 303-311), directed against the Christian Scriptures, proves that their unique position and influence was a matter known to the heathen throughout the Roman Empire. It also made the identification of those Scriptures, as distinct from other Christian books, a vital matter (cf. the history of the Donatist schism on the question of 'traditores'). Eusebius, writing a.d. 313-325, sums up the general consent of that time (Historia Ecclesiastica iii. 3, 24, 25), in three classes of books—'acknowledged,' i.e. of undisputed authenticity and Apostolic power; 'disputed,' i.e. defective in either of those qualities; and 'heretical.' The Emperor Constantine (a.d. 331) caused to be prepared, under the direction of Eusebius, fifty copies of the Divine Scriptures for use in the churches of Constantinople (cf. Eus. Vit. Const. iv. 36). These must have become a standard in the Greek Church. It may be added that the evidence of ancient versions, old Latin, Syriac, and Egyptian, is of great importance; but it is of too complicated a nature to be briefly discussed. Succeeding Councils dealt with the Canon, esp. that of Laodicea (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 363) and the third of Carthage (a.d. 397). The catalogue of canonical books which bears the name of the former is held to be spurious: to the catalogue of Carthage Christendom adheres to-day.

Literature.—The NT (as a whole or its separate portions) forms the subject of well-known ‘Introductions,’ Commentaries, etc. For special information see Sanday, Inspiration; Wright, Synopsis (oral theory); Westcott, Canon of NT and Bible in the Church; Moffatt, The Historical NT. ☩ Nicodemus NICODEMUS.—One of the persons mentioned only in the Fourth Gospel. He is described as a Pharisee and a ruler of the Jews. He had an interview with Jesus by night (Joh_3:1 ff.); and though he did not become an avowed disciple, he protested in the Sanhedrin against the hasty condemnation of Jesus (Joh_7:50 f.); and after the Crucifixion he brought spices to embalm the body of the Lord (Joh_19:39).

The name Nicodemus is Greek (from νίκη and δῆμος—‘conqueror of the people’). Josephus (Ant. xiv. iii. 2) gives Nicodemus as the name of an ambassador from Aristobulus to Pompey. In the Talmud we have the form נִיְדֵמָא as the name given to a certain Bunai ben Gorion, because, it is said, of a miraculous answer to his prayer. This ben Gorion was a rich man, and is reported to have spent a vast sum on the marriage of his daughter, who afterwards sank into abject poverty. He appears to have had charge of the supply of water to the pilgrims at Jerusalem; and he was accused of being a Christian. Some have identified this man with the Nicodemus of the Gospel; but the positive grounds of identification are insufficient; and there is the negative consideration that ben Gorion is spoken of as living till the siege of Jerusalem, whereas Nicodemus, already in John 3 an elderly man (γέρον, Joh_3:4), could hardly have survived to so late a period. Some writers, who regard the Fourth Gospel as un-historical, suggest that our Nicodemus is simply a typical character, constructed by the Evangelist from the traditions of ben Gorion, with the aid of the Synoptic references to Joseph of Arimathaea. Thus E. [Note: Elohists.] A. Abbott (Ency. Bib. art. ‘Nicodemus’) says: ‘Nicodemus ben Gorion passes into the Gospel under the shadow of Joseph of Arimathaea; and speaks of ‘a conflated development of Joseph into two persons.’ He says that N. ben Gorion was one of three or four who were sometimes called βουλευται, ‘rich men,’ ‘great men of the city,’ and suggests that as an official provider of water he was an appropriate character for a dialogue on regeneration. He concludes that Nicodemus is ‘a Johannine conception representing the liberal, moderate, and well-meaning Pharisee, whose fate it was to be crushed out of existence in the conflict between Judaism and its Roman and Christian adversaries.’ This reconstruction can hardly be persuasive except to those who on other grounds have already judged the Fourth Gospel to be without historic value. The general discussion goes beyond the limit of this article. It is enough to say here that there is nothing in what is related of Nicodemus, or in the circumstances of his connexion with Jesus, which is in itself improbable, or out of harmony with what we are told elsewhere. It is altogether probable that some men of the upper classes and of the Pharisees would be attracted by the personality and teaching of Jesus, and that they would seek with varying degrees of caution to know more of Him. To a certain extent the Synoptics confirm this (cf. Luk 7:36; Luk 8:3; Luk 19:5). We may add that the personality of Nicodemus stands out clearly in spite of the brevity of the reference to him. The protest in the Sanhedrin shows the same blending of courage with caution as the interview by night. There was a sufficient sense of truth and justice, and of personal interest in Jesus, to enable him to risk the anger of the majority by a protest, but enough of caution or timidity to put the protest into an indirect and tentative form rather than into a bold defence of the Master. The personality of Nicodemus and the conduct ascribed to him do not weaken the case for the historic credibility of the Evangelist.

It has been urged with some measure of plausibility that the conversation in John 3 bears the marks of artificial construction. It is said that it is really a brief sermon by the Evangelist, and follows the regular plan of the Johannine discourses:—a pregnant saying by the Master; a remark by an interlocutor who misunderstands the text by taking it literally and not spiritually; then a further exposition by the speaker: the whole being ‘a thoroughly artificial construction on a set plan’ (Gardner, A Historic View of the NT, sec. vi.). There is a very general agreement that the discourses in the Fourth Gospel owe something of their form to the Evangelist. Differences of opinion on that point are almost entirely confined to the question of the extent to which the writer has gone in condensing or re-shaping the Master’s utterances. Without surrendering the conviction that we have a faithful report of the substance of a real conversation, we may readily admit that the Evangelist has put his material into the form which seemed best fitted to make the truth clear to his readers. He is, we may suppose, chiefly interested in Nicodemus ‘as instrumental in eliciting from Jesus’ the sayings which he records. But this does not make Nicodemus a mere lay figure, and his questions mere ‘rhetorical artifice.’

Dr. Gardner says of the question in Joh 3:4 : ‘such crassness is scarcely in human nature.’ Yet when we give due weight to the prejudices of a Pharisee and allow for the deadening effect of respectable religious legalism, it is not hard to understand the sheer bewilderment of Nicodemus at the idea that he—no Gentile, no publican—needed to be born anew. How common it is for men of such a type to be utterly unable to understand even an elementary spiritual truth, if it cuts across their conventions and challenges their privileges. Nicodemus did not at all suppose that a second physical birth was meant. He was simply unable to conceive what kind of new birth could be needed by one who was already a Jew and a keeper of the Law. His questions are simply his bewilderment beating the air.

The last reference to Nicodemus (Joh 19:39) appears to show greater boldness and a more definite discipleship on his part. His gift of spices was certainly an expression of respect and reverence for the Master, and its amount is the lavish gift of a rich man. Whether it expressed faith in the Messiahship of the Crucified, ‘the Saviour typified by the brazen serpent which Jesus had explained to him beforehand (Joh 3:14)’ (Godet), is less certain. Nicodemus may have regarded Jesus simply as a martyred teacher, whose cause had perished, but who deserved to be held in loving memory. He could hardly at that moment have anticipated the Resurrection. He may even have been encouraged to bring his gift by the thought that Jesus dead was no longer feared by the authorities, and that it was no longer a serious risk to show respect to His name.

Christian tradition records many legends of Nicodemus, and his name is associated with one of the Apocryphal Gospels; but nothing further is recorded that has any historical value.

 Night

NIGHT

1. Associations of the word 'night.'—(a) It was the season for all that demanded secrecy. Travellers on a dangerous errand went by night, as Joseph did, after he had received warning in a dream (Mat 2:14). Nicodemus for fear of his colleagues came to Jesus by night at the Passover season; the interview may have been on the roof of some friendly house, or in one of the tents used by the pilgrims (Joh 3:2; Joh 19:39); night was also the time for theft, and drunkenness, and revelling (Luk 12:39, cf. 1Th 5:2; 1Th 5:7, Rom 13:12), and was convenient for plots and stratagems (Mar 14:11). The chief priests bribed the guard to say that the disciples had taken away the body of Jesus by night (Mat 28:13).

(b) Night had its peculiar dangers and annoyances (cf. Psa 91:5). Travellers might be delayed through stress of circumstances till after nightfall, and even till midnight (Luk 11:5), and such journeys were not without danger; 'if any man walk in the night, he stumbleth' (Joh 11:10, cf. Job 5:14). A modern traveller has spoken of 'the villages by night, without a light, when you stumble on them in the darkness, and all the dogs begin barking' (G. A. Smith, HGHL [Note: GHL Historical Geog. of Holy Land.], p. 99). Such annoyances would be encountered by the host in the parable, who, coming to beg bread, arrived at midnight after stumbling through the narrow streets of the village (Luk 11:5 etc.).

(c) It was the season when Divine guidance might be looked for. Joseph and the Magi were warned in dreams (Mat 2:12-13; Mat 2:19). Pilate's wife suffered many things in a dream because of Jesus (Mat 27:19). To the Israelites the thought of night would always bring the memory of visions and revelations of God, given to their seers, beginning from the nights when Jacob saw the ladder, and wrestled with the angel.

(d) It was the season of rest (Joh 11:9; Joh 9:4), but not for all men; shepherds guarded their flocks by night (Luk 2:8); though from November to March the sheep were probably in the fold. The fishermen toiled all night (Luk 5:5, Joh 21:3), when the Lake was often swept by sudden gales (Mar 4:37); the men who could not watch one hour in Gethsemane were accustomed to sleepless nights. In Palestine, as in all Eastern lands, the marriage ceremony was celebrated after nightfall; lamps and torches were always the accompaniment of weddings (cf. Rev 18:23, where the light of the lamp and the voice of the bridegroom are mentioned together). In the parable of the Ten Virgins the guests assembled at nightfall, but they had to tarry till midnight before the bridegroom came, the hour being chosen for the purpose of the parable, because then they would most likely be off their guard (Mat 25:6).

(e) Night was the season of surprises. The day of the Lord was to come as a thief in the night (1Th 5:2). In the night the soul of the rich fool was required of him (Luk 12:20). At the coming of the Son of Man 'in that night,' it is said, 'there shall be two in one bed; the one shall be taken, the other shall be left' (Luk 17:34). The disciples must guard against a surprise: ‘for ye know not when the Lord cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping’ (Mar_13:35). Especial stress is laid upon the mid-watches (Luk_12:38); it would be easy to keep the first watch, and almost impossible to sleep during the watch before the dawn.

(f) The phrases ‘day and night,’ ‘days and nights,’ are used to give a comprehensive idea of time (Mat_4:2); or to give an impression of a continuous practice [as when we read that Anna served God night and day (Luk_2:37)], or to indicate the monotonous passage of time: the sower ‘sleeps and rises night and day,’ and nothing happens day after day (Mar_4:27).

2. Divisions of the night.—It is important not to seek the scientific accuracy of modern usage in the NT. Time was divided by natural phenomena. The night varied in length with the seasons of the year; and the length of the four watches into which the night was divided must also have varied (Mat_14:25, Mar_6:48, Luk_12:38). In NT times four watches were recognized, in the OT only three. The division into hours could not be made for the night-season.

‘The division of the day into hours sprang from the use of the sundial, and its peculiar character, the varying length of, the hour, was conditioned by its origin; hours of the night could be measured only by water-glass or some similar means, which would give divisions of equal length during all seasons of the year, and not varying hours like those of the day’ (Ramsay, Expos, iv. vii. [1893] p. 219).

The watches of the night are indicated in Mar_13:35 : evening (ὄψια)—midnight—cock-crowing—full morning. It was at eventide, for example, that Jesus sat down with His disciples; before ‘cock-crowing’ Peter denied Him; and in the ‘morning’ Jesus was carried away to Pilate.

3. In the life of Jesus.—Before Jesus called His disciples, He went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer (διανυκτερεύων, Luk_6:12). After the ‘feeding of the five thousand’ also He departed into a mountain to pray (Mar_6:46 || Mat_14:23), and not till the fourth watch did He come to the disciples, spent with their ‘bootless toil.’ From these and other references it is clear that Jesus often made the night His season of prayer. He whose mind was saturated with the OT may have recalled how the prophets had withdrawn to the mountains.

Might duly take and strongly keep

The print of Heaven.’—(Keble, Chr. Year, 13th Sund. after Trin.).

In the neighbourhood of the Lake, night was the only time of solitude.

‘Save in the recorded hours of our Lord’s praying, the history of Galilee has no intervals of silence and loneliness; the noise of a close and busy life is always audible; and to every crisis in the Gospels and in Josephus we see crowds immediately swarm’ (G. A. Smith, HGHL [Note: GHL Historical Geog. of Holy Land.] p. 421).

It may be urged that Jesus teaches by His example the value of prayer in the silence of night. There are many references to such prayer in the Psalms (cf. Psa_119:62); and it is not without significance that the time is midnight in the parable in which Jesus teaches the lesson of ‘shameless’ prayer (ἀναιδία, Luk_11:8). ‘The thing could never have taken place in the daytime. It is a story of midnight importunity’ (Whyte).

There is no reason to doubt the preference of Jesus for an abode where He would be sure of mountain solitude; we have no record that He entered Tiberias, which was a walled city (HGHL [Note: GHL Historical Geog. of Holy Land.] p. 449). ‘He entered Jericho only to pass through it.’ ‘This freedom Jesus had from childhood’ in Nazareth, Capernaum, Bethany, and other resting-places. When men did not need Him, He must be free to leave them. It is substantially true that ‘Jesus never slept in a walled city’ (see Expos. iii. iii. [1886] p. 146). The scenes of rescue on the Lake were in the night-time; then it was He walked upon the sea and stilled the waves (Mar_6:49; cf. Mar_4:39).

The closing incidents of the life of Jesus cannot be pictured except against the background of night. It was dark when they sang a hymn, and went to the Mount of Olives (Mat_26:30). The approach of the soldiers was marked by their lanterns (Joh_18:3). Peter warmed himself in the chilly air before a fire of coals (Joh_18:18). It was possible in the dark to follow undetected afar off (Mat_26:58). The panic of the disciples owed something to the night. It was at cock-crowing that Peter remembered his Master’s warning, and wept bitterly. The air of night is over all these scenes. It was ‘the night in which Jesus was betrayed’ (1Co_11:23).

After the Resurrection, night was falling when Jesus revealed Himself to the two at Emmaus in the breaking of the bread (Luk_24:31). They, on returning to Jerusalem, found the disciples gathered together, and Jesus appeared amongst them. When, for fear of the Jews, the disciples met at eventide, Jesus came to them (Joh_20:19); and it was when the day was breaking that He welcomed His weary disciples to the shore (21:4).

It is impossible to discover with accuracy the character of these Syrian nights, so wide is the variation in the climate between place and place, season and season; it is not clear whether, for example, it is literally true to say, 'For thee I trembled in the nightly frost.' Even when we know the impression made upon the Western traveller, we cannot tell how Jesus and His disciples, hardened by the bracing uplands of Galilee, endured the cold and the mists of night. It is clear that the nights are often as cold as the days are hot (cf. Gen 31:40, Jer 36:30; see Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, i. 73). At certain seasons in late summer Jesus would be exposed in His nightly vigils to the dense chilly clouds of mist of which the Song of Songs (Son 5:2) speaks: 'For my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.' For modern descriptions of nights spent in the sacred scenes, reference may be made to Warburton's Crescent and the Cross, and Kinglake's Eothen. But in order to discover the colours, the lights and the half-lights of the Syrian night, those modern painters are the best guides who, like Holman Hunt and William Hole, have studied the Holy Land in the lights and shadows, which are the same as when Jesus watched through the hours of night.

4. Metaphorical applications of 'night.'—The contrast between night and day, darkness and light, belongs to the stock of ideas common to all religions, to the most ancient vocabulary of thought. It is freely used in the OT and NT.

(a) In the opening of the Synoptic Gospels, quotations are used to depict as darkness the state of the world before the dawn of Christ (Mat 4:16, Luk 1:79, cf. 2Co 4:6). It is upon such darkness that the gospel shines; and at the consummation of the Kingdom it is the outer darkness that awaits the evil-doers (Mat 8:12; Mat 25:30). Between the two areas of darkness there is the kingdom of light brought in by Jesus, whose disciples were to be the light of the world (Mat 5:14). When Jesus was arrested, He said that the darkness had prevailed (Luk 22:53), for the high priests were the emissaries of darkness. The night was therefore an emblem of all that was set against the Kingdom of God, of the ignorance and corruption of the world which crucified Christ.

(b) The Fourth Gospel has a certain framework of contrasts, amongst which is the opposition between the light of Christ and the darkness (Joh 1:5; Joh 8:12; Joh 11:10; Joh 12:35-36; 1Jn 2:8-11). While Christ is revealed as the source of light, His enemies are unmasked as the story proceeds. Though 'darkness' is used in this connexion, it is impossible to escape from the thought of this conflict when we read of 'night' in this Gospel. It is used to denote the close of the divinely appointed day of service (Joh 9:4). The healing of the man born blind was part of the manifestation of God, for which there was a set time. This day being past, neither Jesus nor His disciples could work. 'In the application to Jesus the night is His death, and His retreat into the invisible world' (Loisy). When Jesus persisted, in spite of the warnings of His disciples, in returning to Judaea, He said that the hours of the day were given for work; so long as it was the appointed time, He would be safe. The one danger was lest the day should be prolonged 'beyond God's appointment.' So prolonged, the day would be as night, in which the traveller stumbles. With both these passages Luk 22:53 should be compared. Night stands also for the close of the day of grace in the life of Judas (Joh 13:30). Judas went out, 'and it was night.' The darkness is his place. Across the darkness 'less deep than his own soul' he moves from the light of Christ. Night stands for the new environment which he has chosen, 'loving darkness because his deeds were evil.'

(c) In the Apostolic writings the night stands for the waning order, which will be ended by the coming of Christ. The day was at hand; the disciples must put off the garments of night, and put on the armour of light (Rom 13:12 etc.). The difference in the metaphorical use of the night may be seen by a comparison of the word of Jesus, 'the night cometh,' with St. Paul's 'the night is far spent.' For those who are of the fellowship of Christ the darkness is already past (Eph 5:8, 1Th 5:4, 1Pe 2:9); 'Some daylight it is, and is every moment growing.' The darkness and the light are alternatives, and contemporary.

'But he that hides a dark soul, and foul thoughts,

Benighted walks under the midday sun.'

Night has other associations for the modern mind. It is still the emblem of peril and evil, but it speaks also of quietness and peace; this value it has had for poets from Milton to Whitman.

'Dear night! This world's defeat;

The stop to busie fools; care's check and curb;

Which none disturb!'—(Vaughan).

It is important that the reader should not carry such associations into the study of the NT. There, night has always a sinister suggestion. It speaks of all that is hostile to God, who is light, and in whom there is no darkness at all. The word has changed its value in the commerce of ideas. It is with the night as with the sea. In the OT and NT both are emblems of fear and evil: in the City there will be no night (Rev 21:25), and the sea is no more (Rev 21:1). But in the modern mind they awaken other thoughts of attraction and kindness. The writers and teachers of the NT use the coinage of their age; and though we may conjecture that Jesus had other memories of night than those of fear, yet He did not depart from the customary usage, in which the men of His time took night as significant of terror and evil.

☞ Nineveh, Ninevites

NINEVEH, NINEVITES.—The great city of Nineveh was on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite the modern city of Mosul. (For account of it see art. in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 553 f.). In Matthew 12 and Luke 11 are grouped several logia of our Lord, short pithy passages, each of which appears to be a whole in itself. Two of these contain references to Jonah and the Ninevites.

1. Mat_12:38-40 || Luk_11:29-30. It would seem that on two occasions, the second of which is narrated in these passages, the Pharisees asked for a sign. Christ's preaching and miracles were not enough for them. They wanted Him to prove His Divine mission by some overwhelming marvel that would force them to believe in it, if it were truly Divine. The first occasion is in Mar_8:11 f. || Mat_16:1-4, where they asked for 'a sign from heaven.' This He met with a definite refusal (Mk.). St. Matthew, however, adds to the answer words which really belonged to the second occasion—'except the sign of Jonah.' The answer on the second occasion contains this exception in both Gospels. (In St. Matthew the Pharisees are addressed, in St. Luke the multitudes 'when they were coming crowding up,' ἐπαθροισζομένων). But the meaning of the explanation which our Lord adds is somewhat obscure: 'for as Jonah became to the Ninevites a sign, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation' (Lk.). It is important to notice that the 'sign' did not consist in the preaching of Jonah and of the Son of Man. Jesus had been preaching already, whereas the sign was still future ('shall be'). And the story of Jonah in the OT does not, of itself, throw any light on the difficulty. Jonah started from Joppa to sail westward (Tarshish), and the storm occurred near enough to the shore to make the sailors try to row back for safety. When Jonah, therefore, was vomited up by the fish on to the dry land, it was presumably near Joppa. Then he received the second command to go to Nineveh. According to the story, therefore, Jonah was in no sense a sign to the Ninevites. One of two conclusions is inevitable; either that there was a current Haggadic tradition about Jonah and Nineveh which was known to our Lord and His hearers but has been lost to us, or that the word

'Ninevites' has supplanted some other word in the original text of St. Luke, having been introduced by the influence of Luk 11:32. St. Matthew obviates the difficulty by omitting the name altogether; but he (or some later writer, cf. Sanday, Bampton Lectures, p. 433) represents our Lord as teaching that 'as "Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale" (= Jon 1:17), so shall the Son of Man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights.' The 'sign of Jonah' is thus the sign of the resurrection. That, and that only, will be the supreme vindication of Christ's Divine mission. [In St. Luke's passage, after Luk 11:30 D [Note: Deuteronomist.] and some Latin Manuscripts add the harmonistic statement καὶ καθὼς Ἰωνᾶς ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ τοῦ κήτους ἐγένετο τρεῖς ἡμέρας καὶ τρεῖς νύκτας οὕτως καὶ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐν τῇ γῆ, 'and as Jonah (was) in the belly of the whale three days and three nights, so also (is, or shall be) the Son of Man in the earth.' It is conceivable that this was the more original form of the words in St. Matthew]. The question whether this passage necessitates the belief that our Lord accepted the story of Jonah as historically true is dealt with in art. Jonah.

2. Mat 12:41 || Luk 11:32. The words in the two Gospels are identical. [D [Note: Deuteronomist.] omits the whole passage in St. Luke]. St. Matthew places side by side the two logia relating to Jonah, and then introduces the one that relates to Solomon and 'the queen of the south.' St. Luke transposes the latter two, 'either for chronology, or effect, or both' (Plummer). Our Lord again addresses the 'evil generation.' 'Ninevites (ἄνδρες Νινευεῖται, no article; Authorized and Revised Versions 'the men of Nineveh') shall stand up (as witnesses) in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it, because they repented in accordance with the message preached by Jonah (εἰς τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰωνᾶ),' whereas this generation has not repented though a far greater than Jonah is preaching to it; 'something greater (πλεῖον, cf. Luk 11:31, Mat 12:6) than Jonah is here.'

☩ Noah

NOAH.—The hero of the Hebrew version of the Semitic tradition of the Flood; mentioned twice in the Gospels. In the genealogy of Jesus (Luk 3:36) he appears in the ninth generation after Adam, as in the OT narrative. The second mention is in Luk 17:26-27 || Mat 24:37-38, where Jesus uses the Flood in the days of Noah to illustrate the sudden and unexpected coming of the Son of Man; the indifference of the people in the time of Noah is paralleled by the indifference of men to this approaching event.

The use of the illustration shows the familiarity of the Jews with the story of Noah. In the OT there is but the slightest mention of him outside of the immediate Flood-story in Genesis. The writer of Isa 54:9 describes the present distresses of Israel 'as the waters of Noah,' to be followed by peace, according to the unchangeable covenant of peace, as surely as the promise and the covenant followed the Flood. Ezekiel (Eze 14:14; Eze 14:20) knows of three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, efficient mediators to deliver the people by their righteousness; but in the present case, even the three shall be able to deliver only themselves (see also Heb 11:7).

☒ Nobleman

NOBLEMAN.—This word is derived from the Lat. nobilis (= gnô-bilis), 'well-known,' 'notable.' In usage the ennobling which makes a man notable may come (a) from rank inherited or conferred, (b) from office, or (c) from character. With the meaning (c) 'nobleman' does not occur in the NT, nor has it often this significance in English authors. 'A noble man' should be used, when it is desired to convey the thought expressed in Dryden's lines;

'A nobleman is he whose noble mind

Is filled with inborn worth.'

In the Authorized and Revised Versions 'a certain nobleman' is the translation of two different Gr. phrases, viz. (1) ἄνθρωπος τις εὐγενής, Luk 19:12; (2) τις βασιλικός, Joh 4:46; Joh 4:49.

1. In the parable of the Pounds (Luk 19:11 ff.) the literal rendering of the Gr. phrase is 'a certain well-born man,' or, more idiomatically expressed, 'a man of noble family' (Weymouth). The nobility comes from inherited rank. Inadequate translations are those of Wyclif 'a worthi man,' and of most early English versions 'a noble man.' The 'nobleman' of this parable is probably Archelaus, who, on the death of his father, Herod the Great, went to Rome in order to urge his claims to the kingdom. An 'ambassage' of fifty Jews followed Archelaus from Jerusalem to the 'far country' in order to protest against his being made king; in other words, they went to Rome to say, 'We will not that this man reign over us' (Luk 19:14).

2. The Gr. word used in Joh_4:46; Joh_4:49 means ‘belonging to a king’ (cf. Jam_2:8 ‘royal’). Wyclif ‘a litil kyng,’ like the Vulgate regulus, follows the false reading βασιλίσκος. More adequate renderings are AVm [Note: Vm Authorized Version margin.] ‘courtier,’ or ‘ruler’; (Revised Version margin) ‘king’s officer.’ The nobility comes from office. Weymouth expresses the meaning well: ‘a certain officer of the king’s court.’ Josephus (BJ vii. v. 2, Ant. xv. viii. 4) uses the word to distinguish the courtiers and other officers of the king from those, of Rome. The ‘king’ in whose court this officer served was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee. The title ‘king’ was not his by right, but was given to him in courtesy (Mat_14:9). It is not known who this king’s officer was, nor whether his duties were civil or military. He has wrongly been identified with the ‘centurion’ (ἐκατόνταρχος) referred to in Mat_8:5 and Luk_7:2,—a Gentile officer in the army of Antipas. To identify the healing of the nobleman’s son with the healing of the centurion’s servant is not only to manufacture discrepancies, but also to lose the light which the earlier miracle casts upon the later one. This is well brought out by Chadwick (Expositor, 4th series, v. 443 ff.); the strong faith of the centurion (Mat_8:10) ‘becomes intelligible, without ceasing to be admirable, when we reflect that he was evidently aware of the miracle formerly wrought for another inhabitant of the same city, an eminent person, one of the court which his own sword protected.’

⚠ Numbers

NUMBERS.—In this article it is above all things necessary to distinguish carefully between passages in which numbers are used only in the ordinary way and those in which they are connected with some custom or belief, or have for any reason symbolic significance, whether secular or sacred. Three facts must be borne in mind throughout the inquiry: (1) the Oriental preference of round numbers to indefinite statements; (2) the close association in Western Asia from early times of numbers and religion. It seems to be proved that each of the chief Babylonian gods had his number: Anu, for example, 60, Bel 50, Ea 40, Sin 30, Marduk, as identified with Jupiter, 11, etc. (KAT [Note: AT Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Test.] [ZW] 454). And it is equally certain that number often played an important part in ritual. (3) The gradual obliteration of the original reference from the popular consciousness. By the time of Christ the process by which certain numbers had acquired special significance would be wholly or partially forgotten by most of the Jews resident in Palestine. They had received their use from their fathers, and found it expressed in literature and ceremonial and daily life, but knew little, if anything, of the way in which it had originated, so that it is very unsafe to credit them with conscious application of ideas current elsewhere. The Jews who lived in Babylonia from about b.c. 600 to the completion of the Babylonian Talmud unquestionably adopted in course of time many Babylonian thoughts and expressions; but this cannot be assumed, at any rate in the same degree, of the Jews of the Holy Land.

Seven.—Of the significant numbers met with in the Gospels the most prominent is that so freely used in the OT and the other literature of the Semitic area—the number seven, represented in the Gr. Test. by ἐπτά, ἐπτάκις, ἑπταπλασίων, ἕβσομος. In three contexts it must be understood literally, although perhaps in the first two with an underlying reference to another use: in the statement that Anna's married life lasted 7 years (Luk 2:36), in the accounts of the feeding of the 4000 (7 loaves, 7 baskets, Mat 15:34; Mat 15:36 f., Mar 8:5-6; Mar 8:8; cf. also the references in Mat 16:10 and Mar 8:20), and in a note of time, 'the seventh hour' (Joh 4:52). In all other passages: Mat 12:45; Mat 18:21 f., 28, Mar 12:20; Mar 12:22 f., Mar 12:16 [9] Luk 8:2; Luk 11:26; Luk 17:4; Luk 18:30 (a doubtful reading) Luk 20:29; Luk 20:31; Luk 20:33; in the number of the Beatitudes relating to character (Mat 5:3-9); in the 7 disciples at the Lake (Joh 21:2); and in the grouping together of 7 parables of the Kingdom in Matthew 13—it has some kind of special significance. In the Apocalyptic passages which come within the scope of this study, the literal meaning combined with the symbolic may be recognized in the 7 churches (Rev 1:11; Rev 1:20), the 7 candlesticks (Rev 1:12; Rev 1:20, Rev 2:1), the 7 stars (Rev 1:16; Rev 1:20, Rev 2:1, Rev 3:1), and the 7 angels (Rev 1:20). Elsewhere, in the 7 seals (Rev 5:1; Rev 5:5), the 7 horns, the 7 eyes, and the 7 spirits (Rev 4:5, Rev 5:6), the use is purely symbolic.

This symbolic or, to speak more generally, non-literal use is very frequent in the Jewish literature of the period extending from about b.c. 150 to about a.d. 100, the period which includes the time covered by the Gospels. The following are a few examples out of many. We read of 7 heavens (Slav. Enoch 3 ff.; Test. of Levi, 2 f.; cf. Charles in ExpT [Note: xpT Expository Times.] vii. [1895] 57 ff.), 7 angels (To 12:15, Ethiopic Enoch 81:5), and 7 high mountains, 7 large rivers, and 7 great islands (Ethiopic Enoch 77:4, 5, 8). Man is said to have been made by the Divine Wisdom of 7 substances (Slav. Enoch 30:8), and to have received 7 natures (30:9). Seven great works were made on the first day of creation (Jub 2:3); Adam and Eve lived 7 years in Paradise (3:15); at the Deluge 7 sluices were opened in heaven, and 7 fountains of the great deep in earth (5:24); and Jacob is said to have kissed his dying grandfather 7 times (22:26).

In this non-literal use of the number, three shades of significance can perhaps be traced, (a) It was a favourite round number. Instead of 'many' or 'a considerable number,' an Oriental in many cases preferred to say 'seven.' This is probably the force of the number in Peter's question about forgiveness (Mat 18:21); in our Lord's command of sevenfold forgiveness for sevenfold injury (Luk 17:4); in the promise (Luk 18:30, according to some Manuscripts) of sevenfold reward (ἑπταπλασίονα instead of the usual reading πολλαπλασίονα); in the references to the 7 evil spirits (Mat 12:45, Mar 16:9, Luk 8:2; Luk 11:26); in the question of the Sadducees about the 7 brothers (Mat 22:25 etc.); and in the passages alluded to in the Book of Jubilees.—(b) Seven often expressed the idea of completeness. So in 7 churches, 7 parables of the Kingdom, the 7 Beatitudes above mentioned, perhaps in the 7 loaves and the 7 disciples, and some of the passages referred to in the Books of Enoch. This use of 7 in the ancient East is directly attested by some cuneiform texts which explain a sign consisting of 7 wedges as meaning 'totality,' 'whole' (Zimmern in Busspsalmen, p. 73).—(c) Seven was for the Jews and all their neighbours from early times a sacred number. In our Lord's day there were many features of Jewish religious life which kept the sacredness of 7 continually before the mind: the observance of the 7th day and the 7th year; the 7 days of unleavened bread and of the Feast of Tabernacles; the 7 sprinklings of the leper (Lev 14:7); the 7 sprinklings of the blood of the bullock in the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:14); the 7 he-lambs prescribed as an offering for several important occasions (Num 28:11; Num 28:19; Num 28:27; Num 29:36); the 7 days of seclusion for uncleanness or suspected uncleanness (Lev 13:4; Lev 13:6; Lev 13:26; Lev 14:9; Lev 15:13; Lev 15:19; Lev 15:24; Lev 15:28, Num 12:14-15 etc.). the sevenfold march round the altar on the 7th day of the Feast of Tabernacles (Mishna, Sukkah iv. 4); and the seven-branched candlestick in the Temple (Josephus Ant. iii. vi. 7, the Arch of Titus). For all classes of Jewish society in the period of our Lord's ministry the number 7 was inseparably associated with the most solemn seasons and the most important acts of worship. There is no direct illustration of this sacredness of 7 in the Gospels, but it can be confidently traced in Apocalyptic imagery: in the 7 candlesticks (Rev 1:12; Rev 1:20; Rev 2:1) which evidently allude to the seven-branched candlestick in the Temple, and in the 7 horns of the Lamb, and the 7 eyes which are the 7 spirits of God sent out into all the earth (Rev 5:6; cf. Rev 4:5). In non-canonical literature it is found in the 7 heavens and the 7 angels, and in the remarkable description in the so-called Fourth Book of Maccabees of the 7 brothers put to death by Antiochus Epiphanes as a most holy 7 (παναγία συμφώνων ἀδελφῶν ἑβδομάς), who circled round piety in choral dance like the 7 days of creation round the number 7 (4Ma 14:7 f., according to the emended text followed by Deissmann in Kautzseh's Pseudepigraphen, p. 169). The rise and development of these shades of meaning, which to some extent melt into one another (for the use of 7 as the number of completeness was probably connected with its sacred use, and its employment as a round number may have been facilitated by the other uses), are questions which hardly come within the range of this article, as the process must have been completed millenniums before the Christian era. Seven is distinctly a sacred number in the inscriptions of Gudea the ruler of Lagash some centuries before the time of Abraham (RP [Note: P Records of the Past.], new series, ii. 83, 94 ff.). Whatever the primary impulse, whether the observation of the phases of the moon, or of the 7 planets, or of the 7 brightest stars of the Pleiades, or of the 7 stars of Arcturus, or of the 7 stars of the Great Bear, which all attracted the attention of early star-gazers, the Jews of our Lord's age (with a few exceptions) will have used the number simply as their fathers had used it for many generations, as they found it in ritual, in proverbial lore (Pro 6:16; Pro 6:31; Pro 9:1; Pro 26:16; Pro 26:25, Sir 7:3; Sir 20:12; Sir 35:11; Sir 37:14; Sir 40:8), in other literature, in history (Jos 6:4, Jdg 6:1; Jdg 16:7; Jdg 16:13, 2Sa 24:13, 2Ki 5:10 etc.), and in common life (7 days of the marriage feast, To 11:18; and 7 days of fasting and mourning, 1Sa 31:13, Job 2:13, Móed Katon 27^b). A few highly educated men associated the number with astral phenomena; the pseudo-Enoch, for example (Slav. Enoch 30:3), and Josephus, who affirms that the 7 lamps of the candlestick imitated the number of the 7 planets (τῶν πλανητῶν τὸν ἀριθμὸν μεμιμημένοι, Ant. iii. vi. 7); but most will have had little or no acquaintance with such speculations.

One use of the number in the Gospels which has been already briefly referred to needs fuller treatment. In three or four passages, which are really but two, mention is made of 7 evil spirits. Our Lord cast 7 devils or demons out of Mary Magdalene (Luk 8:2, Mark 16 :[9]), and He spoke of an evil spirit which had been cast out as returning with 7 other spirits worse than himself (Mat 12:45, Luk 11:26). It has been suggested, cautiously by Zimmern (KAT [Note: AT Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Test.] [ZW] 462-463), positively by R. C. Thompson of the British Museum (Devils and Evil Spirits of Babylonia, i. xliii.), that these 7 are connected in some way with the evil 7 so often referred to in Babylonian incantations, and identified to some extent with winds and storms. That the Babylonian belief was widely diffused in the regions affected by Babylonian civilization is probable enough, and that it lingered in one district at any rate into Christian times is attested by a curious Syrian charm cited by Thompson; but there seems to be no clear allusion to it in the extant Jewish literature of the period inclusive of the time of Christ. The 7 spirits put by Beliar into man, according to the Test, of Reuben (2 f.), are mere abstractions. The whole passage seems to be a sort of allegory. And it must be remembered that the Test., as we have it, has been manipulated by a Christian, who would be familiar with the passages in the Gospels under consideration. The use of 7 in the latter can be fully accounted for without any reference to Babylonia.

In the Holy Land and amongst the Arabs there are still many echoes of the ancient use of 7 as shown in the preceding paragraphs. Dalman's Diwan contains several examples of it as a round number in popular poetry (pp. 260, 287, 305, 309). Mourning for relatives and marriage rejoicings extend amongst the Arabs over 7 days (Forder's With the Arabs in Tent and Town, 216, 218). If the person is stained with blood, the stain is washed 7 times (Robinson Lees, Village Life in Palestine, 2nd ed. 218). A festival at Nebi Musa lasts 7 days (Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-day, 163). These illustrations show that the modern Oriental not only employs 7 as a round number, but sometimes associates it in some measure with the ideas of completeness and sanctity.

Three and a half.—Of the symbolic use of the half of seven there is one instance in the Gospels, viz. the reference to the famine in the time of Elijah as lasting three years and six months (Luk 4:25, cf. Jam 5:17). This number, the half of the number of completeness, seems to have been often used by the Jews of periods of trial and judgment. According to Josephus (BJ i. i. 1, v. ix. 4), the worship of the Temple was discontinued in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes for three years and six months; and, according to the Midrash on Lam 1:5, the siege by Vespasian continued for the same period (cf. Dan 7:25; Dan 9:27; Dan 12:7, Rev 11:2, and Wetstein's note on the last passage).

Fourteen.—The double of 7 in the genealogy at the beginning of Matthew can hardly be accidental. When the Evangelist carefully divides the generations from Abraham to Christ into three groups of 14 each (Mat 1:17), he must intend the number to have some meaning. He does not forget that it is the double of a favourite round number which is at the same time suggestive of completeness. This multiple of 7 seems to have been common in old Canaan, for scores of the Tell el-Amarna Letters from Canaanites to the Pharaoh have some form of the salutation: 'Seven and seven times I fall at the feet of the king my lord.' A striking example of the use of a multiple of 7 in a scheme of history is supplied by a writing composed probably within a hundred years of our Lord's ministry, 'the Book of Jubilees' or 'Little Genesis.' The writer arranges the whole period from Adam to the giving of the Law in about 7 times 7 jubilees, the interval between two jubilees being 7 times 7 years (50:4).

Seventy.—Of another much used multiple of 7, $7 \times 10 = 70$, there is only one instance in the Gospel narrative, the sending out by Jesus of the 70 disciples (Luk 10:1; Luk 10:17). It must be noted, however, that WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.] read (with BD, some OL, Vulgate, Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{cur} and Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin}) 72, the multiple of 6 by 12. In either case the use of 70, of which there are so many examples in the OT and elsewhere (Gen 50:3, Exo 1:5; Exo 15:27, Num 11:16, Jdg 1:7; Jdg 8:30, 2Ki 10:1, 2Ch 29:32, Psa 90:10, Jer 25:11, Eze 8:11, Dan 9:24, Ethiopic Enoch 89:59 'the 70 shepherds,' Test. of Levi, c. 8, 2Es 14:46; Josephus Vita, 11, BJ ii. xx. 5; Bk. of Jub 11:20 clouds of ravens returned 70 times; Sanhedrin i. 6 the high court of justice with 70 members and president) as a round number for 'very many,' with perhaps the added idea of comprehensiveness, may be safely recognized as influential.

The Rabbinic idea of 70 languages for the 70 peoples is found in the Mishna (Sota vii. 5), and so may be as old as the time of Christ, but can hardly be alluded to in a mission intended only for Jews. Dr. A. Jeremias (Babylonisches im NT, 93) regards 70 as used in the Gospel as 'a round number with astral character;' but any reference to the stars is unnecessary and improbable. Babylonian astrologers might be credited with it, but not the Galilaeans of our Lord's time and the Evangelists.

Seventy times seven.—The 70 times 7 of Mat 18:22, the multiple of 10 times 7 by 7, is a very strong way of saying 'very many times,' almost equivalent to 'without limit.' The alternative rendering of (Revised Version margin) 'seventy times and seven,' which yields a much less emphatic meaning, rests on the LXX Septuagint translation of Gen 4:24 where the same Greek ἑβδομηκοντάκις ἑπτὰ represents Hebrew words which clearly mean 77. In Mt. the familiar rendering is distinctly preferable. Wellhausen (Das Evangelium Matthaei, 94) notes that D [Note: Deuteronomist.] reads ἑπτάκις for ἑπτὰ, which is strictly correct (but cf. Moulton, Proleg. Gr. Gram. 98).

Ten (δέκα, δέκατος, ἀποδεκατεύω ἀποδεκατόω).—The number ten is probably a round number in the parables of the 10 virgins (Mat 25:1), the 10 pieces of silver (Luk 15:8), the talents (Mat 25:28), and the 10 servants who received 10 pounds (Luk 19:13; Luk 19:16 f., Luk 19:24 f.); and in the prediction to the Church of Smyrna of tribulation 10 days (Rev 2:10). In other passages (Mat 20:24, Mar 10:41, Luk 14:31; Luk 17:12; Luk 17:17, and the references to the payment of a tenth to God, Mat 23:23, Luk 11:42; Luk 18:12) it is used literally. As a round number significant of completeness (although without the idea of sacredness associated with 7), its use was facilitated by the decimal system, which may have been suggested in the first instance by the number of fingers on the two hands. Be that as it may, the Jews of our Lord's day found 10 again and again in their sacred books and in history; for example, in the 10 patriarchs from Adam to Noah (Genesis 5); the 10 righteous men whose presence would have saved Sodom (Gen 18:32); the 10 commandments (Exo 34:12-26; Exo 20:2-17, Deu 5:6-21); the 10 temptations with which Israel tempted God in the wilderness (Num 14:22); the 10 curtains of the tabernacle (Exo 26:1); the 10 lavers (2Ch 4:6); the 10 candlesticks (v. 7) and the 10 tables (v. 8) in Solomon's temple; the 10 servants of Gideon (Jdg 6:27), and the 10 elders of Boaz (Rth 4:2).

The non-canonical literature of later times supplies many additional examples. The Book of Jubilees knows of 10 temptations of Abraham (19:8), a thought found also in the Mishna ('Abóth v. 4), and the Test, of Joseph of 10 temptations of Joseph (ch. 2). The fondness of the Rabbis for the number receives striking illustration from the long series of significant tens in 'Abóth v. 1-9. The number was also applied in daily life. Ten persons constituted the minimum required for a community or congregation (Mishna, Sanhedrin i. 6), and for a company at a Paschal supper (Josephus BJ vi. ix. 3). Later authorities fix 10 as the number of persons drawn up in a row to comfort mourners (Sanh. 19a) and as the number requisite for the utterance of the nuptial benediction (Kethuboth, 7b). The 10 virgins of the parable may possibly receive illustration from an Arab custom mentioned by some mediaeval Jewish writers. They affirm that in the land of the Ishmaelites, when the bride was taken from her father's house to her new home on the evening preceding the completion of the marriage festivities, 10 torches or lamps were borne in front of her. The authority is, it is true, very late, but the custom described may have been of ancient origin (given in the gloss to Kelim ii. 8, 9b, and in Latin in Wetstein's note on Mat 25:1). The payment of a tithe or tenth to the Deity, referred to twice by our Lord (Luk 18:12, Mat 23:23 || Luk 11:42), must have been connected in the first instance with the symbolic use of 10. The custom has been traced among Hebrews, Babylonians, Phœnicians, Greeks and Romans. The prominence of the subject in later Judaism is attested by the great space devoted to it in the Mishna, three treatises with 150 hălâkhóth.

Five.—Five, the half of ten, is met with in a considerable number of passages in the Gospels, in some of which it may have more than mere numerical significance. So perhaps in the 5 loaves (Mat 14:17; Mat 14:19; Mat 16:9, Mar 6:38; Mar 6:41; Mar 8:19, Luk 9:13; Luk 9:16, Joh 6:9; Joh 6:13), a great multitude fed by an amount of food strongly suggestive of smallness and incompleteness; the 5 talents which bring in 5 more (Mat 25:15 f., 20); the fivefold profit of the second servant in the parable of the Pounds contrasted with the tenfold profit of the first (Luk 19:18 f.); perhaps the 5 sparrows worth two farthings (Luk 12:6); and the 5 disciples of Jesus at the beginning of His ministry (Joh 1:35-51; cf. the 5 disciples of R. Jochanan ben Zakai, c. [Note: circa, about.] 80 a.d. ['Abóth, ii. 10], and the 5 disciples ascribed to Jesus in a baraitha removed from the censored editions of the Talmud [Sanh. 43a, see Laible's Jesus Christus im Talmud, Anhang 15]). In the other passages (Mat 25:2, Luk 1:24; Luk 12:52; Luk 14:19; Luk 16:28, Joh 4:18; Joh 5:2) it is safest to find only the ordinary meaning. Five, as a small round number, is repeatedly met with in the OT (Gen 43:34; Gen 45:22, Lev 26:8, Isa 30:17 etc.) and in the Tell el-Amarna letters, in one of the latter (ix. 20 in Winckler's edition) it seems to be regarded as a number so small as to need an apology.

Forty.—An important multiple of ten is 40, found in the accounts of the Temptation (Mat 4:2, Mar 1:13, Luk 4:2) and of the period intervening between the Passion and the Ascension (Act 1:3). That it is in both cases more than a mere number is evident. The 40 days of fasting in the wilderness clearly point back to the 40 days spent by Moses on Sinai (Exo 24:18; Exo 34:28) and the 40 days' journey of Elijah in the same region (1Ki 19:8). The 40 days of temptation remind us of the repeated use in the OT of the number 40 of periods of testing or punishment. The rain at the Flood fell 40 days and 40 nights (Gen 7:4; Gen 7:17). The spies were absent 40 days (Num 13:25). The punishment and proving of the people extended over 40 years (Num 14:34). Nineveh was granted 40 days of respite (Jon 3:4). The Philistine oppression lasted 40 years (Jdg 13:1), and Ezekiel predicted that Egypt should be desolate 40 years (Eze 29:11). That this application of the number was not confined to Israel is probable from the statement on the Moabite Stone (lines 7 f.), that the occupation of Mehedeba by Israel lasted 40 years. Even if king Mesha intended the number to be understood literally, which is very doubtful, he may have recorded it with a view to its special significance. In another group of passages, also, 40 seems to be a normal or ideal number. Three periods of rest from foreign invasion, each of 40 years, are mentioned in the Book of Judges (Jdg 3:11; Jdg 5:31; Jdg 8:28). Eli was judge for 40 years (1Sa 4:18); and the reigns of David and Solomon are reckoned at 40 years each (2Sa 5:4, 1Ki 11:42 : add from tradition the reign of Saul, Act 13:21 Josephus Ant. vi. xiv. 9).

How did 40 come to be used in this way? The most satisfactory answer is suggested by the following passages in the OT and other Oriental literature and history. Isaac and Esau married at 40 (Gen 25:20; Gen 26:34). Moses came forward as a friend of his people about 40 (tradition recorded in Act 7:23; cf. Exo 2:11 'when Moses was grown up'), and began his work as their divinely appointed leader 40 years later (Act 7:30 and Exo 7:7). Caleb was 40 years old when sent out as one of the spies (Jos 14:7). Hillel is said to have entered on his Rabbinic career at 40 (Sifre referred to in Jewish Encyc. art. 'Forty'), and Jochanan ben Zakai to have exchanged commerce for study at 40 (Rosh ha-shanah, 31*b*: the same is affirmed of 'Akiba in the late writing, the 'Abôth of Rabbi Nathan, c. 6). Mohammed, according to a tradition referred to by König (Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible iii. 563^b, Stilistik, 55; cf. Muir, The Coran, its Composition and Teaching, 11), appeared as a prophet at or about 40. These passages suggest that 40 was regarded in the ancient East as the age of intellectual maturity, and there are not wanting direct declarations of that belief. In the addendum to the fifth chapter of 'Abôth, 40 is described as the age of reason or understanding (לבינה ארבעים נן), and a passage in the Koran cited by König (ll. cc.) runs: 'until he reached his full strength and attained the age of 40 years.' Forty years, therefore, represented a generation, and thus the number 40 became a round number for a full period, a complete epoch, and more generally for 'many.'

It is still used in this way to some extent in the modern East. There is a Syrian proverb: 'If you live 40 days with people, you will then either leave them or become like them' (Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, 111; Bauer, Volksleben im Lande der Bibel, 236, gives it rather differently, but with the same use of 40). As the ancient star-gazers noted the disappearance of the Pleiades for 40 days, some recent writers (Cheyne, perhaps, Bible Problems and their Solution, 114 f., and Winekler cited there; Zimmern, too, in KAT [Note: AT Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Test.] [ZW], 389, thinks the reference possible) connect the interval between the Passion and the Ascension, through a pre-Christian myth, with this astronomical period. This need not be seriously debated. The explanation given above is quite sufficient to account for the 40 days of the Temptation and 'the Great Forty Days.'

A Hundred (ἑκατόν, ἑκατονταπλασίων).—That the product of 10 by 10 should be frequently used in a general way to express a large number, could be expected only in a civilization which was acquainted with the decimal as well as the sexagesimal system. There are instances in the OT, etc.: Lev 26:8, 2Sa 24:3, Pro 17:10, Ecc 6:3; Ecc 8:12, Sir 18:9 (Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 : 'The number of man's days at the most are 100 years'), and the Moabite Stone (lines 28 f.: 'I reigned over 100 chiefs'). In the Gospels the number is used mainly in this way: in the parable of the Sower (Mat 13:8; Mat 13:23, Mar 4:8; Mar 4:20, Luk 8:8), in the parable of the Lost Sheep (Mat 18:12, Luk 15:4), and in Mat 18:28; Mat 19:29 (not WH [Note: H Westcott and Hort's text.]), Mar 10:30, Luk 16:6 f. In Mar 6:40, Joh 19:39 it is employed in the ordinary way.

The division of 100 into 99 and 1 (Mat 18:12 f., Luk 15:4; Luk 15:7), with the preference of the 1, is found in the Mishna, Peah iv. 1 f. The same division is also met with in a remarkable passage in the Jerus. [Note: Jerusalem.] Talmud (Shabbath xiv. 3), which, however, is not earlier than the 3rd cent. a.d. Perhaps the contrast of 90 and 1 was not unknown to the Rabbinic teaching of our Lord's day.

Ten Thousand.—In the two passages in the Gospels in which the multiple of 10 by 1000 occurs (μυρία, Mat 18:24; μυριάς, Luk 12:1), it is best regarded as hyperbolic. The intention in the one case is to name an amount quite inconceivable in ordinary life, a debt which could not possibly be discharged by a private person; in the other, to impress on the reader the enormous magnitude of the crowds which gathered round Jesus at that period of His ministry. There are many examples of this use in the OT (Lev 26:8, Deu 32:30, 1Sa 18:7 f., Ca 5:10, Eze 16:7 (Revised Version margin), Dan 11:12, Mic 6:7 etc.). In the Tell el-Amarna letters 100,000 is used in this way. Dushratta, king of Mitani, prayed that Ishtar might protect him and his royal brother the Pharaoh for a hundred thousand years (No. xx. in Winckler's edition).

Two.—There seems to be no special significance of the number 2 in the Gospels, unless, with König (Stilistik, 51 f.), we regard it as, in some passages, an equivalent for ‘a few.’ This idiom seems to be proved for the OT. ‘Two days,’ in Num 9:22, may well mean ‘a few days’; and ‘the 2 sticks’ of the widow of Zarephath (1Ki 17:12) can hardly be understood literally. It may be illustrated in the NT by the 2 fishes (Mat 14:17; Mat 14:19, Mar 6:38; Mar 6:41, Luk 9:13; Luk 9:16, Joh 6:9), and the 2 who agree in prayer concerning anything (Mat 18:19); but the ordinary interpretation seems not inadmissible in both these cases. The custom of sending out representatives in pairs, of which there are several examples in the Gospel story (the 2 disciples sent by the Baptist to Jesus [Luk 7:19], the 12 sent out by two and two [Mar 6:7], the 70 sent out by two and two [Luk 10:1], the 2 sent out near Jerusalem [Mat 21:1, Mar 11:1, Luk 19:29], and the 2 sent out to make preparations for the Paschal supper [Mar 14:13, Luk 22:8; cf. the 2 going to Emmaus, Luk 24:13 ff., Mark 16 :[12]], the 2 angels at the sepulchre [Luk 24:4, Joh 20:12], and the 2 on Olivet [Act 1:10]), was probably known to the Jewish society of our Lord’s time.

A comparatively early tradition enjoined that the collectors of charity should travel in couples (Baba Bathra, 8b). When the son of Rabban Gamaliel (the grandson of St. Paul’s Gamaliel) was ill, the distressed father sent two of his disciples to R. Chanina ben Dosa to request his prayers (Berak., 34b). The 5 zugoth or couples of eminent teachers, the last of which consisted of Hillel and Shammai, referred to in the Mishna (Peah ii. 6, ‘Abôth i. 4-16), may also be mentioned. The expression ‘pairs’ was probably used of them in Rabbinic circles in the time of Christ.

The two ways of Mat 7:13 f. probably represent a widely current mode of teaching. They are met with in Jer 21:8 (cf. Deu 30:15, Sir 15:17), Slav. Enoch 30:15 ‘I showed him the two ways, the light and the darkness’ (cf. the note of Charles), in the Jewish manual probably incorporated in the early chapters of the Didache (cf. Ep. of Barnabas, 18 ff.), and in a remarkable passage in the Talmud. When R. Jochanan ben Zakai (c. [Note: circa, about.] 80 a.d.) was on his deathbed, he said to his disciples, who wondered at his tears: ‘There are two ways before me: one leading to the Garden of Eden and the other leading to Gehenna, and I do not know in which I am about to be led’ (Berak. 28b).

Three.—A number of peculiar interest to the student of the Gospels is three— $\tau\rho\epsilon\iota\varsigma$, $\tau\rho\iota$ $\iota\varsigma$, $\tau\rho\iota\tau\omicron\nu$, $\tau\rho\iota\tau\omicron\varsigma$. It is purely numerical in the following passages: Mat 15:32, Mar 8:2; Peter’s words about the three tabernacles on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mat 17:4, Mar 9:5, Luk 9:33); Mat 18:16-20; Mat 20:3; Mat 22:26, Mar 12:21; Mar 15:25, Luk 1:56; Luk 2:46; Luk 12:38; Luk 12:52; Luk 20:12; Luk 20:31; Luk 23:22, Joh 2:1; Joh 2:6. In a much greater number of passages it obviously or probably means more: in the allusion to Jonah (Mat 12:40), in the parables of the 3 measures of meal (Mat 13:33, Luk 13:21), the friend asking for 3 loaves (Luk 11:5), the Good Samaritan (Luk 10:36), and the barren fig-tree (Luk 13:7), in the 3 temptations (Matthew 4 | |), and the 3 prayers of Jesus (Mat 26:44, Mar 14:41), in the references to Peter's threefold denial (Mat 26:34; Mat 26:75, Mar 14:30; Mar 14:72, Luk 22:34; Luk 22:61, Joh 13:38), in the allusions to the 3 days' interval between the Passion and the Resurrection (Mat 12:40; Mat 16:21; Mat 17:23; Mat 20:19; Mat 26:61; Mat 27:40; Mat 27:63 f., Mar 8:31; Mar 9:31; Mar 10:34; Mar 14:58; Mar 15:29, Luk 9:22; Luk 13:32; Luk 18:33; Luk 24:7; Luk 24:21; Luk 24:46, Joh 2:19 f.: add Act 10:40, 1Co 15:4), in the 3 manifestations of the risen Lord recorded in the Fourth Gospel (Joh 21:14), and in the threefold question, 'Lovest thou me?' addressed to Peter (Joh 21:15 ff.). In this latter and larger group can be traced a reference to the use of 3 as a significant number, of which there is a multitude of examples in the OT and other Jewish literature: the 3 feasts (Exo 23:14), Job's 3 friends (Job 2:11), the 3 times of prayer (Psa 55:17, Dan 6:10), the threefold shooting of Joash (2Ki 13:18), the 3 sanctuaries—Eden, Mount Sinai, Mount Zion (Bk. of Jub 8:19), the 3 branches of a vine and the 3 baskets representing 3 days (Gen 40:10; Gen 40:12; Gen 40:16; Gen 40:18), 3 days' journey (Exo 3:18, Num 10:33, Jon 3:3), the 3 days' search for the body of Elijah (2Ki 2:17), Esther's 3 days' fast (Est 4:16), the 3 days of rejoicing for the honour done to Enoch (Slav. Enoch 68:7), the perfuming and anointing of the body of Abraham for 3 days (Test. of Abr. text A, ch. 20), the 3 sayings of the men of the Great Synagogue ('Abôth i. 1), the 3 things on which the world standeth (Shim'on the Righteous in 'Abôth i. 2, and Shim'on ben Gamaliel in 'Abôth i. 19), and the 3 sayings ascribed to each of the 5 disciples of Rabban Jochanan ben Zakai ('Abôth ii. 14 ff.).

It is not difficult to see how the number came to be used in this manner. Several wholes which are often met with can be readily divided into 3 parts: the head, trunk, and legs of a body; the source, stream, and mouth of a river; the root, trunk, and corona of a tree (König, DB [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] iii. 562^b); the van, centre, and rear of an army; morning, noon, and evening. Early Eastern speculation grouped all things under three heads; heaven, earth, and the abyss (cf. the Babylonian triad of gods, Anu, Bel, Ea). It will have been noticed in very early times that 3 is the smallest number with beginning, middle, and end. So it naturally came to be used on a small, well-rounded total, especially, as shown above, in reference to time.

The 3 days' interval between the Passion and the Resurrection may perhaps receive additional illustration from the Jewish rule that evidence for the identification of a corpse could not be received after 3 days (Yebamôth xvi. 3). A reason for the rule is given in a tradition ascribed to Bar Kappara, who was associated with the compiler of the Mishna (c. [Note: circa, about.] a.d. 200). This Rabbi is reported to have said that for 3 days the soul hovers near the body, waiting for an opportunity of returning into it, but that at the end of that period, seeing that the features are altered, it goes away (Midrash on Genesis, c. 100; Midrash on Ecc 12:6 : cf. Bousset, Die Religion des Judeuthums, 285 note). The resurrection of Jesus evidently took place before the close of the period of identification. Be that as it may, there can hardly be a doubt that the belief expressed by Bar Kappara, or something like it, underlay the words of Martha: ‘Lord, by this time he stinketh: for he hath been dead four days’ (Joh 11:39). The 3 days were ended, and decay, she thought, had advanced so far that the features would be unrecognizable. That the 3 days between the Passion and the Resurrection had even the remotest connexion with the 3 days’ disappearance of the new moon in spring (Zimmern in KAT [Note: AT Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Test.] [ZW] 389), is highly improbable.

Two other passages cannot be entirely passed over, although little or nothing can be said in illustration: the reference to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost in the baptismal formula (Mat 28:19), and the words ascribed to the risen Lord in the Apocalypse: ‘I am the first, and the last, and the living one’ (Rev 1:17). There is no parallel to the use of the number in the former in pre-Christian Jewish literature, and connexion with Babylonian and Egyptian triads is out of the question. The triple priestly blessing (Num 6:24-26) and the Thrice Holy in the song of the seraphim (Is 6:3) are remarkable, but cannot be safely regarded as foreshadowings of the doctrine of the Trinity. The number 3 is in both cases strongly emphatic, but it is not advisable to find more than emphasis. ‘Holy, holy, holy’ is a very strong superlative. The passage in the Apocalypse is, no doubt, like the preceding words ‘him which is, and which was, and which is to come’ (Rev 1:4), an expansion or interpretation of the name I AM THAT I AM (Exo 3:14), and has a partial parallel in Plato, de Legibus, 716: ὁ μὲν δὴ θεὸς (ὡσπερ καὶ ὁ παλαιὸς λόγος) ἀρχὴν τε καὶ τελευτὴν καὶ μέσα τῶν ὄντων ἀπάντων ἔχων, but must not be connected with it.

Four.—The number 4 (τέσσαρες, τεταρταῖος, τέταρτος, τετράμηνος, τετραπλῶος) is found in the Gospels in the following passages: in the 4 months before harvest (Joh 4:35), the 4 bearers of the paralytic (Mar 2:3), the 4th watch (Mat 14:25, Mar 6:48), the fourfold restitution promised by Zacchaeus (Luk 19:8), the 4 days of Lazarus in the grave (Joh 11:17; Joh 11:39), the division of the garments of Jesus among the 4 soldiers (Joh 19:23), the 4 winds (Mat 24:31, Mar 13:27), and the 4 kinds of soil in the parable of the Sower, with the types of character which they represent (Mat 13:4 ff. and parallels). We may add the 4 Gospels, the number of which was early regarded as significant. The four last references constitute a group. The 4 winds, associated with the 4 points of the compass, are met with in the OT and elsewhere in Oriental literature and symbolism: 1Ch 9:24 (Revised Version margin) , Jer 49:36, Eze 37:9; Eze 42:20 (Revised Version margin) , Dan 8:8; Dan 11:4, Zec 2:6; Zec 6:5, Babylonian Flood Story, eol. iii. line 42, Book of the Dead, c. 161 (in Budge’s smaller edition, p. 531 f.). This use of 4 suggested world-wide extent and then comprehensiveness. So we find in the OT: 4 heads of the river going out of Eden (Gen 2:10), 4 cherubim each with 4 faces and 4 wings (Eze 1:5 f., cf. Rev 4:6 ff.), 4 horns (Zec 1:18), 4 smiths (Zec 1:20), 4 chariots (Zec 6:1), and 4 empires (Dan 2:40; Dan 7:3 ff., Dan 7:17 ff.). An Assyrian royal title ran 'king of the 4 quarters,' that is, of the world. Some of the divine figures in Assyrian sculptures have 4 wings, for example No. 1 in the Nimroud Gallery of the British Museum. Adam's name is said to have been given from 4 substances, that is, the east, the west, the north, and the south (Sl. Enoch 30:13). Abraham is said to have pitched his tent where 4 roads met (Test. of Ab. text A 1). The 4 kinds of soil in the parable, therefore, and the 4 types of character which they represent, cover the whole area of human life; and the 4 Gospels give a complete outline-portrait of Christ. The use of 4 in the grouping of persons or things seems to have been a favourite method with Jewish teachers. There are several examples of it in Amos (Amo 1:3; Amo 1:6; Amo 1:9; Amo 1:11; Amo 1:13; Amo 2:1; Amo 2:4; Amo 2:6) and in Proverbs (Pro 30:15 f., Pro 30:18 f., Pro 30:21 ff., Pro 30:24 ff., Pro 30:29 ff.). Later instances are Sir 37:18 'good and evil, life and death,' Test. of Judah, ch. 16, '4 spirits in wine,' and the remarkable series of paragraphs in 'Abôth v. Pro 30:16-21, in which people generally, dispositions, scholars, almsgivers, college-goers, and those who sit under the wise, are in each case grouped in 4 classes. May we suppose that our Lord, in accordance with His habit of utilizing current methods, adopted in the parable a familiar mode of classification?

Twelve.—Twelve, as the number of the tribes of Israel according to ancient tradition, became naturally a favourite number among the Jews, especially as it carried with it the suggestion of Divine choice and Divine faithfulness. So it figured in religious ritual, symbolism, and history. There were 12 jewels in the high priest's breastplate (Exo 28:21), and 12 cakes of shewbread (Lev 24:5). Solomon's sea stood on 12 oxen (1Ki 7:25), Elijah's altar on Carmel consisted of 12 stones (1Ki 18:31), and the altar-hearth in Ezekiel's visionary temple was 12 cubits long by 12 cubits broad (Eze 43:16). It is, therefore, not surprising that the number 12 is prominent in the Gospels. The 12 disciples referred to in Mat 10:1 f., Mat 10:5; Mat 11:1; Mat 20:17; Mat 26:14; Mat 26:20; Mat 26:47, Mar 3:14; Mar 4:10; Mar 6:7; Mar 9:35; Mar 10:32; Mar 11:11; Mar 14:10; Mar 14:17; Mar 14:20; Mar 14:43, Luk 6:13; Luk 8:1; Luk 9:1; Luk 9:12; Luk 18:31; Luk 22:3; Luk 22:47, Joh 6:67; Joh 6:70 f., Joh 20:24 (in 22 of these passages simply as οἱ δώδεκα, 'the Twelve'; cf. also Act 6:2, 1Co 15:5, Rev 21:14), the 12 baskets of broken pieces (Mat 14:20, Mar 6:43; Mar 8:19, Luk 9:17, Joh 6:13), the 12 legions of angels (Mat 26:53), are all more or less reminiscent of the 12 tribes. In the promise in Mat 19:28 || Luk 22:30 is a direct reference which puts beyond doubt the association of the number in our Lord's day with the tribes.

This use may have been aided by the constant recurrence of the 12 months of the year, but it is not safe to follow Dr. A. Jeremias (Babylonisches in NT, 88) in connecting the number of the Apostles even indirectly with the 12 signs of the zodiac. He does not, indeed, venture to affirm that this lay in the consciousness of Jesus, although he thinks the promise of the 12 thrones (Mat 19:28, Luk 22:30) might point at that; but he is confident that 'the mystical cosmological reference,' as he calls it, lies in the words of the writer of the Apocalypse about the 12 Apostles of the Lamb (Rev 21:14). However it may be with the latter, it is unnecessary to find any allusion of the kind in the Gospels. Men familiar in some degree with Gentile culture and the astrological-astronomical speculations which were in vogue about this time, such as Philo and Josephus, might connect the 12 gems of the high priest's breastplate with the signs of the zodiac, and might therefore regard 12 as a perfect number (Philo, de Profugis, § 33, cited by König, DB [Note: Dictionary of the Bible.] iii. 563a, τελειος δ' ἀριθμος ὁ δώδεκα; Josephus, Ant. iii. vii. 7) without the idea ever entering the minds of the majority.

In several passages a period of 12 years is referred to. The woman healed by touching the fringe of the Lord's garment had been ill for 12 years (Mat 9:20, Mar 5:25, Luk 8:43). The daughter of Jairus was 12 years old (Mar 5:42, Luk 8:42). Jesus was 12 years old when found in the Temple (Luk 2:42). In all these cases the number must be understood literally, but the second and third admit of illustration from Oriental life. At 12 childhood ceased for the Jewish boy. In the addendum to the fifth chapter of 'Abôth two of the rules run: 'At 10 the Mishnah, at 13 the Commandments.' A boy of 12, therefore, was on the threshold of manhood. A tradition recorded by Josephus affirms that Samuel was 12 years old when he received the Divine call (Ant. v. x.4). Another tradition, found in a Christian writing, but probably of Jewish origin, represented Solomon as 12 years old when he gave his famous judgment about the child (pseudo-Ignatius, ad Magnesias, iii.). At 12 a girl was marriageable. According to the Book of Jubilees (30:2), Dinah was 12 years old at the time referred to in Gen 34:2.

One more passage remains: 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' (Joh 11:9). Here, no doubt, Babylonian influence can be traced, although in the time of Christ most of the Jews living in Palestine will have been wholly unconscious of the fact. The full day was divided by the Babylonians, who in this matter as in so many points set the rule for all their neighbours, and through the Greeks for the whole Western world, into 12 parts. As this day consisted of two halves, the daylight portion and the night portion, the division into twelve was applied to each, without regard to the season of the year. An hour was one-twelfth of the day or the night (KAT [Note: AT Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Test.] [ZW] 328, 335 f.). The old way of speaking still survives in Syria. The day is regarded, as in the time of Christ, as consisting of 12 hours (Bauer, Volksleben im Lande der Bibel, pp. 274 f.).

Sixty.—The use of the number 60 in the parable of the Sower (Mat 13:8; Mat 13:23, Mar 4:8; Mar 4:20, not in Luk 24:13) may possibly have indirect connexion with the sexagesimal system of Babylonia (for this, cf. Bezold, Ninive und Babylon, 90, 92), which must have been current throughout western Asia, especially through its use in the subdivision of the talent (talent = 60 manehs; maneh = 60 shekels), and would naturally lead to the employment of the number with more or less significance. There are many passages in the OT and other Jewish literature in which 60 can hardly be accidental: Num 7:88 (60 rams, 60 he-goats, 60 he-lambs of the first year), Deu 3:4 (60 cities, cf. Jos 13:30, 1Ki 4:13, 1Ch 2:23), 1Ki 6:2 (Solomon's temple 60 cubits long, cf. 2Ch 3:3), 1Ki 4:22, 2Ch 11:21, Jer 52:25 (60 men of the people of the land found in Jerusalem by the Babylonians, cf. 2Ki 25:19), Ca 3:7, 6:8, Test, of Judah, ch. 3 (stone weighing 60 lbs.), ch. 9 (60 men slain), Test, of Abraham, text A 10 (cherubic chariot attended by 60 angels). The many examples in the Babylonian Talmud (fire the 60th part of Gehenna, Berak. 57b etc.) will be largely due to the Babylonian atmosphere of the compilation.

Thirty.—Thirty, the half of sixty, may be used in the same context (Mat 13:8; Mat 13:23, Mar 4:8; Mar 4:20) in somewhat the same way, through the same association. In Luk 3:23, where it is said that Jesus was about 30 years of age at the beginning of His ministry, there is probably an allusion to the belief that 30 years marked the attainment of manly vigour. Joseph entered on his career as a states-man at 30 (Gen 41:46), and David was 30 when he ascended the throne (2Sa 5:4). In the appendix to the fifth chapter of 'Abôth, 30 is defined as the age of strength (שלשים בן לכה). The 30 pieces of silver paid to Judas (Mat 26:15; Mat 27:3; Mat 27:9, cf. Zec 11:12 f.) would remind every Jew of the average value of a slave as fixed in the Law (Exo 21:32), 30 shekels. The Babylonian average was lower, but the Assyrian coincided with the Hebrew (Johns in Babylonian und Assyrian Laws, Contracts, and Letters, p. 182 f.). In the remaining passage, Joh 6:19, the number is purely historical.

☩ Nunc Dimittis

NUNC DIMITTIS (Luk 2:29-32), so called from the opening words in the Latin version, is the third and shortest of the hymns of the Incarnation preserved to us by St. Luke. Like the other two, it speaks of Christ; but whereas Benedictus, the Song of the priest Zacharias, is naturally of His Priesthood, and Magnificat, the Song of the royally-descended Virgin Mary, of His Kingdom, this, the Song of Simeon (wh. see), as befits the utterance of a prophet, is of Messiah fulfilling the prophetic function assigned to Him in the OT (cf. Deu 18:15), and especially by Isaiah.

The feature in Simeon's character which is to the Evangelist the climax of his virtues is that he was 'waiting for the consolation of Israel.' The words are a reminiscence of Jacob's, 'I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord' (Gen 49:18); and they describe what was precisely the attitude of Abraham in regard to God's promise of the land (Act 7:9 and Heb 11:13), and of David in regard to the kingdom (1Sa 26:9-11), both of whom did not 'fret themselves in anywise to do evil' (Psa 37:8), but waited till the Lord would give what He had spoken. So our Lord, speaking of those in danger of being led away by false Christs, bids His followers 'in patience possess their souls' (Luk 21:19). This was part of the faith of Simeon: his waiting for 'the Lord's Christ' (Luke 2) saved him from going after any turbulent pretender, or accepting, with the Herodians, a mere king of this world. The 'consolation of Israel' was a phrase with the Rabbis for the times of Messiah: Lightfoot (Hor. Heb.) gives five illustrations of its use.

The repeated mention of the Holy Spirit guiding Simeon at each successive step evinces the fact that prophecy, silent since the days of Malachi, is again about to stir (de Wette, Oosterzee); yet the difference also is to be observed between the repeated comings of the Spirit upon Simeon, and His abiding on Jesus (Joh 1:33) and remaining with the Church (Joh 14:16). By what sign Simeon was taught of the Spirit to recognize the child of Mary as the Christ we are not told: perhaps the Virgin's poverty, evidenced by her offering of doves, was the token to him, as the manger-cradle had been to the shepherds (Luk 2:12). Anyhow the Child was pointed out to him; he went up to Him, received Him in his arms, and, as he held Him, he 'blessed God,' and uttered his Nunc dimittis. There are no different readings in the text of it; but the Syriac renders the verb in the first clause, which in Greek, Latin, and English is in the indicative mood, by an optative, 'My Lord, now release thou thy servant in peace.' The mistake has been followed by several in this country who should have known better: e.g. by Logan, in the Scottish Paraphrases (Par. 38):

‘Now, Lord, according to thy word,

Let me in peace depart.

At length my arms embrace my Lord,

Now let their vigour cease,’ and even by John Keble, usually so accurate:

Lord, let me now depart.’

As a matter of fact, Simeon does not pray for death. He thanks God for permitting him to see, what many prophets and kings had desired to see and were not permitted (Luk 10:24), the salvation He had promised; and having seen it he says that he is ready to go when God wills.

The hymn is in three couplets:

(1) Thanksgiving for permission at last to leave his post, as the sentinel when the hour of his watch is over (Godet). Death will be to him as sleep to a labouring man (Bruce).

‘Now thou art letting thy servant depart, O Lord,

According to thy word, in peace.’

The ‘word,’ of course, is the promise of v. 26 that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord’s [own] Christ; and the fulfilment of the promise has brought him peace, because in Christ there is sure salvation for him and for all God’s people.

There are two fine Patristic comments—Cyprian’s (On the Mortality, 3), ‘He bears witness that the servants of God have peace, are free, and tranquil when, withdrawn from the whirlwinds of this world, they reach the port of the eternal home, and pass through death to immortality’; and Ambrose’s (Exposition of St. Luke, Bk. ii. ii. 59), ‘Let him who wishes to depart come into the Temple; let him come to Jerusalem; let him wait for the Lord’s Christ; let him take in his arms the Word of God, embracing Him by the arms of faith.’ Servant (δοῦλον), Lord (δέσποτα)—‘slave,’ ‘master’ are terms appropriate at all times to express the relation between God and men, yet savouring of the Law (Bruce).

(2) The reason of Simeon's peace in the prospect of death:

Which thou preparedst before the face of all peoples.’

What we see with our eyes is sure (cf. Joh_1:14; Joh_19:35 and 1Jn_1:2). And Jesus Christ is salvation (Isa_49:6), for salvation is in Him and in none other (Act_4:12). Moreover, He is the salvation which God Himself provided, not which man might have fancied. ‘Preparedst’ is a more correct rendering than Authorized Version ‘hast prepared,’ for the tense refers to a definite historical fact (cf. Luk_1:47); and this God means for all peoples (Luk_2:10) (plural)—both the sections of mankind of whom, in the next verse, Simeon is to speak, viz. the Gentiles and Israel. The Greek word used (λαός) usually means Israel only, the people [of the Lord]. But now the privilege is extended, and they who were not a people are to be the people of the living God (Hos_2:1, Rom_9:25-26, 1Pe_2:13).

(3) The different prophetic functions Christ is to discharge towards the Gentiles and the Jews respectively:

‘A light to lighten the Gentiles,

And the glory of thy people Israel.’

(a) To the Gentiles who sat in darkness (Isa_9:2) He is to be a Light (Isa_49:6); but not only by giving them light. The thought is greater than merely that Christ is to reveal truth to the Gentiles. He is a Light ‘for their revealing’ (εἰς ἀποκάλυψιν ἐθνῶν)—to show what the Gentiles are, how dear to Almighty God (cf. Rom_3:29), and how capable they are through His grace of producing saints. The prophecy of Simeon is thus akin to that of John the Baptist (Mat_3:7), and has its OT roots in such passages as Isa_25:7 and Hos_2:3. How wonderfully has it been fulfilled—that out of Judaism He could bring a Peter, a John, a Paul; out of decadent Rome an Augustine and an Ambrose; out of the wild Irish a Columba; out of the Saxon ‘knife-men’ a Wilfrid and a Bede! We have yet to see what He will make of China and Japan, when they are Christianized, (b) Of Israel, who had produced so many saints, prophets, and teachers, the ‘lights of the world in their several generations,’ Christ is to be the supreme Glory, of more honour than Moses (Heb_3:3), with a better priesthood than Aaron (Heb_7:27), Himself the very Brightness of the Father’s glory (Heb_1:3), which was beheld in Him (Joh_1:14). St. Paul saw, in the 1st cent., how true is this prophecy of Christ (Rom_9:4-6), and all subsequent history is its confirmation.

A parallel is given by Carpenter (The Synoptic Gospels) from Buddhist legend of one who, discerning in a babe the signs of perfection, predicted, 'Thou wilt be a Buddha, and remove the veils of sin and ignorance from the world.' But the Indian seer could not rejoice with Simeon, he could only weep that he would not be alive to share the light; which reminds us that Simeon's peace is through the Christian hope of a better life to come, when we shall be with Christ.

Simeon's attitude towards the Gentiles, while in full accord with that of the OT (Gen 22:18; Gen 49:10, Psa 98:3; Psa 100:1, Isa 42:6; Isa 49:6; Isa 60:3), is in striking contrast to that of the nearest contemporary Jewish writings, the Psalms of Solomon, in which, though there is the same longing for Messiah and His kingdom, the lot of the heathen is not light or salvation, but only judgment (Ps-Sol 16:4).

The singular sweetness—the calm beauty, as of a perfect pearl—of the Song of Simeon has always been recognized; and for ages it has entered into the evening service of the Church. Both the Roman Catholic and the Anglican Churches have appointed it as a hymn at Vespers, teaching us (as it does) to live each day as if we knew it to be our last; and, embracing Christ by faith, to thank God for Him and be ready in peace to depart in Him. In the Church of Scotland, while Knox's Prayer-Book held its place, and again after the introduction of the Paraphrases (1781), it became customary to use it at the close of the Communion Service; while in a few churches, both Episcopal and Presbyterian, it is sung at funerals when the body is being carried out of the church.

☩ Oaths

OATHS.—Christ's teaching on the subject of oaths is set forth in one of the sections of the Sermon on the Mount, in which He contrasts His doctrine with that of the earlier dispensation (Mat 5:33-37). The position of the Law on the subject is summed up in the statement, 'Thou shalt not forswear thyself,' but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths.' This is a combination of different passages in the Law (Lev 19:12, Num 30:3, Deu 23:22), of which the first deals specially with oaths, the others with vows. But in point of obligation oaths and vows were recognized in the Rabbinical schools as on the same footing (Wünsche, Neue Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrasch, p. 57), and the statement in which Christ here represents the position of the Law was, no doubt, the current formula in which, in these schools, the doctrine of the Law on the question was summed up. in opposition to this dictum of the Law, Christ lays down an absolute prohibition, 'Swear not at all' (Mat_5:34), and proceeds to draw out the full meaning of the 'at all' (ὅλως) by showing that His prohibition covers every appeal to anything beside us in confirmation of our word, and not merely such as expressly introduce the name of Jehovah. The casuists among the scribes made a distinction between more and less binding oaths. The former class consisted of those which invoked the name of God; the latter used such forms as 'by heaven,' 'by earth,' 'by Jerusalem,' 'by the life of my head.' An oath by heaven and earth, for instance, was not considered to be binding, because one did not require to think of the Creator; whereas if one swore by one of the letters of the Divine name, or by one of the Divine attributes, that was regarded as binding, and he who treated such an oath lightly was punishable (Wünsche, op. cit. p. 59; Schürer, HJP [Note: JP History of the Jewish People.] ii. ii. 122).

Our Lord Himself gives other examples of such casuistical distinctions in the matter of oaths in Mat_5:16-22. He refers to them here because the full import of His prohibition of oaths might not be realized by those who were familiar with such distinctions. It might be thought that He was merely forbidding a direct appeal to the name of Jehovah. And so He proceeds to show how utterly different is His standpoint on the question of oaths from that of the Rabbinical authorities. They endeavoured to empty the oath of reference to God, so as to narrow the scope of the commandment against perjury. Christ sought to make explicit the reference to God virtually contained in every asseveration, so as to widen the scope of His prohibition of swearing. With this object He takes some of the common forms of oaths which were regarded as less binding, and shows how, though the name of God be not expressly mentioned, they are meaningless unless they involve an appeal to Him. Thus to call heaven or earth to witness our statement is an empty form, unless we be thinking not merely of heaven or earth, but of the Power they suggest, who will punish unfaithfulness (Mat_5:34-35 a), i.e. God, of whom heaven is the throne and earth the footstool (Isa_66:1). To appeal to Jerusalem (Mat_5:35 b) is meaningless unless we be thinking of the great King, who has made Jerusalem His city (Psa_48:3). And to swear by one's head (Mat_23:36) involves an appeal to Him in whose hands our destiny lies, and who alone can bring upon our heads the punishment of perjury. For ourselves, we cannot make one hair black or white. Black hair is here used as the symbol of youth; white, of old age. The very colour of our hair, Christ would say, reminds us that we are in the hands of a higher Power. It is to that Power we appeal when we swear by the life of our head. Every form of asseveration, then, Christ concludes, every appeal to anything beside us in confirmation of our word, is an oath, for it virtually involves an appeal to God. All such forms come under Christ's prohibition. His command is: 'Swear not at all; but let your speech be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay' (Mat_5:34; Mat_5:37).

These last words have received different interpretations. Beza renders them, ‘Let your affirmation be yea, and your negation nay,’—an attempt to bring the present verse into harmony with Jam 5:12 at the sacrifice of grammar. Equally unjustifiable grammatically is Grotius’ attempt to secure the same object by his translation, ‘Let your yea and nay of speech correspond to a yea and nay of fact,’ with the additional fault that it is questionable whether that is the meaning of the passage in James. The simplest way of taking the words is to regard the καὶ ναί, οὐ, οὐ, as a repetition, such as was common in actual speech (cf. 2Ki 10:15, 2Co 1:17), to confirm a statement. ‘Let your speech,’ says Christ, ‘be a clear and forcible yes or no. For whatsoever is more than these,’ He continues, ‘cometh ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ.’ Again there is difference of opinion as to these last words. Many take them as equivalent to ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου. But B. Weiss (Matthäusevangelium, ad loc.) contends that such a view is incompatible with the fact that the OT requires oaths (Exo 22:11), and even puts them into the mouth of God (Gen 22:16; Gen 26:3). It is better to take the πονηροῦ as the gen. of the neuter; so that the statement will mean that the oath springs from evil, either in the sense that it is the presence of evil in the world that leads to the oath in confirmation of one’s word, and that in the Kingdom of God, in which truth prevails, the oath must altogether disappear (so Weiss), or that the practice of confirming one’s statement by an oath springs from the tacit assumption that when one does not so confirm it, one is not bound to speak the truth (so Wendt, Lehre Jesu, ii. 210).

Before proceeding to discuss the conclusion to be drawn from the passage, we must note an interpretation of Mat 5:34-36 which has gained considerable acceptance, but which puts quite a different meaning upon Christ’s prohibition in Mat 5:34 from what we have given above. It is suggested that the prohibition is not meant to embrace all oaths, but merely the thoughtless swearing of everyday life whereby the name of God is profaned (so Calvin, Ewald, Tholuck, and many others). The ὁμόσαι ὅλως of Mat 5:34, it is contended, does not include swearing by God; for, as Ewald (Die drei ersten Evangelien, p. 267) says, that was done only in courts of law, and Christ is not referring to this at all. If He had meant to forbid oaths absolutely, He would certainly have mentioned the direct oath in which the name of God is expressly invoked. As He has not done so, we must conclude that His prohibition is not meant to apply to it, i.e. that he means to forbid only such thoughtless oaths of common life as He proceeds to exemplify.

This attempt to empty the ὅλως of its meaning does not commend itself. It is evidently inspired by fear of the consequences which seem to ensue from the absolute prohibition Christ lays down, and such a motive does not tend to sound exegesis. It fails to do justice to the original. The only permissible translation of μη ὁμόσαι ὅλως is that which regards it as an absolute prohibition. Only thus does Christ's position present a proper contrast to that of the Law. The Law forbids swearing falsely; Christ forbids swearing at all. Thus we have a sufficient contrast to, and advance beyond, the position of the Law. But on the present interpretation Christ sets over against the commandment against perjury in the name of God a prohibition merely of frivolous swearing, and that of a kind which does not mention the name of God at all, which is somewhat of an anti-climax. It is true, as the supporters of this interpretation point out, that Christ does not expressly mention the oath by the name of God in the instances He adduces. But it is much more reasonable to suppose that He omits it because it is evident that it is included under the swearing He prohibits, while there may be doubt as to these indirect oaths He specifies, than to argue that, when He prohibits swearing ὄλωϛ, He includes under the prohibition only those forms of oath which were hardly regarded as oaths at all by His contemporaries, and omits the one oath that was universally so esteemed.

We conclude, then, that Christ's word in Mat_5:34 is to be understood as an absolute prohibition of swearing, and that it cannot be restricted to the thoughtless, irrelevant oaths of common life. And it remains to consider in what spirit this absolute prohibition is laid down, and what are the conclusions that follow from it. Christ has Himself given the reason for His prohibition of swearing. Whatsoever goes beyond the distinct and forcible affirmation and negation, He says, cometh of evil (Mat_5:37). As we saw above, this saying may be interpreted in different ways. It may be taken to mean that it is the presence of evil among our fellow-men that necessitates oaths, to convince them of the good faith of the speaker. So Augustine (Sermon on the Mount): 'Tu autem non malum facis, qui bene uteris juratione, quae, etsi non bona, tamen necessaria est, ut alten persuadeas quod utiliter persuades, sed a malo est illius, cujus infirmitate jurare cogaris.' But, as Tholuck (Sermon on the Mount, English translation p. 252 f.) remarks, this is open to a twofold objection—first, that in such a case the evil in question rests with him who requires the oath, whereas all the stress of the prohibition is directed against taking oaths; and, second, that on this interpretation the fulfilment of our Lord's command would be deferred to the realization of that ideal state in which no evil exists, in which case the present command would stand on a different footing from the others of the Sermon on the Mount, which plainly apply to a world in which evil is prevalent. For this reason we accept the other interpretation of the words given above—that whatever goes beyond the plain affirmation and negation cometh of evil, in the sense that behind it is the tacit assumption that, when our word is not confirmed by an oath, we are not bound to adhere strictly to the truth. This brings the present passage into harmony with the general spirit of the Sermon on the Mount. The theme of that Sermon is righteousness of the heart. When Christ opposes His commands to those of the Law, it is to show that He requires more than the Law demanded, that He insists not only upon righteousness of outward conduct, but upon righteousness of the heart. The Law required strict truth whenever an oath was taken. The tendency of the Pharisaic formalism of Christ's day was to keep the letter of the Law by strict fulfilment of one's promise and scrupulous adherence to the truth whenever the Divine name was invoked, but to break its spirit by assuming that whenever such an oath was not taken, greater latitude was allowed. Christ insisted upon such a regard for truth that the absence of the oath should make no difference. To feel that one is more bound by an oath than by one's simple word is to have the spirit of falsehood in one's heart. In such a case whatsoever is more than the direct yea and nay cometh of evil.

Once we realize what is the spirit in which Christ's prohibition is given, we are in a position to decide some of the questions raised as to the practicability of the observance of the command in existing social conditions. If the prohibition is absolute, on what ground can the practice of taking oaths in courts of law be defended? The answer is that the spirit in which the oath is taken in such a case is very different from that which our Lord condemns in the present instance. In a court of law we take the oath to convince our fellow-men, who cannot see our heart and judge of our regard for truth, of our good faith. That is a very different thing from thinking that we are not required to speak the truth unless bound by an oath; and it is the latter view that Christ condemns in His dictum upon swearing. We may still keep the spirit of our Lord's command though we break the letter of it by taking an oath in court, just, as we may keep the spirit of many other injunctions of the Sermon on the Mount, e.g. that with regard to praying in private (Mat 6:6), though we break them in the letter. Christ Himself, according to the Gospel in which the present passage occurs, did not refuse to answer when the high priest adjured Him by the living God (Mat 26:63). And though Mark omits the adjuration, so that we cannot with confidence appeal to the conduct of Christ Himself on this occasion, all the Gospels represent Him as frequently strengthening His declarations by the solemn ἀμήν, which in the Fourth Gospel becomes ἀμήν ἀμήν. In a word, while the prohibition of swearing is absolute, and is on no account to be modified in the manner we have referred to above, we must remember that what Christ is aiming at is not the mere outward oath, but the spirit of evil which inspired it, and regard as an infraction of His command only such conduct as cometh of the evil He seeks to destroy. When we regard the commandment in that light, there is no need to defer the fulfilment of it to an ideal state. It does not describe the conditions which should prevail between the members of the Kingdom of God only in their relations to one another, but lays down a principle which should guide the member of the Kingdom in his relation to all with whom he comes in contact. And though, owing to the conditions of the society in which he lives, he may have to depart from the strict letter of the precept by taking a solemn oath on occasion, so long as he does not do so from the unworthy motive which inspires the oaths against which Christ contends, he may still claim to remain faithful to the command of Christ.

OBEDIENCE

i. The Obedience of Christ

1. Christ as a man (see Humanity of Christ) came under the obligations of men, and principal among these was the obligation of obedience. This He Himself recognized explicitly. His parents had Him circumcised (Luk_2:21), and brought Him to Jerusalem according to the custom, to observe the law of the Passover (possibly every year, Luk_2:41-42), which custom He subsequently continued personally (Joh_2:23; Joh_5:1; cf. Joh_7:2; cf. Joh_7:10, Mat_26:17 ff. etc.). He felt Himself called upon to join in the great religious movements of His day, though not commanded by the Law (Mat_3:15), as well as to observe the political customs (Mat_17:27). It was therefore more than a mere expression as to a definite example when He said: 'It becometh us [me] to fulfil all righteousness' (Mat_3:15).

2. The fact of His obedience.—If we test this by the Ten Commandments as substantially embracing the whole moral law, we find His obedience complete. They are mostly prohibitions, and we do not find Him infringing them. It cannot be said that this silence of the Scriptures as to transgressions does not prove His entire conformity to them, and leaves room for the doubt whether His obedience was perfect; since He was surrounded by watchful enemies who magnified variations that were not disobedience, and would have mentioned any real disobedience with eagerness. The honour which He paid to God was as perfect as His perception of the spiritual nature of His worship was clear (Joh 4:24). He observed the Sabbath, being found regularly in the synagogue on that day (Luk 4:16 'as his custom was'). The fact that He did no work that was contrary to the Sabbath commandment, is shown clearly by the fact that He was repeatedly attacked for immaterial things and for exercising His healing power upon that day, for which He successfully defended Himself (Mat 12:3; Mat 12:7; Mat 12:11-12). To those of another race and time He may seem to have been lacking on one occasion in respect for His mother, viz. at the marriage in Cana of Galilee (Joh 2:4). But the appellation 'Woman' was not disrespectful, for it was used in the tenderest way at the cross (Joh 19:26); nor was it disrespectful to reprove officious interference; nor was Mary left unsatisfied (Joh 19:5), but expected His compliance with her hinted request. So much for the negative side of the moral law. On its positive side, as comprehensively stated by Him in the words, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself' (Mat 22:39), none was ever so zealous of God's honour, or of preserving His own communion with Him (Joh 10:30; Joh 17:11; Joh 17:21-23; Joh 17:25), as Jesus. And love of neighbour, as interpreted first fully by Himself (Luk 10:30 ff.), He exemplified in all His contact with suffering and needy humanity. Nor did He fail in that harder sort of obedience which consists in quick response to the personal will of God manifested in providence (Mat 4:4, Luk 2:49, Joh 12:27-28). His care for the ceremonial law, besides the cases already cited, may be seen by His recommending the lepers whom He cleansed, on two occasions, to observe the law of Moses provided in their case (Luk 5:14; Luk 17:14).

3. His sinlessness.—We thus see in the life of Jesus no offence against the law of right. There is no evidence of sinfulness. But this would not in itself establish His sinlessness. Many a man gives the impression of a perfect life, is, according to the Scripture phrase, 'blameless,' who is not 'sinless,' because he sees sin in himself, and charges himself with it. But Jesus claimed sinlessness for Himself. He challenged the Jews to convict Him of sin (Joh 8:46); and He affirmed of Himself that the 'prince of this world' had nothing in Him (Joh 14:30). True, this sinlessness was first attained through conflict (cf. Mat 4:11, Joh 12:27, Mar 15:34), and 'learned' (Heb 5:8), and Jesus Himself shrank from the application to Him of the word 'good' in the absolute sense (Mar 10:18); but it was attained and learned, and this without the experience of failure. Its necessity to the work of redemption gives it its complete dogmatic establishment (cf. Heb 9:7; Heb 9:14; Heb 5:9; Heb 4:15); but the proof of its actuality depends, finally, upon the word or Jesus Himself. Were this the testimony of the Jews, who were self-righteous, and thus incapacitated for judging of their true spiritual condition, it would have no value; but it is the testimony of a specially sensitive conscience, one which saw deeper into the meaning of the Law than others, which enjoyed perfect communion with God (Joh_14:9; Joh_12:45). As such it stands, and is subject to no diminution from our ability to point out defect in Him. As a challenge, it was not met by His adversaries, evidently because they could not meet it. See, further, art. Sinlessness.

4. His superiority to the Law.—His obedience may be conceived, on the one side, as His perfect subjection to the Law. But, on the other side, He was superior to the Law. In respect to infringements of the law of the Sabbath with which He was charged, He did not simply defend Himself by saying that He alone rightly interpreted the law, but He proclaimed His superiority to it. ‘The Son of Man is Lord even of the sabbath’ (Mar_2:28). He set aside certain of the provisions of the Law (Mat_5:38); but He did a more significant thing in deepening the meaning of others (Mat_5:27 ff.). He revealed the true meaning of the Law when He brought it back to its foundation in the all-embracing law of love. The element of the Law which He modified was, therefore, the external, the scaffolding or clothing of the legal principle, not the fundamental meaning of the Law. He came also to ‘fulfil’ the Law (Mat_5:17); and this meant to fill out (πληρῶω), and hence to set it aside as completed and its design accomplished. In the later form of the Apostolic doctrine Jesus was called the ‘end of the law’ (Rom_10:4), in the sense that He provided a new way of salvation, which had formerly had to be attained through the observance of the Law. This was particularly through the sacrifice of Himself (Heb_10:8-14) by which He brought the whole OT system to an end, and for ever cancelled the ceremonial law. When the same idea appears in St. John’s Gospel (Joh_3:14; Joh_3:16; Joh_6:51; Joh_10:17), it may be thought to belong to the same stratum of later teaching; but it is reflected in the earliest form of the Gospel (Mar_10:45), it appears in the institution of the Lord’s Supper (Mat_26:28), and is accordingly to be regarded as the primal and unvarying substance of the Gospel. The Law, then, is abrogated because its object has been attained, and its definite and peculiar prescriptions may give way to more general and spiritual forms of precept. The emphasis is hereafter to be laid not upon the letter, but upon the spirit (2Co_3:6). See Law, Law of God.

5. The capital article of His obedience—the Death upon the Cross.—The later strata of the Gospel history lay emphasis upon the fact that the death of Christ was a subject of the Divine command. Thus Jesus says, according to St. John, ‘This commandment [viz. to lay down my life] I received from the Father’ (Joh_10:18). In Joh_12:27, shrinking from the foreseen suffering of the cross, He says, ‘For this cause [viz. to suffer the death of the cross, cf. Joh_12:32] came I unto this hour.’ The same idea, that His death upon the cross was the essential part of His work which He came into the world to do, and which was laid upon Him by the Father, appears in many other texts in this Gospel, implied where not explicitly stated (cf. Joh 3:14, Joh 6:38; Joh 6:50-51; Joh 6:58, Joh 8:21, Joh 10:11, Joh 14:30-31, Joh 17:13, Joh 19:30). The same conception is fully developed in the other portions of the NT which belong to the same period of development with this Gospel, particularly in Philippians (Php 2:8) and the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb 5:7-8; Heb 10:10). But it is also indicated in the earliest strata. In Mar 10:45 Jesus Himself says that He has come, 'not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' The whole Gospel story is displayed, as it were, upon the black background of the darkness and sufferings of Calvary. Prophecies by Jesus Himself of His own death begin to appear at an early period by intimation (Mat 10:38; cf. Mat 16:24), and at a period still long before the final Passion in more explicit and frequent utterance (Mat 16:21-28 ||; Mat 17:3 ff. according to || Luk 9:31; Luk 17:22-23 ||; Luk 20:17-19 ||). There is evidence in these passages, taken as a whole, and regarded as containing the concurrent and consistent Evangelical idea of the death of Christ, that to Christ the burden of death consisted partly in its physical pain, from which One shrank who possessed the instinct of life among other human qualities (see Humanity of Christ), but still more as something unbecoming to the pure and holy Son of God, associated, as it was in human history, with the idea of sin and condemnation. Or, as St. Paul expresses it (Gal 3:13), it was a curse which He did not lightly take upon Himself. Two things result from this method of considering the death of Christ: (1) that it measures the highest degree of devotion to the salvation of men; and (2) that it was effective because it lay in the will of God, to which Christ was obedient, not assuming it Himself, as a desperate and uncertain remedy, but accepting it as the God-designed path of propitiation and redemption.

6. The relation of Christ's obedience to the salvation of men.—The relation of the sacrifice, which was the main article of His obedience, to the salvation of men is considered elsewhere (see Atonement, Propitiation, Sacrifice, etc.). No text of the Gospels presents the obedience of Christ, strictly considered, as having a connexion with our salvation, except as His moral perfection was among the qualifications for the office of Saviour. The inference which has been made, that the obedience of Christ itself formed a part of His saving work, has been drawn from such texts as Rom 5:19 ('through the obedience of the one shall the many be made righteous'). But this idea receives no support from the Gospels, and none from the text cited itself, when carefully interpreted. The thought of the Apostle is unfolded here in a series of parallel expressions, in which, on the one side, Adam's 'trespass,' 'sin,' 'disobedience,' and, on the other side, Christ's 'grace,' 'gift by grace,' 'free gift,' 'righteousness,' 'act of righteousness,' 'obedience,' are mentioned as equal to one another, and as contrasted, the one side with the other. The obedience of Christ here considered is, therefore, His act of obedience, or His atoning death. The act of obedience saves, not as obedience, but as atonement.

7. The significance of Christ's obedience for religion arises from the exaltation which it affords of the Person of Christ. As the victorious contestant and the perfect character, He calls out the veneration and enthusiastic loyalty of His followers, incites them to greater efforts, and fills them with loftier courage than any imperfect prophet could do, however excellent otherwise, and thus becomes the true 'exemplar and leader' (ἀρχηγός, Heb_12:2) of our faith.

ii. Our obedience.—Christ came not only as a Teacher and Redeemer, but also as an Example. It might be said of all His life, as He said when He washed the disciples' feet, 'I have given you an example, that ye also should do as I have done to you' (Joh_13:15). As the object of all His work was to reveal the Father, and he that had 'seen him had seen the Father' (Joh_14:9), so he who did as Jesus did obeyed the will of the Father, which was perfectly exemplified in Him (Joh_8:29). Indeed, this was the necessary consequence of His teaching office, for He always said in fact if not by word, 'Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me' (Mat_11:29). It was His purpose in the world to bear witness to the truth (Joh_18:37), and to do this not merely by word, but by right deed. Hence the obedience of Christ is the standard of our obedience. We are to be 'perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect' (Mat_5:48), and that perfection is the perfection which is manifested in the Son. At the same time, as performance falls far short of ideal in other human things, so here. There is no example given us in the Gospels of the attainment by a disciple of such perfection as was in the Master. Peter who denied Him, Thomas who could not believe His resurrection, John and James who were fired by an unholy ambition, were the chief among the Twelve, and doubtless as successful as the others. Even after Pentecost, Paul and Barnabas had a sharp contention. All had 'the treasure in earthen vessels.'

The obedience which Christ asks of us is an obedience of the spirit rather than of the letter. He says in one place, 'If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love' (Joh_15:10); but when we ask what the commandments of Jesus are, we find few which, in the form in which they are given, have direct application to the conditions of modern life. He refers to the Ten Commandments when the young man asks what he shall do to inherit eternal life (Mat_19:16); but when the young man is not satisfied, He gives him a test which was not in any of the Commandments nor of any general application to men, 'Go, sell, and give to the poor' (Mat_19:21). His own observance of the Sabbath was not according to the customs of the Jews (Mat_12:8). He went beneath the letter of the Law to its spirit, and this was His demand of men, that they should obey the spirit of the Law. Hence He reduces the Law to its essential and comprehensive element of love (Mat 22:37-39), which, if a man observe, will constitute the fulfilling of the Law (cf. Rom 13:8). And thus the attitude of one who is evangelically obedient is not that of an anxious inquirer as to every specific commandment and consequent duty, but that of one who freely wills to do the will of God, is animated by the spirit of love, and out of its abounding fulness, by the indwelling Spirit (Rom 8:4, cf. Joh 16:13; Joh 17:17), does what is well-pleasing to God. Such a person might conceivably err as to duty in some specific case, because of lack of enlightenment, but if he has the spirit of obedience, he has substantially obeyed. The spirit will bring him into eventual accord with the objective demands of reason and conscience.

At the same time, none of the specific commands of the Decalogue are set aside. Even the Sabbath was observed by Jesus Himself and by His disciples after Him. The ethical results of the Jewish development were, therefore, conserved by Jesus, who added to them the more spiritual interpretation of the facts of history and experience, and to this extent made them richer and more comprehensive. Not merely judicial false witness (Exo 20:16 שקר עֵר), but every form of lying (ψεῦδος, as the absence of all ἀλήθεια, Joh 8:44), come under His disapproval (as already in Pro 26:28).

The great standard and guide of our obedience therefore becomes the will of God as manifested both in His written word and in His providence. It is not so much the general will of God that we are to seek to learn. This is generally easy to understand and recognize. It is His specific will, as manifested in the course of events, in the unfoldings of our personal history, that we are to learn how to understand and fulfil. Thus obedience rests upon the study of history both general and individual to ourselves (Mat 26:39, cf. Joh 4:34; Joh 5:30), and consists fundamentally in submission to the Divine will.

Sin is therefore not to be conceived of as merely disobedience to specific precepts of the Law. It is this; but it has its secret in the failure to adjust oneself to the will of God as such. Obedience is not profession empty of definite good works (Mat 7:21); it is not even always to be found with those who 'prophesy' and perform miracles (Mat 7:22). The emphasis in the Gospels is laid upon 'faith' in Jesus Christ as fully as it is in the Epistles. This granted, as the important and controlling element of the religious life, obedience follows from it as a matter of course. Such obedience, however defective in form, is genuine obedience, acceptable in God's sight. This is because God wants the man, not his acts; his heart, and not any material gift. With the heart will naturally be given to God every other desirable service.

Hence the penalty of disobedience, since this is essentially difference with God, is first of all separation from Him. It is 'darkness' because men refuse the 'light' (Joh 1:11; Joh 3:18-21). The sinner is in his 'own place' (Act 1:25), the place fit for him because he is what he is. The penalty involves pain (Mat 13:50, cf. Rev 14:11), is judicial (Mat 25:31 etc.), and involves the personal disapproval of God (Mat 25:41); but it is, in a high sense, natural and inevitable. The wicked man, being what he is, cannot meet with any other lot than what he has. Obedience, on the other hand, leads to reward. This is not 'deserved,' and so given as a matter of justice. Sinners will always 'deserve' punishment. But God freely rewards the forgiven sinner whose heart is right with Him, because of His own goodness, that He may express His favour. Thus the lot of the saved man is the reverse of the sinner's, and is a state of blessedness in the presence of God.

☞ Obscurity

OBSCURITY.—Those who are called from darkness to light do not perform the journey instantaneously, and so must be conscious of obscurity, in various ways and to different degrees, in their progressive apprehension of the gospel of Christ. Yet we are assured that nothing is hid, save that it should be manifested (Mar 4:22); and the Holy Spirit is promised us for guidance into all the truth (Joh 14:26; Joh 16:13). All four Gospels speak of a clouding of the eyes and dulling of the ears of the perverse (Mat 13:13, Mar 4:12, Luk 8:10, Joh 12:40). To the heedful and amenable the teaching will be made plainer and plainer (Luk 8:18; Luk 10:21). To the haughty and cunning nothing clear can be vouchsafed (Luk 13:32). In teaching by parables there was necessarily an element of obscurity; but this stumbling-block Christ frequently removed (Mat 13:11), and promised the clearance of all hindrances to the perfect knowledge of God (Joh 16:13; Joh 16:25). Obscurity was not infrequently felt by the Apostles in their efforts to discern the meaning of the Lord's other utterances. The teaching about the eternal food of His flesh and blood for the life of the world was felt to be 'a hard saying' (Joh 6:60). The foretelling of His cruel death and glorious resurrection was not at first understood (Luk 18:34). Indeed, the Apostles experienced a signal opening of mind after the Resurrection in respect of the prophecies implying His Passion (Luk 24:45). Thus in the Last Discourse they are found exclaiming, 'We know not what he saith' (Joh_16:18); and a little later they gratefully confess, 'Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb' (Joh_16:29). Obscurity there must often be when spiritual realities are expressed by the inadequate vehicle of human vocabulary. Such an instance may be: 'This is your hour, and the power of darkness' (Luk_22:53). The living spirit cannot be expressed by the dead letter except in similitudes and allegories (Joh_3:8). When the Infinite strives to find portrayal in the finite, there must be what we call obscurity. Richness of significance and application attaches to heavenly truths which might at first seem obscure (Joh_3:31). Obscurity must disappear more and more, for the darkness cannot confine the Light of the world within any bounds (Joh_1:5; Joh_8:12; Joh_9:5). The steadfast disciple will learn to understand His speech (Joh_8:43), and release from obscurity will convey increase of freedom (Joh_8:32). The gospel is not meant to remain obscure (Mat_5:15).

⚡ Observation

OBSERVATION.—This word occurs only once in the NT, viz. Luk_17:20 'The kingdom of God cometh not with observation' (μετὰ παρατηρήσεως). The verbal form (παρατηρέω) is used: (a) for watching carefully, especially in a bad sense, as a spy or with the object of finding fault (e.g. Luk_20:20); (b) for keeping a religious ordinance (Gal_4:10). This second sense is impossible in the place where the substantive occurs; nor can the malignant sense of (a) be here suggested. The meaning seems to be that the Kingdom will come in such a way that even the close watchers may not discover its approach. The reason given for this assertion is that 'the kingdom of God is within [(ἐντός) or "among" (so Syr [Note: yr Syriac.] ^{sin})] you' (Luk_17:21). Whichever meaning we give to the preposition, a spiritual and therefore invisible presence is indicated. This statement appears to be contradicted by Luk_17:24, where 'the Son of Man in his day' is compared to 'lightning when it lighteneth out of the one part under the heaven' and 'shineth unto the other part under the heaven.'

Four explanations of the apparent contradiction have been proposed: (1) that the earlier verse refers to the Pharisees, who are blind to the signs of the new age, and the later to the disciples, who will have their eyes opened to see it (cf. 2Ki_6:17); (2) that the coming of the Kingdom is a different event from the Parousia of Christ, ‘the Son of Man in his day’; (3) that there is no contradiction between the two passages; because while, on the one hand, there will be nothing for the watcher to discern as indicative of the drawing near of the great event, this being sudden as a flash of lightning, when it has come it will be universally apparent; (4) that the reference to the lightning manifestation is an apocalyptic element from a foreign source that has been inserted, with other similar elements, among the genuine teachings of Jesus. Against (1) is (a) the lack of any discrimination between two classes of hearers, and (b) the breadth of the lightning-like manifestation, which does not indicate a secret revelation for the few, but what all the world can see. Against (2) is the fact that elsewhere the coming of the Kingdom and the coming of Christ are regarded as the same event (e.g. cf. Mat 16:28 with Mar 9:1). Against (3) is the indication of signs, such as, ‘Now learn a parable of the fig-tree,’ etc. (Mat 24:32, Mar 13:28, cf. Luk 21:29). Explanation (4) is to cut the knot, and against it is the fact that not this passage only but many other equally inconvenient passages would have to be removed by an arbitrary process. Thus all four proposed explanations are beset with difficulties.

H. Holtzmann points out that παρατήρησις should be understood in an active sense; it is not to be regarded as a conceivable attribute of the Kingdom, but as associated with the bringing about of the Kingdom. Accordingly, perhaps, we should reconcile the sayings thus: Sharp, critical watching will not bring it. They who busy themselves with this unsympathetic action will neither hasten its coming nor perceive the first signs of its appearance. In its beginning it is already present (ἐντὸς ὑμῶν ἐστίν). Yet those who practise παρατήρησις do not perceive this. Nevertheless, the complete revelation of the Christ in His Kingdom will be universally manifest.

☞ Occupation

OCCUPATION.—This word is not found in the Gospels. It occurs elsewhere twice in the Authorized Version (Act 18:3 [τέχνη] and Act 19:25 [περὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα]). ‘Occupy,’ in the sense of ‘do business,’ ‘traffic,’ ‘trade’ (so Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885), is found in Authorized Version of Luk 19:13 as the rendering of πραγματεύομαι. Christ, as well as His reputed father, was Himself an artificer in wood, or a carpenter (τέκτων). Every Jewish boy, indeed, had to learn a trade (τέχνη), that it might stand between him and destitution if, other resources failed. And however far removed our Lord might be in later life from quondam fellow-craftsmen, this technical education kept Him in touch with His industrial compatriots.

Our Lord's attitude towards the various occupations in which men are engaged is of more interest than details regarding the occupations themselves. Judaism in Christ's day had lost hold of the masses, because its ministers urged a law viewed by themselves in false perspective. Christ denounced them for tithing mint, anise, and cummin, while omitting the weightier matters, judgment, mercy, and faith (Mat 23:23). Hence work and worship were largely divorced. People indulged in pagan-like worry over the question, What shall we eat, and what shall we drink, and wherewith shall we be clothed? instead of seeking first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness (Mat 6:31 ff.). But Christ's strenuous example proved the possibility of being diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. 'I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night Cometh, when no man can work' (Joh 9:4). He never allowed danger to interfere with duty—'Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world. But if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him' (Joh 11:9-10). Christ poured contempt on that monastic spirit which creates artificial distinctions and exalts religious officials, devoid of religious motives, at the expense of those who, though engaged in less responsible callings, are more devout. He reprobated the Pharisee who thanked God for his superiority to other men; and justified the Publican who was a butt for his fellow-worshipper's sneers (Luk 18:10 ff.). He rebuked Simon, haughtily hospitable, and commended the kindly woman, whose love exceeded her pride (Luk 7:44 ff.). He held up the priest and Levite to perennial scorn; and crowned with approbation that Samaritan who proved more humane, if he did not profess to be as holy as they (Luk 10:30 ff.). St. Luke relates with professional delight how Jesus defended His own act of healing on the Sabbath day, against the false spirituality that saw in it a breach of the Fourth Commandment (Luk 13:15 f., Luk 14:3 ff.).

A legitimate inference from all this is that our Lord—with His healthy outlook on life—would encourage all the honest occupations which ministered to man's varied needs. The Apostles' teaching surely reflected the mind of their Master on this subject. If eating and drinking could contribute to the glory of God (1Co 10:31), then all the occupations which provided food and drink could be pursued in the same spirit. St. Paul enjoins on bishops and other teachers of the gospel to inculcate upon Christians that they should maintain good works for necessary uses (Tit 3:14). That means for the support of themselves and families, and relief of the needy. This is a duty as imperative in its own place as the duty of the ministry, and the Apostle lays great stress on it. 'This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men' (Tit_3:8), i.e. of general benefit and advantage to mankind. Thus a man's occupation, instead of being a hindrance to religion, is a part of it,—that sphere in which he can prove himself a doer of the word,—and faithfulness is required there as much as anywhere else (Luk_16:10). ⚠️ Offence

OFFENCE.—This article deals with the ideas connected with the words σκάνδαλον and σκανδαλίζειν, and, in so far as they are applied in the same moral sphere, with those suggested by προσκοπτειν, πρόσκομμα, and ἀπρόσκοπος. The literal meaning of σκάνδαλον, which is probably the Alexandrian form of σκανδάληθρον, may be the part of a trap to which the bait is fastened, and which, when it is touched, springs up and catches the victim; but in Scripture the sense is not so definite. It may be questioned, indeed, whether it is ever used literally; and the figurative or ethical use of it, which is peculiar to Scripture, is what we are now to investigate. The one idea which is constant in every use of the word, literal or figurative, is that of hurt sustained; it may even be of ruin incurred, by the person who encounters the σκάνδαλον. It will be convenient to exhibit the Scriptural view of the subject by referring (1) to the experience of Jesus; (2) to the teaching of Jesus; and (3) to the application of this in the Apostolic Church.

1. Experience of Jesus.—When Jesus visited Nazareth, and taught in the synagogue so that all were astonished, astonishment soon passed into a kind of carping criticism. 'Whence hath this man these things, and what is the wisdom that has been given to him? And these mighty works that are being done by him? Is not this the carpenter?' And so on (Mar_6:2 f. ||). The people had been used to Jesus in one aspect or character, and they could not adjust themselves to Him in another. There was something in His present appearance and claims which they could not get over: as the Evangelists put it, ἐσκανδαλιζοντο ἐν αὐτῷ. Jesus Himself was the σκάνδαλον with which, for the time at least, they collided: it was to their hurt even at the moment (He could do no mighty work there because of their unbelief, Mar_6:5), and it would be their ruin if it were their final attitude. Probably before Jesus can become a σκάνδαλον, men must have felt the attraction in Him: it is only when closer acquaintance reveals something in Him, or in the consequences of attachment to Him, which is repellent to the natural man, that He becomes a σκάνδαλον, and those who were once attracted fall away. They stumble at something which attachment to Him involves; they cannot get over it, and so they desert Him. This is the connexion in which σκανδαλιζεσθαι occurs in Mar_14:27; Mar_14:29 and ||. Jesus on the last night of His life recalls to the Twelve the prophecy of Zechariah (Zec_13:7): ‘I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered,’ and applies it by adding, ‘All ye σκανδαλισθήσεσθε ἐν ἐμοὶ ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ταύτῃ.’ They had felt the charm of Jesus, and continued with Him in His temptations so far; but a Messiah who should be seized, tortured, and crucified by sinners would be too much for them. In spite of all they had seen and felt in Him, they would stumble at this, and leave Him in the lurch. It is the same idea, mutatis mutandis, which is found in Mar_4:17 and || Mt.; the rocky ground hearers, who have shown a warm appreciation of the word, are taken aback when they find that they have to endure, persecution because of it, and ‘immediately they are offended.’ Luk_8:13 gives the correct interpretation: ‘in time of temptation they fall away.’ The parable of the Sower, standing where it does, is not so much a prophecy, though it is prophetic, as a summary of the disenchanting experiences of Jesus. He had seen many enthusiasms chill, the moment fidelity to Him exacted any sacrifice. In one sense this is ‘the offence of the cross,’ though it is not what St. Paul means by this expression. We are in the same circle of ideas in Mat_24:1 f., Joh_16:9 f. Jesus warns His disciples of coming persecutions; they as well as He have the cross to bear; and while many will stumble at it,—that is, find it too much for them, a thing which they cannot get over, and must simply decline,—He tells the Twelve beforehand, that being forewarned they may be forearmed against the peril of apostasy.

One of the most striking instances of σκάνδαλον in the experience of Jesus is that which is connected with John the Baptist. John was evidently disappointed somehow in Jesus. He had had reason to regard Him as the Messiah, but He was not the Messiah John had expected. Where were the axe and the fan and the consuming fire? Why, if the Messiah had really come, were not all wrongs irresistibly righted? Why was a true servant of God like himself left to suffer for fidelity to his Master? It is to this temper in John that Jesus says, 'Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me' (Mat 11:6, Luk 7:23). We must not impose our preconceptions on God, and dictate to Him the terms on which He may have recognition from us. This always implies the risk that we may stumble at what He actually does—refuse to recognize Him in Jesus because the manifestation does not square with our demands. The Baptist here is a perfect illustration of St. Paul's words, written in immediate connexion with his idea of Christ as σκάνδαλον: 'Jews claim signs.' They say, Let God signalize His presence; let Him make bare His holy arm, and break in pieces the oppressor, and we will see and believe Him; and when they see nothing of this in Jesus, they stumble at Him. He becomes a σκάνδαλον to them. And just as Jesus in His acts may become an offence to those who anticipated something quite different, so may He be by anything disconcerting or too challenging in His teaching. Thus the Pharisees in Mat 15:12 were offended by the word in which He seemed to abolish the distinction between clean and unclean meats: they could not get over the idea that a distinction on which so much of their sanctity depended should be so summarily swept away. It finally repelled them from Jesus. And in Joh 6:61 we find disciples put out, as it were, by the hard sayings about eating the flesh of the Son of Man, and drinking His blood: it is almost more than they can stand, and Jesus asks τοῦτο ὑμᾶς σκανδαλίζει; 'Doth this cause you to stumble?' Almost anything in Jesus may become a ground of stumbling—the demands He makes, the sacrifices which fidelity to Him entails, His disappointment of our expectations, the paradoxical and apparently impossible elements of His teaching. And all these become grounds of stumbling to those who have made some acquaintance with Him, been to some degree attracted and held by Him. To be offended in Him is the sin of those who have had the opportunity of being disciples.

Even though the words σκάνδαλον, σκανδαλίζειν, are not used at every point, the whole of the central division of the Gospel according to Matthew (chs. 11-18) may be read as a series of illustrations of them. In ch. 11 we have the Baptist, the whole generation (Mat 11:16 ff.), the favoured cities (20 ff.), and especially the wise and prudent (Mat 11:25), offended in Jesus. In ch. 12 we have first the Pharisees, and then His mother and brothers. In ch. 13 the parable of the Sower gives the keynote: it is the experience of one who knows what it is to be an offence: cf. Mat 13:21; Mat 13:41. In ch. 14 there is the miraculous feeding with which, the great 'offence' proved in Joh 6:14 f., Joh 6:66 is connected. Then cf. Mat 15:12; Mat 16:23; Mat 17:17; Mat 17:27; Mat 18:6 ff.

There is another side to the experience of Jesus, that in which the σκάνδαλον is not found in Him, but presented to Him. In Mat 16:23 He says to Peter σκάνδαλον εἶ ἐμοῦ.

He had been telling His disciples for the first time of the necessity of His death, and Peter had made a vivacious remonstrance. He had tried, in short, to put Jesus at fault about the path appointed for Him by the Father. He had the human temper which avoids suffering at all costs, not the Divine love which at any cost is faithful to its calling; and in yielding to his human temper he had made himself a stumbling-block in Jesus' way. It is a signal illustration of 'a man's foes shall be they of his own household.' But Jesus does not stumble: in ὑπαγε ὀπίσω μου, σατανᾶ, He sweeps the σκάνδαλον from His path.

2. Teaching of Jesus.—It is remarkable that almost the only thing approaching to a discourse of Jesus in our earliest Gospel (if we omit the chapter of parables (ch. 4) and the eschatological discourse (ch. 13)) deals with the subject of offences, and this in both the aspects in which we have seen 'offence' appear in the experience of Jesus: Mar 9:42 ff.

(a) There is first the giving of offence to others. The others are conceived as disciples—'little ones who believe' (Mat 18:6 says 'who believe in me'). To 'offend' such means to be responsible for leading them into sin; and when we think what and whose they are, it means to be responsible for their separation by sin from Christ. Thus to mislead 'the little ones who believe' is for Jesus the sin of sins: all the Evangelists record the terrific words in which He denounced it (Mar 9:42, Mat 18:6, Luk 17:2). It is singular that side by side with this both Mt. and Lk. preserve a saying in which the inevitableness of offences coming is admitted, while unabated woe is pronounced on him through whom they come. Nothing is said by Jesus about how they come, that is, about the ways in which the little ones who believe are led into sins which put them at fault about Him; but what has been said above about Jesus as a σκάνδαλον has its application here. What is meant is in principle to seduce them to ways of thinking or acting such as led men to stumble at Jesus while He lived. It is only in the Christian society that this sin can be committed, and there is something peculiarly solemn in the picture of the Last Judgment in Mat 13:41 the Son of Man shall send His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom πάντα τὰ σκάνδαλα. There is in the life of Jesus one very interesting illustration of His own care in avoiding what might cause others to stumble (Mat 17:24-27). Here we see—what will repeatedly come up later—that an inconsiderate use of our spiritual liberty as children of God may prove a stumbling-block to those who do not understand it; and we are taught by the example and word of Jesus that conduct is never to be decided merely by the abstract principle that this or that is in itself legitimate; part of the motive on which a Christian must always act is consideration for others, and the moral significance of his conduct for them. Of course, there is the complementary consideration of what the principle requires, and though it is not to be pressed to the hurt of 'little ones who believe,' it is not to be sacrificed to obscurantists or hypocrites (see for an illustration of this Mat 15:12-14). All this will reappear in what is sometimes regarded as the characteristically Pauline part of NT teaching.

(b) Equally important with His sayings on causing others to stumble are those in which Jesus warns His disciples against allowing anything to cause themselves to stumble. There are three of these in Mar 9:43; Mar 9:45; Mar 9:47 (Mar 9:44; Mar 9:46 are spurious), and they are found twice in Mt. (Mat 5:29 f., Mat 18:8 f.). It is a fair inference from this that, though Lk. does not give them, they were found in the collection of discourses used by him and Mt. as well as in Mk. (Mt. inserting them in his Gospel from both sources), and therefore that they belong to the most surely authenticated words of Jesus. What Jesus contemplates is that one's hand or foot or eye may cause one to stumble—in other words, that something in his nature, something which is in itself legitimate, may mislead one in the spiritual region and alienate him from Christ; and He declares that to prevent such a catastrophe no severity to nature can be too great. The right eye is to be plucked out, the right hand or foot cut off and cast away: it is better to enter into life halt or maimed or with one eye, than to go with two eyes and feet and hands into the everlasting fire. It is easy to argue against this from the point of view of self-realization and the development of all sides of our nature, but the peremptory and vehement tone of Jesus does not suggest arguing. For men whose nature is what ours is, living in the world in which we live, and called to discipleship to Jesus, situations will emerge in which salvation depends simply on whether we have it in us to subject nature to summary and surgical treatment. If a man will do no violence to his nature, but claims liberty for it on every side,—if he will go wherever his feet can carry him, do whatever his hands itch to do, look at whatever his eyes long to see,—the end will not be a complete and rounded character, it will be the forfeiture of all character; it will not be an abundant entrance into life, it will be hell fire. This is the philosophy of Puritanism. It is relative no doubt to human nature as Jesus knew it and as we know it; but as that is the only human nature we have to do with, it is absolute enough. It is as much a matter of life and death in the teaching of Jesus that we should not allow natural impulses to put us at fault about Him, as that we should not become responsible for putting others at fault. The most passionate words that ever fell from His lips deal with σκανδαλιζειν and σκανδαλιζεσθαι in both these vital aspects.

3. The Apostolic Church.—When we pass from Jesus to the Apostolic writings, we find new illustrations and applications of His teaching, but no new ethical ideas. Thus the conception recurs (a) of Christ Himself as σκάνδαλον. In the gospel which presented a crucified man as the power and the wisdom of God, there was something which people could not get over; they stumbled at it and turned away. This was especially true of the Jews (1Co 1:23). They could not accommodate themselves to a Messiah who had been hanged, especially when they thought of Deu 21:23. As the act of striking against an obstacle is often painful and irritating, it was this offence of the cross which explained the persecution of St. Paul by the Jews, and even by Christians who did not know what Christianity meant (Gal 5:11): it was the reaction of their soreness against what caused it. The early Christians, who had naturally difficulty in understanding how Christ could be a stumbling-block, found relief for their minds in this as in similar perplexities by discovering that the disconcerting fact had been predicted in the OT. It lay not outside of, but within the Divine counsel and plan. In Rom 9:33, 1Pe 2:8, Christ is spoken of as λίθος προσκόμματος (a loose stone on the road against which the traveller strikes his foot = נִיבָה אֶבֶן) and πέτρα σκανδάλου (a rock projecting through the soil, over which he falls = מִכְשׁוֹל צוּר). [On the relation of these two passages to each other and to Isa 8:14; Isa 28:16, see Sanday and Headlam on Romans, and Hort on 1 Pet.]. What it was in Christ over which men stumbled, Peter does not say: but in Paul it is clear that what the Jews could not get over was the demand involved in Christ's atoning death, that they should renounce the pursuit of a righteousness of their own, and humble themselves to receive in faith the gift of a Divine righteousness. It was the cross that was a stumbling-block, and it was a stumbling-block to pride.

(b) In the main, however, σκάνδαλον is discussed in the Apostolic writings in connexion with the possibility that Christians may cause others, especially weaker Christians, to stumble, and so to forfeit their connexion with Christ. The danger of doing this is the more serious that it is possible to do it (so to speak) with a good conscience. It comes up mainly in 1 Corinthians 8-10 and Romans 14. In both these passages the central idea is that of Christian liberty, and the problem is what are the Christian conditions of its exercise. There are minds which are intoxicated by it, and will not hear anything of conditions. They know what the Christian principle is, and to determine their conduct they do not need to think of anything else. They know, for example, that an idol is nothing in the world, and that is enough to answer all questions about their relation to idolatry—about buying and eating meat which had been sacrificed in a pagan temple, about attending a pagan friend's feast in the temple, and so forth. They know that the earth is the Lord's, and all that it contains; and that is enough to answer all questions about eating and drinking. In this region all things are lawful for them. It is at this point that St. Paul interposes in the spirit of Mat 17:24-27 (see above, 2 a). The knowledge of the Christian principle, he insists, is not enough. He accepts the principle, with a half-ironical depreciation of it: 'We know that we all have knowledge'—as if he would say, but that does not carry us far (1Co 8:1). In dealing with conduct we must always consider its moral consequences, both to others and to ourselves; we must consider not only an abstract principle, which may in itself be sound enough, but the practical effect of acting upon it in given conditions. We must consider, in particular, whether it may not cause others or ourselves to stumble. These are distinct questions, yet involved in each other. If we cause another to stumble by what we do, our own ruin is inseparable from his. St. Paul accepts the principle of liberty, but qualifies it in both directions to avoid σκανδαλιζειν and σκανδαλιζεσθαι. Thus he writes, ‘All things are lawful for me, but all things do not edify,’ sc. the Church (1Co_10:23); and the edifying or building up of the Church is the rule of all Christian action (1Co_14:26, Rom_14:19; Rom_15:2). To be Christian, in other words, conduct has to be guided not merely by knowledge, but by love. It has to include a reference to Christ’s interest in others, especially in the weak; a Christian sins grievously when he asserts his liberty in disregard of that. The extraordinary vehemence of St. Paul’s language in discussing this subject reminds us vividly of our Lord’s words in the same connexion. ‘For meat destroy not the work of God’ (Rom_14:20). ‘Through thy knowledge he that is weak perisheth, the brother for whose sake Christ died’ (1Co_8:11). ‘If meat maketh my brother to stumble, I will eat no flesh for evermore’ (1Co_8:13). ‘Who is made to stumble, and I am not on fire with pain?’ (2Co_11:29). These are flashes of the same fire which glows in Mat_18:6-9. The use of Christian liberty in an environment of paganism no doubt presented many moral problems, all with possibilities of σκάνδαλον in them. A false solution, legitimating a free relation to pagan worship and its ordinary festive and sensual accompaniments, which no doubt caused many to stumble, is denounced in Rev_2:14; possibly in the ‘Apostolic decree’ of Act_15:28 f. we have a more considerate and Christian solution for a special set of circumstances. (For the interpretation of the decree, practically in this sense, see Lightfoot, Galatians, 306 ff.; Chase, Credibility of the Acts, 96 f.). In the whole region in which liberty can be asserted, it is to be exercised only in subordination to love; to violate this rule and so injure others in their conscience and in their relation to Christ is the most un-Christian sin of which a Christian can be guilty. But Paul is aware of the other side of σκανδαλιζειν also—that in which a man so acts as to lead to his own stumbling, and the perdition of his own soul. ‘All things are lawful for me,’ but not only do all things not build up the Church, but ‘I will not be tyrannized over by any’ (1Co_6:12). A man may be befooled by his wisdom: if he is puffed up in the consciousness that he comprehends the principles of Christianity, he is quite capable of yielding to his natural appetites under the delusion that he is exercising a Christian liberty. St. Paul dreaded this for himself. 1Co_9:24-27—especially after v. 1 ‘Am I not free?’—is written in the very spirit of Mar_9:43-47, and in 1 Corinthians 10 the Apostle warns his converts of the peril which awaits them, if secure in their Christianity they slip into easy relations with paganism. In the end of this chapter the idea of offence is generalized. ‘Show yourselves. ἀπόσκοποι—persons in whom there is no occasion of stumbling—both to Jews and Gentiles and to the Church of God’ (1Co_10:32). This is a final if not the supreme maxim of Christian ethics; there must be nothing in the Christian's conduct which could mislead, disconcert, or repel any person seeking or enjoying relations with Christ. Put positively, it is the rule of the Apostle's own action: 'I have become all things to all men if by all means I might save some' (1Co 9:22); which again is but one form of the Golden Rule. Hence the teaching of the NT on 'offences' can be summed up in Mat 7:12. The only passage in which σκάνδαλον occurs in Jn. (1Jn 2:10) perhaps combines the two references which it has elsewhere. When a Christian loves his brother, there is no σκάνδαλον in him; he does not cause others to stumble, and he does not create difficulties in his own path. 'The triumph of love is that it creates no prejudice against the Truth' ('Wescott, ad loc.).

In the technical sense, implying a formal ceremonial act, three Gr. words are represented by 'offer,' 'offering,' in the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 : (1) προσφίρω, to bring to or near, the general term for the act of worshipper or priest, Mat 5:23-24; Mat 8:4 (= Mar 1:44, Luk 5:14), Joh 16:2; (2) ἀνάθημα, a votive offering set up in a temple (Luk 21:5); (3) δίδωμι, to give (Luk 2:24, cf. Luk 21:4).

The attitude of Jesus to the ceremonial law is, in part, indicated in these references. Speaking to Jews He uses language appropriate to their condition, and illustrates the truth He would teach from their everyday life. He assumes that they will bring their gifts to the altar, and so far 'He respects the practice,' but He adds the all-important truth that the reconciliation of man to man must come before the altar-offering. Forgiveness of injuries (Mat 5:23 f.), filial piety (Mat 15:5 f.), and mercy (Mat 9:13, Mat 12:7) condition all acceptable service of God. In this Jesus takes His stand with the Hebrew prophets, and fulfils their moral law. The command to the leper, now cleansed, ‘show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded,’ Mat_8:4 (= Mar_1:44, Luk_5:14), ought not to be pressed beyond this. The leper was ostracized, and the priest alone could remove the ban, and grant a certificate of health (Leviticus 14). Freewill offerings, over and above the requirements of the Law, were provided for in the Temple treasury (Mar_12:41, Luk_21:4). Of the 13 trumpet-shaped boxes of the treasury 4 were for voluntary gifts. (See Edersheim, The Temple, p. 26; and for the general subject, see Giving; cf., further, artt. Law and Sacrifice).

⚠️Officer

OFFICER.—The term ‘officer’ is used in the Gospels (and Acts) as a translation of ὑπηρέτης in the ordinary secular applications of that term (Mat_5:25, Joh_7:32; Joh_7:45; Joh_18:3; Joh_18:12; Joh_18:18; Joh_18:22; Joh_19:6, Act_5:22; Act_5:28). In other two cases (Mar_14:54; Mar_14:65 || Mat_26:58, Joh_18:36) the Authorized Version translation ‘servants’; the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 in the former adhering to ‘officers’ and in the latter putting it in the margin. In most of these cases the officers are servants of the Jewish Council; in Mat_5:25 and Joh_18:36 they may be regarded more generally as servants of the State. In Luk_12:58 ‘officer’ is the translation of a still humbler term, πράκτωρ, a prison official, described in (Revised Version margin) as ‘exactor’ from his duty of collecting fines. In Joh_4:46 (Revised Version margin) ‘king’s officer’ appears as an alternative to ‘nobleman’ for a term meaning ‘courtier.’

It is evident that in the 16th or 17th century ‘officer’ had a lower meaning than now.* [Note: The most frequent application of the term was not to commissioners in the army or navy, but to petty officers Of justice, as In ‘sheriff’s officer,’ ‘peace officer.’ It is this usage that is reflected in the NT.] These ὑπηρέται belong to the rank and file. They are subordinate officials, with duties purely instrumental, virtually on a level with our policemen. As emphasized in Jn., they are the creatures of the Jews, accompanying the chief priests for the doing of their will; or they may take orders from a captain of the Temple (Act_5:26), or they carry into execution the sentence of a judge (Mat_5:25). St. Luke in his narrative of the Arrest and Trial and in Luk_12:58 avoids the term, but he uses it in Act_5:22; Act_5:26 as above (where, possibly, he is following a source), and four times of religious service—in Luk_4:20 of a minister of the synagogue, in Luk_1:2 and Act_26:16 (Paul) of Christian preachers, and in Act_13:5 of John Mark, who was, in some sense, assistant to Barnabas and Paul. So also St. Paul uses it in 1Co_4:1. In all these cases the Authorized Version renders 'minister'; in two (Luk_4:20, Act_13:5) the Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885, without much lucidity, substitutes 'attendant.'

ὑπηρέτης, originally 'rower,' was used in Greece of an assistant or inferior agent in any sort of work. In particular, it was used in a military sense of attendants on heavy-armed soldiers, and also of adjutants to officers of rank. A similar indefiniteness, but always involving subordination, belongs to the NT usage. The term 'officer,' owing to the secular and especially the military associations of the name, was manifestly unsuitable for the description of a Christian minister of any rank. Such terms of ancient administration as ἀπόστολος (commissioner) and ἐπίσκοπος (inspector) were received into modern languages, not by translation into an equivalent, but by a process of adoption and adaptation. But the ὑπηρέτης, whose title, like these, was extended from the secular to the sacred sphere, was too inferior in dignity and too indefinite in character for such distinction. We have indeed in ordinary usage a somewhat similar rank expressed by the term 'office-bearer,' and there is a special episcopal use of 'official'; while a still humbler dignity, parallel with the secular use in Scripture, is denoted by the designation 'church officer.' Of such terms, and of the term 'officer' as representing the servants of the Sanhedrin, the interest pertains merely to the study of language. No theological or ecclesiastical idea is involved; and for practical utility or correctness the only duty of new Revisers towards this term is to eliminate it entirely from the sacred page.

☩ Offices Of Christ

OFFICES OF CHRIST.—As the specific offices of Christ are handled in this work under their several heads, the treatment in the present article will be general.

Etymologically the word 'office' is from officium, the shorter form of opificium, the root meaning of which is 'a doing of a work' (Gr. πρᾶξις). The meaning of officium being wide enough to include any service or kindness, a more precise connotation is supplied by munus, the technical term employed by writers like Calvin to describe the capital functions discharged by Christ. In the Bible the word is nowhere used of Christ's work, though it occurs in other connexions in OT (פְּרִיָּה) and in NT (διακονία, Rom. 11:13 [Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 'ministry'], πρᾶξις, Rom. 12:4). The idea, however, abounds in connexion with the Jewish Messiah and the Christ of the Gospel. Under the OT dispensation the three principal offices were those of prophet, priest, and king; and 'the innermost pulse, so to speak, of the history of prophecy is to be found in the effort to interweave these three offices together, and to contemplate them in the Messianic image instead of in their distribution among several persons' (Dorner, System of Christ. Doct. iii. 388). Jesus, being the Messiah, fulfilled these three offices, as the supreme prophet, arch-priest, and Divine king. So repeatedly does He appear in these capacities in the NT, that it would be superfluous to enumerate loci.

Passing to theology, we may find beginnings of the official conception of Christ in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Eusebius, Gregory of Nyssa, etc. Thomas Aquinas departs from the triple division of the offices, and makes them coincide with the two states of humiliation and exaltation; the high-priestly office, to which the prophetic is merely introductory, coinciding with the state of humiliation, while the kingly is to be reserved for the state of exaltation (Dorner, op. cit. iii. 391). Discussions as to the relations of Christ's two natures (Eutychians and Nestorians) involved different views as to the way in which He performed official functions. But it was the Reformation, magnifying the sufficiency of Christ in every capacity, that was most fruitful in the exposition of His offices.

'The theologians of the Lutheran Church,' writes Hagenbach, 'further developed the locus de persona Christi by distinguishing between three different genera of the communicatio idiomatum, which were brought into connexion with the two states of Christ's exaltation and humiliation (status exaltationis et exinanitionis). To this they added the theory of the three offices of Christ, viz. the prophetic, priestly, and kingly offices. These definitions owed their origin in part to temporary controversies within the Lutheran Church, such as the controversy between the theologians of Giessen and those of Tübingen, at the commencement of the 17th cent., concerning the κένωσις and κατάψις of the Divine attributes, and the controversy carried on by aepinus in a previous century respecting the descensus Christi ad inferos' (Compend, of Hist. of Doctrines, Buch's translation p. 317). Those of Tübingen said that Christ in His humiliation possessed omnipotence, omnipresence, etc., but that these attributes were concealed; whereas those of Giessen said that Christ laid these prerogatives aside, aepinus said that Christ's soul suffered the punishments of hell while His body lay in the grave, whereas Calvin said that the only hell suffered by Christ was anguish of soul. The Lutherans, again, held that Christ's visit to hell was a part of His exaltation. Such controversies had a reflex influence upon ways of stating how Christ exercised His offices. Our subject is admirably treated by Calvin in the second book of his Institutes, Christ's priesthood being magnified as against Romish usurpations (ch. xv.). Arminius is especially full and interesting in the present connexion. 'Two things,' he writes, 'were necessary on Christ's part: that He should undertake some offices for the sake of men to obtain eternal salvation for them, and that God should bestow upon Him dominion or lordship over all things' (Private Disputations, Nichols's translation ii. p. 380). Both these things were comprehended under the title of Saviour and Mediator. In respect of Christ's priesthood, the preparation consisted in imposition of office, sanctification by the Spirit, obedience, sufferings and death, and resurrection; and the discharge of the office consisted in His offering His body and blood. Re Christ's prophetic office, Arminius raised the question as to whether He received knowledge from the Logos as well as from the Holy Spirit. The functions of Christ's kingly office were legislation, giving of remission of sins and of grace, and judgment. The results of Christ's official work are the gathering of the Church, the obedience of His people, the actual remission of sins, resurrection from the dead, and life eternal. The means of Christ's rule are His Church, Word, and Holy Spirit. To all this the corollary is that no one is admitted even subordinately to participation in Christ's proper offices; therefore no pope can be tolerated.

The Westminster Confession of Faith contains a chapter (viii.) 'Of Christ the Mediator,' from which we give the third Section. 'The Lord Jesus, in His human nature thus united to the Divine, was sanctified and anointed with the Holy Spirit above measure; having in Him all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; in whom it pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell: to the end that being holy, harmless, undefiled, and full of grace and truth, He might be thoroughly furnished to execute the office of a Mediator and Surety. Which office He took not unto Himself, but was thereunto called by His Father; who put all power and judgment into His hand, and gave Him commandment to execute the same.' Along with this may be taken the answers to questions 43-45 in the Larger Catechism. 'Christ executeth the office of a prophet in His revealing to the Church in all ayes, by His Spirit and word, in divers ways of administration, the whole will of God, in all things concerning their edification and salvation.' 'Christ executeth the office of a priest in His once offering Himself a sacrifice without spot to God, to be a reconciliation for the sins of His people; and in making continual intercession for them.' 'Christ executeth the office of a king in calling out of the world a people to Himself, and giving them officers, laws, and censures, by which He visibly governs them; in bestowing saving grace upon His elect, rewarding their obedience, and correcting them for their sin, preserving and supporting them under all their temptations and sufferings, restraining and overcoming all their enemies, and powerfully ordering all things for His own glory and their good; and also in taking vengeance on the rest, who know not God, and obey not the gospel.'

In our day it is less common than formerly to speak of the official character of Christ; and this for several reasons. Definite doctrine as to the Person and work of our Lord is unacceptable in many quarters, and a reaction from the terminology of the schools is common. Questions as to the metaphysical nature of Christ are thought to be too abstract. That Jesus should embody a fulfilment of OT prophecy as to the Messiah is of remote interest to many. The richness of Christ's humanity has been so energetically unfolded, that there is an aversion to contemplate Him in any aspect which might be suspected of dehumanizing Him by representing Him more in the light of a formal functionary than of a loving Son of Man and Elder Brother. Ritschl, e.g., attacks the word 'office' as unsuitable, because office is a special calling with a view to realizing a legal or moral community upon conditions of law (see Corner, op. cit. p. 383).

As against such objections we would submit that the theological category in question possesses too much historic and intrinsic worth to be discarded. Historically it has its roots in Scripture, and controversially it has served to clarify doctrine and to safeguard certain aspects of Christ's Person and work. But, above all, Christ in His official character meets the entire needs of sinful man. On account of that moral evil which blinds the soul to the knowledge and perception of God, we need a Mediator to reveal God and to enlighten the conscience; and here Christ, as the Light of the world, appears in His prophetic office. Next, the effect of light is to disclose the fact of sin and awaken the sense of guilt and the fear of judgment; and here Christ, by putting away sin, by affording access to God, and by blessing us from God, discharges the priestly office. Lastly, by creating an eternal society in which we may live as His loving subjects, serving Him willingly according to His laws, He acts as a Divine king. Nor is there any subordinate office performed by Christ which may not be classified under one or other of these constitutive three.

OIL (טָשׁ, ἔλαιον), by which we are to understand olive oil, was from the very earliest times one of the main products of Palestine, for already in days prior to the Hebrew settlement, Canaan was 'a land of oil olives' (Deu 8:8). The importance of this valuable commodity cannot easily be overestimated. It afforded light (Mat 25:3) and nourishment (1Ki 17:12) to the household; it was valued for its healing and medicinal virtues (Is 1:6 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 , Luk 10:34); it had its place in the Hebrew ritual (Exo 29:40, Lev 2:1); and it was an important article of commerce (2Ki 4:7, Luk 16:6).

The oil was obtained by subjecting the berries of the olive-tree to pressure. The earliest method of expression seems to have been that of treading the olives with the feet, to which allusion is made in Mic 6:15, and perhaps also in Deu 33:24 This process is unknown in modern times (Thomson, LB [Note: The Land and the Book.] pp. 207, 339). Van-Lennep, however, states that the pulp from the olive-press is still 'trodden with the bare feet of women and girls' (Bible Lands, p. 130). At what period this primitive method was abandoned, and made way for more thorough processes, we do not know. The OT has no references that are clear enough to guide us: those that occur (e.g. Job 24:11; Job 29:6) are vague and general, and in none of them is the oil-press specifically mentioned. But from the Mishna (Menâhōth viii. 14) we learn that the processes commonly employed were bruising in a mortar, find crushing in the oil-press and the oil-mill, these processes being consecutive, not alternative.

The quality of the oil depended partly on the time at which the olives were gathered, and partly on the mode of crushing. The best quality was that yielded by berries gathered before they became black (as they do when fully ripe), and pounded in a mortar. Of this kind was 'beaten oil' (Exo 27:20; Exo 29:40, Lev 24:2, Num 28:5). This first quality of oil was got by putting the pulp from the mortar into wicker baskets, through which the strained liquid ran into receptacles placed beneath. A second and a third quality were obtained by further crushing of the pulp in the oil-press, and then in the oil-mill.

In the NT allusions to oil are not very frequent; those occurring in the Gospels have reference to its use:—(1) As an illuminant (Mat 25:3-4; Mat 25:8). The lamps in common use were of earthenware, and small in size (see Lamp). When they had to be kept burning for any considerable period, it was necessary to replenish them with oil from time to time. (2) Medicinally (Luk 10:34, Mar 6:13, cf. Jam 5:14). The healing virtues of oil were highly esteemed by the Jews, and it was much employed by them and by other ancient nations. It was applied, e.g., to wounds (Isa 1:6 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885) to soothe their pain and to hasten the process of healing. A similar usage is found in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luk 10:34). In this instance, wine as well as oil was employed, the added wine imparting to the mixture an antiseptic quality (cf, Pliny, HN xxxi. 47; Talm. [Note: Talmud.] Shabbâth xiv. 4). Oil-baths were sometimes used, as in the case of Herod the Great (Josephus Ant. xvii. vi. 5). The anointing of the sick with oil (Mar_6:13, Jam_5:14) was doubtless based on the current belief in its remedial powers, but may also have been a symbolic act, as was the anointing of lepers (Lev_14:15 ff.). Plumptre suggests that ‘it served as a help to the faith of the person healed; perhaps also, in the case of the Apostles, to that of the healer’ (‘St. James’ in Camb. Bible for Schools, p. 103). (3) For anointing (Mat_6:17, Luk_7:46). The custom of anointing the head or the body with oil was a very common one in ancient times, and was practised by the Egyptians (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyp. [Note: Egyptian.] ii. 213), the Greeks (Homer, Il. x. 577), and others (Pliny, HN xiii. 1 ff.). Among the Jews the anointing of the head with oil seems to have accompanied the daily ablutions (Mat_6:17, cf. Rth_3:3, 2Sa_12:20), except in time of mourning (2Sa_14:2, Dan_10:3). It was also a mark of honour paid to guests by their host (Luk_7:46, cf. Psa_23:5). Anointing the feet (Luk_7:38; Luk_7:46, Joh_11:2) was very unusual. The dead were anointed as a tribute of respect (Mar_16:1, Luk_23:56; Luk_24:1, cf. Joh_12:3; Joh_12:7), aromatic spices being added. (4) As an article of merchandise (Mat_25:9, Luk_16:6). In common and daily use, and to the Eastern one of the necessaries of life, oil played a large part in the home trade of Palestine (2Ki_4:7), and was, further, a most valuable export. We find special mention made of trading in oil with the Tyrians (Eze_27:17), who probably re-exported it, and with Egypt (Hos_12:1). It formed an important part of the supplies sent by Solomon to Hiram in return for the timber and other materials furnished for the building of the Temple (1Ki_5:11).

Ointment

OINTMENT (μύρον).—Nard oil, from a plant found especially in Arabia (nardus), and highly prized at Rome. St. Luke mentions it in connexion with the anointing of Christ by the unnamed woman in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Luk_7:38; Luk_7:46), and again (Luk_23:56) as one of the things prepared by the women for the intended completion of the burial of the Master. See art. Anointing.

In the account of the anointing of Jesus at Bethany, St. Matthew describes the unguent as μύρου βαρυτίμον, ‘exceeding precious ointment’ (Mat_26:7 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885); St. Mark as μύρου νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτελοῦς, ‘ointment of spikenard [marg. pistic nard] very costly’ (Mar_14:3 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885); St. John as μύρου νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτίμου, ‘ointment of spikenard very precious’ (Joh_12:3 Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 , with ref. to Mar_14:3 [marg.]). As this word πιστικῆ is found only in these two places, it is rather difficult to give its true equivalent. It is used by Plato (Gorg. 455) and by Aristotle (Rhet. 1. 2), where it is synonymous with πειστικός, ‘persuasive’; but that meaning would be irrelevant in this connexion.* [Note: In later Greek, however, πιστικός = trustworthy, and the meaning may thus be ‘genuine,’ ‘unadulterated,’ ‘pure.’] Scaliger would translate ‘pounded nard,’ from πίσσω, ‘to pound,’ which is a possible rendering, but lacks analogy. The Revised Version NT 1881, OT 1885 has translated it ‘spikenard,’ following, apparently, the Vulgate rendering of Mar_14:3, spicati. Some would translate ‘liquid nard,’ deriving πιστικός from πίνω, ‘to drink’; others regard it as a local technical term (see Mar_14:3 (Revised Version margin) ; cf. Westcott, St. John, Joh_12:3). The most natural rendering would appear to be ‘pistic nard,’ an Ointment prepared from the oil of the pistachio nut, which is used to this day in Syria for similar purposes. See especially a long note by Morison, Com. on Mark, Mar_14:3, and cf. artt. Nard and Spikenard.

OLD TESTAMENT (I. Christ as fulfilment of).† [Note: On the OT of Jesus see following article.]

1. The ideals of life found in the OT by Jesus.—Jesus’ conception of the life of the OT is that of the life which is proper to the children of God (Matthew 5-7). It is the normal relation of fellowship between God and His children, obedience to God and to His messengers (Mat_7:24). The life for which the prophets laboured, that which they represented as the ideal, was adopted by Him as the ideal, and their labours were continued by Him. He claimed no less an authority to carry on the development of the ideal than the greatest of the prophets had exercised. As the prophet taught (Isa_50:10) that those loyal to Jehovah should obey His representative, so did Jesus when He combined such sayings as ‘He that doeth the will of my Father’ (Mat_7:21), and ‘He that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them’ (Mat_7:24, Luk_6:45-49).

The OT ideal of religious life was the earlier stage of a religious development which He came to continue. It needed no essential change to become that which He wished to establish. It was characterized by an imperative demand for a righteousness which consisted in a thoroughgoing obedience to God, and this was just what Jesus demanded and exemplified. Moreover, while Jesus taught that the ideal of life was to be found in the OT, He was far from teaching that all that was in the OT contributed to this ideal. When He had occasion, He expressly taught that even the lawgiver, Moses, permitted practices which belonged to a lower plane of living than that of the principles contained in the OT. There was so much in the human heart that was hostile to these principles, that for a time a standard of life lower than these ideals was permitted (Mat 19:8).

Jesus, like the prophets, was certain that the religious life for which He laboured was to become a universal religion. His claim of permanence for His utterances (Mat 24:35, Mar 13:31, Luk 21:33) was also a claim that His teachings had the changeless quality of the word of God under the Old Covenant (Isa 40:8; Isa 55:10-11; cf. Isa 51:6), and of God's law under the New (Mat 5:18, Luk 16:17). Words uttered by Him when the Greeks sought to see Him (Joh 12:32), were an assumption to Himself personally of the universal significance for human history which the prophets (Isa 11:9, Hab 2:14) had claimed for the religion of Jehovah. This claim to a unique place in human history and identification of Himself with those lofty utterances of the OT, show that in the mind of Jesus the religious life of the OT had a unique place among the religions of the world. This is equally seen in His declaration to the Samaritan woman (Joh 4:22), 'Ye worship that which ye know not: we worship that which we know: for salvation is of the Jews.'

Jesus addressed His hearers constantly as having the true religion, as nominally recognizing the true and living God, and as needing to do no more than live up to their own religion. He saw in the OT a universal ideal of society, and the principles for a programme of its establishment. The ideal society was one in which the lost should have been saved; into which the called and chosen should have been gathered; in which the repentant should have found pardon, the distressed and scattered should have found comfort; the members of which should love God supremely, and each other as themselves, and should be humble, meek, and pure in heart. During the progress of the establishment of this society, those who belonged to it would be called upon to be merciful, to hunger and thirst after righteousness to be peacemakers, to endure persecution for righteousness' sake patiently, to love enemies, to devote themselves to God without pretence and with singleness of mind; and yet to live lives of radiant goodness, to bring forth an abundant fruitage of beneficence for the sake of Jesus and in His name, to observe the duties which grow out of the natural relations of life, to lose their lives for His sake and the gospel's, to seek first this ideal society and God's righteousness, to go to Jesus and take His yoke upon themselves, and look upon a life of lowliest ministry as the life of highest honour.

In these conceptions Jesus was developing the OT ideal, as will be seen later. An important element in developing the ideal was a maturing of the conception of God. Since Jesus was an 'OT saint' (A. B. Davidson, Theology of the Old Testament, 520), the OT God was His God. Moses had been able to add new elements of meaning to Israel's conception of God in connexion with the name 'Jehovah.' Jesus made a further advance by using the OT word 'Father' as applied to God, making it the dominant name in His own thought, and reading into this dominant conception of Fatherhood all the OT elements of the thought of God. Jesus so enlarged the conception of God that He practically gave a new revelation as the basis of the new development of religious life which He was promoting. This enlargement came in part from replacing the name 'Jehovah' by the name 'Father,' partly by the assumption on His part of a unique Sonship into which none of His disciples might enter (Mat 11:27), partly by the new place given to the Spirit which was no more than adumbrated in the OT.

In these views Jesus was at variance with many of the people among whom He lived. The Jews at large were incapable of understanding them. For Pharisees and Sadducees the OT was a finality. It was a full and complete law incapable of further development. It was to be accomplished, fulfilled, simply by obedience to its letter. Prophecy was formal and literal, and their interpretations were often puerile. The Apocryphal literature shows how far short they fell of the ideals of the ancient prophets in spite of their ethical zeal. There was attachment to noble ethical ideals, and desire to attain them, and yet blindness to the real nature of these ideals. There was a lack of insight into the nature of their own religion, and an incapacity to live anywhere except on the surface of things.

2. Jesus and the Law.—Jesus found in the OT not only the ideal of a life, but also commandments, moral and ritual, by which this ideal was to be realized. It is certain that He regarded the OT as supremely authoritative for the conduct of life. He so accepted it and used it. He emphasized it as giving an authoritative revelation of the mind and will of God. He met temptation (Mat 4:4; Mat 4:7; Mat 4:10, Luk 4:4; Luk 4:12; Luk 4:8) with precepts for life (Deu 8:3; Deu 6:16; Deu 6:13), which exactly fitted the emergency. He also referred to the Ten Commandments as specific directions for conduct (Mat 15:4, Mar 7:10 a; Mat 19:18-19 a, Mar 10:19, Luk 18:20). He treated the OT as giving authoritative legislation when (Mat 22:37; Mat 22:39, Mar 12:29-31, Luk 10:28) He quoted or approved other commands found in the Law (Deu 6:4-5, Lev 19:18; Lev 19:34) as chief rules for life. His practice is not the only indication of His mind. He made a definite declaration of principles, and gave abundant illustration of what He meant by it. The Sermon on the Mount is luminous on this point: Mat 5:17 f. 'Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil'; cf. Luk 16:17.

His words to John the Baptist (Mat 3:15 'Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness') show that His conception of fulfilment included His own personal performance of any and every duty which was incumbent upon Him according to the Law, so that nothing should be wanting to His full performance of every human duty. In other utterances, as Joh 4:34; Joh 5:36; Joh 17:4, His use of $\tau\epsilon\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\omega$ shows that His idea of fulfilment meant the completion of the tasks laid upon Him to accomplish. It should be borne in mind that He considered, and even claimed, that His conduct and will were in perfect harmony with the will of God (Mat 7:21; Mat 12:50, Mar 3:35, Mat 26:39, Mar 14:36, Luk 22:42, Joh 5:30; Joh 6:38; Joh 8:46). This is a real and important mode of His fulfilment of the Law. If He did no more, it would be small help to those who were to preach the gospel. He did it because He was able to do far more, He was able to complete the Law as a law, i.e. to bring it to its perfection as a law. See, further, artt. Law and Law of God.

One wishes to find a clear utterance of the mind of Jesus respecting the imprecatory Psalms. Perhaps it is to be found in Mat 5:44. If the basis of the current Jewish morality respecting revenge found support, as some think, in Psa 41:11, (10) ('But thou, O Lord, have mercy upon me, and raise me up, that I may requite them') and the imprecatory Psalms, then we find the mind of Jesus in respect of those Psalms an expression of feelings which belong to the individual relations in life. Hate, divorce, and revenge are contrary to the principles of the society which Jesus came to establish, and they have no place in His ideal Kingdom.

The OT often had an ideal in solution, as it were, which in the mind of Jesus was precipitated into crystals of perfect and imperishable form. An illustration is the inchoate ideal of Job 31:29 'If I rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me, or lifted up myself when evil found him'; cf. Pro 24:17 'Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thy heart be glad when he is overthrown'; Pro 24:29 'Say not, I will do so to him as he has done to me, I will render to the man according to his work'; Pro 20:22 'Say not thou, I will recompense evil; wait on the Lord, and he will save thee'; Pro 25:21 'If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink'; Exo 23:4-5 'If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him'; 1Sa 24:4-8 the example of David in sparing the life of Saul when he had him in his power; also the similar instance of Elisha in sparing the Syrians (2Ki 6:22); Psa 7:5 b (4b) 'Yea, I have delivered him that without cause was mine adversary.' These were expressions of an ideal as yet unformed; passing through the mind of Jesus, they appear in the form, 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you' (Mat 5:44), or more completely in Luk 6:27 b, Luk 6:28 'Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, bless them that curse you, pray for them that despitefully use you.' And they are exemplified in His prayer on the cross, Luk 23:34 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (on this verse see Westcott-Hort, Gr. Test. ii. pp. 67, 68).

The ideal of true life found in the OT was fellowship with God. The necessary condition of such a life was perfect obedience to the law of love. Jesus found these principles in the literature of the OT, and their authority came from the Spirit, who moulded the life of which the OT was a growth.

3. Jesus and prophecy.—The recorded utterances of Jesus seem to indicate that He laid as real stress on the fulfilment of the prophecies of the OT as He did upon the fulfilment of the Law. This was a necessary consequence of the conviction that the ideal was to be realized. In Law and Prophets alike Jesus found declarations of the Divine purposes in human history, and intimations of the programme of the accomplishment of this purpose. In respect to the latter He expressed a firm confidence that the will of God as declared in the Law should be accomplished. In the Law and the Prophets He found intimations of Himself, of His experiences, and of the relation of these experiences to the establishment of the Kingdom. 'Ye search the scriptures, because ye think that in them ye have eternal life' (Joh 5:39). Were the intimations which Jesus found in the Prophets detailed and exact predictions which He was to fulfil? How did He look at the OT in relation to His own life? Did the Messianic conceptions of Jesus come chiefly from predictions which He found in the OT? Early in His ministry (Luk 4:21), after reading from Isa 61:1-2 He said, 'To-day hath this scripture been fulfilled in your ears.' He continued, and the contents of His speech are described (Lukr 4:22a), 'And all bare him witness, and wondered at the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth.' What these words of grace may have been is left to our conjecture. They may have been like the answer sent to John the Baptist at another time, which seems to show that Jesus regarded the work He was doing in preaching good news to the poor, healing the sick, restoring sight to the blind, as the fulfilment of the utterance of the prophet in this passage. But also the fact that He Himself was doing this work was seen by Jesus as a fulfilment of that prophecy. It is only reasonable to interpret the words of Jesus as affirming that He regarded Himself 'personally as included within the scope of the passage. Again, 'For I say unto you, that this which is written must be fulfilled in me, And he was reckoned with transgressors: for that which concerneth me hath fulfilment' (Luk 22:37). 'That which concerneth me' probably means that which in the Divine counsel concerned Him, whether written or unwritten. The words quoted by Him from Isa 53:12 were a part of the Divine counsel, according to the thought of Jesus. He says in effect: This utterance includes me within its scope and finds its culmination and perfect realization in my experience. The same may be said of the following, 'But that the scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth my bread lifted up his heel against me' (Joh_13:18); 'But this Cometh to pass that the word may be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cause' (Joh_15:25), i.e. 'the words of the OT find their completion in my experience.'

All the most important utterances of Jesus concerning fulfilment of OT prophecy found in His work or experience were attached to no specific Scripture passage, and furthermore we are unable to find a specific OT utterance as the basis. This is a very significant fact, and deserves more careful attention than was needed in the case of the passages just mentioned; cf. Mat_26:54 'How then should the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?'; Mat_26:56 'But all this is come to pass, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled'; less fully in Mar_14:49 'But this is done that the scriptures might be fulfilled'; Luk_18:31 'And he took unto him twelve, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all the things that are written by the prophets shall be accomplished unto the Son of Man.' Most important of all are Luk_24:26-27; Luk_24:44-47 'Behoved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory? And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself.... And he said unto them, These are my words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, how that all things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms, concerning me. Then opened he their mind, that they might understand the scriptures, and he said unto them, Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer, and rise again from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all the nations, beginning from Jerusalem.' In these passages Jesus taught plainly that the OT testified that His death and resurrection were necessary antecedents to the preaching of repentance and the forgiveness of sins. In other words, according to Jesus, the OT clearly showed that His death and resurrection were a necessity in the Divine economy. The exact nature of this necessity has not been preserved in the record of the teachings of Jesus. We may say that in harmony with Scripture we should regard this necessity as not due to any arbitrariness on God's part, or to any necessity of a mechanical conformity to the utterances in the OT. Rather, in the nature of things, it was due to the hardness of the human heart, which necessitated such experiences on the part of a Saviour in order to overcome its hardness.

It is quite significant that no one passage is quoted or mentioned in the reports of the teaching of Jesus given by Him after His resurrection. Yet He taught His disciples explicitly that His sufferings, death, and resurrection were necessary in order to fulfil the OT. Further, the disciples, after they understood the Scriptures, also saw the necessity of the death and resurrection. For the most part, the early utterances of the Apostles, as recorded in the Book of Acts, show the same reticence respecting specific OT passages which Jesus had shown.

We must believe that in its general tenor the Apostles taught what they had learned of Jesus. Is it not possible that the speech of Stephen before the Sanhedrin gives us very nearly the character of the teaching of Jesus? This is an argument from broad historical analogies and principles rather than a use of particular passages. In support of this suggestion we may turn to the utterances of Jesus, before His crucifixion, respecting His sufferings. See art. Announcements of Death.

The only passages of the OT which Jesus is recorded as having quoted in any relation to His sufferings are Psa_35:19; Psa_41:9 (Hebrew 10) Psa_69:4 (Hebrews 5), Isa_53:12, and Zec_13:7. Did Jesus see specific predictions in these passages?

Before attempting to answer this question, it will be well to note what He said respecting the suffering of others than Himself which was due to their religious activities. He affirmed that in the past the world had been bitterly hostile towards those who worked for the doing of God's will on earth. In Mat_5:11 f., Luk_11:47-49, and similar passages, Jesus called to mind the fact that God's messengers to His people had encountered bitter hostility throughout the past. In passages like Mat_10:17; Mat_10:22; Mat_10:34-36; Mat_23:29-31; Mat_23:34; Mat_23:37, Mar_10:30, Luk_12:49-53; Luk_13:34, Joh_15:18-25; Joh_17:14-15. He showed that such hostility is inevitable in the progress of His Kingdom. The spirit and methods of the world in the midst of which His Kingdom must develop are wholly alien to those of the Kingdom, therefore Jesus must meet hostility, and so must His disciples. The work of Jesus in the establishment of the Kingdom was conditioned by a long historical development which had already been centuries in progress when He came.

A long-continued historical movement, however complex, tending toward one goal has a substantial unity of character in all stages of its development. The various attitudes assumed by men towards the great features of such a movement are substantially the same from generation to generation, from age to age. Human beings persistently manifest their attitude in modes that are practically identical. Hence arise the oft-noted historical parallels. The fact that at one stage of a movement persons may act as persons do at another stage is the essential element of a historical parallel. In a long-continued development of a specific character nearly identical situations will often be repeated, and nearly identical experiences will often occur.

More noteworthy than mere historical parallels is the substantial identity of moral attitude and conduct seen in the persons whose experiences constitute the historical parallels. These facts can be verified from the political life of all peoples which has been recorded and transmitted to us. Nay, even movements separated widely in time and place, and not in the direct lines of historical development, give striking instances of historical parallels, and substantial identity of human character and conduct. This is notably exemplified in the entire history of the attempt to establish an ideal society, from Moses until the present day. Every attempt of men to establish the coming perfect society had some likeness to the labours which were to follow it. Every person, therefore, who shared in the earlier parts of the work in some respect foreshadowed those who should come later, including Him who should complete it. The earlier is the type of the later. So the persons in the earlier stages were typical of those in the later stages. So also were the Institutions which were auxiliary to the labours of these persons, or instrumental in their hands, typical of elements involved in the final accomplishment of the work to which they contributed. The later experiences are more complex than the earlier ones. For this reason we may say that the earlier ones foreshadowed the later, but we do not say that the earlier ones show with anything like exactness what the later ones were to be. Nevertheless, there is so much of likeness that similar language may often be used respecting them both. The names or descriptions of the earlier may, in a measure, fit the later. It was thus that Jesus properly gave the name Elijah to John the Baptist (Mat 17:10-13), and appropriated for him the utterance in Mal 4:5 (Heb. 3:23), as He had done more explicitly (Mat 11:10-14) in the use of Mal 3:1.

It is a most noteworthy fact that men who would gain power over others to secure their, transformation of character, must gain that power by self-denial and suffering. This was the philosophy of history given by Deutero-Isaiah. It was recognized by Stephen in his address before the Sanhedrin. Is it likely that Jesus had any less insight into the meaning of the history of His race, and the nature of the work which He had to do, than the prophet of the Exile? The teachings of Jesus show that He saw that the ideal state of society could come only by means of a contest with human selfishness and victory over it. The conflict presents essentially the same aspects in all stages of its progress. A successful issue of any long struggle is the consummation of all the previous stages of that struggle. Any complete realization of an ideal sought in the past is the consummation of that ideal. Also any conflict or experience securing the consummation of the ideal is equally the consummation of those seemingly fruitless conflicts and sufferings in the previous stages of the striving after the ideal. The history of redemption is organic. All the earlier stages typify the later ones.

Among other things, two facts have come to clear recognition at some stage in this discussion. One is that Jesus knew that the society which He was labouring to establish, the Kingdom of God, was certain to be established, and that both the chief place in the establishment of it and the supreme place in it after its establishment belonged to Him. The other fact is that Jesus recognized the inevitable and deeply rooted antagonism which He and His society must encounter and overcome, and that the way of suffering was the only path by which He could reach the goal of success.

The conviction of the certainty of the establishment of the Kingdom of God must accordingly carry with it the conviction that all the conflicts and sufferings necessary to the establishment of this Kingdom were equally certain. Without doubt, Jesus saw in the OT Scriptures those experiences narrated and depicted which were necessary as the conditions of accomplishing the work which belonged to the establishment of the Kingdom of God. He claimed that He was establishing the Kingdom, that the foremost place in it belonged to Him, and that the position of men in the Kingdom was determined by relation to Himself. Accordingly He, the pre-eminent agent in the establishment of the Kingdom, in order to accomplish the purpose for which He was labouring, must accept into His experience all the trial and conflict which could befall any person engaged in the same work. OT prophecy, therefore, as a programme of the establishment of the Kingdom, depicted the experiences and labours of God's servants, which were an unavoidable part of their work in achieving the results which they sought. The Synoptics record the sense of Jesus that sufferings prophesied in connexion with the establishment of the Kingdom were necessary (δεῖ, Mat_16:21 et al.). He saw that the goal was certain to be reached, and that the OT representation of the toils, sufferings, and experiences necessary for the accomplishment of the labour which He was to perform concerned Him more fully than they concerned any one else, because the chief place in the Kingdom was His. So all the partial successes and the unsuccessful attempts in past generations to establish the ideal society were prophetic of what must come before the goal should be reached.

We must believe that this typical nature of the OT records and prophecy was that which Jesus had in His mind when He applied the OT prophecies to Himself. This is a principle, and the use which Jesus made of the OT in ethical and spiritual matters was so prevalently that of principle, that it is most natural to regard the use of prophecy as that of principle. Like the Semitic mode of presenting principles by concrete examples, so was His use of the OT Scriptures by definite illustrations and allusions to individuals. The instances noted above of the use of Isa_53:12, Zec_13:7, Psa_41:9 (Hebrew 10) Psa_35:19; Psa_69:4 (Hebrews 5), may all without violence be interpreted as concrete illustrations of principles, instead of being regarded as citations of specific predictions of His individual experience. Jesus saw in Himself the fulfilment of all that belonged to the life of conflict which must be met by any of the members of the Kingdom of blessing, and of all that belonged to the work of deliverance of the people from those habits of life which enslaved them, and which might render them liable to re-enslavement after having once experienced some release.

The view thus derived from the broad consideration of the teaching of Jesus is supported by the various words conveying the idea of fulfilment in respect to the OT utterances and their relation to the experiences of Jesus (τεληρῶω, Mat_26:54;

Mat 26:56, Mar 14:49, Luk 4:21; Luk 24:44, Joh 13:18; Joh 15:25; Joh 17:12; ἀναίτη ριω, Mat 13:14; πίμπληται Luk 21:22; τέλος, Luk 22:37; τελεω, Luk 18:31; Luk 22:37, Joh 19:30). The study of these passages gives the idea of the completion of the incomplete, the culmination of a process, as was the case in the use of the first of the above words when applied to the Law. e.g. Mat 13:14; the generation of Jesus exemplified in their conduct, more fully than any previous generation could have done, that wilful blindness, that spiritual insusceptibility described in Isa 6:9-10. Thus in the experience of Jesus He thought that nothing was to be lacking of the element of differing which was the indispensable condition of His entering into the fulness of power needed by the Messiah. Since He was the One who should perfect the work for which so many before Him had toiled and suffered, He must gain His power by the same method as they, for the very nature of things made this a necessity, and His experience must fulfil theirs by taking up into it every variety known by them, and fill out to complete realization every type of suffering by which one must enter into power. He needed greater power than others, hence He must suffer much more than they.

It is to be noted that the large and broad conception of prophecy which is evident in the words of Jesus is not equally evident in the writings of the Evangelists. Mark and Luke make little use of prophecy, and present no variation from the method of Jesus.
Matthew and John had much more use for OT prophecy. As Orientals, they also would naturally follow the example of Jesus in the use of the common method of teaching by illustration. Those passages which in the mouth of Jesus would be of illustrative value were often stated by the Evangelists so as to seem the fulfilments of strict predictions. The following are passages of this sort: Mat 1:22-23; Mat 2:15;
Mat 2:17-18; Mat 2:23; Mat 8:17; Mat 12:17-21; Mat 21:4-5; Mat 27:9-10, Joh 2:17;
Joh 12:14-16; Joh 19:24; Joh 19:36-37. See, further, art. Prophecy.

☞ Old Testament (II. Christ As Student And Interpreter Of).

OLD TESTAMENT (II. Christ as student and interpreter of).

1. Importance of the subject.—In studying the Gospels, it is hardly possible to exaggerate the importance of the subject of Christ's knowledge of and use of the Scriptures of the OT. These constituted the main part of the literature of His fellow-countrymen, and by all of them were regarded with a reverence second to nothing else.

In our own day it has become possible to study this subject as no previous generation has ever had the opportunity of doing. Careful textual investigation of the NT has enabled us to be much more sure of the actual form of the text than ever before, and the patient comparative study of the Gospels has set forth their inter-relation and dependence upon one another in a clearer fashion for the ordinary reader than at any other time. Much more care has also been expended on the study of the OT, both in Hebrew and in Greek, and, consequently, the influence of the latter version upon the language of the NT has been rendered clearer. Much study has also been given to the language of the NT, so that we are better able to tell when the LXX Septuagint influences it, and when the vocabulary is less that of the OT than it is of the common contemporary speech. The discoveries of recent years among the papyri of Egypt have given us much insight into the ordinary Greek of the period, so that many words formerly supposed to belong exclusively to the LXX Septuagint are now known to belong to the everyday language of the market-place. Investigations of another order have made us better acquainted than before with the vast amount of literature current in the circles of Judaism, only a small portion of which is contained in the Apocrypha of our English Bible. The various Apocalypses in particular exerted an immense influence upon the generation to which our Lord belonged, and much of their language and ideas can be traced in the pages of the Gospels. Again, the mere improvement in the methods of printing has made the study of this subject easier for present-day students. Take such a copy of the Greek text as that of Westcott and Hort. A cursory examination of it shows that not only actual quotations, but even reminiscences, when these consist of not more than a word or two, are printed in uncial type, and so reveal at a glance the fact that there are traces of the OT in the passage. It is very striking to run through the Gospels in such a form, and to find how large a portion of them, comparatively speaking, is made up of OT phraseology. A similar expedient is carried out in the Twentieth Century NT, save that there quotations and reminiscences from the Apocryphal literature are also indicated. In Weymouth's translation, The NT in Modern Speech, the actual quotations from the OT are also indicated in special type, and more clearly still these various sources are indicated in Weizsäcker's German translation of the NT. All these are indications of how thoroughly modern scholars realize the importance of setting forth the presence of OT language in the text of the NT. This, however, is not mainly of antiquarian or historical interest, but derives its greatest significance from the bearing that it has upon the personal thought and action of our Lord. It is always of the greatest interest and significance to discover the intellectual forces that have moulded any great personality. 'Books that have influenced me' always constitute an illuminative section of the autobiography of any great thinker or writer; and to discover that the recorded conversations and addresses of our Lord reveal to us as clearly as they do the literature upon which He has nurtured His own soul, is a great help both in the interpretation of His teaching and in the understanding of His message and mission.

2. Difficulties of the subject.—Fascinating as this study is, it is beset with many peculiar difficulties, (a) First among these is the question of language. It is now generally recognized that the language our Lord spoke was Aramaic, the then current colloquial speech of Palestine. This is, as is well known, revealed in certain expressions in that language quoted in the Gospels, as, for example, the words upon the Cross and those spoken at the raising of Jairus' daughter. The fact that our Lord commonly spoke Aramaic implies, of course, that all the reports of His speeches and conversations are translations, and this at the outset necessarily complicates the question we wish to investigate, for the references that are clearly obvious to the OT or other writings may be the work of the translator; and, on the other hand, many traces of OT language present in the original address may now be lost sight of. It is a further question whether and how far the existing Gospels depend upon an Aramaic original or originals. The well-known tradition, derived from Papias, that Matthew's Gospel was originally composed in Aramaic, has been taken as a basis for various theories, that seek to account for existing divergences among the Synoptics by the supposition that these consist of different translations of the same original.

(b) The second difficulty that attaches to the preliminary investigation of the subject is as to whether our Lord Himself quoted from the original Hebrew text of the OT, or from the Septuagint. A knowledge of Hebrew was not usual among the common people, and in the synagogue services the reading of the Hebrew text was always accompanied by that of an Aramaic paraphrase;* [Note: It has been thought that a trace of this Aramaic paraphrase of Pro_15:27, which uses the expression 'mammon of unrighteousness,' may be found in our Lord's use of the phrase, Luk_16:9 (see Expos, iii. vii. [1888] p. 112).] but, of course, it is impossible to tell whether in any one individual case a knowledge of the sacred language might not in some way have been acquired. But the evidence goes to show that the Greek version of the OT was that most commonly in use, and the majority of the quotations in the Gospels are made from it. Swete has pointed out that the large number of citations common to the three Synoptics, or to two of them, are directly taken from the LXX Septuagint, while in the case of citations that are peculiar to one Gospel a larger proportion show independence of the LXX Septuagint text. Some of these peculiar instances will be examined in detail later in this article; but a curious discovery has been made, namely, that certain quotations contained in the Gospels reveal a closer agreement with Cod. A than with any other existing text of the Greek OT—a tendency that has also been discovered in the writings of Josephus and of Philo, while Swete also points out that there is an 'occasional tendency in NT quotations to support Theodotion against the LXX Septuagint' (Introd. to the OT in Greek, p. 395). It would thus, appear that the NT writers may have employed a form of text different from that of the LXX Septuagint as now known to us in what we reckon its best textual form; but whether, of course, this is only a peculiarity of the writer or was also the form of text familiar to and used by our Lord Himself, is impossible to decide.

An interesting illustration of our Lord's apparent intimate acquaintance with the LXX Septuagint, where that differs from the Hebrew, is given by Dr. Horton in the case of the Book of Proverbs. In Pro_9:12 there is a long addition in the LXX Septuagint text to that of the ordinary Hebrew, the latter part of which runs as follows: 'For he hath forsaken the ways of his vineyard, and gone astray in the paths of his field; for he walketh through a desert without water (διαπορεύεται δι' ἀνύδρου ἐρήμου) and over a land that is set in thirsty places; and with his hands he gathereth that which is without fruit.' The phrase used above for 'through a desert without water' is that employed in the description of the conduct of the unclean spirit in our Lord's parable in Mat_12:43. Again, in Pro_4:21 the LXX Septuagint, instead of 'Let them not depart from thine eyes,' reads 'in order that thy fountains may not fail thee,' using a metaphor which recurs frequently in the pages of the book (see Pro_18:4; Pro_14:27; Pro_16:22), and is frequently employed by our Lord Himself in His language with reference to the 'water of life' (cf. Joh_7:38, and what is said of that passage below).

(c) The third difficulty is that which attaches to the method of the Evangelists in reporting our Lord's sayings. For instance, in Luk_11:29-30 our Lord says that no sign shall be given to the men of His own generation save the sign of Jonah; 'for even,' He adds, 'as Jonah became a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation ... the men of Nineveh shall stand up in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and behold a greater than Jonah is here.’ It is obvious that in Lk.’s understanding of the saying the parallel between Jonah and Christ is that of the preacher of righteousness, and the result that his preaching had upon his hearers; but when we turn to the parallel in Mat 12:40, we find the sign distinctly given as the fact of Jonah’s being three days and nights in the maw of the sea-monster, and as a parallel with the Son of Man’s being three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. But the close of the passage is the same as that given by Lk., so that it seems pretty certain that this fantastic and allegorical interpretation was not due to our Lord Himself, but to the Evangelist, a fact that is made the more probable by the consideration that He seems never to have hinted at His resurrection except to the immediate circle of His disciples. Another instance is to be found in Mar 7:11-12 and its parallel in Mat 15:5-6, where Mk. in the explanation of the custom of Corban makes our Lord say, ‘Ye no longer suffer him to do aught for his father or his mother,’ while Mt. says, ‘He shall not honour his father (or his mother).’ A further study of these two parallel passages will also reveal the fact that a passage from Isaiah quoted in each of them has a different connexion in each Evangelist, and that either considerable freedom must have been used in reporting our Lord’s words, or the Evangelists have themselves introduced the passage as appropriate to the occasion. The well-known method of Mt., in particular, of introducing OT passages as illustrative of incidents in our Lord’s history or as explicative of His teaching, makes it the more difficult in the case of the First Gospel to feel certain when we have our Lord’s own words and when the sayings are attributable to the writer.

3. How Jesus learned to know the OT.—Jewish boys were from their earliest years made familiar with the contents of the OT, particularly with the books of the Law (see Boyhood, and Education). They were not only taught to commit many passages to memory, but there seems to have been a pretty widespread knowledge of reading. While the primary steps in such education were no doubt carried out in the home, there is pretty clear testimony that everywhere schools for at least elementary education were established. Within the home circle also children were accustomed from a very early age to observe certain practices enjoined by the Law, e.g. the keeping of the Sabbath, fasting on the Day of Atonement, the simpler forms of prayer, and grace at meals. Boys at least, as soon as they could walk the requisite distance, were required to be present at the chief festivals in the Temple, and in particular were bound to observe the Feast of Tabernacles. At the earliest manifestation of manhood’s estate being reached, the full observance of the Law was enjoined upon the youth, and, consequently, our Lord’s appearance in the Temple at the age of twelve is quite in accordance with the regular practice of the time. On this occasion the boy Jesus gained His first insight into the Temple worship. Whether He returned at all, or frequently, during His youth and early manhood, to the Holy City, we have no means of ascertaining; but in Nazareth He would seem to have been a constant attender at the synagogue services, for such is noted in the Gospels as being His practice; and when He returned to the town, after His public ministry had begun, it was not His presence in the synagogue that surprised His fellow-townsmen, but the learning of one whom they had previously regarded as an ordinary comrade. In the services of the synagogue He would be familiar not only with the recognized reading of the Law in accordance with the prescribed practice and order, and may even have been frequently called upon in His youth to read, but in the chief Sabbath service He would also become familiar with passages read from the Prophets. These might be chosen at will by the appointed reader, a practice of which Jesus probably availed Himself (Luk 4:17). The Scriptures were not only read in these services, but were paraphrased into the popular language of the people. It is uncertain whether the interpreter was a fixed official, or whether his function was left open to be undertaken by any competent member of the congregation. It is at least permissible to think that Jesus may Himself have played this part many times in the quiet of the Nazareth synagogue, and by the exquisite appropriateness of His language have already shown Himself capable of making the word of God an attractive message to the common people. This is at least a possible fancy, and if it is true, it would form an excellent training for His subsequent service as a deeper interpreter of the inner meaning of both Law and Prophets.

It is almost certain that our Lord would have another advantage in gaining a familiar knowledge of the OT, and in enabling Him to use that knowledge for the benefit of His countrymen, the advantage, namely, of being familiar with another language that was then the common speech of the civilized world, namely, Greek. The LXX Septuagint was, as we have already seen, the Bible most generally used by the Jewish community, and it is quite possible that Jesus Himself read it. In any case, if He could speak Greek (see art. Language of Christ), He would have the immense advantage that belongs to any one who grows up able to speak and think in two languages almost indifferently. It seems as if the condition of affairs then prevalent in Palestine was similar to that which exists in many parts of the Highlands of Scotland, or in Wales, at the present moment. The people will always read a book like the Bible by preference in their own tongue, and its language will naturally be most familiar to them in that form, but they can at will translate it into English, though that English may not, and very likely will not, agree verbally with the version in use. Some such process as this may account for many variants that are found in the Greek quotations from the OT in the pages of the NT. But the alacrity thus attained in mental processes and in the rapid change, not only from the idiom of one speech to that of another, but also from the mental atmosphere of one to that of another, is a great education, and helps the man with a natural gift as a teacher to develop his inborn genius in directions very valuable for those he has to teach.

4. Jesus as interpreter of the OT.—Having now seen how Jesus acquired His knowledge of the OT Scriptures, the next matter of importance is to discover how He attained to His position as an interpreter of them. There was a class of official interpreters, and neither by training nor by personal claim did He belong to this section. Yet His methods of interpretation created far more surprise among His hearers than did the teaching of the orthodox and recognized men of learning. It was not only that His methods possessed the charm of novelty, but that they enabled the people to feel that for the first time their Scriptures had become a new and living book, which no longer pressed upon their souls like a heavy burden, but itself enabled them to bear life's greatest loads. He became, therefore, a popular interpreter of the Book to the weary heart of humanity; while He became, on the other hand, a hated teacher to the privileged class, who felt their profession endangered both by His methods and by the reception they met with at the hands of the crowd. He regarded the OT with much more real reverence than did the scribes, and, indeed, He spoke of it in a way that might almost sound extravagant in its praise, but He also treated its message with a freedom that was surprising, and broke through the husk of the letter till He found for men the strength and the sweetness of the kernel they had not before tasted.

(a) The great ideas that were regulative of the OT revelation were also those which guided the conduct and practice of our Lord, ideas that were central to His thinking, and loyalty to which He demanded not only from all His followers, but from the people who themselves professed to reverence them. The OT idea of righteousness of conduct as consisting in both outward obedience to the ceremonial observance of the Law and inward obedience to its spiritual precepts, were the two points round which His own teaching and practice appear to have centred. It was this, we are told (Mat_3:15), that led Him to undergo the ceremony of baptism at the hands of John, as it was this also that on more than one occasion made Him quote the great spiritual commandments of the Law as containing within themselves the secret of eternal life.

(b) It is not, of course, possible to judge fully from the scanty references preserved in the Gospels as to how far our Lord employed the histories of the OT to illustrate His teaching; but inasmuch as we have no material other than these upon which to form a judgment, we must examine the records that we possess. The difficulty is increased, moreover, by our uncertainty as to when the statements are clearly those of the Master Himself, and when they are due to the editing hand of the Evangelist.

In the passage, for example, in which He refers to Noah's flood (Mat_24:37 ff., Luk_17:26 f.), He has been dealing with the question of the future history of the world. In Mt. the words occur in the middle of the great apocalyptic passage, which is more than likely to have been much influenced by later ideas, and more altered than many sections of the Gospel. As Lk. reports the reference, it is contained in a short section of teaching to the disciples that follows upon a question asked by the Pharisees; but it is a section which also bears upon it the impress of apocalypse, and may be a passage extracted by the Evangelist from what the present writer regards as most probably the first collection of the sayings of Jesus, i.e. His apocalyptic utterances about the future. Apocalypse was so favourite a form of literature in our Lord's day, and exercised so strong an influence upon His contemporaries, that it seems more than likely that the first series of His words to be reduced to writing would be that which in form and substance most readily fell in with current conceptions. Such a collection of sayings also best accounts for the variety of form in which this particular section appears in the first three Gospels, and may also lie behind St. Paul's well-known passages in the Epp. to the Thessalonians. If the theory here suggested is a sound one, that collection of our Lord's sayings would be in the hands not only of St. Paul, but probably also of his correspondents; and consequently his language and imagery would not only be familiar and intelligible, but would have the authority of Christ behind it. In the parallel passage in Lk., above referred to, there is added to the reference to Noah a reference to the history of Lot, and the fate of Sodom and the Cities of the Plain is again referred to by our Lord when He utters His judgment upon the generation that rejected Him, and declares that in the Final Judgment it shall be more tolerable for Sodom than for them (Mat 10:15; Mat 11:24, Luk 10:12). In the same connexion He makes reference to the fate of Tyre and Sidon. According to Mat 12:40, our Lord speaks of Jonah's being swallowed by the sea-monster, but from the parallel in Lk. we should judge that the reference was made only to Jonah's preaching and the subsequent repentance of the Ninevites (Luk 11:29; Luk 11:32).

All the Synoptics (Mat 12:3 f., Mar 2:25 f., Luk 6:3 f. contain a reference to an incident in the life of David, viz. his eating the shew-bread, and, according to Mk. and Lk., his sharing it with his companions. The account of Mk. has a peculiar difficulty, inasmuch as 'Abiathar' is given as the name of the priest, where the OT narrative (1Sa 21:1 ff.) states that it was 'Ahimelech' (see Abiathar). To Elijah the prophet there is more than one reference. In answer to the question asked by the disciples as to what is meant by the statement of the religious authorities that Elijah must be the precursor of the Messiah (a doctrine founded on Mal 4:5), our Lord replies that the advent of Elijah has already taken place—a statement which in one connexion (Mat 11:14) is directly referred by Jesus in its fulfilment to John the Baptist, whereas in another place (Mat 17:13) this interpretation is given by the Evangelist himself. Another reference to the history of the same prophet is that to his visit to the widow of Sidon in the time of the great famine (Luk 4:25 f.), where also an illustration is taken from Elisha's cleansing of Naaman the Syrian. In the former passage there is again a divergence from the OT as to the length of the period of famine. The latter two passages occur in the address in the synagogue of Nazareth, for which, of course, we have only the authority of Lk.; but inherent probability is in favour of our Lord's using such illustrations to show the wider reach of His mission, though it is not perhaps quite probable that He would have done so, as Lk. represents, at the very outset of His ministry. We may therefore, perhaps, regard the fact of the reference as a correct tradition, but the place and manner of it as due to the Evangelist himself.

The glory of the court of Solomon is twice referred to in the Gospels, and that in words of Christ. The first instance is the unfavourable comparison between the splendour of the great monarch and the beauty of the field flowers (Mat 6:29, Luk 12:27). The second occasion is the reference to the story of the visit of the 'queen of the South' to the court of Solomon, and the argument that inasmuch as a greater than Solomon is here, she will bring into condemnation Christ's contemporaries. A general reference to the ill-treatment of the prophets at the hands of their countrymen is made in the pathetic lament over Jerusalem, attributed to our Lord in Mat 23:37, Luk 13:34, while a more specific reference is contained in the immediately preceding verses in Mt.—a passage, however, that is fraught with peculiar difficulties. The whole section is that which contains the woes uttered against the scribes and Pharisees, and bears considerable trace of later editing, even if it is to be attributed, in very much of its present form, to the writer of the Gospel. The passage referred to is contained in Mat 23:29-36, where the religious teachers are spoken of as those who 'build the sepulchres of the prophets and garnish the tombs of the righteous, and who say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we should not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets.' The passage then proceeds to a prophecy of what is to happen later to further witnesses that will be sent, and of their ill-treatment; they are to be scourged and persecuted from city to city—an obvious reference to the treatment of the early Christian missionaries, and, in all likelihood, with the knowledge of their fate before the writer's mind. The conclusion of the passage speaks of the judgment that is to come upon the men of that generation for all the blood shed on the earth, from that of 'Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah, son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the sanctuary and the altar.' It is very difficult to decide what is meant by this last reference, the supposed original passage (2Ch 24:21) having a different name for the father of Zachariah (see Barachiah). In John's Gospel there is a reference (2Ch 3:14) to the brazen serpent raised by Moses in the wilderness, and in His controversy with the Sadducees our Lord shows His acquaintance with the passage in the life of Moses that relates the revelation at the burning bush (Mar 12:26).
